For Reference

Not to be taken from this room

1253329

Every person who maliciously cuts, defaces, breaks or injures any book, map, chart, picture, engraving, statue, coin, model, apparatus, or other work of literature, art, mechanics or object of curiosity, deposited in any public library, gallery, museum or collection is guilty of a misdemeanor.

Penal Code of California, 1915, Section 623.

Digitized by the Internet Archive in 2012 with funding from internet archive

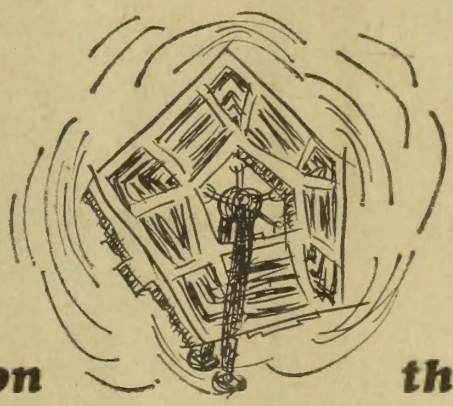
http://archive.org/details/nation209julnewy

GREEK TORTURE JAMES BECKET



THE NATION

JULY 7, 1969 35 cents

S-170R PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

252829

BURLINGAME
JUL 8 - 1969
LIBRARY

Thirty-Six Years on the Merry-Go-Round

Drew Pearson

on War, Love, Graft, Politics, Revolution and the Hiding Places of Power an interview with ROBERT G. SHERRILL

THE PRACTICE OF POETRY

new collections from

JOHN BEECHER
GWENDOLYN BROOKS
KENNETH BURKE
RAMON GUTHRIE
RANDALL JARRELL
JUAN RAMON JIMENEZ
BILL KNOTT
ROBERT LOWELL
WALTER LOWENFELS
JAMES WRIGHT

LETTERS

an appeal to the people of the United States

The following statement has been issued by Pham The Truc, aged 29, who was elected two years ago to the House of Representatives, Republic of Vietnam, from the Province of Binh Thuan. Congressman Truc has left Saigon and is now living in Tokyo, where Jonathan Mirsky met and talked with him. It was Mr. Mirsky who forwarded the statement to The Nation.

Thousands of people every day are being killed and the land devastated in the cruel war in Vietnam. Why can't peace be established in Vietnam—a peace for which not only the people of Vietnam but also all peace-loving peoples of the world are longing? The following is my view on this question.

The regime of Nguyen Van Thieu and Nguyen Cao Ky is the offspring of a military clique and is still, in its basic nature, a military dictatorship. It has been able to maintain its status only by the continuation of this war. In order to buy the favor of its supporters, this regime encourages them to exploit the poor and acquiesce in their activities of corruption. The corruption in Vietnam is no less inhuman for the people than the war itself and the fundamental rights of the people are being trampled upon.

Furthermore, the present Saigon regime never hesitates to enact whatever repressive measure it can lay hands on in trying to banish, detain and oppress religious leaders, politicians, intellectuals and students. The recent arrests of the Rev. Thich Thien Minh, as well as a number of students, are examples of this oppression. . . .

In other words, the present government is a regime which lacks the support of the majority of the people, exclusively relying on a few people who gain profits out of war procurements and exploit the poor.

It is the United States Government which supports this unpopular government of Vietnam, and by advocating the "Vietnamization of the war" it intensifies the military actions. Thus the United States Government is making the solution of the war all the more difficult and adding to the atrocities of an already bloody war.

Through these serious errors, leaders of the United States Government have proved again that there is not the slightest improvement in their basic understanding of Vietnam and Asia.

As a citizen of Vietnam and also as a member of the Congress, I present the following requests to the United States Government:

(1) The United States Government should immediately stop supporting the military regime of Nguyen Van Thieu and Nguyen Cao Ky. (All the treaties which have been concluded between the United States Government and the military regime of Vietnam have no value to the Vietnamese people whatsoever.)

(2) The United States Government should withdraw all military forces from Vietnam. (There is no ground for President Nixon's view, expressed in his eight-point proposals of May 14, that the United States military forces cannot be withdrawn without the risk of mass slaughter.)

(3) The United States Government should be sincere in the Paris peace talks. By being "sincere" I mean that peace for the Vietnamese people, and not the face of the United States Government, should be the priority. Political settlement, and not military settlement, should be the priority.

A believer in God, I pay my respects to the people of the United States who love peace, freedom and equality. I pray from my heart that God and the American people's pious faith in God will reflect the noble traditions of the United States and will show its leaders the right policy toward peace in Vietnam. Pham The Truc

EDITORIALS

Spotlight on Vietnam

If the American people have not lost all collective moral sense, then the full significance of continuing intervention in the Vietnamese civil war must have been kept from them. That the latter alternative is the case is suggested again by the media attention paid to the May 25-June 10 visit to South Vietnam of a U.S. interreligious study team, sent to investigate stories of arbitrary arrest and imprisonment by the Thieu-Ky regime. The coverage was so scanty that there was little danger the average newspaper reader or TV viewer would be diverted from his preoccupation with the troubles of Joe Namath.

Members of the study team were Robert F. Drinan, S.J., dean of the Boston College Law School; Rep. John J. Conyers (D., Mich.); Bishop James Armstrong of the United Methodist Church; Mrs. John C. Bennett, wife of the president of Union Theological Seminary; Allan Brick of the Fellowship of Reconciliation; John deJ. Pemberton of the American Civil Liberties Union; Rabbi Seymour Siegel of the Jewish Theological Seminary and Adm. Arnold E. True, U.S.N. (Ret.).

The itinerary was as respectable as the participants. The delegation met with President Thieu and South Vietnamese government officials, Ambassador Ellsworth Bunker and members of his staff, and conferred with religious leaders, legislators, attorneys, students and a variety of persons of different political persuasions.

"The government of South Vietnam," the report acknowledges, "was helpful in providing data, permitting team members to visit prisons, and in making accessible certain prisoners." The auspices under which the tour was conducted, and the character of the investigators, preclude any suspicion of bias or unfairness. What emerges must be accepted as definitive—and it could scarcely be more destructive of the claim that we are fighting for the free choice of the people of South Vietnam in determining their future.

Before leaving for Vietnam, the team conferred with members of the White House staff and received assurances that the number of political prisoners in South Vietnam was decreasing. In Saigon a few days later, the American Embassy official most familiar with the problem of political prisoners admitted that the number is increasing steadily and, further, that this increase will continue as the U.S. "pacification" program extends further into the countryside. The American Embassy stand is that the prisoners are an internal concern of the South Vietnamese government. This is a convenient fiction to cover an inconvenient fact—that the U.S. mission is ferreting out suspected "Communists" in Vietnamese villages and turning them over to extra-constitutional "Military Field Courts" which lack any procedural safeguards and which in many cases employ torture to extract confessions or information.

Political prisoners in South Vietnam number at least 20,000, and 25,000 is a more likely figure. All are classified as "Communists," although many are guilty of nothing more than advocating a coalition government or steps toward ending the war patterned on President Nixon's proposals. The de facto criterion of "communism" is opposition to the war policies of the dictatorship, but even that is not essential. In the Chi Hoa jail the survey group saw 200 children between the ages of 10 and 14; the charge against some of them was likewise communism.

252829

JAN 13

The group met Truong Dinh Dzu, runner-up in the 1967 Presidential election, who was arrested in May 1968 for an interview in which he advocated a dialogue with the National Liberation Front. As Dzu had envisioned future developments, the real Communists would get only 20 per cent of the vote in a free election, and would thereafter have a role like that of the Communist parties of France or Italy. This probably underrated the Communist strength, but it would hardly justify a five-year sentence, subsequently commuted to three.

Another celebrated prisoner interviewed by the group was the Buddhist leader, the Venerable Thien Minh. Although Thien Minh speaks excellent French and adequate English, a condition of the interview was that he could talk with his visitors only in Vietnamese. Thien Minh asserted: "I have committed no offense except that I want peace." Originally he was sentenced to ten years on a charge of assisting draft resisters; his term was subsequently reduced to three years.

If the number of political prisoners in South Vietnam is assumed to be 25,000, that, in a country with a population of 17 million, is the equivalent in the United States of 300,000 political prisoners. In his talk with the study group President Thieu pleaded that in wartime, and considering the unfamiliarity of his country with the democratic process, he cannot relent in his severely repressive policies. But in that case there never will be democracy in South Vietnam; authoritarianism only breeds more authoritarianism. Even if all American forces should be withdrawn, leaving the Thieu government or a successor supplied with American arms, the prospect is for a permanently repressive regime patterned on Chiang Kai-shek's police state on Taiwan. No doubt such an outcome would be quite acceptable to many in the Nixon Administration, but that peace can be established on any such terms is political fantasy. And time is running out, both for Mr. Nixon and the dubious allies we have selected to represent us in that unhappy country.

'A Calculated Risk'

The Army's new Sheridan tank has just completed its first round of combat tests in Vietnam. The kill score: one dead, three severely burned and several other casualties reported—all Americans.

The dead GI and his hideously burned comrades are victims of an Army "calculated risk." This gamble was to send the newly designed Sheridan tank into battle even though a test manager warned long before it left

IN THIS ISSUE

July 7, 1969

EDITORIALS

2

ARTICLES

6 Greece: The Rack and the Bomb — James Becket

7 Drew Pearson: An Interview — Robert G. Sherrill

BOOKS & THE ARTS

17 Private Gardens, Cloisters, Silent Women — Robert Bly

18 Six poems (Translated by Robert Bly) — Juan Ramón Jiménez

19 Melancholy Monument — Hayden Carruth

20 Pieces of a Broken Mirror — Paul Zweig

22 Sojourner of the Self — Jerome Mazzaro

24 Lyrical Discourse — Germaine Brée

26 The Politics of Poetry — Alexander Laing

28 Hosting Russian Poetry — Simon Karlinsky

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
HELEN YGLESIAS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, JOHN LOGAN; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 209
No. 1

the United States that it was prone to breakdowns and deficiencies that would jeopardize U.S. troops.

High-ranking Army officials have repeatedly told Congress that the Sheridan tank has been operating satisfactorily under Vietnamese combat conditions. Yet, in a still secret report, the Pentagon admits that the "calculated risk" has "shaken the confidence" of the crews operating the new tank. The report elaborates further on the reasons the crews feel somewhat insecure:

The tank has had "16 major equipment failures, 125 electrical circuit failures, 41 weapons misfires, 140 ammunition ruptures, 25 engine replacements (caused by overheating) and persistent malfunction of the 152-mm. cannon."

Also depressing the crews is the Army's field manual on the Sheridan, which did not arrive in Vietnam until after the first sixty-four tanks had been in combat for six weeks. The 20-page manual advises the Sheridan crews as follows: The electrical system is prone to failure; the weapons firing system is not reliable; the new type of combustible cartridge is subject to malfunction.

This is not to say that any of these deficiencies were unknown before the "calculated risk" was taken. The test manager warned:

> The Sheridan is of questionable dependability and unknown limitation. I do not believe that a combat situation where mission and lives depend so heavily on equipment reliability is the test environment to question and resolve these problems.

The project manager made this statement on November 5, 1968; on February 8, 1969, the tank was on its way. On February 15, one week after the tank went into combat, one of the Sheridans hit a mine that would not have severely damaged some of the Army's older tanks. The explosion ruptured the hull of the Sheridan, ignited the ammunition and killed the driver.

Later, an enemy round struck one of the new combustible shells as crew members wrestled to extract it from the chamber of another tank after it had misfired. Three GIs suffered severe burns.

What effect have these "accidents" and the critical combat field report had on the Army's current plans for the Sheridan tank and its continued deployment in the field? Just announced: 171 new Sheridans are to be shipped to Vietnam.

The Answer to Poverty

One year ago the poor of the nation sat on Congress' doorstep, believing that if they drew attention to their poverty, they would receive adequate federal assistance. They came to Resurrection City from great distances, trusting in strangers for their daily needs. Some traveled from California to Washington in school buses, bearing the bounces, the weariness, the strangeness, the homesickness and the homelessness because of their hope in the government.

They endured torrential rains, flooded "streets" and poor plumbing in their plywood town. From most persons they received derision; the contempt of the many mingled in unequal ratio with the real kindnesses of the few.

Some attention was paid to them by Congress, and some concessions were made—an increase of food stamps, investigations like that of Sen. George McGovern's Select Committee on Hunger and Human Needs. But the most tangible result of their ordeal came to them last month when Congress acted in direct response to Resurrection City. The House voted 327-50 to ban all sit-ins, camp-ins and sleep-ins in the capital. The poor, they stated, had "disrupted the seat of government and destroyed public property."

The cost of living rises and welfare is being cut; the poor have the answer to their demonstration of what poverty really is: no more Resurrection Cities. Congress dislikes being bothered, especially by the poor.

To Him That Hath...

The National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition in the United States reports that the Department of Defense plans to spend nearly $4 billion in fiscal 1970 to feed an average of slightly under 3.5 million servicemen. A major part of this sum goes for labor, capital items, etc. For food alone the allowance is $1.7 billion, which breaks down to about $500 per person per year. Even allowing for the government's purchasing power this does not seem excessive, but the government has the same advantage in purchasing food for the poor, and under the Nixon Administration's present allocations the poor stand to get only $77 per person per year.

The ratio of 6.5 to 1 may be regarded as reflecting the solicitude of any prudently managed, normally predatory government for its armed services; but in another, purely civilian, area an even more atrocious discrimination is practiced. Confronted with statistics on malnutrition in the United States, the average well-meaning citizen comforts himself with the thought that at least the poor kids get a good hot lunch at school. But do they? A story by Gene Blake in the June 4 Los Angeles Times, and some nationally collected data, indicate that they don't.

According to a suit brought in federal court in San Francisco by the California Rural Assistance League on behalf of needy children in three counties, the state last year received $25 million in federal funds and commodities to subsidize an average of about 825,000 lunches daily in participating school districts; but school officials arranged to supply to all the children a lunch worth 55c at a reduced price of 35c. Those who have the 35c eat, those who haven't go without. The papers set forth that in one Monterey school district, one out of every two wealthy or middle-class children benefits by the program, but only eleven of the district's 803 needy children receive a free or reduced-price lunch, and three times as many teachers and other adults eat the cut-rate meals.

The National Council on Hunger and Malnutrition estimates that since the National School Lunch program was inaugurated in 1946, more than $4 billion has gone to help the children of the well-to-do instead of the needy. Of more than $500 million expended by the U.S. Department of Agriculture last year, it is said that $375 million, or 75 per cent, subsidized the more prosperous children. It looks like yet another case of "to him that hath shall be given," although the author of that sad aphorism may have thought, in his innocence, that the very young might be spared. It would be refreshing if, just once, a program of this sort were operated for the benefit of those for whom it was intended.

More Dirty Business

J. Edgar Hoover would now have us believe that he was a reluctant eavesdropper and that it was the late Robert F. Kennedy who originated the idea of tapping the phone of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. But Hoover's statements are inconsistent with those made by Ramsey Clark, Nicholas deB. Katzenbach, Burke Marshall and Carl T. Rowan, and with testimony of one of his own agents given under oath. Study of these statements and independent investigation convinces us that some time in 1963 Hoover reported to Kennedy that a "Communist" was working in Dr. King's office and requested authorization to install a wire tap. Kennedy approved the request for a limited period, we are told, and later assumed it had been discontinued.

In the meantime, however, Hoover, without the Attorney General's approval, had managed also to place "bugs" in Dr. King's home, office, and on at least one occasion in a hotel room occupied by Dr. King. Hoover assures the country that the tapping and/or bugging were discontinued on April 30, 1965, but his own agent has testified that the surveillance continued until Dr. King's death. Was the bugging, as distinguished from the wire tap, ever authorized? And who authorized the surveillance to continue after April 30, 1965? Not Clark, not Katzenbach, and not Kennedy, who resigned as Attorney General on September 3, 1964. Clark tells us that Hoover made repeated requests for authorization to install wire taps on Dr. King, none of which he granted, and that the last request came two days before the assassination.

But there is an aspect of the surveillance that is more repulsive than the fact that it was ever undertaken. Summaries of the recordings, we learn, were revealed to members of the House Appropriations Subcommittee headed by Rep. John J. Rooney (D., N.Y.). Rooney and his colleagues were so "shocked" by what they learned that they thought the Speaker should have the privilege of listening to the recordings (Congressional Record, June 18, 1969, p. E-5056). How many other members of Congress saw the summaries or listened to the tapes we do not know, but word travels far and fast in those circles. Accounts have appeared in print of how some of the tapes, which related to Dr. King's private life, were played for the entertainment of journalists who happened to visit the FBI establishment.

Carl T. Rowan, who headed USIA, says that he was familiar with the summaries. Are such summaries, then, shown routinely to heads of government agencies? In this issue Drew Pearson is quoted as saying that he had some of the tapes or summaries. Rowan reports that "for years the FBI has had a small army of agents and allies roaming the country whispering the dirt about Dr. King."

This, we submit, constitutes an intolerable situation, one which the federal government cannot, in all conscience, ignore. Ramsey Clark is clearly on sound ground in saying that Hoover should resign. More to the point, he should be forced to testify under oath, subject to cross-examination, concerning every aspect of this ugly incident. To permit him to distort the truth, by taking advantage of the fact that neither Dr. King nor Robert F. Kennedy can refute him, is to involve Congress, the Executive and the White House as accessories to his malicious slander of the dead.

The Cook Doctrine

Fred J. Cook, the well-known crime reporter and liberal journalist, wrote a feature article for The Nation and was harshly attacked by the right-wing Rev. Billy James Hargis over the chain of radio stations that carry his diatribes. Cook, who is not one to take verbal muggings passively, requested equal time. Some of the stations acquiesced and played a tape of Cook's rebuttal. If everyone was not as happy as a lark, there was no ill feeling, and the time of all concerned was conserved.

However, in reply to his request, some of the stations sent Cook a rate card and offered to sell him time for rebuttal. One of these was WBCG in Red Lion, Pa. (near York), whose transmitter often lays down a serviceable signal well beyond the usual FM range. Cook sued. On June 9 the Supreme Court decided unanimously in his favor, thereby upholding the constitutionality of the Federal Communications Commission's fairness doctrine.

Obviously, had it decided otherwise, the Court would have sanctioned the freedom of well-heeled interests to say whatever they pleased, short of outright libel, about the less affluent, without the latter being in a position to reply. One result of the Court's action may be a little less reckless word-slinging by the rampant right wing.

In a separate but related action the Court, again unanimously, turned down a challenge by the broadcasting industry to the fairness rules codified by the FCC in 1967 and 1968. The industry contended that the requirement that stations provide time for reply would discourage them from carrying controversial material. This seems an overstatement. The requirement does not apply to regular news programs, nor to commentaries carried therein, nor to bona fide political broadcasts.

Mr. Cook has performed a public service in pressing the issue, and any inconvenience that may be caused to the broadcasters will be overbalanced as the Court evidently intended, by the furtherance of free speech in the true sense of the term.

GREECE: THE RACK AND THE BOMB

JAMES BECKET
Mr. Becket, a Harvard Law School graduate, is studying for a Ph.D. in international law and economics at the University of Geneva.

Geneva

Two weeks ago Prime Minister Papadopoulos of Greece announced that he would himself hang in Constitution Square any official who had tortured a Greek citizen. This declaration was provoked by an article in Look magazine, "Greece: Government by Torture." Though reports of torture have been in the European press for two years, an article in a mass circulation American magazine hit the junta where it hurts. The usual categorical denial was given, and the "falsehoods" were attributed to "Communists" and "mentally deranged persons." Perhaps the colonels were justified in their annoyance, since it is undeniable that in many parts of the world colonels get on with the business of "national regeneration" with hardly a murmur of protest from abroad. But Greece is a special case, and one of the reasons it is a special case is that Greece is a signatory to the European Convention of Human Rights.

In mid-June in Strasbourg the European Human Rights Commission heard seven more witnesses on Article Three ("No one shall be subjected to torture or to inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment"). After the sessions of last November and December, which were dramaticized by James Bandopoulos scenes of escaping junta witnesses (see The Nation, January 6), the commission held hearings in Greece in February. Exercising its power under the convention to carry out an investigation on the spot, it examined fifty-one witnesses. But the commission was refused access to certain witnesses, notably the would-be assassin of Papadopoulos, Alecos Panagoulis, who only recently escaped and was recaptured. (The Human Rights Commission is hardly pleased with Papadopoulos' offer to Look to come and make a free and "serious investigation" in Greece, when this was denied the commission which enjoys the right under an international convention.)

The seven new witnesses, heard on June 15 and 16, had escaped from Greece with the help of resistance organizations. Two witnesses called from Greece were not permitted to leave the country. One of them, the right-wing lawyer George Mangakis, who has defended many political cases before the courts-martial, had his passport confiscated at the airport. (Thus, for good measure, violating the convention article on freedom to travel.)

The June session, unlike previous ones, was calm. The witnesses had the same story of torture to tell: bastinado, mock execution, electro-shock, sexual abuse, etc. (One new interpreter collapsed after an hour and

There follow here several lists of persons known to have been tortured in Greece, the headquarters where they were tortured and the identities of those who tortured them. The Nation does not know who in Athens prepared this list, but it came to the United States in a diplomatic pouch and was forwarded to the magazine by a source which we have every reason to believe is reliable. It was compiled several weeks ago and is not complete.

A. Prisoners tortured at Police Headquarters in Athens:

(1) Korovessis, Pericles: actor
(2) Lentakis, Andrew: student
(3) Loissios, Leonidas: theatre director
(4) Panoussis, Themistocles: journalist
(5) Mandeos, Peter: clerk
(6) Dakos, Apostoles: accountant
(7) Haralambous, Miltiades: house painter
(8) Palamaras, Christos: notary clerk
(9) Sideris, Leonidas: worker
(10) Bertsas, Nicholas: accountant
(11) Tsirka, Natasha: accountant
(12) Tolios, John: student
(13) Manolakos, Aristides: student
(14) Kalergi, Mary: student

Their torturers were:

Police officers Lambrou, Malios, Babalis, Gravaritis; Policemen Panagopoulos, Kleomenis

B. Prisoners tortured at Police Headquarters in Piraeus:

(1) Christopoulou, Vassiliki: housewife
(2) Kilakos, Stamatios: student
(3) Papayannakis, Christos: architect's aide
(4) Iliadis, Theodore: merchant
(5) Frantzeskakis, Constantine: accountant
(6) Papayanneas, John: printer
(7) Ambatielos, Nicholas: accountant

Their torturers were:

Police officers Yannacopoulos, Kouvas, Yaroutsos; Policemen Angelopoulos, Iliopoulos, Potinos, Kanatas

C. Prisoners tortured at Gendarme precincts in various suburbs of Athens (Nea Ionia, Kalogresa, Nea Liosia and Aigales):

(1) Paraskevas, Nicholas: plumber
(2) Nicolacopoulos, George: worker
(3) Komatas, Peter: worker
(4) Morsitis, Angelos: worker
(5) Toukas, Constantine: worker
(6) Dimitrelis, Stavros: shoemaker
(7) Stratis, John: professor
(8) Karamintsis, Epaminondas: stenographer

Both Stratis and Karamintsis as well as Mary Kalergi were also tortured at the military camp of Dionysos, near Athens, where the barracks of Papadopoulos' Praetorians are situated.

The torturers in the above cases were:

Lieutenant Rigalos, Sergeant Kotiridis, Gendarme Kolias.

was replaced by a veteran.) One reason for the calm was the absence of both principals, the Scandinavians and the junta Greeks, at the in camera sessions, and this time no junta thugs were patrolling the premises. This meant also that the junta's chief man on the case, and its most ardent defender on the diplomatic scene, Basil Vitsaksis, was absent. Mr. Vitsaksis has been rewarded with appointment as ambassador to Washington, though he is waiting for the United States to send its ambassador to Greece. There is now the chance that he might be appointed to replace Foreign Minister Pipinellis, who is not well.

The question for the commission is no longer whether torture exists or not (nor, one would suppose, whether there are to be hangings in Constitution Square) but whether torture appears in "isolated cases" or is an "administrative practice." A decision is expected from the commission at the end of November. It will be a landmark for international law. The case is rare in international jurisprudence in that the Scandinavian countries did not bring the action for commercial reasons but for reasons of principle. As the chief agent, Norway's Jens Evensen says: "We fought a war so these things would not happen again. We are bringing this case not just for the Greeks but for the Italians, for all Europeans."

This essentially juridical decision has taken on increasing political significance. The Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe managed to avoid expelling Greece from the Council with the excuse that it would be more proper to wait for the decision of the Human Rights Commission. This means that if the commission were to find that there had been torture, the expulsion would be almost automatic. The junta's policy, as devised by Mr. Vitsaksis, has been to obstruct, but he is running out of delaying tactics. Expulsion would have serious consequences for the colonels, who fear the operation of a "domino theory" on other, more vital European organizations.

Meanwhile, mass arrests and torture continue. A recent wave of bombings has been aimed at American targets: The PX, Litton Industries, American Express, the Hilton, USIA, etc., as well as around recent NATO exercises in the north of Greece. This expresses the belief of every Greek that the United States is responsible for the current situation, and that only a change of American policy will change the situation. Some observers believe that the United States, the major supporter of the junta, is becoming more and more disenchanted. Greece's Minister of Economics was officially invited to France recently by the Minister of Defense and declared he wanted to give France important contracts. France, South Africa's leading arms supplier, represents the only area for maneuver for Fascist Greece in the event of American pressures. The junta's anti-communism and strategic importance to the West exclude an Eastern or Nasser-like path.

In the face of a probably unfavorable report by the commission on torture, of increased bombings and resistance, and of European dissatisfaction, the Nixon Administration will have to make some decisions it has so far avoided.

DREW PEARSON: AN INTERVIEW

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

To many Americans—and this is especially true in the hard-dirt hinterland where fame seeps down slowly—there is only one political columnist operating in Washington, or at least only one they can name. It's Drew Pearson, of course—Andrew Russell Pearson, as he was christened seventy-two years ago in Evanston, Ill.—whose "Washington Merry-Go-Round" was the first of its kind and has never been successfully imitated. Evans and Novak produce a column that much more accurately relates political trends and political machine work around the nation. Joseph Kraft turns out a much more literate and thoughtful column, and so does Tom Wicker. But nobody comes even close to competing with the Pearson product, which is a unique blend of carnival pitch, news, synthetic philosophy and rumor.

Whereas most good reporters get by on gall, Pearson operates behind a front of old-school pride that is not quite arrogance. Even for a man who estimates that he has 50 million readers, he takes credit for some rather unlikely achievements. For instance, he feels that simply by asking the right question in a press conference held by Coke Stevenson in 1948—the year Stevenson and Lyndon Johnson were vying for the Senate seat from Texas—he defeated the former and elected the latter. It is a theory held by no one but Pearson. He believes that by disclosing in 1967 (he was the first to write about it) that California Gov. Ronald Reagan's office was haven for a homosexual ring, he "pretty well knocked Reagan out of the box as a Republican candidate and as an attempt by the far Right to take over the Republican Party—and the United States—in 1968." He believes that if he had carried the bit about Richard Nixon's psychotherapy before the election of 1968, Humphrey might today be President, which is something Pearson would have loved to help bring about.

This kind of opinionated self-assurance is one of the things that makes Pearson great fun to read, even when he falls short of accuracy, and it was in anticipation of both amusement and the wisdom that comes with years that The Nation put these questions to Pearson at his Georgetown home:

Q. During the next four years do you foresee a colder cold war or a normalization of relations with the Communist bloc?

A. I think Mr. Nixon will be practical regarding Soviet Russia and we will have reasonably friendly relations. I think the Russians are anxious to get along with him. I was in Romania and Poland in September, and some of the leaders there, some of the very top leaders, said they thought they could get along with Nixon. One of them, Ceausescu, had talked with him rather extensively in Romania. And the foreign minister of Poland, Winiewicz, had been ambassador in Washington when Nixon was on the House Un-American Activities Committee and Nixon had come to see him—(he talks about this rather jokingly)—to investigate communism. Of course Winiewicz was one of the leading Communists in the United States at that time. [Pearson grins.] But they said, "We think we can get along with him." I've noticed that the Soviet and Communist newspapers have been rather noncommittal about Nixon, whereas the Western European newspapers have been critical. Nixon has said he thinks the day of confrontation is over. I think he means that. I think he's a common-sense guy. I think he knows the peace of the world depends on these two supernuclear countries.

Q. In domestic things, do you think we'll move to the right under Nixon?

A. He'll drift to the right, domestically. There'll be more wire tapping, more bugging of your and my bedrooms.

Q. Do you see a Kennedy-Muskie ticket in 1972, or will Humphrey be back? What are the most likely Democratic entries next time?

A. I think there is going to be a three-way race for the Presidential nomination. In the first place, John Connally of Texas is going to run for the Senate and has in mind running for President later.

Q. You mean he will run against Sen. Ralph Yarborough in 1970?

A. Against Yarborough first. Then he will lead the Johnson wing of the Democratic Party, perhaps with, uh—I don't know where Hubert Humphrey is going to stand as yet—and then there will be the other wing, the Muskie wing of the party which actually is not at all different from the Kennedy wing, except in personalities. And there will be Kennedy. You'll have a three-way fight.

Q. You actually think there is an excellent chance that Connally will run for President in 1972?

A. Yes, and that would put Johnson in power in Washington again, in a way. The campaign itself would put him in the political swim as an adviser and perhaps as a semi-campaign manager. Johnson and Connally are very close. Johnson isn't going to stay idle.

Q. About Nixon's psychotherapy, why didn't you write that in your column before the election?

A. For two reasons. In the first place, I couldn't quite confirm it. Secondly, I think I was a little cowardly. I think I could have confirmed it if I had worked hard enough. But I've gotten hell so many times from my editors for writing stuff the last few days of a campaign and they don't realize you go through a lot of work to get a story and it sometimes takes a lot of time. For instance, I got badly criticized when I brought out the story of Don Nixon's $205,000 loan from Howard Hughes about a week or ten days before the end of the 1960 campaign. Actually, some papers like The Washington Post didn't use it. So, I've got to live with these editors and I say perhaps I was a little cowardly.

Q. Do you think if you had written about Nixon's treatment before the election, it might have changed the outcome?

A. It could have changed the course, if I had been able to get it a little earlier. But I was traveling, for one thing (it is something of a mistake to travel during a campaign, but you have to do it to get political sentiment). I called this Dr. Hutschnecker from Boston—I had tried to call him from Miami early in the morning, and finlly got him on the telephone about 10 o'clock. He first admitted and then subsequently denied treating Nixon with psychotherapy. I had asked Jack Anderson first of all to check with Herb Klein, and to give Hutschnecker's name, to say that we had confirmation from him. Then at 4 o'clock Hutschnecker changed his story completely. Later I found that Hutschnecker admitted to friends that he got this call from Nixon's office before he switched positions. Furthermore I found out that at the time Nixon saw Hutschnecker—1953 and 1954—Hutschnecker was not practicing internal medicine at all, as Nixon's group now contends. He had written a book in 1951 on the will to live. Although he was licensed to practice internal medicine he wasn't doing it.

Q. Do you feel Mr. Nixon was unstable?

A. He seems to have acquired some mental stability now, certainly. But in the past he has not been stable in two or three big crises. One was when he lost the governorship race in California and had that press conference afterward at which he lost his head. And it was after that that he really had, I am reasonably informed, a lot of psychotherapy. Intensively in 1962. Not with Hutschnecker.

Q. We heard that he would sometimes retire to his room for two or three days at a time.

A. I heard he had two-hour sessions with the psychiatrist, every day, five days a week. In late 1962 and early 1963. Also, back when he had the incident down in Venezuela as Vice President, when he was mobbed, he retired to his room in the American Embassy. This I have confirmed. He retired to his room and would not come down. They canceled a state dinner in his honor. He went into a blue funk, wouldn't come out, and only ate bread and cheese with bourbon. Finally he got control of himself.

Q. Aside from needing all his marbles, a President also needs power. Does any President have enough power to outweigh the drag of Congress, in terms of what the Executive is expected to initiate in the way of programs, momentum, etc.?

A. No, the Presidency just does not have that kind of power. Nixon will have a certain amount of power only for the first year. Even Johnson with his tremendous ability to sway the Congress was able to get the power only for the first three years. Nixon will have real trouble after the first year.

Q. How would you compare Kennedy and Johnson in the use of Presidential power?

A. I think Johnson was much more adept. Kennedy was always a little frightened of Congress. I talked to Kennedy in the summer of 1961—he'd been in office about seven or eight months. We were talking about the federal aid to education bill. He was bemoaning the fact he couldn't get an aid to education bill through. I suggested to him that he might veto the impacted areas school bill —to use as leverage, for all Congressman favor impacted aid—and he said, No, it wouldn't get anywhere. I don't remember if he said Congress would pass it over his veto, but he wouldn't tackle it.

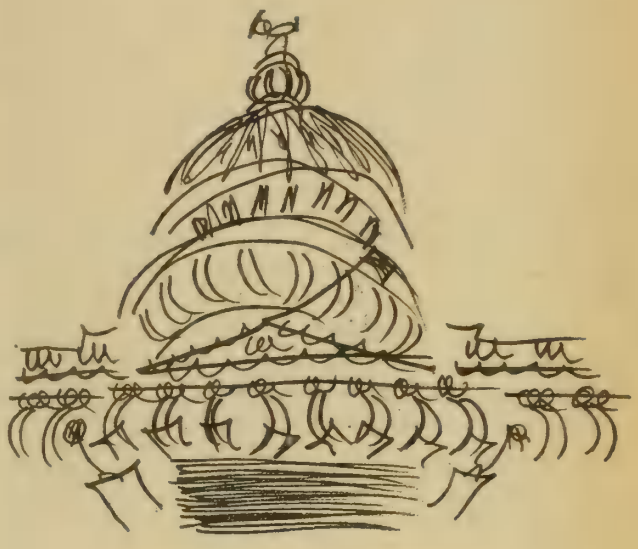
Q. Given another term, do you think Kennedy could have learned how to deal with Congress? Would he have been a great President?

A. I think he was heading for trouble his last year. Time had run out on him. Another four years could have been disastrous, and looking at it from the cold-blooded point of view of history, he may have been lucky that he didn't live longer. I say that with regret because he had great qualities, but nevertheless Congress was turning against him. He didn't have either the techniques or persuasiveness of Lyndon Johnson and he also didn't have the margin that Johnson had, after whipping Goldwater.

Q. But of course he had an election coming up in '64. He might have got that margin.

A. It would have eroded. I talked to some of the good Democratic leaders who were for him but were a little bit on the old-fashioned side, and they said it was going to be very serious. They were talking about what was ahead for him in 1964, and they said it might be so bad that he might not get re-elected.

Q. Even against Goldwater?



A. Well, Goldwater was not then nominated. If the Republicans saw any chance of winning, they wouldn't have nominated Goldwater. They figured Johnson was sure to win; they figured they might as well get Goldwater out of their system, spew him up.

Q. Was Johnson as ruthless as some said?

A. He's a mixture. He can be ruthless, but on the whole I don't think that's the word I would use to describe him as President. In the Senate, yes, he could be ruthless. I had an interesting talk with him after he had been President about a year and I was telling him about some of the problems I had been having with some of the right-wing publishers down in Louisiana. He said: "You know, I had to live with those fellows when I was in the Senate, but thank God I don't have to live with them any more." I used to criticize him about his oil legislation and his natural gas legislation, and I remember—this was in 1956 —he said: "Did you ever notice Hubert Humphrey voting against the dairymen of Minnesota? I can't vote against the oil men of Texas." But as President, he broadened out. I didn't see him do anything out of the way for the oil people after he entered the White House. He appointed Lee White to be chairman of the Federal Power Commission [which regulates the oil industry] and White's shown himself to be a good consumer man.

Q. There was a great deal of oil support for Nixon in the campaign.

A. He has far more support from oil than Johnson had. And Johnson made a whale of a good record for the consumer. There's been no President, even including Franklin Roosevelt, who did so well for the consumer.

Q. Both Kennedy and Johnson managed to bungle things abroad, but of the two, which President would you say had the better grasp of foreign affairs?

A. When Kennedy and Johnson came in, neither had a very good grasp of foreign affairs. I'm talking now about Johnson coming in as Vice President and Kennedy as President. But Johnson picked up the reins quickly in regard to Soviet-American relations. Immediately. I talked to him one week after he became President and he, at that time, outlined to me the fact that we must have better relations with Soviet Russia, that this was the key to future peace. And he said, "I'm going to work at this, harder than any other policy." At that time he was not very conversant with Latin America. He had trouble with Panama two or three weeks after he came into office. He mishandled it. He mishandled the Dominican Republic, in my opinion. But he learned his Latin American politics excellently as he went along. I think his European policies were, on the whole, good. I think his policies with France, de Gaulle, with Western Europe were excellent. He didn't let de Gaulle rattle him. But on Asiatic policy he took the advice of Dean Rusk, and Rusk had been so close to Asian policy he couldn't see the trees for the leaves. Johnson was at least three-fourths good on foreign policy and quick to learn.

Kennedy, on the other hand, was good on Latin American relations from the start and was good on European relations from the start, though he pounded that "I am a Berliner" theme too hard. But he was awfully slow on Soviet-American friendship. It took him to June 10, 1963, when he made that American University speech, to really come around to the test-ban treaty. I had talked to Kennedy, had taken a message from Khrushchev to him in the first week of September 1961, and I found Kennedy was still sore at Khrushchev from the Vienna talks. I think he got deeper into Vietnam partly as an offset to the failures he had made in Vienna, the failures of Cuba, and so on.

Q. In the last two years we have noticeably started moving to the right again. Do you see a further swing to the right, or to the left, or where does the pendulum seem to be aiming these days?

A. The swing to the right is going to continue probably through much of Nixon's first four years.

Q. That's a pretty long swing. Could it carry us almost to fascism?

A. If intense enough. But I don't think it's a long swing as far as time is concerned. After all, a swing that began with Harry Truman and the Joe McCarthy days, in '48 or '50, continued right up to 1960—ten years. It continued under Eisenhower, though it did ease down toward the end of his term. Eisenhower was complacent; he wasn't a rightist, but he kind of rode along with the tide. I may be wrong but I don't think the rightist movement we are now in will ruin us, and by the end of the four years I would say the swing to the right will be over. Nixon is going to have real problems with the black militants and some problems with the Negro moderates.

Q. I remember that you, or Anderson, wrote several pieces perhaps not apologetic for the Chicago police but unfriendly toward the demonstrators.

A. That's correct.

Q. I was wondering if the Walker Report had changed your mind.

A. No. I think that the Walker Report quite properly emphasizes the fact that the police overreacted. We reported that, too. What we stressed was the part which the television networks and the television producers played in the whole thing. Our columns were aimed at trying to overbalance the deluge of criticism that came out at that time, aimed solely at Mayor Daley. I'm no champion of Daley, particularly, but I think he's been a pretty good mayor. I've met him only casually. Everybody was squawking about the fact that a few newspaper men had got beaten up. Well, the newspaper profession is hazardous—you can get killed. I've been beaten up myself—by Joe McCarthy. He hit me and kneed me.

Q. Since the Ethics Committee that the Senate set up at the time of the Dodd scandal was supposed to look into all the conduct to see if any other investigations were called for, and since there haven't been any, do you think it's reasonable for us to say that the rest of the Senate is clean, or was this Ethics Committee something of a fraud?

A. There is one Senator who would bear some intensive scrutiny, but he isn't getting it. That's Everett Dirksen. Dirksen is a lovable fellow but he is such an actor that he gets away with murder. He has a law firm which he constantly votes with or for on the floor of the Senate, on such things as higher-priced drugs and oil-depletion allowance. He is really blatant in his conduct but he is such a popular guy that no one will believe it of him. You look at his voting record. I'm not saying that what Dirksen is doing is illegal but it is highly unethical.

Q. But isn't the purpose of the Ethics Committee to look into ethics?

A. Certainly. They could well afford to look into Mr. Dirksen, but they won't.

Q. Then they are something of a fraud?

A. They are. The fact is they won't look into any Senator unless a newspaper man forces them to.

Q. In recent years a great many shady dealings have been uncovered relating to Congressmen but very little of the shadiness has been uncovered by Congress itself. Does this point to complicity of all 535 members, or stupidity, or ignorance?

A. I would say partially ignorance, but more than anything else, protectionism. They don't want to see any evil or hear any evil or speak any evil. You know the rules—they must not speak evil of a club member. They know what the score is. Take the case of Dodd, if I may. Several Senators, long before we went into his record, told me that he was unethical—they used stronger words than that. I think the only reason they went into Dodd extensively is that he made the mistake of writing them a letter, asking them to. After that they couldn't dodge it.

Q. Former Congressman Resnick once asked: Who runs Congress—the people or the lobbyists? And you remarked at that time, ironically, I'm sure, that this was an interesting but a foolish question. What did you mean by foolish?

A. The lobbyists run the Congress except when you can get a big issue up and get a lot of public opinion steamed up for that issue. I'll give you an illustration. Last summer there was a bill increasing the size of truck trailers, almost doubling their size. This coasted right through the Senate, right through the House committee, and then, thanks to some vigilance by some alert newspaper men—I'm sorry to say it was not me or Jack Anderson but a reporter for the Des Moines Register and another fellow from the Scripps-Howard newspapers—it was shown that members of the House committee had received contributions from the trucking lobby rather extensively and over some period of years. The public got steamed up about it, thanks to this publicity, and I believe the bill was stopped in committee.

Q. How many people now serving in Congress have been influenced, at one time or another, by gifts or favors from lobbyists?

A. In the House the percentage is larger. It would be very unfair to try to make a real estimate. When you take minor favors, 50 per cent—minor favors like free airplane rides or small Christmas gifts. Major gifts, the percentage is lower. In the Senate, the percentage is much less; 20 per cent for minor favors.

Q. Is there any possibility, or probability, that the questionable byplay between lobbyists and Congress can ever be stopped?

A. I don't think so.

Q. Some of these Congressional investigations seem to gear up and then just fizzle out. Do you think they are concocted as threats, for a kind of blackmail?

A. Sometimes. Pretty hard to put your finger on it, but there is one Congressman who is chairman of an important committee who has started some investigations and then suddenly they just go up in smoke.

Q. Would that be Mr. Celler?

A. It would be.

Q. Have you got any evidence or leads?

A. Well, he started an investigation of Pan American Airways some years ago, and Ed Levy, his counsel, who is now president of the University of Chicago, did a very thorough job of it and then nothing happened. I've talked to Levy about it; he defends Celler. (I think it was Levy; maybe I'm wrong, maybe it was the other counsel who is now on the Court of Customs Appeals.) But I did look into that and it seemed to me there was no excuse for dropping this investigation. Secondly, he had an investigation going on newspaper monopoly. He did some work on this, it looked very promising; then suddenly the investigation stopped. Senator Hart of Michigan picked it up and really has done a very thorough job. But Celler kissed it off.

Q. What could he get out of such a thing as that?

A. Well, he's got a law firm where he's still a member. I've talked to him about this and he doesn't like what I've said at all. Celler has done some great things for civil rights, he's been on the plus side as a Congressman. I think he's done great service to the United States as a whole, but on this I think he's very vulnerable.

Q. Mr. Pearson, part of our government is elected and part appointed. These are the visible parts. But we keep hearing there is an invisible arm of government that comes out of the posh law firms here in Washington. Is it true that they lay their mark on much of the legislation that passes? Is this "fraternity" concrete enough to be called an arm of the government?

A. Almost, but it's a little exaggerated. There are certain law firms, very astute and powerful—they've got brains, and many of their members have served in government. For an example, Lloyd Cutler, who represents the big automobile people. He's very shrewd and successful in, for instance, changing the auto safety codes, modifying them within this past year. He also represents Columbia Broadcasting Company and at one time he has served as counsel on the violence commission. He euchred, or maneuvered, the commission so that it went into a very superficial study of TV violence, at first. Subsequently Hale Boggs kicked to high heaven and now they are going into it more thoroughly.

Q. Would you say the big law firms' influence, in general, is for good or for bad?

A. Well, usually their influence is not too good. They're working for their clients and they are in their pay. And usually their clients are against the public.

Q. Then, on any important bill that would pit the public against special interests, we can be sure there are powerful law firms working on those bills?

A. Yes, you can be absolutely sure. Take, for instance, the bill that was passed a couple of years ago, rushed through the House of Representatives and subsequently the Senate, forbidding the Federal Trade Commission from regulating cigarette advertising. Now who put that across? The Tobacco Institute, and Covington & Burling helped on it. Covington & Burling is a very good law firm; they represented me; they are expert, they don't charge too much in law fees, and they produce. They produced here. Right now they're trying to produce further. On a very interesting point which I'm going to write about shortly. They're trying to get the American Cancer Society to lose its tax exemption.

Q. You mean because they're lobbyists?

A. Of course. They're lobbyists for better health.

Q. Compared to the large number of questionable activities on the part of Congressmen, the 300 or so Presidential appointees at the top seem to be rather pure. Are appointed officials more honest than elected ones?

A. I think they are. We're talking now about the federal government. I think you've got a very dedicated group of officials, for the most part, in the Executive branch of the government and always have had, ever since I have been in Washington. I would say that we have had for years one of the most honest governments in the world. I think it compares very favorably with the Scandinavian or the British. But there's another reason right now: Johnson, for the first time in history, required every bureaucrat and Cabinet member to file his assets.

Q. That started with Johnson?

A. Yes, with the Civil Service Commission—four times a year. You remember Harry Truman tried to do that and had trouble; Eisenhower never required it and he had a lot of conflict of interests. Even so, even despite those conflicts of interest, I think the Executive branch of the government, even under Ike and Truman, though there were some problems under Truman, on the whole was honest.

Q. To what extent are regulatory agencies and the Congressional committees parallel to these agencies bought off in a gentlemanly roundabout fashion by the industry they are supposed to regulate?

A. They are bought off. To give you an illustration: Senator Pastore of Rhode Island, in my opinion, is a good Senator. In fact, he is one of the top Senators, except he has one great weakness. He is hand in glove with the networks. Whenever anything comes up regarding the networks—he is, I think, the second Democratic member on the Senate Commerce Committee—he always goes to their defense. I persuaded Magnuson to appoint a subcommittee to investigate some of the unethical practices in the TV industry. He appointed Yarborough as chairman, Gale McGee is a member, Hugh Scott is the minority member. And that committee was in existence for maybe seven or eight years—I forget exactly—and they weren't able to do a thing, for the simple reason that Pastore claimed that this was infringing on his prerogative. I'm sure that in his own mind Pastore doesn't feel that he is bought off and I'm sure that technically he's not—no cash has ever been exchanged. But they have been very adroit in buttering him up and making him out to be a very important Senator, which he is, and he steps in and he protects them just as if they had a paid lawyer there. It's a matter of friendship, but it works.

Q. When Lee Loevinger was head of antitrust he said the history of every regulatory agency in the government is that it comes to represent the industry or groups that it is supposed to control. He said the companies wine and dine their regulators and get to be great friends.

A. Yes. That's what happens to the Federal Communications Commission. We've brought out in the past that Chairman John Doerfer of the FCC cruised around on the yacht of George Storer, owner of a big chain of TV stations. Eventually he was kicked out—or was forced to resign. Various other commissioners have taken trips. There was one noticeable case, Commissioner Richard Mack, who accepted a loan from people who had litigation regarding Channel 10 in Miami.

Q. What about the other agencies? Is the FCC the worst in that regard?

A. Yes. The Interstate Commerce Commission has some friendships with railroads but they're not flagrant. It's hard to put your finger on.

Q. Just not much regulating gets done, is that it?

A. You said it exactly.

Q. Favoritism for special interests violates the broad, general one-man, one-vote idea. If you kept that one-man, one-vote idea and shifted over into the area of legislation or regulation, and you found favoritism, why wouldn't that violate the Constitution? And if it did and you could make a good case for favoritism being shown, why couldn't those people be prosecuted as though they had violated the law?

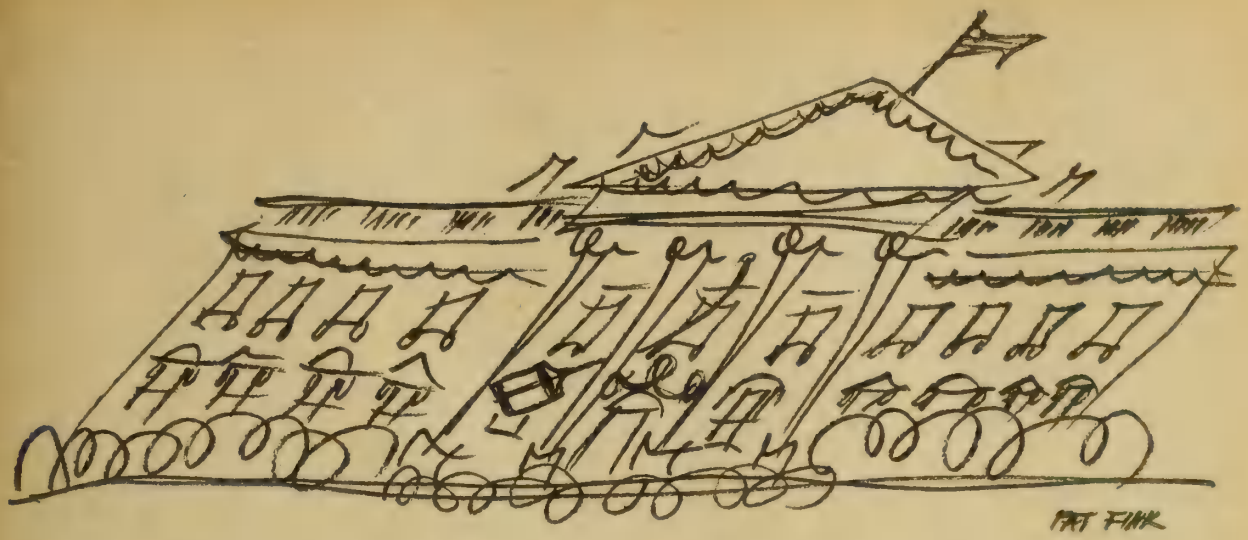
A. I think they could. I'm not familiar with the technicalities of the law. The problem is to get anybody to prosecute. Even when you've got clear-cut cases, it's asking a lot to get prosecution. I remember Parnell Thomas, Congressman from New Jersey, when he violated the kick-back law clearly. I had a heck of a time getting the Justice Department to prosecute. I went to Alex Campbell, who was chief of the criminal division, a very good man, and I said, "You're a Democrat and here's a Republican who has violated the law"; and he said, "Well, we haven't got a witness." So I went and got him a witness, Parnell Thomas' secretary, Helen Campbell. He said, "Well, all right." And he said to her, "Will you consent to be indicted?" She was reluctant to be indicted but she said she would, in order to plead a charge of conspiracy. She said, "Then what happens to me? Do I get a job?" And he said, "We'll get you a job." Well, Thomas was convicted and Helen Campbell ended up on my payroll! Until she retired at the age of 75.

Q. You mean it was left to you to give her a job?

A. Right. I employed her here about fifteen years. They didn't give her a job and somebody had to take care of her.

Q. Everyone agrees that politicians should be honored to the extent that they are public servants, but at what point do special privileges begin to spoil and corrupt?

A. I don't think you can fix any point. Once you have special privileges they begin to spoil almost immediately. The minute you give special privileges to a Congressman or Senator or any other government official, you're in danger.



Q. Do you think we attract better people to run for public office by offering them, say, special immunities from arrest and higher pensions than most could hope for in private life—special insurance policies, etc.?

A. Of course, that's the purpose, but I don't believe we attract them. We should, but I don't believe we do.

Q. I wonder if there was a time that you can remember when there wasn't such treatment and we maybe had better members of Congress.

A. It is my impression that when I first came here, in 1925, you had a higher standard of ethics in the Senate. That was the time when Blair of Pennsylvania was kicked out for spending about $1 million in getting the nomination, and when Senator Smith of Illinois was kicked out for taking $100,000 in campaign money from Insull. And it was just after the Teapot Dome investigation, when Walsh of Montana was riding at the peak of his investigative prestige and doing a very good job and everybody was trying to be on their mettle to improve the quality of the Congress. It was in the wake of the Harding scandals and Coolidge had appointed some men to clean things up. We can say the ethics of Congress was better then than it is today. It would probably take a first-class scandal to shake it into reform action.

Q. Time and again over the past several decades you've shown how House and Senate members with financial interests in oil have finagled things around on behalf of the oil industry, how those with financial interests in cotton or soybeans or some other farm commodity have bilked the public on behalf of their pocketbook, and so on. Yet you almost invariably have called this conflict of interests; that's your gentlemanly way. Isn't it really racketeering, Mr. Pearson?

A. It's high-class racketeering. That's a better description, I would say.

Q. Why don't you call them racketeers in your column? Why not be tougher on them?

A. I am against words that sound exaggerated; the public thinks the word racketeer, when used against a Congressman, is exaggerated and unfair. I think the reader gets the idea if you just recite the facts. In the case of Poage of Texas, for example, if you tell about the junkets he took to the Dominican Republic at the time of Trujillo and the things he did for Dominican sugar—increasing the sugar quota—the public gets the point. And then if you go on and show how he has championed the increase in farm subsidies up to as high as $2 million to $4 million for individual farmers, I think in California and Texas, the public gets the point. So although I think it might be fair to call him a racketeer, I would not use the term.

Q. To dwell on the point a little longer, in your book, The Case Against Congress, you say the great majority of Senators and Representatives in the U.S. Congress are honorable men. You go on to call them victims of a system. And yet, as your book so excellently shows, many of the people in Congress you are talking about transgress morality and the law. Do you think that maybe you've been too sympathetic?

A. I'm a little taken aback at your saying I've been too sympathetic. I suppose I've got more enemies per square inch on Capitol Hill than any place else in the world. I do call the majority honorable men. Because, number one, in the Senate, they are—a great majority. In the House the ratio is not so big. But I still think that the majority in the House are honorable.

Q. In your first book, Washington Merry-Go-Round, which came out in 1932, you said that the great majority of America's newspapers were "trivial, reactionary and subservient." What's more, you said that the Washington press corps was the slave to such influences. In your last book, your judgment of the press was much less harsh, but you still said that its watchdog functions "left a good deal to be desired." As a matter of fact, although the quality of reporting out of Washington has improved greatly since 1932, couldn't the great majority of American newspapers still be described as "trivial, reactionary and subservient"?

A. Yes. Eighty per cent of the newspapers are Republican owned. When a Republican administration is in power they naturally are inclined to protect that administration. When the Democratic administration is in power, they are delighted to have their newspaper correspondents investigate and criticize the administration. To do an adequate investigation of a government official or government department is not easy. It takes money, it takes time which is more valuable than money. And it takes risk. Last year, I spent at least $25,000 on legal fees alone. Which just about ate up my profit for the year. And I haven't lost any cases either. The average reporter can't afford the money or the time to do this. Some papers have been very good in backing them up, backing me up. The Washington Post, The Wall Street Journal. The New York Times has dug more and more into some of these things. But the easy thing to do is to say, well, so what? I have worked awfully hard on some stories only to have them killed.

Q. Has this happened recently, Mr. Pearson?

A. Yes. During the recent election I had what I thought were some important stories about Nixon's law firm. For the first time in history we were about to have in the White House a man who was a member of an important New York law firm, with very big clients—railroads, oil companies, investment banks—so I went into some of the companies that he represents. I got a letter from one publisher, who is not a big publisher, and he said (this is an exact quote): "I have given instructions to my editor to throw your columns in the wastepaper basket when they mention Nixon." I spent a lot of time on this, and I thought it was rather important.

Q. Did most of your editors run it?

A. Yes, most of them did.

Q. You have been criticized because you have used information from the FBI files. You wouldn't consider it fair for the FBI to publicize confidential information, yet you use confidential information from their files. How do you answer that question for yourself?

A. That's not an easy question for me to solve or to answer. The most recent case in which I used wire-tap information was that of Black, the lobbyist, who was convicted for income-tax evasion. He already had been convicted and he had been up for appeal and had been granted a new trial on the basis of these wire taps. So the wire taps then became automatically a matter of considerable public interest. They had not been released, but the fact that the courts had ruled that his wire had been tapped seemed to me to place this information in a somewhat less privileged category. Now I did not publish all of it—there were certain sections in there that were not published—not pertaining to him, however. We picked out and did publish such things as telephone conversations with certain Congressmen asking that defense plants be placed in their districts in order to get them re-elected. Carl Albert, Congressman from Oklahoma, who is a fine Congressman, wanted a defense plant placed by either General Dynamics or North American in his district so it would help. He wanted Black, who represented North American, to do this. Now that was very important for the public to know about because it illustrates the alliance between Congress and the Defense establishment and the industrial establishment. An alliance which really influences the United States more than any other single factor, in my opinion. And that I thought was important and should be published. There were some other similar things.

Another illustration: I wasn't criticized for this that I just told you about, but I was criticized for the one I am going to tell you about now. When Martin Luther King was killed, we found that the FBI had tapped his telephone for approximately one year. And it seemed to me, and to Jack [Anderson], that this was the kind of surveillance that should not have happened. And Robert Kennedy had signed the wire-tap order. It seemed to us that the Negro leader was entitled to privacy on his telephone, as I think a newspaper man is entitled to privacy on his telephone, and others. So we did some rather extensive investigation about this, and we did quote from some of the FBI reports on Martin Luther King. The one part where we were criticized was in regard to an FBI reference to King's sex life. I debated that for a month, and finally used a small portion—I didn't use very much.

Q. Did you have the whole transcript?

A. I had an extensive part of it, yes. I don't believe it was all of it, but it was extensive. I left out the major portion. I think the column carried only one paragraph. This was a debatable point, but we used it. His followers were very critical.

Q. What was your purpose in using that one paragraph, to show what?

A. Well, I think to show that King was not superhuman.

Q. As a matter of fact, J. Edgar Hoover was putting it around to favored newsmen, something about Martin Luther King in a hotel room—I remember reading it in Marquis Child's column. So Hoover was unloading it as he wished to anyway.

A. I think he was talking to a few newspaper men. He didn't talk to us, by the way. Hoover does not like me, at all.

Q. Have you had your own phone bugged, Mr. Pearson?

A. I have so many people tapping my phone that I sell commercials on it. I can't tell, and I don't worry about it. The only thing that I have to be careful about are news sources. When I talk to Jack Anderson on the telephone about news sources, we leave out names.

Q. I read Behind the Lines, your biography, and it says that once you went to Lyndon Johnson privately in 1950 and asked if he could defend you against an attack you anticipated from Joe McCarthy on the floor of the Senate, but that Johnson refused to help you. Looking back on it, do you think it wise—would you have sought that favor if you had it to do over again?

A. Johnson was not a great Senator at that time; he was not Senate Majority Leader. Yes, I wouldn't hesitate to go to a Senator who knew me and knew that I was not a Communist and ask him to say that I was not. I would have no hesitancy in so doing. If you're being unjustly attacked on the Senate floor where you don't have privilege, and the attacking Senator does, I would like to have a little help. Fortunately they didn't believe what he said about me, but I couldn't be sure in advance.

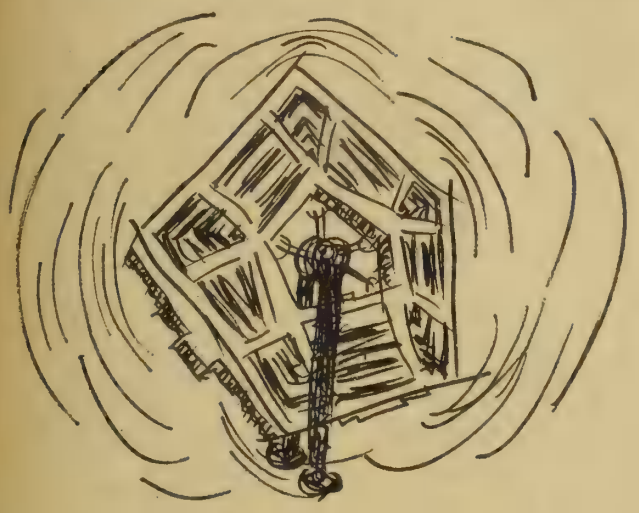
Q. I understand that for your help in the administration's effort to purge then Sen. Millard Tydings, that President Roosevelt after that cleared every federal appointment in Maryland with you before it was made. Let me ask you two questions: Do you think it wise for a columnist to participate like that, in a campaign; and do you think it wise to accept that type of recognition for your help?

A. No on both counts.

Q. You wouldn't do it if you had it to do over again? You've not made that mistake since then?

A. No, I haven't. Millard Tydings and I had been rather friendly as young bachelors around town in the early days. But he proceeded to crucify my father, who had been appointed Governor of the Virgin Islands by Herbert Hoover, as a Republican. Tydings was a Democrat and wanted him out. And the things that he did against him were almost beyond belief. It eventually killed my father. He died in 1938. That's why I did my best to defeat Tydings.

Q. And FDR did clear appointments with you?



A. Yes, he did—Maryland appointments. Roosevelt was eager to destroy the political hold Tydings had on the state of Maryland. Tydings had built up his little airtight political kingdom there.

Q. How many times have you been sued?

A. Can't remember. Some of the suits have been relatively minor, but maybe fifty times. Congressman Bramblett of California brought a $100,000 libel suit against me and he dropped it immediately after we had him indicted; he was convicted. So if you count those suits that were dropped, it might come to fifty.

Q. I guess the most famous was the $1,750,000 suit filed against you by the late General MacArthur. It's sort of a classic mystery. Why was the thing dropped? You never explained it. At this time, would you care to?

A. MacArthur was confronted with the evidence, which was overwhelming against him. We had said he had lobbied for his own promotion, that he strutted, that he evicted the bonus army from Washington. One of his girl friends came across with all the evidence against him.

Q. You mean, just on that? On the bonus march? That was right out in the open, wasn't it?

A. We were not worried about that anyway. But on some of the others, such as lobbying for his own promotion.

Q. So you just confronted MacArthur with a lot of stuff, and told him, if you're going to push this thing we're just going to have to bring it up in court?

A. No, we had not known about this information until he brought the suit. Frequently it happens that when someone brings a suit it serves as a lightning rod and his enemies come to you and say, look, so-and-so is suing you, did you know this? Ross Collins, Congressman from Mississippi, who was head of the Appropriations Committee for the War Department, as it was then, suggested to me—he said, "You know, MacArthur's been keeping a girl in the Chastleton Apartments, on 16th Street just up the street from the White House? The Chinese girl." I didn't pay much attention to Ross Collins' advice but he was right. This Chinese girl he had kept in the Philippines and had brought over here, she'd been keeping a diary, with all these entries, so we just got in touch with MacArthur's attorney. That was all there was to it.

Q. The entries were about his official life?

A. Official life and private life, both.

Q. Would it have made pretty racy reading?

A. Very. It would have sold like hot cakes.

Q. How many good stories like this have you held back, over the years?

A. Oh, I don't believe there were many. The sex life of important people, I haven't printed. And there has been some sex life.

Q. Under what conditions in general, other than national security, should a reporter hesitate to write a story about which he knew his facts were accurate?

A. Well, almost never, other than national security. I think that perhaps when a man is dead you should think about it a little bit, if it's going to injure his family. But if the man was very important and the events that are involved are important to the public welfare, even then it should be written.

Q. You were the first to point out that Mendel Rivers has a liquor problem, and you have warned that inasmuch as he is chairman of the Armed Services Committee and privy to many defense secrets, his sobriety or lack of it can pose grave questions of national security. Do you know of other heavy drinkers in Congress who are similar national security risks? Is the nation helpless to do anything about it so long as their constituents keep voting them back into office?

A. Russell Long of Louisiana, Tom Dodd, Adam Clayton Powell have had a problem. There are some others, but not too many in the Senate.

Q. In addition to drinking, is there the woman-chasing type of security risk in Congress?

A. Oh, yes, many. There's a proverbial saying, when girls take jobs with certain Congressmen they have to buy track shoes.

Q. This would be a security problem, wouldn't it?

A. I don't believe so, because most men are not so easily blackmailed in regard to that; they are blackmailed in regard to homosexuality.

Q. Is there any of that in Congress, that you know of?

A. Well, I don't know. I suspect there is, but I don't know.

Q. You have dined frequently with Presidents, and with every important person in government. Where do you have to watch yourself lest you become too friendly? Is there any sort of a measure in your own mind?

A. It's a very difficult problem. There was a time when I didn't accept any invitations to the White House during Roosevelt's administration, though I did go down to see him privately. During the Truman administration I was never asked, so there was no problem there. He had three people on the list he never invited—one was Clare Booth Luce, one was Adam Clayton Powell, and one was me. All three of us had been critical of his wife. I didn't mean to be, but he thought I was. Mrs. Truman is an awfully nice woman. But, anyway, getting back to your question: it's difficult. Actually I don't believe going to the White House alone or going to dinner gets you obligated.

Q. I don't mean obligated. I mean, if you got to like a President personally you might slack off in criticism. Isn't there that danger?

A. I know what you mean, and I was going to go on to say that you get to know Cabinet officers, and other high officials in government, and you have a problem. A real problem. Sometimes they can be very hurt when you criticize them after you have met them socially. On the other hand, some of them will take it in their stride, kiss it off and say, it's all fair in love and war and politics. I'll give you an illustration: the other day I met Edward Day, former Postmaster General. He is a nice fellow and I've known him quite well. I had written a piece—he now represents the firm which sells TV sets—about how he had lobbied with the House of Representatives to change a bill which would require standards in regard to radioactivity. I saw him the other day and found he had just shrugged it off. But some fellows are very petty. The big caliber people know that they're in this kind of a game and have to take the criticism with the praise.

Q. It seems that I recall reading recently that somebody was the ghost writer with you on your novel.

A. Yeah—Gerald Green. He helped me, as I pointed out in the frontispiece of the book.

Q. When I read about your ghost writer, I thought to myself, Mr. Pearson belittled President Kennedy for getting someone to write Profiles in Courage, and here he's using this man to help him write his novel. Do you think that was a fair criticism?

A. [Pearson chuckles.] It was a natural thought. However, as I said, I gave Green credit and I offered to give him more credit.

Q. You know the power of a column intrigues me, that is, the measurement of the power. How many readers do you have?

A. It's estimated from 30 million to 50 million; it's pretty hard to say.

Q. It is said that you think perhaps your interview with Khrushchev in 1961 helped lead to the test-ban treaty, and more East-West trade, and to the present period of coexistence. Does your column really have that sort of influence?

A. I think it did help in that case. First place, I published rather extensive quotes following two days with Khrushchev and that was widely carried not only in my own column but was picked up by other newspapers and reprinted. At that time, I went out on what many people thought was a limb. I said that I thought that Khrushchev potentially could be a friend. And that we could trust him as a friend. Or words to that effect. I was criticized for this by some editors, but I think I was right and still think I was right. Maybe it's an exaggeration to claim that this changed sentiment in the United States, but we were in the process of changing. Mr. Kennedy had had an unfortunate showdown with Khrushchev in Vienna three or four months before. When I came back from seeing Khrushchev I had a talk with Kennedy, told him about our talk, and in fact gave him a message from Khrushchev. Although Kennedy didn't react immediately to it, later he did. I had talks also with Robert Kennedy, Averell Harriman, some of the people in the State Department. They all were anxious to know all the details of what Khrushchev had said and how he had acted. In fact, I had a long session with the CIA. I didn't tell them anything beyond what I subsequently wrote except possibly in more detail. I told all of them that I was convinced that Khrushchev had some trouble from his own military, which was later brought out because he was kicked out, and some trouble from his own reactionary clique in the Kremlin. And that he wanted to iron out his problems with the United States.

Q. What's been your objective as a columnist? Any sort of an impulse that has kept you going besides just the fun of it all?

A. Well, I don't make an awful lot of money, and although I do have some fun, the headaches sometimes outweigh it. You asked me whether I get outraged—I don't think I do any more as much as I used to. My chief motive is to try to make the government a little cleaner, a little more efficient, and I would say also, in foreign affairs, to try to work for peace. I began life wanting to be a diplomat. I didn't have the money to go into career diplomacy so I went into newspaper work and I think I have made some contributions for better understanding around the world. It wasn't merely my talk with Khrushchev that helped in this direction. I also spent some time visiting Tito, and the leaders of the Communist world—in Romania, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia—and have attended some journalistic conferences in those countries at a time when you risked being called pro-Communist. And I think I may have had a little bit to do with the policy of people-to-people friendship which Eisenhower adopted in 1955 with the Geneva Summit Conference. I had urged this on him personally, even before he became President. And I kept harping on it, talking about it, and working on it with various State Department people. Tried to work for it, write about it, and may have had a little something to do with it. So, I would like to say, in answer to your question, that that is one of the things that motivates me. Arthur Goldberg was good enough, when he became UN Ambassador, to offer me a job as his assistant which was very flattering and tempting.

Q. You couldn't have possibly taken it, could you?

A. If I had quit being a newspaper man, yes.

Q. What post could conceivably tempt you out of your column?

A. I wasn't tempted—I didn't take it.

Q. Would you take an ambassadorship, Mr. Pearson?

A. No.

Q. Why are you on the comic page in The Washington Post?

A. Well, when Eugene Meyer first persuaded us to leave the Washington Times-Herald for the Post we were a little critical of some of his friends and he finally put the column way back on the comic page out of the way. I've always enjoyed being back there.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Private Gardens, Cloisters, Silent Women

ROBERT BLY

Mr. Bly is a poet, and editor and publisher of the Sixties Press. The article below, in slightly different form, will appear as the introduction to Forty Poems of Juan Ramón Jiménez, chosen and translated by Robert Bly. The poems which follow the article are a selection from the book where they will appear with the Spanish originals (Sixties Press).

To Juan Ramón Jiménez a poem means ecstasy: that is the difference between poetry and prose. Living as a poet means feeling that ecstasy every day of your life, every hour if possible.

His poems are signposts pointing the reader back to the life from which the ecstasy came. Jiménez said that he lived his life in such a way as to get the most poetry possible out of it, and he loved solitude, private gardens, cloisters, silent women with large eyes.

His poems ask the question: what sort of life shall we live so as to feel poetry, ecstasy? His emphasis on how the poet lived, rather than on rhythm or technique, is precisely why so much poetry flowed from him into the young poets. In his life he embodied as Yeats did some truth about poetry that everyone, but especially poetry professors, try to ignore and do ignore.

We can understand the subject matter of Jiménez's poems if we understand that it is in solitude that a man's emotions become very clear to him. Jiménez does not write of politics or religious doctrines, of the mistakes of others, not of his own troubles or even his own opinions but only of solitude, and the strange experiences and the strange joy that come to a man in solitude. Jiménez's books usually consist of emotion after emotion called out with great force and delicacy, and it must be said that his short, precise poems make our tradition of the long egotistic ode look rather absurd. Seeing the beauty of a sunset, for instance, he does not, with many stanzas, complicated syntax, and involved thoughts, write a long elaborate ode on immortality—he simply says:

Serene last evening,
Short as a life,
End of all that was loved,
I want to be eternal!

(Translated by Carlos Francisco de Zea)

This is what he calls "naked poetry." It is poetry near the emotion. He has a wonderful poem in which he says that in his youth, when poetry first came to him, she came to him like a very young girl, naked, and he loved her. Then, later, she began to put on ornaments and become very elaborate, and he began to hate her, without knowing why. Then, years later, she began to trust him, and now, at last, is a young girl, naked, again —"naked poetry, that I have loved all my life!"

Jiménez, as a poet, was born in the great and joyful reviving of Spanish poetry about 1905, led by Antonio Machado, Unamuno and himself, who all dreamed of a new blossoming of Spain. Jiménez was not robust. He was delicate, neurasthenic, and slipped off into insanity more than once. Yet his devotion to poetry was healthy and rigorous. He was more generous to younger poets than Yeats was; he spent years editing poetry magazines and starting publishing ventures to get poets in print, endless afternoons poring over young poets' manuscripts. His delight and Machado's stubbornness prepared the way for the great generation of 1928: Lorca, Aleixandre, Salinas, Guillén. They all knew it. Lorca's early poems are imitations of Juan Ramón, as they always called him. Juan Ramón threw up light and airy houses made out of willows, and in so many different designs that all the coming Spanish poets found themselves living in one or another of his willow houses before they moved out to their own house. Jiménez even anticipated Lorca's mature work. Juan Ramón Jiménez came to the United States in 1916 to marry Zenobia Camprubi, who was the sister of a man who owned a Spanish-language newspaper in New York. Jiménez lived in New York and Boston for a few months, and wrote Diary of a Poet Recently Married, a book about the United States, but still not well known here. Thirteen years before Lorca he met the "King of Harlem" walking up Fifth Avenue; he describes the meeting in his prose poem "Deep Night," translated in this collection. The crippled Negro whom he calls "king of the city" is clearly the same Negro of whom Lorca said:

Tu gran rey prisionero, con un traje de conserje!
(Your great imprisoned king, dressed as a janitor!)

Anyone who knows the work of Guillén, Salinas or Alberti will also see Juan Ramón Jiménez in their poems, seated quietly on the sandy bottom, clearly visible through the sunlit water, like a magic water creature.

When Franco won, almost all the poets of that magnificent spring were killed or went into exile; Lorca was killed by Franco's militia during the war, and Miguel Hernández died in a Franco prison in 1942. With Rafael Alberti, Jorge Guillén, Pedro Salinas, Emilio Prados, Manuel Altolaguirre, and Luis Cernauda, Jiménez went into exile. He lived for a while in Chevy Chase, Md., then in Puerto Rico. Later Franco asked him to return to Spain, but he refused.

His love for his wife was one of the greatest devotions of his life, and he wrote many of his poems for her. When he received the Nobel Prize in 1956, his wife was on her deathbed, and he told reporters to go away, that he would not go to Stockholm, that his wife should have had the Nobel Prize, and that he was no longer interested. After his wife died, he did not write another poem and died a few months later, in the spring of 1958.

Jiménez and Rubén Darío, the Nicaraguan, gave a great gift to Spanish poetry: an emphasis on pleasure. Herbert Marcuse in his Eros and Civilization talks of how many Americans are crippled because of the puritanical adherence to duty, to the reality principle. They are crippled because they are addicted to boring sobriety, harshness, duty, "responsibilities of life," business. They think it is their duty to accept boredom in politics, to stay inside on a moonlit night, and to be miserable, selling or teaching, doing what they don't want to do. If they avoid delight, they feel more mature. Americans are crippled because they give up, perhaps at 10 or 15, all hope of being happy. Juan Ramón Jiménez is aware of all this—only the Spanish temperament is as puritanical as the American. His work pulls the psyche toward pleasure. His poems are an elaborate defense of the pleasure principle. He sees the humor and drama of making such a defense today. He talks to the full moon:

The basil is not asleep,
The ant is busy.
Are you going around naked
In the house?

(The following are Mr. Bly's translations of six poems which are to appear in Forty Poems of Juan Ramón Jiménez.)

FULL CONSCIOUSNESS

You are carrying me, full consciousness, god that has desires, all through the world.
Here, in this third sea,
I almost hear your voice: your voice, the wind, filling entirely all movements;
eternal colors and eternal lights, sea colors and sea lights.

Your voice of white fire in the universe of water, the ship, the sky, marking out the roads with delight, engraving for me with a blazing light my firm orbit:
a black body
with the glowing diamond in its center.

OCEANS

I have a feeling that my boat
Has struck, down there in the depths,
Against a great thing.
And nothing Happens! Nothing . . . Silence . . . Waves . . .

—Nothing happens? Or has everything happened,
And are we standing now, quietly, in the new life?

'THE LUMBER WAGONS'

The lumber wagons are already there.
—The pines and the wind have told us,
the golden moon has told us,
the smoke and the echo have told us . . .
They are the carts that go by in these afternoons at dusk, the lumber wagons carrying the dead trees down from the mountain.
What a sound of crying from these carts
on the road to Pueblo Nuevo!
The oxen come along in the starlight, daydreaming about their warm stalls in the barn smelling of motherhood and hay.
And behind the lumber wagons
the ox-drivers are walking, the ox-prod on their shoulders, and eyes watching the sky.
What a sound of crying from these carts
on the road to Pueblo Nuevo!
The dead trees as they move through the calm of the fields leave behind a fresh honest smell like a heart thrown open.
The Angelus falls from the steeple of the ancient town over the stripped fields which smell like a cemetery.
What a sound of crying from these carts
on the road to Pueblo Nuevo!

DAWNS OF MOGUER

The silver poplars rising out of the fog!
The lonesome wind there moving over the dark marsh—an earthquake that is not real—and Huelva, stretched out, far away, rose-colored!
Above the sea, toward La Rabida, in the moist pear-gray of the sky, with the night still cold behind its crude dawn—a horizon of pines—cold behind its white dawn, the baffled moon!

ROAD

They all are asleep, below.
Above, awake,
the helmsman and I.

He, watching the compass needle, lord of the bodies, with their keys turned in the locks. I, with my eyes toward the infinite, guiding the open treasures of the souls.

DAWN OUTSIDE THE CITY WALLS

You can see the face of everything, and it is white—plaster, nightmare, adobe, anemia, cold—turned to the east. Oh closeness to life!
Hardness of life! Like something in the body that is animal—root, slag-ends—with the soul still not set well there—and mineral and vegetable!
Sun standing stiffly against man, against the sow, the cabbages, the mud wall!
—False joy, because you are merely in time, as they say, and not in the soul!

The entire sky taken up by moist and steaming heaps, a horizon of dung piles.
Sour remains, here and there, of the night. Slices of the green moon, half-eaten, crystal bits from false stars, plaster, the paper ripped off, still faintly sky-blue. The birds not really awake yet, in the raw moon, streetlight nearly out.
Mob of beings and things!
—A true sadness, because you are really deep in the soul, as they say, not in time at all!

Melancholy Monument

RANDALL JARRELL: The Complete Poems. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 507 pp. $10.

HAYDEN CARRUTH

Mr. Carruth is a poet, novelist and critic. His most recent book is a study of Camus, After the Stranger (Macmillan).

Randall Jarrell was a romanticist of the generation which came to adulthood during the miserable 1930s in a society whose most active intellectual centers were dominated by the thought and style of T. S. Eliot and, behind him, of Irving Babbitt. Jarrell reacted as did the others. He launched into a search for a way out of the social and cultural order which seemed to him, and which was, superannuated. More than this, he launched—in spite of his Southern politesse, for he was born in Nashville and graduated from Vanderbilt—with an eagerness that was virtually demoniacal. Among his romantic contemporaries, he was an especially pure example of the type—at least so I have always thought. He was what Jacques Barzun has called an intrinsic romanticist; that is, a figure existing outside the primary epoch of European romanticism but still exhibiting the romanticist's primary characteristics.

What these are is open to question. But leaving aside the secondary characteristics, such as the romanticist's commitments to freedom, to individualism, to irrationalism, etc., certainly one of his primary characteristics is his hang-up between man's power and man's misery, between the vision of glory and the experience of degradation. "Man is born free; and everywhere he is in chains." In his youth this was precisely the paradox that Jarrell saw in the world around him: at the top a culture oriented toward tradition and devoted to the methodical delectation of aesthetic splendor, at the bottom a society sick in every member, vitiated by pain and injustice. As the 1930s advanced—Harlan County, Abyssinia, Detroit, Spain—the realities were unmistakable. But so were Jarrell's longings. For years the commonest locution in his poems was the phrase "and yet . . ." uttered sometimes wistfully, sometimes mordantly, sometimes in hollow despair.

To surmount this impasse the romanticist seeks a faith, or at least a synthesis, which will define and accommodate both sides of the paradox. Historically speaking, few have managed it, especially among the poets. Probably the commonest way out has been through radical social action, based on Hegelian concepts of history. For poets a surer but much more difficult course has been the ascent from romantic agony to genuine tragic vision, which in turn destroys its own romantic base by imposing upon it the classical order of the tragic world. The great example, of course, is Goethe. In our own time we have the smaller but very instructive case of Theodore Roethke. He began with a verbal and mental style different from Jarrell's, granted, but with much the same poetic materials, the same view of nature and human reality; but he converted them into an at least sporadically consistent tragic vision. Roethke continued to write with more and more depth of feeling until he died, while Jarrell, almost exactly contemporary, dwindled away into fragments and exercises.

Not that Jarrell didn't try. Social action was effectively denied him, since his connection with the amorphous, self-doubting radicalism of the Partisan Review was doomed from the start to futility. Apparently conventional religious faith was also inaccessible to him. But he tried other means of escape, especially by pursuing romantic revulsion to its logical ends in dream and fantasy. Time and again he constructed elaborate dream visions, Germanic—not to say Gothic—in style, from within which he looked out at the "dream" of the waking world and denounced it. But the stress of actuality always supervened. Jarrell was sane, excruciatingly sane, and he could never secure his dream beyond the limits of a few separate, though quite splendid, poems.

Similarly he tried, but only half-heartedly, to commit himself to the mystique of creative impunity, to the expressionistic anti-world of style and imagination; he tried to give himself, not to the meretricious elites of Gottfried Benn and Wyndham Lewis (he was too radical for that) but to the commonalty of alienated poets—troubadours, dandies—preserved against social, moral and metaphysical blight by the self-sustaining integrity of their creative endeavor. In a few passages he sounds surprisingly like Vachel Lindsay. But it is noteworthy that Jarrell's most consistent statement of these ideas occurs in neither his poetry nor his criticism but in a story for children, The Bat Poet. He didn't believe it himself. Jarrell simply could not forgo the exquisite anguish of his dual attachment to vision and experience. In the end he was left in the wilderness of romantic nihilism with no base but sensibility.

The results are evident. In his criti-

John Kenneth Galbraith

How to Control the Military

During fiscal 1968, the Pentagon awarded over 57% of the nation's defense contracts (24 billion dollars worth) without competitive bidding. Today, nearly 700 generals, admirals and navy captains are employed by the ten largest defense contractors. Citing these facts in the midst of the continuing ABM controversy and the ever-escalating arms race, John Kenneth Galbraith gives a concise history of how the "military-industrial complex" in America has grown to overwhelming size and power. Most important of all, he proposes ten steps we can take now to break it up. $3.95 at all booksellers cism Jarrell gave us vibrant readings of individual poets, Frost, Williams and others, but no theoretical statement of importance. In the last twenty years of his poetry, although the dream poems and a few others are interesting, he fell more and more into fragmentary utterance, false starts, scraps and notes, and into set pieces—"story poems" and "character poems," updated Robert Frost—that lacked the verve of his youthful work. Then, too, there was the endless translating and retranslating of the German poets, especially Rilke. What Jarrell needed, apparently, in order to write successfully, was an occasion which gave him not only the reality of an episode and the framework in which to place it but a certain distance from the complexity of the ordinary world; and the only sustained occasion of this kind which occurred in his life was World War II. Jarrell's war poems are his best in every sense. They are the most alive poetically, the most consistent thematically.

DOUBLEDAY

All this is what I have thought for some years, and in reading The Complete Poems I find it confirmed. The book would be a melancholy monument at best. Here is Randall Jarrell complete and completed, the same Randall Jarrell who so enlivened our literary and social consciences only a short time ago: at least the time must seem short to readers of my generation. Now he is stuffed in a great fat tome, for the dusty corner of a low shelf, to be looked at once and then forgotten. Well, the poems deserve far better. Some of them are great.

The book contains all Jarrell's poems from his previous books, plus three additional sections: one for new work written between his last book and his death, a second for poems published in magazines but not previously collected, the third for earlier unpublished poems. It is, we are made to understand, complete. But curiously it is the only book of its kind that I know in which we discover no hint of the person upon whose authority we are to accept either its completeness or its other attributions: it has no editor; which accounts for the unusual form of the headnote to this review. I have given the bibliographical data as they appear on the title page, and nothing further can be learned from the book or its dust jacket.

We have, then, a considerable bulk of poetry, in which the war poems make a distinct, superior unit. They are not many, perhaps thirty or forty altogether, but even if they were fewer they would be a remarkable achievement. How anyone could write while soldiering is difficult to understand; as one who went through the war unable to write a word, I can only marvel. But Jarrell had been writing for nearly ten years before America entered the war. His early poems are sometimes mannered or imitative, and often artificially opaque; but from the first, as nearly as one can tell, he wrote with ease, and suffered none of the verbal embarrassment customary among young poets. When the war came he already possessed a developed poetic vocabulary and a mastery of forms. Under the shock of war his mannerisms fell away. He began to write with stark, compressed lucidity.

Nowadays we commonly hear critics declare that World War II produced no memorable poetry. Even a critic as acute as George Steiner has said that the poetry of 1940-45 is without "the control of remembrance achieved by Robert Graves or Sassoon" in 1914-18 (The Death of Tragedy). To this I can only reply that if I know what "control of remembrance" means, in my experience the poems of Jarrell have it, and they have it pre-eminently. I am certain that other readers of my age, those who were there, find in these poems of soldiers and civilians, the dead, wounded and displaced, the same truth that I do.

Warfare gave Jarrell the antagonist he needed; not fate, not history, not the state, not metaphysical doubt but all these rolled into one—The War—that brute momentous force sweeping a bewildered generation into pathos, horror and death. Today our young dissenters and resisters sometimes ask us why we didn't resist too, why we were willing to go along with the militarists. Shamefacedly and unsuccessfully, we try to explain that willingness had nothing to do with the matter. But we needn't try; it is all there in Jarrell's poems. Cannot they be republished separately—and cheaply—with a proper introduction and editorial notes where needed? It would be a benefaction to all concerned. The irresistibility of the war, the suffering of its victims, Americans, Germans, Japanese—Jarrell wrote it all with equal understanding, equal humane sympathy. And he wrote it then, there, at that time and in those places, with power, spontaneity and perfect conviction. Against what I have already said about his poetry, I must in basic honesty conclude with an amendment: in his powerful war poems Randall Jarrell did rise, as if in spite of himself and at the command of a classical force outside his own consciousness, to his moment of tragic vision.

Pieces of a Broken Mirror

SHALL WE GATHER AT THE RIVER. By James Wright. Wesleyan University Press. 43 pp. $4. Paper $2.

THE NAOMI POEMS. By Bill Knott. Follett Publishing Co. 64 pp. $3.95. Paper $2.45.

PAUL ZWEIG

Mr. Zweig teaches at Columbia University. He is the author of The Heresy of Self-Love: A Study of Subversive Individualism (Basic Books).

A generous fantasy has enlivened American poetry during these past years. With the help of our poets, and of writers like Norman Mailer, we have come to recognize, shudderingly, that what we see writ large in the brutal events of the day is but a shadow of the personal script of our shyest secrets. A traffic jam blurred by exhaust clouds becomes a mental event; a political demonstration, a place to live out dream gestures; a war, a bog of secret self-discoveries.

I think of the river James Wright describes in his new book. It has two shores, "The one in hell, the other/ In Bridgeport Ohio." We straddle the river between hell and Ohio. Between our personal carbon monoxide, and that dull street in America where we are waiting for all the lights to change. But what if we are the river, flowing between the inner and the outer shore? Is that perhaps what Mr. Wright is telling us? Like any likely river, we need both shores if we are to have a name, a shape, and a hope to bear up our end of civilization, which needs bearing up.

So many of the poems in James Wright's new book are attempts at prayer: enormously quiet, as if they hoped to pass underneath the jarred noises of the rooms, fields, streets and cities where they are spoken. They plead and thank, but for uncertain gifts. The grace they implore has a hard, almost bitter edge to it: "Men have a right to thank God for their loneliness." Wright's poems are the prayers of a man longing to be forgotten; for whom the emptiness of the Midwestern heaven has become strangely, unexpectedly consoling:

> The Sixth Day remained evening, deepening further down,
> Further and further down, into night,
> a wounded black angel
> Forgotten by Genesis.

The book's title, Shall We Gather At The River, brings to mind an old prayer meeting: people huddled near a prairie stream, made small by the endless flat spaces and by the uncomplicated hugeness of the sky. Their prayers will have a long way to travel. Under such a sky more faith will be needed than in some intricate church building. But the title also asks a question. Shall we gather at the river? What is it worth to pray when my voice can only measure the blank space it has failed to penetrate? "I am afraid of my own prayers," says Wright, perhaps because they draw close to him, for a moment, the windy emptiness that has consumed them. The poem, "A Prayer To The Lord Ramakrishna," ends:

No!
I kneel down, naked, and ask forgiveness,
A cold drizzle blows into the room,
And my shoulders flinch to the bone.
You have nothing to do with Sleep on.

The God will not wake up. Wright will continue to inscribe his prayers, wishing they were "grass," scraping them "on the wall of the drunk tank," with a "raw fingernail." Never will he know if his prayers are reaching far; if his despair has taken wing or if, instead, it has become a mirror in which he discovers the persona of his poems: a skeleton, a "full blooded Sioux Indian," a "red spider," a bum drowned in a suck hole: the unknown faces of himself.

Wright's imagination is most comfortable in this world of surreal explorations. The solid answers of heaven may be doubtful; but the other eye—the spiritual, third eye—flickers quietly open in this space of lyrical secrets.

The most successful poems in Shall We Gather At The River, make quiet, free-wheeling movements between Wright's private space of "white birds," a space piled high "with the secrets of the wheat and the mysterious lives/ Of the unnamed poor," and those angular streets of Minneapolis or Chicago where, he tells us, there are men "who labor dawn after dawn/ To sell me my death." Faced with the emptiness of the God who "sleeps on," Wright turns timidly toward the abyss, toward those dread companions, his own fearful identities. And they do not fail him. His search is painful, and the poems set a mood of quiet despair. When the poet looks outward, he sees a place where "a cop's palm/ Is a roach dangling down the scorched fangs/ Of a light bulb." It is the haunted public place, shaped like a dream of paranoia. And yet it is not a dream, for the fears are real. America has enlarged the intricate madness, giving us "Highschool backfields (that) search under benches/ Near the Postoffice. Their faces are the rich/ Raw bacon without eyes."

But when Wright opens the spiritual eye, it too sees deadly images, as in "Three Sentences For A Dead Swan," part of which I quote:

Now one after another I let the black scales fall
From the beautiful black spine
Of this lonesome dragon that is born on the earth at last,
My black fire,
Ovoid of my darkness,
Machine-gunned and shattered hillsides of yellow trees
In the autumn of my blood where the apples
Purse their wild lips and smirk knowingly
That my love is dead.

The machine guns, the shattered hillsides have detached themselves from the gross warnings of newspaper, TV and radio, becoming part of an inward language. They describe how the poet has rediscovered all the wars housed in his own small world. America and he understand each other, as they lay waste the land. And yet the poet's voice contains an art of survival, for it has reopened the connections between the inner and the outer violence.

Poems like "The Minneapolis Poem," "Before A Cashier's Window In A Department Store," "Willie Lyons," "In Memory Of Leopardi," "To The Muse" (these are only a few), cross between the two worlds with ghostly smoothness. They explore both shores of the river that flows between hell and Bridgeport, Ohio; between personal madness, and "the rich raw bacon without eyes."

Shall We Gather At The River is, in many ways, James Wright's strongest book. By dint of sheer labor—the kind of spiritual labor Kierkegaard meant when he wrote: "He who does the work becomes his own father"—he has hardened and shaped the despairing moments described by his poems. What might have been self-pity has undergone a change into clear, strong poetry. Also impressive is how Wright has managed, so often, to rise above the modish style of surrealist pastoral elegy which he himself, along with Robert Bly, had done so much to create. How far beyond it he has moved can be seen by comparing the few poems in this new book where the old style still appears with the many poems I have cited.

To write poetry today is to hold up pieces of a broken mirror. The believable forms have been ground to bits by a century of millstones. Now fragments of the self crawl over a living rubble of culture. To taste the wholeness of his experience, the poet must carry the mirror very close, dangerously close. What he sees in it will be scarcely visible: not a procession of worldly forms but the hub of a spiritual wheel whose center is me, and whose outer rim is everywhere. His poem will be "fantastic," "surreal," "metaphoric," "fragmented" or dubiously "unpoetic"; a jagged yet necessary fiction, like a chemical element still to be discovered, though a gap in the psychic chart tells us it must be there. The poem is a tentative theory of the missing element, a sketch of what it would be like if the void were filled. (Do we yet understand the role of "emptyness" in poetry? Baudelaire's ennui, the stoic ataraxy, i.e., that mysterious Eastern ability to wait and see, when the psychic wheels have exhausted their inertia and, for a moment, are still, before the horses of the blood have kicked them into motion again.)

Bill Knott's first book, The Naomi Poems, is one of the most elusive and unusual collections by a young poet. It is elusive because Mr. Knott holds the sharp edges of the mirror so close to the reader and to the world that we do not recognize at once what we are seeing. Elusive also because Knott's poetry is uneven, though in the way of honesty. We are given the whole experiment to undergo: the sharp lyricism, but also, intermingled, the clumsiness, the poetic afterbirth. In a way, The Naomi Poems is not a good book, if by that we mean

THE ROBERT BLY NUMBER OF TENNESSEE POETRY JOURNAL

features new poems

—articles by William Matthews, Frank Steele, and others, with a one-word contribution by James Dickey

—a long interview

$1.50 a copy, postpaid; or $3.00 with three-issue subscription, including STAFFORD

THE WILLIAM STAFFORD ISSUE, with many new poems and an article by Paul Ramsey, is ready; prices as above.

John Ridland's

ODE ON VIOLENCE (paperback) is ready . . . $2.50 postpaid

Tennessee Poetry Press
P. O. Box 196
Martin, Tennessee, 38237

a solid achievement of rhetoric and sensibility. It does not always reshape the language it has unsettled. Its best moments are often fragmentary: a stanza, some unforgettable lines. But Knott can reach further in a line than many poets can in a book. The mill wheels have ground his language, his life perhaps, into the smallest pieces. But he has learned—at what cost?—to gather images from the broken world, and to recompose them with a kind of visionary wisdom:

Bloodspurts lessening . . . hoofbeats of animals stalked to their birth by the sun, fade.
It is a bright edgeless morning, like a knife that to be cleaned is held under a vein.

. . . . . .

Isadora I write this poem
On my shroud, when my home village walks out to harvest.
Bread weeps as you break it gently into years.

Not many poets have seen so simply, so convincingly! Many of Knott's best poems flicker briefly in the psychic emptiness, and then withdraw, shaped by their momentary insight. They are some of the finest short poems I know. Grappling with fragments, Knott has discovered a form sensitive to the smallest movements of the psyche. I quote a few of the short poems:

Poem

Alright if I have to be famous let it be for this great starfish-shield I made
And the sands of her face drift over her body

Death

Going to sleep, I cross my hands on my chest.
They will place my hands like this.
It will look as though I am flying into myself.

Hair Poem

Hair is heaven's water flowing eerily over us
Often a woman drifts off down her long hair and is lost

The Naomi Poems, subtitled "corpse and beans," are attributed on the cover of the book to St. Geraud, a pseudonym, but also a character whose existence is the poems he wrote. Paul Carroll, in his preface, tells us that St. Geraud was originally a character in an anonymous piece of 18th-century French pornography. It is a troubling irony, for the new St. Geraud's poems are chaste, so chaste that they create a kind of fear in the reader, a feel of vulnerability, as if the voice of the poems were dying, as if these were his last words. Each poem is like an epitaph. What is more, we are told that St. Geraud is dead. Bill Knott's next book will have to be written by someone else. A dream of self-destruction moves through The Naomi Poems, as if the book itself had killed St. Geraud, perhaps in order that Bill Knott may survive. I like to think that "Widow's Winter," one of the finest poems in the volume, is Bill Knott's adieu to St. Geraud, and his quietly spoken welcome to the world:

Outside,
the snow is falling into its past. . .
I do want this night to end.
In the fireplace, a section of ash caves in.

The fall day you were buried birds went over,
south,
thick enough to carry someone.
They took my gapes of breath —their fuel?
We are together in some birds, who fail?

I didn't even want to look at your grave, its heroic little mound like the peck of dirt we hope to eat in our life. . .

It is a bitter, realistic welcome. Yet the harshness of the last stanza describes an act of recognition which will arm the poet. Bill Knott is at his strongest in such poems which survive like bulwarks in a dream of suicide.

Sojourner of the Self

NOTEBOOK 1967-68. By Robert Lowell. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 161 pp. $6.

JEROME MAZZARO

Mr. Mazzaro is in the English Department at the State University of New York at Buffalo. He is the author of a book of poems, Changing the Windows (Ohio University Press) and of The Poetic Themes of Robert Lowell (University of Michigan Press).

Some years ago, Robert Lowell complained to Alfred Alvarez of "the monotony of the sublime" in American culture. "Even the minor poet," he indicated, "reaches for the sublime." A year later, as part of the same complaint, he told Stanley Kunitz: "You wouldn't write poetry unless you felt it had some chance of lasting. But if you get too concerned about posterity, you're in danger of becoming pompous and fraudulent. The poet needs to keep turning to something immediate and alive . . . something impertinent, engaging, un-Olympian." For the Union Dead was supposed to have been that turn, but, even more than it, Notebook 1967-68 represents the corrective for Alexandrian postures.

It chooses for its form the journal and, like Gide's, Lowell's fourteen-line, blank verse entries "represent considerably more than a notebook filled with confessions, acts of literary repentance and raw material for future works." As far as his scrupulous revising permits, they represent an exercise in "spontaneous rapid composition." This composition, he explains in his "Afterthought," though intended as neither chronicle nor almanac, "rolls with the seasons": the separate poems and sections opportunist and inspired by impulse, the subjects accidental, and the whole a single poem "jagged in structure." The result is a remarkable book—one of Lowell's three best and one which should greatly influence the direction of poetry to come.

The subjects of the book are not new. They deal with the decline of the West in general biographic terms paralleling the seasons and the ages of man, the failure of the idea of progress, the loss of Christianity, the mechanization and dehumanization of the modern world, the tensions of family life. In this connection, he reprints "In the Cage" from Lord Weary's Castle, revisions of "Night Sweat," "Caligula," and "New York 1962: Fragment" from For the Union Dead, revisions of "1958" and "For Theodore Roethke: 1908-1963" from Near the Ocean, and includes lines and half-lines from many earlier poems. And though, as Lowell writes, he seems to have felt mostly "the joys of living," what he records, "thanks to the gift of the Muse" along with an assist from Freud's "reality principle," is the pain. As one of his voices announces in "Rats," "Only man is miserable." Out of this misery come love, war and art.

Here, one might argue, the influence of Randall Jarrell's Arnoldianism is less couched than in other volumes. For it is out of misery, too, that Jarrell in "Seele im Raum" draws his inclinations to the future and, like Jarrell, Lowell proffers as the future's key a secular imitation of Christ, "our only king without a sword." The imitation may be accomplished imaginatively through art since Christ is the Word or, as "Joinville and Louis IX" suggests, through Christly acts. Like the ghosts that haunt Jarrell's poems, those who succeed remain as guides for those struggling.

For both poets, the struggle is part of an assumed evolutionary drift toward less imperfection wherein man, ignorant

THE POWER OF THE PENTAGON

Historic Dialogue on Foreign Policy and National Priorities

Now published in a special issue of

The Progressive

It is yours as a bonus with a special half-price subscription—
12 months for $3

The hitherto off-the-record proceedings of the recent Congressional Conference on the Military Budget and National Priorities mark an historic milestone in open, hard-hitting discussion. The dialogue brilliantly illuminates some of the most compelling issues confronting the country today:

- The Militarization of Foreign Policy
- The Showdown over ABM and Other Aspects of Missile Madness
- How the Military-Industrial Complex Works
- The High Price of Pentagon Secrecy
- The Urgent Need for Civilian Control of the Military
- The Truth about the So-Called Missile Gaps
- The Lessons of Vietnam and the extent to which swollen military budgets are distorting our priorities through miserably funded budgets for domestic needs.

PARTICIPANTS

J. KENNETH GALBRAITH
SEN. GEORGE McGOVERN
ARTHUR LARSON
SEN. J. W. FULBRIGHT
HANS MORGENTHAU
SEN. GAYLORD NELSON
GEN. WILLIAM W. FORD
REP. BENJAMIN ROSENTHAL
RICHARD GOODWIN
HERBERT YORK
MARCUS RASKIN
REP. ROBERT KASTENMEIER
ADAM WALINSKY
REP. WILLIAM RYAN
JEREMY STONE
REP. PHILLIP BURTON
FRED WARNER NEAL
REP. DONALD FRASER
GEORGE KISTIAKOWSKY
REP. JOHN CONYERS
CHARLES SCHULTZE
REP. DON EDWARDS
RICHARD BARNET
REP. RICHARD McCARTHY
GEORGE KAHIN
REP. GEORGE BROWN JR.
RICHARD FALK
REP. ABNER MIKVA
REP. LESTER WOLFF
SEN. WILLIAM B. SAXBE
REP. BOB ECKHARDT
REP. ROBERT L. LEGGETT
LEN RODBERG
GEORGE RATHJENS

Subscribe now—get your copy as a bonus

AMONG RECENT WRITERS

HARRISON SALISBURY	MORTON MINTZ
JAMES FARMER	SEN. EUGENE McCARTHY
CHARLES V. HAMILTON	HAL BORLAND
SIDNEY LENS	DR. ROBERT COLES
JAMES BALDWIN	KAY BOYLE
RALPH NADER	JAMES A. WECHSLER
SEN. GAYLORD NELSON	MILTON MAYER

FULL MONEY-BACK GUARANTEE

Your $3 will be refunded promptly anytime you are not satisfied.

SPECIAL HALF-PRICE OFFER only $3 for 12 monthly issues plus The Power of The Pentagon

The Progressive
422 W. Gorham
Madison, Wis. 53703

Yes—send me The Progressive for 12 months for only $3 with a full money-back guarantee, plus The Power of the Pentagon.

☐ $3 enclosed ☐ Bill me

Name_____

Address_____

City_____ State_____ Zip_____

of God and God's plan, is disregarded while the species is preserved and women fulfill their roles through propagation. The last line of "The River God," with its lepers dying to preserve the state, even echoes the dying gunner in the final line of Jarrell's "The Death of the Ball Turret Gunner." But, whereas Jarrell trusted to God to realize the plan, Lowell, as Jarrell once pointed out, "sometimes doesn't have enough trust in God and tries to do everything himself." This lapse in trust posits a world which in its Caesarism and its notions of a survival of the fittest and of charity assumes a more Spencerian and Schopenhauerian cast than does Jarrell's.

The volume continues as well the dualistic view of the world which Lowell shares with many classic American writers. Its tensions of light and darkness, liberal and conservative, self and shadow, he has consistently acknowledged as part of his own nature. This dualism which in volumes like Imitations and The Voyage once shaped a diction that pitted word against word here restricts itself to a series of similar or opposing images. Wall stands against wall, for example, in "Two Walls," or, in "The March," the protesters "like green Union Army recruits" oppose "the other army, the Martian" and "his new-fangled rifle, his new green steel helmet."

What is new and hence startling in the book are its techniques. The journal or rather "false" journal form creates a "false" Lowell through observations, reminiscences, thoughts and opinions carefully doctored to appear complete while at the same time personal and natural. The form strikes one immediately as a 20th-century equivalent to the epistle which Alexander Pope fashioned on Horace in the 18th century to escape the empty formalism of his day. It also strikes one as Lowell's daylight, conscious equivalent to John Berryman's dream song which by being nocturnal and subconscious works through dream and wit. The form introduces a way of getting more of life into poetry, along with an opacity in which there is a total disappearance of the image in the fog of personal and daily experience—only to have the image waft back eventually into vividness.

The technique opposes the meditational structure of Lowell's early poetry, where he tried to put himself into the very spot where the event occurred by visualizing every minute detail. Thus, for example, in a poem like "Long Summer," the vaporish, confused closeness of a two-month fog lifts briefly at one point to reveal:

—one second, bright as burning shavings, scattered bait and ptomaine caught by the gulls with groans like straining rope;
windjammer pilgrims cowled in rubber hoods, making for harbor in their yellow bus.

To this form, this going from existential nausea to freedom, Lowell adds a blank verse which in its rhythms and its collapses of syntax is uniquely his own. It is based upon a shifting ten- to eleven-syllable line with an unusual number of feminine endings that give to it a casual flow. Occasionally the line will expand or contract to handle more or fewer syllables, but always it manages to suggest the personal voice and commitment that has increasingly become Lowell's hallmark.

Lyrical Discourse

ASBESTOS PHOENIX. By Ramon Guthrie. Funk & Wagnalls. 132 pp. $4.95.

GERMAINE BREE

Miss Brée is Vilas Professor in the Institute for Research in the Humanities at the University of Wisconsin. She is the author of books on Proust, Gide and Camus, among others.

Suite, alba, canticle, cantata, rigadoon, doxology, oracle, ode, elegy, springsong, coda, recital, threne, dirge. . . . Poetry as voice, courses through the volume in rich patterns, a fierce many-faceted lyrical discourse of love, pain, rage, joy, memory and desolation. The first response—mine at least—is delight in Ramon Guthrie's mastery of rhythm, the rare variety and range of the modes of poetic discourse he can adopt, and yet always speak in his own voice directly in the poem. His easy familiarity with a long poetic past (French as well as English), an element of that mastery, never comes between us and the poem. From "Logos":

Untethered from words Poetry could be the most—or better say, the only—autonomous impulse in the world

Untethered from words perhaps, but not from rhythm, which here seems primal; the words, truculent, exuberant, unforeseen, bring the substance with which it plays. Each poem is a dynamic, never a static, whole. From "Exegesis":

I consort with words only from sheer loneliness,
as a lifer in solitary might welcome the companionship of a spider or a cockroach.

One sees of course the passion and the paradox. For Guthrie's joy—sometimes flamboyant—in words can hardly be missed; the sudden unexpected Joycean puns and inventions, the alliterations so fantastic that one wonders how he manages to unleash and restrain them at will: witness the unabashedly funny poem entitled "Wunday the Worst of Weptober." One sees it too in the quasi-inexhaustible presence of figures and names drawn

LITERARY EDITOR

With this issue, Helen Yglesias retires from The Nation after more than three years of dedicated, creative work as literary editor; the magazine expresses its thanks for her contribution to its pages.

The incoming literary editor is Beverly Gross, who was brought to the editors' attention when she wrote "Culture and Anarchy: Little Reviews and Little Magazines" for the Antioch Review's special issue (Spring 1969) on magazine publishing.

Miss Gross graduated from the University of Michigan in 1959 and received a Ph.D. from the University of Chicago in 1966. She was fiction editor of the Chicago Review in 1962-64, and has published frequently in that magazine, as well as in the South Atlantic Quarterly, Modern Language Quarterly and other literary journals. Fiction: Open and Closed Forms, which she co-edited with Richard Giannone, will be published by Holt, Rinehart & Winston next year.

Miss Gross has taught at Northwestern University, Vassar and Queens, from which last college she comes to The Nation.

Poetry Editor

Beginning July 1, Allen Planz will be The Nation's poetry editor, succeeding John Logan in this rotating post. He is now selecting poetry for publication beginning in the fall.

A collection of Mr. Planz's poetry, A Night For Rioting, has just been published by The Swallow Press, and his verse has been appearing for some time in Chelsea, Chicago Review, The Massachusetts Review, Poetry, The Nation and elsewhere. In 1966, he won the New York YM-YWHA Poetry Center award for younger poets. Mr. Planz has taught at Hunter College, New York University and Queens College.

from myth and legend, attuned to the poet's every mood, from the ribald to the despairing: Saint Budóc, Saint Cornély, Saint Winohk'l; Marsyas, Merlin, Caliban; Norns, Parcae, Siren; Vivian and the fiercely pursued, elusive Mélusine. "An immense curious learning," Alexander Laing has noted, "shuttles through Asbestos Phoenix." True. But concretely alive, bound to personal mood and theme, wedding legend to reality and reality to the timeless world of myth. Ramon Guthrie's technical virtuosity and vast knowledge are never an end in themselves, an excuse for self-indulgence. He is not an academic poet. So the figure of George Trockett—two-hundred-fifty-odd tobacco-chewing pounds, George Trockett in suspenders, brass collar button and no collar, small blue ursine eyes asquint. . . .

has its place, "an Ajax drawn by Baskin," a "Titan in a Goya lithograph" or "Falstaff at a tea on Beacon Hill."

The world of Asbestos Phoenix is peopled with its own fauna and flora, vividly perceived, precisely etched: images of light and water, of birds, flowers, people, scenes, which like the figures culled from myth, art or history are summoned there by name, alive and germane to the poet's design.

A dragonfly perched with its angular four wings and six abrupt elbows on the dry summit of a stone.

Guthrie's world is concrete, sensuous, active. Underlying all is the poet's acute awareness that though words are there to people an unwilled solitude, yet

In instants when delight and anguish cancel each other out in shrill conjunction it happens

—moments when word and perception coincide. Guthrie intimately knows what Howard Nemerov called "an emotion of poetry . . . a rhythmic or patterned exaltation which takes up and transforms its complex material of feelings and objects....of which....the dominating traits are gaiety, energy, and control." Thence the force of the poet's desire and never terminated quest of that elusive, magic Mélusine. Guthrie is a poet who intends to sacrifice no part of his awareness, whether perception, imagination, or thought.

"Who but Guthrie would ever think of a 'stalled meteor'?" comments Laing of one of Guthrie's many quasi-surrealistic images that free the mind from its habitual moorings. Or of an "Asbestos Phoenix," an image Guthrie himself comments on. Poetry for him is, he tells us, a way to self-knowledge; a mirror in which he can decipher "what manner of animal" he is. "Feeling itself grow old," so runs the legend of the Phoenix, "this bird builds itself a pyre whereon it mounts and is consumed. On the ninth day thereafter it rises from its own ashes." Guthrie sees himself, "like most sentient human beings, a noncombustible Phoenix," who cannot either consume himself on the pyre or rise from his own ashes "after a nine day recess from existence": hence the paradox, the ridicule and the pain.

"Suite by the River," the first poem in the book, is a muted sensuous love poem, mysterious and delicate as the figures it evokes, the dragonfly, Mélusine and, absurd and poignant, the baffled "stalled meteor" forever distant from whatever there is to be distant from. . . .

The happiness and intimacy, the parting and the longing, are inescapably held together:

Sluiced by oncoming dawn you are far and near shaped ivory whose gloss lint of sleep a moment yet obscures

The same evanescent presence of exquisite images echoing in the memories emerging from long corridors of time are woven into the subtle "Pattern for a Brocade Shroud":

There was a fragrance of moss
....grants of moss
lichen pungency of dawn
....awn herons standing in the fallow sedges
....shallow edges of the lake.

"Feeling itself grow old": the past, time and, more cruelly ironical, the outrage of physical pain and the tête-à-tête with death, flame on the pyre of poetry. "So I spoke in a chorus of three different voices," begins a "Dialogue with the Sphinx"— of a gun-shy banshee of a landlocked merman of Orpheus himself with a bad case of laryngitis,....

One never knows in what form the poet's self will be mirrored back to us; nor in Guthrie's verse what shape will arise in answer to the voice. . . . And be held under the poet's sardonic eye, leaving no room for self-pity or deprecation.

In the volume, no figure perhaps is more absurd, tragic and deeply moving than Marsyas "in the intensive care ward," a setting "straight out of Jacques Callot by Hogarth," Marsyas, who can wrest from his double imprisonment—physical pain and solitude—the image of Brocéliande:

So name her Vivian. I, scarecrow Merlin, our Brocéliande this frantic bramble of glass and rubber tubes and stainless steel....

This fierce contestation—not negation—of one reality by another, never relinquished, evidenced only in the poem, is Guthrie's own paradoxical realm, the "autonomous impulse" that binds together every mood and poem. The terrible reality of life is his essential concern.

The volume closes with four stringently satiric poems (one other too, a masterly translation, "The Reseda and the Rose," Louis Aragon's poem in memory of four Resistance dead) that punctuate our political past: "Homage to John Foster Dulles"; "Some of Us Must Remember"; "Scherzo for a Dirge," and from Graffiti the "Postlude: for Goya."

The poems collected in the volume, all but two, were, Guthrie informs us, composed between 1960 and 1968 and comprise about a third of the poetry he wrote in these years. Another volume, Maximum Security Ward is in preparation—a rich offering. Asbestos Phoenix alone would place Ramon Guthrie among the major poets of the mid-century.

Student power in China

The Cultural Revolution began at Peking University. Why? How did it start and how did it develop? In one of the most detailed accounts yet to appear, Victor Nee describes China's educational system and the student campaign to revolutionize it. Prior to book publication, "The Cultural Revolution at Peking University" appears in full as this summer's double issue. Send for your sample copy now.

MONTHLY REVIEW

Edited by Paul M. Sweezy and Harry Magdoff

Dept. 2 116 West 14 St. N.Y., N.Y. 10011
$7 a year students $5 (foreign add $1)

The Politics of Poetry

ALEXANDER LAING

Mr. Laing wrote "The Nation and Its Poets" for the magazine's one hundredth anniversary issue. His poetry has been published in The New Yorker, The Atlantic Monthly, The Nation and other periodicals. He is the author of The Sea Witch (Ballantine) and other books.

HEAR THE WIND BLOW! Poems of Protest and Prophecy. By John Beecher. International Publishers. 189 pp. $5.95. Paper $2.25.

IN THE MECCA. By Gwendolyn Brooks. Harper & Row. 54 pp. $4.95.

COLLECTED POEMS 1915-1967. By Kenneth Burke. University of California Press. 296 pp. $7.50.

THE POETRY OF MY POLITICS. By Walter Lowenfels. Olivant Press. 131 pp. $5.95.

THE PORTABLE WALTER: From the Prose and Poetry of Walter Lowenfels. Edited by Robert Gover. International Publishers. 160 pp. $5.95.

In the good old days, when the New Criticism was middle-aged, Horace Gregory praised e. e. cummings for being "anti-political and against all forms of state tyranny." The quotation is picked up in The Poetry of My Politics, Volume II of an autobiography which Walter Lowenfels is stitching together out of swatches from his own past writings. Lowenfels could have demolished Gregory's critical silliness more quickly than he does, by analyzing the phrase quoted. To be "against all forms of state tyranny" is itself an unqualified political posture.

It is the politics of their poetry that brings these four writers within a common critical perimeter. New readers may need to be reminded of a surge of honors that welcomed the emergence of Gwendolyn Brooks, some twenty years ago, culminating in the 1950 Pulitzer Prize. Her sixth volume of poetry is political in the common sense, which recognizes politics as the means of affecting or halting social change. Her poems for Medgar Evers and Malcolm X deal with political murder, which can set a ghost walking, stronger than its first humanity.

In the Mecca is mostly given to the title poem's syncopated revelation of what it is like for more than 2,000 Negroes to live crammed into the 176 once luxurious apartments of "the Mecca," an enormous "showplace of Chicago" built in 1891. Miss Brooks, using at first a casual line structure, tightens it to quivering muscle as she guides us in search of a child vanished in the huge labyrinth that somewhere conceals its Minotaur:

> She whose little stomach fought the world had > wriggled like a robin!

This poem's fierce judgment upon a society that so viciously impacts a part of itself is the better for doing without the explicit speech of the two elegies.

Lowenfels in his first chapter, "White Poetry Only," rebukes the segregation practiced by anthologists who select black poets only, labeled as such, or offer unlabeled gatherings that turn out to be lily white. Miss Brooks's credits indicate that segregation begins in the magazines. I cannot ask of her a finer poem, ever, than the slant-rhymed sonnet "Piano after War" in her first book, but In the Mecca verifies her impressive growth into a new prosody.

If the 1950s were characterized by beats and confessionals, the sixties have been marked by the grand looming up of earlier figures, eclipsed for a while by fashion or by their own reticence. John Hall Wheelock and Ramon Guthrie suddenly, past 70, have given us their vigorous best poems. Kenneth Burke, described in a standard compendium as having begun as a poet, spoke a farewell to poetry as definite as Rimbaud's in his secretive novel Towards a Better Life (1932). But it contains the statement, "Here is a promise: resurgam!" The promise was half-fulfilled in The Book of Moments (1955), which is now included, together with its perverse foreword, as the first third of Collected Poems 1915-1967. The perversity is in the foreword's "doctrinal" toying with the political poet's need for a devil's advocate who nevertheless does not appear in the poems that follow—and a good thing too.

That two-thirds of these poems were written in the past twelve years is evidence enough of the poet unleashed at high maturity, but the "critic's critic" has not been put down. He apologizes for pieces that "would profit best by a collective situation in which they might prop one another." I find myself wishing that the synthesist of a grammar and a rhetoric of motives had devoted his central genius to the coalescing of many more of these evocative "paragraphs," as he calls them, into final poetry. There are no false starts here. Thank the critic for that.

I am aware of having had a reader's quarrel only once with E. M. Forster, over his essay on anonymity. It has always seemed to me that the absolute warrant of a work of art is its unmistakable reflection of a unique individual who created it. Forty years ago Walter Lowenfels and a friend tried to start yet another literary movement in Paris with their anonymously produced pamphlet: Anonymity. It did not work—and Burke's only half-intended poetical anonymity has not worked either. The impishly particularizing human being—who has blocked himself from being one of our best poets—is defined with a new shape by all these bits. When some of them are brought to bear upon a single focus they prop one another deftly. Witness two stanzas from different parts of the poem, "The Great Debate":

> To expunge a one-day fly > be quick.
> Spare it interminable seconds > of long-lingering torture.
>
> . . .
>
> Give us an honorable peace
> And we'll stop
> Our dishonorable war.

When Burke reminds us, once in a while, that rhyme and meter can still be a surprising joy, be wary of his impulse—as in "Sand, Sea, Sky"—to give us a compensating swift kick in the grammar in his last line. The five calligraphic pages of Flowerishes are reprinted here, with four new ones. Sample: "Poets with little to say learn to write as though guarding a secret."

John Beecher has no such problem. If presented anonymously his work would loom as the strong, angry speech of a 20th-century abolitionist—the impassioned outcome of evident physical confrontations with the several sorts of bleak scoundrels who profit from the degradation of their fellow men. "After Eighty Years," a 14-page poem upon which this book pivots, was timed from the Emancipation Proclamation to Beecher's service in World War II as a merchant seaman in the integrated freighter Booker T. Washington under a Negro skipper. The poem was published in 1945 as a chapter of All the Brave Sailors, Beecher's prose account of that experience. Here I Stand had announced the poet in 1941, and there have been other books—no intentional anonymity.

In an introduction to Hear the Wind Blow!, Maxwell Geismar suggests that Beecher's lack of recognition relates to the preoccupation of the literary establishment "whether paid-off or voluntary" with a concept of the "Free World" that found the implications awkward. Somewhat. Pressures that keep Pete Seeger and Joan Baez a little off center in the great American spotlight would work more definitely against Beecher be-

No,
I don't laugh at death.
It's just that I'm not afraid to die among birds and trees.

The words of a 19th-century romantic, "dying" for the love of a lady? No, the words of a 20th-century guerrilla fighter, Javier Heraud, who was shot to death at the age of 21.

OUR WORD is a beautifully presented collection of contemporary poetry, most of which has not appeared here before, written by Latin American guerrilla fighters, including Ernesto "Che" Guevara. The poems and introductory remarks appear in both the original Spanish and in English translation.

Hear OUR WORD, translated and edited by Edward Dorn and Gordon Brotherston. Subscribe now to The NATION and we will send you this remarkable book as a gift.

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free OUR WORD, edited by Edward Dorn and Gordon Brotherston.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign.)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....Zip .....

N 7-7

cause he is relentlessly harsh, never an entertainer. But if this was a dominant factor it was abetted by other preoccupations of mid-century criticism: a symbolism insulated from external reality, and the deep plunge into self. Neither aspect interests Beecher. His usual methods are scalding, short, objective portraits and plain narratives: the ten lines of "A Dixie Hero," or the twelve of "Chainey," performing both functions. The latter, telling of an ex-convict, ends:

We capering white brats dogged her around, mocking that tethered gate.
She shambled rolling-eyed down every street in Birmingham, mumbling of "Jedgment." All our minds were shackled by her chain and ball.

Beecher, emerging into some notice in his middle 60s, acknowledges the help, in assembling his new book, of Lowenfels, whose first book appeared in 1925 and who said farewell to poetry more emphatically than Burke did, at about the same time. From 1940 to 1955 Lowenfels reported for and edited the coal fields edition of The Daily Worker, until he was convicted under the Smith Act of conspiracy to pull down the republic. His "Speech to the Court," which the impartial judge called a "pretense . . . mocking the American concept of justice," pointed out that the documentation of his subversion did not include a single word he had written, in books or in The Daily Worker. The speech is reprinted in The Portable Walter, revised and shortened from the form of its 1955 appearance in Masses & Mainstream.

"While Marxists [sic] experts from the FBI occupied the witness stand," Lowenfels worked on a sonnet sequence, a bourgeois sort of thing to do. His consequent Sonnets of Love and Liberty carries a 6-page note on the form as traditional as T. W. H. Crosland's thick volume, still prescribed by English Departments. Only two of thirty-four sonnets survive into the selection "edited" by Robert Gover, a rowdy, successful young writer who has found himself a hero.

A humdrum editor is what Lowenfels needs most as he ruffles through the records of what he calls "My Many Lives." Gover, who denies being a critic, is therefore ill equipped to act as editor —but in the self-edited Poetry of My Politics the author also serves himself badly. Truncated letters refer to matters known long ago to writer and recipient, but to hardly anyone now. The amassing of scraps creates repetitions. "Human tradition" on page 38 is 5,000 years old, on page 45 it "goes back hundreds of thousands"—a difference of some consequence in one who on page 66 asserts the "inexorable laws" of Marxist history. The name of Howard Fast was deleted from "Speech to the Court," understandably. When it came to snitching on friends, Lowenfels did not join the puling band who regretted their salad days of unchasteness with the Left. But if there was to be political revision of the record, much more would have been justifiable for reasons of logic and clarity.

Lowenfels has never quite sorted himself out as a poet either. Returning to poetry in the later fifties he did a little mining of his early work. "To Certain Poets," published in The Nation twelve years ago, was a section of his fine elegy to Apollinaire, printed in Paris in 1930. In many of the recent poems he uses deftly the jargon of the space-age technicians, but as a surface skin rather than an appropriate outgrowth of the poem's core. By contrast with Beecher's immediacy, Lowenfels, who filled his reporter's notebook at the struck pitheads, seems more at home with Ludwig Wittgenstein and Giordano Bruno. He does best in the love poems, best of all in those addressed to his wife, whose sudden semi-paralysis began one of his many lives. Nothing in Beecher is more direct than Lowenfels' poem on taking a bath in these circumstances:

you hold the shower rail and I hold you and what love
can be purer or cleaner

"From an Exposition of Power and Industrial Machinery" is a mocking, small miracle of letting jargon speak foolishly for itself.

Concluding his introduction, Gover says, "to have Walter, the American Communist, tell about himself in his own way will interest those of my countrymen who have never been directly exposed to an American Communist." This recalled to me an occasion at the cold-war's origins, about twenty years ago, when I welcomed a visiting academic speaker who was to enlighten a course with which I was connected on the subject: "World Communism." To make conversation I asked if he knew a friend of mine, a Communist playwright, who lived in his city. "You know," he said, looking at me oddly, "to the best of my knowledge I've never been in the same room with a real live Communist in my life." I remember wondering what academic authority a speaker on pneumonia at the medical school would have who had never been in the same room with Diplococcus pneumoniae. Walter Lowenfels' "Lives," his prose and his poetry, should be published with proper editing, less for his sake than for the better understanding of those who make cold, and hot, wars.

Hosting Russian Poetry

MODERN RUSSIAN POETRY: An Anthology with Verse Translations. Edited and with an Introduction by Vladimir Markov and Merrill Sparks. Translated by Merrill Sparks. The Bobbs-Merrill Co. 842 pp. $12.50. Paper $5.95.

POETS ON STREET CORNERS: Portraits of Fifteen Russian Poets. By Olga Carlisle. Random House. 430 pp. $6.95.

SIMON KARLINSKY
Mr. Karlinsky is professor of Slavic languages and literature at the University of California. He is the author of Marina Cvetaeva: Her Life and Art (University of California Press).

Few Western readers are likely to grasp without explanatory comments the meaning of the pivotal scene in Solzhenitsyn's In the First Circle, in which the young Soviet diplomat Volodin rummages through the magazines of his late mother's library and becomes aware of the range and the scope of early 20th-century Russian art and poetry. The three decades of Stalinist cultural policies, which precede the action of the novel, had so thoroughly distorted Russian cultural history, so successfully slandered or driven into oblivion the finest Russian poets and painters of this century, that to a cultivated and intelligent young Russian like Volodin, brought up in the 1930s and '40s, the very discovery of their existence and of their excellence comes as a shattering jolt. The discovery triggers off an emotional and ethical evolution in Volodin, eventually culminating in his attempted act of kindness toward his mother's old doctor, the act that ruins his diplomatic career and delivers him into the hands of the secret police.

The power of the cultural establishment in the Soviet Union to make and break literary reputations, at home and abroad, is awesome. By Stalin's fiat, Vladimir Mayakovsky could be created a great national poet, his statues adorning innumerable town squares and subway stations, his patriotism and party-mindedness extolled in a steady stream of books and articles. All this would be cause for rejoicing, were it not for the awkward fact that about a dozen of Mayakovsky's contemporaries, whose poetry is equal or superior to his, get no monuments or monographs but only an occasional cursory or derogatory mention, simply because they were not eulogized by Stalin, or were not as vociferously loyal to the party as Mayakovsky was, or, worst of all, because they chose to live abroad.

The variety and richness of 20th-century Russian poetry which the government concealed from Solzhenitsyn's Volodin is no longer a secret outside the Soviet Union. The two bilingual anthologies intended to acquaint the English-speaking reader with that richness and that variety testify to the growing awareness of an interest in what is sure to be eventually recognized as one of the crowning achievements in the history of world poetry.

What these anthologies attempt to do is so very necessary and so right that the initial reaction to their appearance is humility and gratitude. Surely, it would be carping to find fault with editors and translators who offer us these volumes full of this hitherto inaccessible poetry.

Yet carp one must, for the virtues and defects of these two collections (and they are mutually complementary, as it happens) raise and illustrate the basic problems of selection and translation, problems that are likely to stay with us for some time.

Professor Markov's Modern Russian Poetry is, first of all, an astounding and beautiful feat of selection. No anthology exists in Russian that offers such a thorough, competent and imaginative picture of that multifaceted, protean poetic age. Permanent quality and significance seem to have guided his choice (the one exception is the inclusion of the topical poetry of World War II, in what seems to be a misguided effort at objectivity). For the major poets, there are balanced, comprehensive selections of poems tracing their entire careers and some of these (the sections on Zinaida Gippius or Velimir Khlebnikov, for example) could serve as a basic sampler of the best things each poet wrote.

But while the poetry printed in Russian on the left-hand pages unfolds an unparalleled and rewarding panorama of a remarkable poetic age, the English equivalents of these poems printed on the right are something else. The fatal mistake of the translators was to assume that present-day literary techniques, versification and poetic language in Russian and in English are similar and interchangeable. But, unfortunately, the kinds of meter and rhyme used by Pasternak or Mandelstam no longer exist in serious poetry in English: unless something is done to modernize the diction or the syntax, such meters inevitably suggest musical comedy lyrics and barroom ballads. Thus, when Markov and his collaborator, Merrill Sparks, after doing much violence to meaning and style, manage to duplicate the Russian rhyme scheme (mostly by using strings of present participles: winging—singing—ringing) the result is Kuzmin or Khodasevich rendered into the idiom of Gilbert and Sullivan, of Rodgers and Hammerstein or, in particularly virtuoso instances, into a watered-down Cole Porter. The slick, hackneyed rhymes, the incongruous lapses into American slang, the pseudo-poetic syntactic inversions all contribute to inject a wildly inappropriate Broadway flavor into some of the most delicate and finely wrought Russian poems ever written.

Stylistic and semantic levels of the English texts are systematically (and, apparently, unconsciously) vulgarized. The chilling apostrophe to Lady Macbeth by Vladislav Khodasevich is couched in English in the tones of a comic cop handing a traffic citation to a housewife. The English versions of the subtle and perverse lyric miniatures of the émigré poet Georgii Ivanov make one think of Ethel Merman attempting a raucous, jazzed-up rendition of a Chopin nocturne.

The Markov-Sparks anthology, for all its enormous distinction as a collection of Russian poems, cannot qualify as a satisfactory collection of translations. At their best, the English texts can serve as not entirely reliable trots for those who read Russian with difficulty. It is hard to find a single translation in the volume that could stand up in its own right as a poem in English.

In Olga Carlisle's Poets on Street Corners, on the other hand, some of the finest poets now writing in English have produced polished and elegant, although rarely faithful adaptations of major modern Russian poets. Many of these translations are also excellent English poems. Unfortunately, however, the Carlisle anthology suffers from serious defects in those areas where the Markov-Sparks one is strongest: in the selection of poems, in command of the literary background, and, all too often, in elementary comprehension of the cited Russian texts.

Vladimir Markov takes his reader through the castle of modern Russian poetry as a supremely confident host, familiar with every inch of the premises and in full command of his every step. Olga Carlisle's role is that of a chatty society hostess who, although brought up in another culture, is still attempting to lead a few guests on a tour of her ancestral home. The stance is gracious enough, but it ill serves the great poets who are introduced to the reader in such a flippant, haphazard manner. Well-known poems are arbitrarily abridged, untitled poems are provided with new titles, and dedications translated and printed as if they were titles.

The title Poets on Street Corners is a naively opportunistic attempt to capitalize on the current popularity of Yevtushenko and Voznesensky in the West. To designate thus Akhmatova, Mandelstam and Blok is about as meaningful as to call Yeats, Auden and Eliot "Beat poets." Where Vladimir Markov offers carefully thought-out, representative samplings of each poet's work, Mrs. Carlisle's selections are hasty and whimsical. She writes of elements of surrealism in the Soviet poetry of the 1920s and includes a section on the most surrealistic of Soviet poets, Nikolai Zabolotsky. But, with the exception of one single poem, he is represented exclusively by the tame, traditional poetry of the 1950s, after a decade of Stalinist labor camps broke his spirit and forced him to give up his own original style. If Marina Cvetaeva was "an important part" of Mrs. Carlisle's Parisian childhood, why is there no poem to represent her Paris period, and why are the numer-

(Advertisement)

Why Aren't You A Fast Reader?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, many people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More," mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Simply enclose a dime to cover postage and handling. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey Pkwy., Dept. 533-517, Chicago, Ill. 60614. A postcard will do.

PERSONALS

A PARTING WORD

25 years ago, when we were in the midst of a grave crisis, we used to see this slogan in all of our terminals: IS THIS TRIP NECESSARY?

These days, when many consider we are in a worse crisis, and there is an opportunity to profit from that crisis, those of us that are not in dire circumstances, when tempted to grasp such a profit, should ask ourselves: IS THIS PROFIT NECESSARY?

We don't mean to criticize tenement people who cannot afford to pass up any opportunity to secure something. Rather, we are trying to appeal to those who are compulsively "caught up in the heat of the money-mad game", and cannot pause long enough to realize that the Law of Diminishing Returns applies to money as well as anything else. Is the money the final product, or just the nuts and bolts and axles which are assembled into the end product, human satisfactions?

There is a clear division among people as to whether life is richer sharing, or hogging it. Some people insist on hogging it to the extreme of gorging and wallowing senselessly. Should not those of us who are prospering ask ourselves once in a while: IS THIS HOGGING IT NECESSARY?

There are white lies, and harmless flattery, and over-encouragement. But much deceit does more harm than good. If we are prosperous, and don't need to use deceit, or cheating, or treachery, shouldn't we occasionally ask ourselves: IS THIS DECEIT NECESSARY?

We have brains. What a waste it is not to use them.

Au revoir.

David Koretz 521 Park Detroit, MI 48226

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 7-7-69

[redacted] Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $15

☐ 5 Months, $5

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada; $2 foreign)

Name .....

Address .....

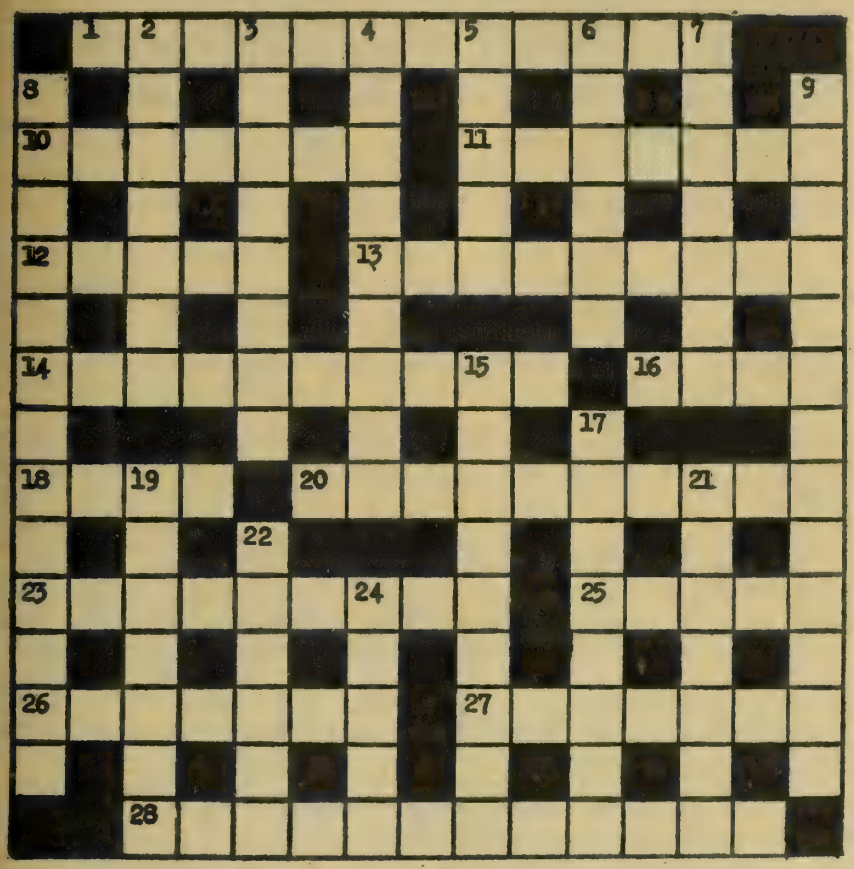
City .....

State ..... Zip No. .....

ous selections from her work (whose production spans three decades) almost all restricted to the single year 1921? There is a profusion of poems addressed to other poets—Akhmatova's to Blok and Pasternak, Pasternak's to Akhmatova, Cvetaeva's to Blok and Mayakovsky, etc. Now, most of these were occasional pieces, of no great importance in the poets' output. Their sheer concentration here gives modern Russian poetry a misleading, unwarranted air of parochialism and inbreeding.

There are various valid ways of translating modern poetry into English and Mrs. Carlisle's poet-collaborators have tried many of them. Among the most successful are Richard Wilbur's versions of Akhmatova, and adaptations of Pasternak by Theodore Weiss. Wilbur treats the originals with reverence and follows them with fidelity, while Weiss converts Pasternak into extremely free and inventive English equivalents. In both cases there is a recognizable relationship to the Russian poem printed on the opposite page; in both cases the poet-translator clearly understands the text he is translating and knows what he is doing to it.

This cannot be said of the majority of other translations in the volume. In order to forestall accusations of misreadings, Mrs. Carlisle warns us in her foreword that "what sometimes appears as a mistranslation in English is an attempt on the part of the adapter to recapture the concreteness of the Russian original." It would be nice to be able to believe this ambiguous statement. But when Marina Cvetaeva writes of "billowing red calico and whistling of the quail" and Denise Levertov translates "the familiar grass lifting in the wind and whistled tunes," it is painfully clear that someone had failed to look up some unfamiliar Russian words. Anna Akhmatova writes a shattering stanza about the women friends who waited with her at the prison gate and then followed their loved ones to Siberia. Robert Lowell's adaptation of this stanza speaks of a male friend, who would then contextually have to be Akhmatova's son. In the same cycle, Akhmatova's line "Magdalen writhed and sobbed" is rendered by Lowell as "Magdalen fought and hit the officer." Are we to believe that this sort of thing (which occurs on every other page of the collection) is "recapturing the concreteness of the Russian"? Isn't it more likely that this is simple misunderstanding based on erroneous reading of the number and gender of the word podrugi in the first Akhmatova-Lowell example and in the second of the verb bit'sia (which can mean "to fight" in other contexts, but not here)?



Since Mrs. Carlisle claims the credit for most of the trots used by her collaborators, the inescapable conclusion is that she either reads her native language with difficulty or else carelessly and inattentively. Such an impression is given further plausibility by her out-of-focus translations of the passages from memoirs and poems cited in her introductory sections. If this is so then we can understand the sad case of Robert Lowell's much admired, much criticized "adaptations" of modern Russian poets.

Robert Lowell's verbal magic in English is potent. There are people able to read Mandelstam in the original who melt in admiration before Lowell's distorted adaptations and "never mind what Mandelstam actually wrote." There is nothing wrong with the extreme freedom of Lowell's treatment. That kind of freedom worked wonders in his translations of Baudelaire and Montale. It was pushed to extremes in his magnificent adaptation of Racine's Phèdre. In all those cases, there was no doubt that Lowell had a full grasp of the text he was translating or adapting. With Mandelstam, Pasternak and, now, Anna Akhmatova, it is equally evident that, all too often, Lowell does not understand the tone, the structure and, sometimes, the elementary meaning of the poem. What he is adapting is some hasty, shoddy trot, and every few lines some misread, misunderstood Russian word or phrase (and a glance at the Russian text easily establishes the nature of each misunderstanding) pokes its way through the elegant, eloquent flow of his English, like a rusty spring out of a stylish piece of furniture. Surely, the poets Boris Pasternak, Osip Mandelstam and Robert Lowell deserve better.

The ultimate impression of these two anthologies is that of a tremendous missed opportunity. What a magnificent anthology we could have had if the respective editors had pooled their efforts; if Olga Carlisle and her collaborators had secured the advice of someone like Vladimir Markov, who really knows this poetry and understands it in all of its nuances; if Vladimir Markov had Richard Wilbur, Theodore Weiss, Denise Levertov and a better-informed Robert Lowell to help him put the poems he so beautifully selected into modern and poetic English verse. But the rare opportunity was missed and we will probably have to make do with these two collections for some years to come. We should, therefore, appreciate them for the good things they do contain: the Markov-Sparks as a collection of Russian poems and Mrs. Carlisle's volume for the dozen or so good and knowledgeable translations by fine American poets.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1305

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Very unhappy because the record is being played after midnight? (12)
10 Expedient but singular government business? (7)
11 In it butter is wrong—an olive would be better! (7)
12 More like shootin' as the dated saying goes. (5)
13 Poet arranging to plunder a French town? (9)
14 Are radical deeds the business of the revisionist? (10)
16 Polish river, or German. (4)
18 Not all one's duty, perhaps. (4)
20 See 17 down
23 The child of 4, sometimes associated with Bach? (9)
25 Nothing has the poet going round and round, almost! (5)
26 What a dentist might do to get the root? (7)
27 Is beriberi an obvious thing to show one from Madrid or Lisbon, perhaps? (7)
28 This could make one quick again. (12)

DOWN

2 Variety of red-bill, not being a very refined strain. (3-4)
3 A fall possibly might cause poor vision. (8)
4 The relation of the inevitable to the nature of its conditions. (9)
5 Containing a certain element that is somewhat less than worldly. (5)
6 Reach a stopping point. (6)
7 In the end, a little one of those things no man is, hence isolated. (7)
8 Personally addressed, one not being in the immediate vicinity. (13)
9 However in high office he isn't responsible for wrong-doing! (4-9)
15 One doesn't 6 according to schedule, if this—and certainly no credit is implied. (3,2,4)
17 and 20 across Do they seem to prove there's no crime in not being involved? (8,10)
19 One who fixes things, in a way, and in France might be in flower. (7)
21 Hate or fear, for example. (7)
22 Goes quietly—not necessarily in gym shoes. (6)
24 Put into the ground, proving there's no point to the cold season. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1304

ACROSS: 1 Chain letters; 9 And so forth; 10 Ties; 11 Bypasses; 12 Canoes; 13 Hates; 15 Salic law; 16 Terrapin; 19 Yaqui; 21 Uglier; 22 Inimical; 24 Stye; 25 Egocentric; 26 The bitter end. DOWN: 2 Henry the Eighth; 3 Instant; 4 Lifts; 5 Thrusts; 6 Ethically; 7 Satanic; 8 Generalization; 14 Supersede; 17 Raiment; 18 Nairobi; 20 Quieter; 23 Id est.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Opening this fall. Grades 10-11, boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational but seriously Christian related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

RECORDS & TAPES

PACIFICA RADIO (WBAI - KPFA - KPFK) TAPES—Campus Unrest, Black Man in America, Drug Scene, Abortion Dilemma, Anti-Vietnam, Draft Protest, Modern Poetry, etc. Over 4000 titles. FREE BROCHURES. Write Box M, Pacifica Programs, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

MARTIN LUTHER KING'S "I Had A Dream", RALPH ABERNATHY'S "Freedom Road", plus landmark speeches by MALCOLM X, REYES TIJERINA and CESAR CHAVEZ. Five powerful statements of vital significance. First quality broadcast tapes from Pacifica Radio. $12.50 each or $55.00 for all five. FREE BROCHURES. Write Box K, Pacifica Tape Library, Berkeley, Calif. 94704.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor says that his Self Designation is half of the story. The other important half is in "World Democracy".

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum

CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

100,000 signed this Declaration during the JOHNSON Administration.
NIXON is allowing death and destruction to continue and to increase.
Pressure and action against the [illegible] needed.

Individuals Against the Crime of Silence

A Declaration To Our Fellow Citizens Of The United States, To The Peoples Of The World, And To Future Generations:

1 We are appalled and angered by the conduct of our country in Vietnam.

2 In the name of liberty, we have unleashed the awesome arsenal of the greatest military power in the world upon a small agricultural nation, killing, burning and mutilating its people. In the name of peace, we are creating a desert. In the name of security, we are inviting world conflagration.

3 We, the signers of this declaration, believe this war to be immoral. We believe it to be illegal. We must oppose it.

4 At Nuremberg, after World War II, we tried, convicted and executed men for the crime of OBEYING their government, when that government demanded of them crimes against humanity. Millions more, who were not tried, were still guilty of THE CRIME OF SILENCE.

5 We have a commitment to the laws and principles we carefully forged in the AMERICAN CONSTITUTION, at the NUREMBERG TRIALS, and in the UNITED NATIONS CHARTER. And our own deep democratic traditions and our dedication to the ideal of human decency among men demand that we speak out.

We Therefore wish to declare our names to the office of the Secretary General of the United Nations, both as permanent witness to our opposition to the war in Vietnam and as a demonstration that the conscience of America is not dead.

On September 23, 1965, a Memorandum of Law was incorporated in the Congressional Record of the 89th Congress of the United States of America, in which leading American attorneys, after careful analysis of our position and actions in the Vietnam War, came to the conclusion that the U.S. is violating the following accords: The Charter of the United Nations, The Geneva Accords of 1954, the United States Constitution.

To Protest — To Object — To Dissent has long been an American tradition. The following are a few among the many who have signed this declaration to be on permanent record.

ABE AJAY
JAMES [illegible]
(FATHER) J. E. BAMBERGER, M.D., OCSO
DANIEL BERRIGAN, S.J.
REV. PHILLIP BERRIGAN, S.S.J.
[illegible] BRADBURY
[illegible] McAFFEE BROWN
REV. WILLIAM H. DU [illegible]
JAMES FARMER
W. H. FERRY
[illegible] JEROME D. FRANK
REV. STEPHEN [illegible] FRITCHMAN
BEN GAZZARA
DR. FRED GOLDSTEIN
NAOMI L. GOLDSTEIN
[illegible] RALPH R. GREENSON
PROF. ABRAHAM J. HESCHEL
BRIG. GENERAL H. B. HESTER, RET.
DR. STANLEY HOFFMAN
TERESSA B. HOFFMAN
CHARLES H. HUBBEL
SANDER L. JOHNSON, [illegible]
PROF. DONALD KALISH
EDWARD M. KEATING
PHIL KERBY
RING LARDNER, JR.
RABBI RICHARD N. LEVY
LOUIS LICHT, ESQ.
DR. ROBERT E. LITMAN
VICTOR LUDWIG
HERBERT D. MAGIDSON
SHIRLEY MAGIDSON
NORMAN MAILER
THOMAS [illegible]
SIDNEY MEYER
EASON MONROE
PROF. [illegible] J. MORGENTHAU
HENRY E. NILES
DR. MARK F. ORFIRER
AVA HELEN PAULING
DR. LINUS PAULING
BISHOP JAMES A. PIKE
RICHARD [illegible] POWELL
CARL REINER
JANICE RULE
ROBERT RYAN
DAVID SCHOENBRUN
LORRY SHERMAN
PROF. ROBERT SIMMONS
DR. BENJAMIN SPOCK
FRED H. STEINMETZ, ESQ.
DR. NORMAN TABACHNICK
D. IAN THIERMANN
BRYNA IVENS UNTERMEYER
LOUIS UNTERMEYER
DICK VAN DYKE
ROBERT VAUGHN
DR. MAURICE N. WALSH
[illegible] HARVEY WHEELER
A. L. WIRIN, ESQ.

I wish to sign my name to the above Declaration to the United Nations and want to go on record with this Declaration of the Individuals Against the Crime of Silence.

signature _____
For clarity, please print your name after your signature address _____ date _____
city _____ state _____ zip _____

Sign, complete and mail to P.O. Box 69960, Los Angeles, Calif. [illegible] The office of the Individuals Against the Crime of Silence will then forward the information to the United Nations.
Should you also wish to support additional publishings and communications, send $1 or more in cash or by check or money order payable to Individuals Against the Crime of Silence. . . . This donation entitles you to the lapel emblem, the wallet-size registration card and four personalized letter replicas of the Declaration for you to individually send to the President and your U.S. senators and congressman. Money is needed to speed our progress.
The strength of our numbers will regularly and effectively be made known. Your signature does have power.

Tear Out On The Dotted Line And Mail

COMMUNIST SUMMIT PAUL WOHL

THE NATION

JULY 14, 1969 35 cents

BURLINGAME
JUL 14 1969
LIBRARY

5-70R PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

Mr. Nixon's Urban Ballet

HAMILTON E. DAVIS

The Glenville Shoot-Out

Bad Day In Cleveland

ROLDO BARTIMOLE

Anti-Union Hospitals

BLUE CROSS PAYS THE BILLS JOEL SELDIN

China in Our High Schools ORVILLE SCHELL

MARK L. KRUPNICK on Henry James

JOAN GOULIANOS on Lawrence Durrell

LETTERS

faith of the New Left

Koch, Mo.

DEAR SIRS: Your issues of June 16 and 23 contained two important discussions of the New Left: the paper on Marcuse by Peter Clecak and the review of Christopher Lasch by John McDermott.

In these, as well as in everything else that I have read concerning the various radical movements, there is one puzzling feature, i.e., the omission of the question of "ends" that the revolutionary movements are seeking. . . .

We do have a bit of history to teach us. Many important pieces of real estate are now in the hands of revolutionary Marxists, and other points on the globe are controlled by other brands of socialism. Is it not germane to "look at the records" of these lands? How does the performance match the promise? Is there more—or less—chauvinism in Russia, in China, in Poland, in North Vietnam? Is there now no imperialism practiced by the "liberated" nations? Is man's spirit and dignity freer and more respected anywhere in the lands where the revolutionary movements were guided by Marxist doctrine? An answer to these rhetorical questions is hardly necessary, but is the New Left aware of the lesson to be drawn? . . .

If the New Left is not to copy the Russian model, or the Chinese—what blueprint or design do they have? If none, is it at all rational to proceed toward the destruction of a structure without any notion as to what is to replace it? Shall we trust that through some mystical process a program will somehow develop as we go along? That would surely place a heavy burden on faith. . . .

Albert Kaplan, M.D.

finger on Dr. King

Woods Hole, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: I wonder whether there was not more to the "dirty business" of the Martin Luther King surveillance than the fact and the timing of this outrage. Many of us have no doubt been surprised that the confessed murderer of Dr. King not only had plenty of money but that he must also have had good sources of intelligence regarding Dr. King's plans. The telephone tap would have provided such information to the operatives on the job. Mr. Hoover and his superiors (if there be any) owe to us and to history the assurance that none of the knowledge gained in the course of the wire tap was leaked to the murderer or to the accomplices that he now claims to have had.

Harry Grundfest

reporters' passions

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Elmer Bendiner writing about John Reed ["The Troubadour of Revolution," The Nation, June 30] is irritating as hell. "Yet how much we need men of Reed's passionate intelligence and tender eye at work for us in Vietnam and China and Cuba!" he exclaims, and overlooks a horde of us who may not claim one tender eye but who have written about these countries with intelligence and concern for their peoples. The literature on these countries' revolutionary struggles by American writers is not only voluminous but of so high an order that Reed may at best be called a precursor. The truth is not that today "technology weights the odds against the reporters who write passionately of human beings" but that technology's crimes (as in Vietnam) have aroused writers to write more movingly (take only the example of Jonathan Schell) than Reed ever did. . . .

Jose Yglesias

EDITORIALS

Who Is Nixon?

Chalmers M. Roberts writes in The Washington Post that no man reaches the White House on his own by other than "a vast balancing act designed to produce enough votes from America's heterogeneous population," and no one stays there except by the same means. Almost everyone will agree, but when Mr. Roberts extends it to the Knowles episode he is on unsure ground. In this and several other actions since he has been in office, Mr. Nixon has exceeded the norms of political expediency to such a degree that the most cynical analysts of government are left wondering whether he is a single, unified personality, or several at conflict with one another. To some extent Mr. Roberts shares these doubts, for in his opening paragraph he cites the trite question, "Will the real Richard Nixon please stand up?" and tries to answer it.

That the question is so persistently raised, and so unsuccessfully answered, is a political phenomenon in itself. Lyndon B. Johnson, by default and by action, produced a "crisis of credibility" which reached such proportions that, long before he left office, it had become irremediable. People did not know when to believe him and when not to believe him, but this did not blur the impression of the man himself. He showed a consistency in his deviousness and left no doubt that he knew who he was and would continue to be just that. The same could be said of John F. Kennedy and of Truman and Eisenhower. One never read feature stories about the "New Truman" or the "New Eisenhower," or speculations as to how much was old and how much new about either.

Nixon, on the other hand, has a real identity problem and one suspects that it is something more basic, and potentially more troublesome, than the zigzagging that is an indispensable component of a top-flight political career. Combined with canniness and a high order of skill in pretending to candor where he most wishes to avoid it, there is a strange uncertainty about the role in which he visualizes himself. This chameleon trait, which can no more be hidden than the histrionic grin, has given rise to the vexations about the "real Nixon," the "new Nixon," the "old Nixon," the "new-old Nixon," and all the other variations on the theme.

These speculations are quite justified; hardly anything could be more important than the subjective aspect of Presidential decision making. The unknown quantities in Mr. Nixon's character show up in foreign policy, as in the decision to visit Romania prior to a disarmament conference with the Russians, and in a general unevenness on which Senator Javits has commented. "He's back and forth," Javits says, "and it's been a very spotty performance. He hasn't made up his mind who he is. There is doubt who is in the ascendancy at a given moment. . . ."

This description hints at a partial explanation—a divided Republican Party whose leader, like a circus equestrian, tries to ride two horses which are kept going in the same general direction only by ties of expediency. But in relation to the Knowles case this hypothesis does not take one very far. Secretary Finch was the President's chief credential as a half-liberal executive. The feeling was that with such a man administering Health, Education and Welfare the Cabinet could not be altogether bad. Moreover, Mr. Finch was reputed to be Mr. Nixon's best friend and a protégé of whom Mr. Nixon could be proud. If Dr. Knowles had been appointed soon after Mr. Nixon took office there would have been no difficulty in securing not only confirmation but general approbation. The American Medical Association and Senator Dirksen could not possibly damage Mr. Nixon as seriously as he has damaged himself by keeping Finch and Knowles on the hook for five and a half months, allowing Finch to tell the reporters that Knowles was sure of appointment, then switching at the last minute to a generally similar candidate, and in the process embarrassing Finch so severely that even his enemies now sympathize with him.

The American people are not ill-natured in their attitude toward their President, however he has come to the office. They will tolerate—have tolerated—many mistakes, ascribing them to the difficulties of the office rather than the failings of the man. They do, however, expect the President to be a person of definable character. If they get the feeling that he is ruled entirely by expediency, that he has no convictions which merit their respect, they will turn against him as, for other reasons, they turned against Mr. Johnson. On this basis, Mr. Nixon has a problem on his hands that transcends the problems of inflation, the cities, Vietnam, and all others, for it affects everything that comes to him for decision. And Mr. Nixon's problem is the problem of every one of us.

Fair Dartmouth

Hanover, N.H.

For the instruction of other administrators confronted by dissent, Dartmouth's trustees have just celebrated their college's bicentennial with a wonderful demonstration of the worst ways to proceed. Most of the forty students whom they tossed to the courts of New Hampshire by the injunction route (see "The Injunction on Campus," The Nation, June 9) had completed their thirty-day sentences just in time to welcome the Earl of Dartmouth and his lady on June 14, but some were still behind bars when the faculty members who had gone along in the student seizure of Parkhurst Hall faced trial on June 23 and 24 before the faculty Committee Advisory to the President.

It was quite a show. Paul Knapp, visiting associate professor of chemistry, and Dona Strauss, assistant professor of mathematics—advised by the dean to resign—had retained the formidable William Kunstler to guide their appeal under academic due process. The administrators panicked and confronted Kunstler with the father-and-son team of Kenneth F. and John A. Graf, acting for the trustees, with a third attorney to backstop the legal amateurs of the faculty committee. The press was suddenly excluded, over bitter defense objections, from what promptly became an adversary proceeding. A scatter-

IN THIS ISSUE

July 14, 1969

EDITORIALS

34

ARTICLES

38 The Communist Summit: A Little Something for Everyone — Paul Wohl

41 The Glenville Shoot-Out: Bad Day in Cleveland — Roldo Bartimole

45 Mr. Nixon's Urban Ballet — Hamilton E. Davis

48 Anti-Union Hospitals: Blue Cross Pays the Bills — Joel Seldin

BOOKS & THE ARTS

53 The American Economic Empire — James O'Connor

54 The Miracle of the Frescoes Saved from the Flood (poem) — Florence Victor

55 The Sanctuary of Imagination — Mark L. Krupnick

56 Landscape of the Heart — Joan Goulianos

57 Weimar and Edinburgh — Martin Green

58 Learning About China — Orville Schell

60 Films — Robert Hatch

62 Art — Lawrence Alloway

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR. | Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS | Associate Editor PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH | Literary Editor BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 209 No. 2

shot charge was soon narrowed to "gross personal misconduct," in the face of extremely strong support for both teachers from their departments.

Interchangeable, Graf and Graf set out to establish facts and to repel any notion that motive was relevant. When Kunstler objected to a Graf question, the committee chairman—a decent man trapped in an unsought routine—would consult his counsel and deny the defense objection; but prosecution objections were monotonously sustained, to exclude any hint that the seizure of Parkhurst Hall was a despairing protest against the continuing implication of the college in a wicked war through ROTC and military recruiting.

The prosecution hammered its allegations that Knapp had assisted in the ejection of Dean of Freshmen Dickerson from his office and had been photographed haranguing the rabble through the windows with a bull horn. Dickerson's own testimony revealed the uncertainty of his identification, and Knapp testified that he had used the bull horn only to read an official summary of President John Sloan Dickey's remarks on the merits of the injunction procedure.

On the second day it was clear that the committee, because of such episodes, had reassessed a ludicrous situation in which Graf Senior had sometimes addressed its chairman as "Your Honor." Prosecution objections began to be crisply denied. A graduate student, by a display of wordless astonishment, repelled the notion that he had been subverted by the political wiles of Mrs. Strauss. To Kunstler's eloquent summation, the factual Grafs chose not to respond at all.

What next? The committee has only an advisory function: the trustees, who could make jailbirds of forty boys under their care by letting a judge do it, must solve this one on their own—well aware that an observer for the AAUP is watching. ALEXANDER LAING

Contempt of Congress

If an alleged Communist refuses to answer the questions of a Congressional inquisitor, he is cited for contempt, prosecuted and almost inevitably sent to jail. He has interfered with the legislative process by refusing to furnish information, however trivial. But when officials in the Pentagon systematically deceive the Congress on a matter of the most vital national importance, no one is cited, no one is tried, no one is jailed. It is almost as if one of the unwritten privileges of the military were to spend their $80 billion a year allowance pretty much as they see fit, with only a minimum of accountability to Congress, and of course none at all to the public.

In the case of MIRV—the multiple warhead development, which is perhaps the most crucial issue before the country today—Rep. William S. Moorhead accuses the Pentagon of "willful concealment," and the record bears him out. Since 1962, the Air Force has been working on "penetration aids," costing to date about $1.5 billion. MIRV is only one element of this program. At the next level of detail, the Mark 12 General Electric re-entry vehicle has been an element of MIRV, but not an exclusive one. So far as the Congress was concerned, the whole MIRV program was still in the development stage and there was no connection between MIRV and Mark 12. Thus a routine Pentagon announcement, under date of July 10, 1968, that it had given General Electric a "letter contract" to produce sixty-eight Mark 12 re-entry vehicles attracted no Congressional attention.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During the summer, The Nation will not appear on the following dates: July 21, August 4, August 18.

On June 19 of this year, President Nixon told the country that he was considering asking the Russians to agree to a moratorium on further MIRV testing. Forty-one Senators lined up behind a "sense-of-the-Senate" resolution proposed by Senator Brooke, supporting a mutual test moratorium. But in the meantime, in April and May of this year, the Pentagon was engaged in negotiations with General Electric to convert the July 1968 letter of intent into a formal contract. This process was completed and the contract was signed on June 19—the very day on which Mr. Nixon was informing the reporters that he was considering trying to work out a standstill with the Russians. Contrary to its usual practice, the Pentagon did not announce the award. When Representative Moorhead expressed outrage, the Pentagon referred blandly to its letter of intent announcement of almost exactly a year earlier.

The General Electric contract is not for research and development (the kind of testing that the Congressmen wanted halted); apparently matters are well past that stage. It is a production contract for the top stage of Minuteman III ICBMs, which can then be equipped with three warheads in place of one. Up to fourteen missiles can be mounted on the submarine-borne Poseidon, successor to the Polaris. Their warheads are smaller than the single warheads of the older vehicles, but they are city-busters in the 50-200,000 kiloton range. For comparison, the bomb that leveled Hiroshima was of 25 kiloton size.

The basic idea is to quadruple the number of deliverable warheads and to target them accurately on every town or missile site. The Russians have not been idle in this laudable endeavor. Their line of development is aimed at fewer but larger warheads. U.S. intelligence is not certain whether the Soviet warheads are ejected in a shotgun pattern or are individually targetable like ours. The latter scheme is regarded as more sophisticated.

Since the United States is already in the production phase, it is hard to see how a mutual moratorium can be arranged. Coupling it with the Nixon visit to Romania, the Soviet leaders may feel that they have no choice but to press their MIRV equivalent, or as close to it as they can get, and so the nuclear arms race starts on another upward spiral. But Congress still has a chance to make its voice heard. It can insist, as Mr. Moorhead suggests, on an immediate suspension of the GE production schedule pending U.S.-Soviet talks.

Whatever the outcome, this episode brings into sharp relief a basic weakness of our governmental system in the missile-space age. Vast governmental-corporate enterprises like the Department of Defense hold a tactical advantage over their Congressional overseers. They are in a position to act, to take the initiative, while the Congress, very few of whose members have enough technical background to know what is going on, is still debating. In the MIRV case the Pentagon simply took $88 million out of a lump sum of $1.72 billion which the Congress had authorized for "missile procurement-Air Force," and went into production. Who authorized a step of such monumental proportions? Did the President know about it? If so, did he think it would help to persuade the Soviets to agree to a moratorium? Suppose it has the opposite effect? In any case what becomes of the "democratic process" when momentous decisions are made in this fashion?

Kahn's Canals

Since all other measures have failed, the Department of Defense has turned to Herman Kahn's Hudson Institute to tell it how to win in Vietnam, or at least get out without complete loss of face. Combining patriotism and business acumen, Kahn accordingly wrote a scenario, the chief feature of which is a "new" type of "death-belt barrier" to be built around Saigon and along the Cambodian border. Although similar in principle to the ill-fated McNamara Line and its predecessor, the Maginot Line, the Kahn Line has several "gee-whiz" features not found in the earlier versions. It is a line of water, which would make construction contractors happy for years. Canals would be dug from the Gulf of Siam to a point on the Cambodian border opposite Saigon, thence connecting with a circumambient canal to protect the capital. The earth dredged from the canals would form a bank 50 yards high—that's as high as a 15-story building, if the New York Times description does not exaggerate. Two chain-link fences would make trespassing more perilous. The far bank of the canal would be fortified with barbed wire, mine fields and electric sensors.

But what about the Vietcong and North Vietnamese who are already in the villages? Dr. Kahn has not neglected them. The American forces, reduced to 100,000 or 200,000 men by the middle of 1971, would be pulled back to the coast and kept in readiness to reinforce the South Vietnamese troops in case the latter should succumb to combat fatigue or other disabling illness. American Special Forces would build up large units of Montagnard tribesmen who would harass the Vietcong unmercifully. The war, that is, would be Montagnardized, leaving the troops of the Republic of Vietnam to attend to more pleasant duties.

It all sounds so good that when officials of the Nixon Administration tell us that the wide-ranging package has "considerable appeal," but decline to say which features are "being woven into the fabric of our strategy," we are consumed with curiosity.

The editors regret to announce the death in New York of Grandin Conover, who, from November 30, 1964 to October 18, 1965, was literary editor of The Nation. Conover was a man of wit, imagination and creative energy; a sensitive editor and a delightful colleague. It is tragic that his life was so brief, and we express our deepest sympathy to his family and many friends.

The Right to Moonlight

Back in March, Henry P. Leifermann, then a reporter for UPI, wrote an article for The Nation about Memphis a year after Dr. Martin Luther King's assassination. Leifermann knew that it was customary for UPI reporters to "clear" manuscripts with executives before submitting them elsewhere. So he mentioned to UPI executives that he intended to do a piece about Memphis and was told that it would never be approved if it "said anything bad about the Memphis newspapers." In addition to having the usual agent-client relationship, both UPI and the Memphis papers are owned by Scripps-Howard. But Leifermann went ahead anyway and wrote the piece, without formal clearance, and The Nation published it (March 31). In the article he characterized the Memphis papers as part of the city's "establishment" and said they were "open to valid charges of discrimination in their news columns" because of racial labeling; he went on to accuse them of taking "an almost rabid stand behind whatever the police force proposes." For this horrendous offense he was given a five-day suspension without pay. Leifermann then resigned, saying UPI had no right to suspend him, and he is now in the Atlanta office of Newsweek.

Fortunately the Wire Service Guild, which represents the wire service newsmen, has decided to force the case to arbitration. The Guild contends, as does Leifermann, that in writing the article he was exercising his rights under the First Amendment, to which by their own account the newspapers and wire services are utterly and passionately devoted. "It is easy to see where this sort of conduct could lead this wire service and the news business in general," Leifermann comments. "In attempting to placate the wishes of clients, all semblance of honesty or fairness in its news reports will soon be lost."

No one doubts that the press is committed to the First Amendment; it is forever insisting, as it should, on its right to function without prepublication censorship of any kind. But freedom of the press involves more than freedom for newspapers; it protects the working press as well as the publishers and editors of newspapers. The Leifermann case is one of "first impression" so far as the wire services are concerned, and regardless of how it is finally decided, an important precedent is in the making.

A Little Something for Everyone

PAUL WOHL
Mr. Wohl covers the Soviet scene and international communism for The Christian Science Monitor.

Moscow has had its way at the Communist summit. For the Russians the international conference of seventy-five Communist and workers' parties, which met in the Kremlin from June 5 to 17, was at once a liturgical exercise at home and a political maneuver against Peking.

For the Moscow-oriented movement outside the Soviet bloc it was a quickening experience. On the other hand, the Communist parties of Japan, North Korea, North Vietnam and most of southern Asia, which seek to remain aloof from both Moscow and Peking, are gratified that they did not participate in what turned out to be a focused attack on Maoism, earlier Soviet promises notwithstanding. Peking has called it a "sinister counterrevolutionary conference" and "a despicable plot."

Little more than half of the world's 45 million Communists were represented at the conference and nine-tenths of this half belonged to nine parties that rule in their own countries (Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, East Germany, Hungary, Mongolia, Poland, Romania and the Soviet Union), where communism is revolutionary only in a historical sense. The Cuban party, which still has a revolutionary spark, was represented by an observer.

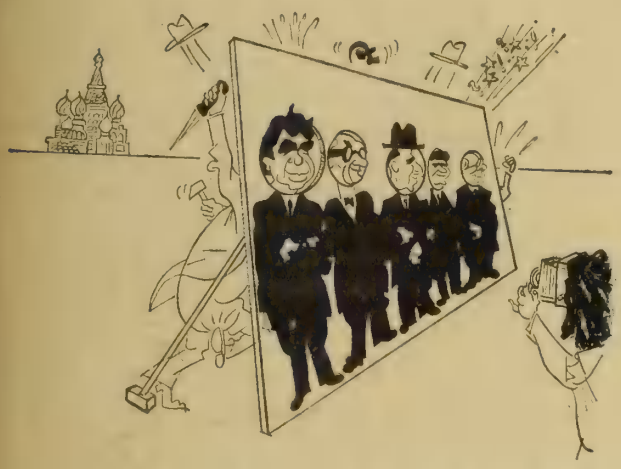
Among the domesticated ruling parties, only the Romanians did not follow Moscow in all matters. This meant that innovations could come only from among the sixty-six nonruling parties, whose total membership is between 2.5 million and 3 million, more than 2 million of them in Western Europe.

Officially, each party had equal status at the conference. Membership did not matter, and the party of San Marino, Ireland, Lesotho, Réunion or Martinique was the peer of the Italian party with more than 1.5 million members or the French party with close to 400,000 members. The Italian party alone has six times as many members as all twenty-four Latin American parties.

Some of the parties present in the Kremlin—for example the Communist party of West Berlin or that of Namibie (South West Africa)—did not exist nine years ago when the previous Communist summit convened, with China present. While the importance of a party in the political life of its country is not necessarily measured by the number of its members, nor is a country significant entirely according to its area or inhabitants, this theoretical equality imposed a certain artificiality on the Moscow conference.

Nevertheless, the conference was a political event. It has made history, to use a term cherished by the Soviets. After this summit there can no longer be a dominant party. In relations among Communist parties (outside the Soviet bloc) the rule of diversity and plurality has been admitted. The myth of the monolith is abandoned.

Some speeches were severely critical of the Soviet party's methods, particularly of the occupation of Czechoslovakia and of Moscow's appraisal of the international situation. Other speeches, notably those of Italy's Ernesto Berlinguer, Australia's Laurie Aarons, Cuba's Carlos R. Rodriguez and the Dominican Republic's Manuel Sanchez, were an outright challenge to the organizers of the conference. Nevertheless, and in contrast to the previous international conferences of 1957 and 1960, the delegates' speeches were published by the Soviet press in full or in summary, many summaries being drafted by the delegations themselves. The example of the Russian press, moreover, seems to have been followed by all the leading Communist newspapers of the bloc. For the first time since Lenin's day, Pravda readers had evidence that their allegedly all-knowing, always "correct" party was being taken to task by foreign Communists.



Seven delegations (Australia, Austria, Britain, Italy, Spain, Sweden and Switzerland, with a combined membership of more than 1.6 million) openly condemned the Warsaw pact intervention in Czechoslovakia. Others, like the Romanians, disapproved implicitly. The French party, which initially expressed "surprise and disapproval," took an ambivalent stand. Its secretary general, Waldeck Rochet, made no reference in his address to Czechoslovakia. He paid tribute to the "sovereignty of each party," but on the other hand came out for "proletarian internationalism," which is the principle the Soviets invoked to justify the invasion.

A few days later, the French delegation held a press conference for the benefit of members back home. Politburo member Georges Marchais recalled that the French party had "disapproved military intervention in Czechoslovakia," but also referred to the desire of the Czechoslovak party that "the problem should not be discussed at the international conference." The reason for this ambiguous performance may well be that the French Communists have once again become financially dependent on the "solidarity" of the Soviet party. The same may be true of other parties that avoided a clear statement on the Czechoslovak issue. The Spaniards, on the other hand, showed themselves indomitable, although presumably also dependent on Soviet support.

China was the cause of the other major controversy. The long-winded conference document with the formidable title "On the tasks of the struggle at the present time against imperialism and the unity of action of Communist parties and anti-imperialist forces" included China among the world's "Socialist countries" and refrained from criticizing Peking.

At the preparatory meetings it had been agreed that no party would be attacked by name at the conference. The last meeting of the preparatory commission in May, with more than sixty parties represented, once again confirmed this rule. However, this session coincided with renewed gunfire on the Sino-Soviet border, and as at the preceding meeting in March, Secretary General Leonid I. Brezhnev cited the shooting as a reason why the commission would change its ruling. Those who opposed a condemnation of China stood firm. (The coincidence between the meetings of the preparatory commission and the outbreaks on the Sino-Soviet border was interesting.)

Ten days later, in his address to the conference, Mr. Brezhnev ignored the agreement and subjected China to a blistering attack—its "feverish war preparations," its preparations for a "a great nuclear war . . . against the Soviet 'revisionists,'" its "intention of planting the banner of the ideas of Mao Tse-tung on the entire planet," its party-splitting activities in almost thirty countries," its "direct or indirect support of imperialism." Hardly any insult in the rich Communist vocabulary was omitted.

Backes, Nuernberger Nachrichten

Scores of smaller parties then followed the Soviet lead. Among speakers for parties representing Communist states, only Romania's Nicolae Ceausescu came out for continued good relations with all parties, including China. Italy's Ernesto Berlinguer offered to mediate between the Chinese and the Russians. There could be no peaceful coexistence, he said, without Chinese cooperation. A perpetuation of the hostility raised the danger of a world order based on bilateral agreement between Washington and Moscow.

Criticism of the Soviet party was not limited to the two big issues. "Marxist thinking in the last decades has to a large extent become schematic and dogmatic," said Mr. Berlinguer. "We consider negative the tendency to stick a label of ideological condemnation on anyone who holds a different opinion." It would be dangerous for a Russian to express such views.

Another point of discord between the Soviet party and its critics was the feasibility of a single model of socialism. Each party must go its own way, was the line of the dissenters. Differences also arose over Soviet insistence on peaceful coexistence. That had been the burden of Mr. Brezhnev's speech. Peaceful coexistence, he said, not only means no war; it also implies growing cultural, scientific and trade relations between Socialist and capitalist countries. But according to Cuba's Carlos Rodriguez, the main goal of Communists should not be the preservation of peace but the annihilation of imperialism. "This is a more general and greater task than the maintenance of peace." The same view was expressed in even stronger terms by the delegate from the Dominican Republic.

Most of these opposition statements were carried by Pravda. They were somewhat toned down for publication, but those who wanted to know exactly what the foreign delegates had said usually could obtain the full texts in Russian translation. How many Russians dared avail themselves of this facility is another matter.

This frankness was a big shift from traditional Soviet behavior, but the risk may not have been as great as it seems. Dissenters in the USSR listen to Western broadcasts and know what is being said. The great mass of Pravda readers, on the other hand, no longer pay much attention to international party politics and ideology. Some of the criticism leveled at the home party, moreover, cannot have pleased the average Russian, who prefers peace to war and no longer believes in world revolution. As far as China goes, Mr. Brezhnev probably also had the great majority of his people on his side. Nevertheless, the open airing of controversy was the price the Kremlin had to pay in order to get a large number of parties to the conference.

Why, then, were the Soviets so keen on this conference? After the dissolution of the Comintern in 1943, there was no longer a machinery for this kind of international meeting; the last Comintern congress met in 1935. And in the years after World War II, there was no need for a Communist summit. Stalin was the supreme mystagogue, the "father of the peoples"; his authority was unconditionally accepted by all parties. Only the Yugoslavs dared skepticism.

Things changed after Stalin's death. The "confusion and disarray" of which Stalin's heirs warned at his bier did not break out immediately, but the authority of the Russian party was no longer beyond question. Questioning voices began to be heard in the Soviet Union and internationally. The legitimacy of party and state was challenged.

The two institutions which are supposed to perpetuate the revolution and from which the party claims to have received its mandate are the local soviets and the international Communist movement. Incessant efforts to activate the local soviets have not been successful. The grassroots democracy which they were to represent has again and again been smothered by the bureaucracy.

That leaves the international movement as the heir to the revolution and the mainspring of the authority of the Soviet party and the Russian state. The Kremlin's interest in international communism also has a practical angle. Most foreign parties have acted, openly or unwittingly, as auxiliaries of Soviet foreign policy. They were, to say the least, good-will agents for the USSR. The dogma of the last Comintern congress had been that it was the first duty of every Communist everywhere to defend the Soviet Union. After the war, this was no longer official doctrine but it lingered on in the thinking of most Communists.

Even after the 20th congress of the Soviet party in 1957 had conceded that each party might chart its own road to socialism and had reaffirmed the Leninist principle that all parties are equal, the Kremlin retained a unique international authority. In November 1957, on the occasion of the first international Communist summit in honor of the fortieth anniversary of the Bolshevik revolution, it was Chairman Mao who proclaimed this leading role for the Soviet party.

In 1960, when the second summit convened, the Soviets still headed the international movement, but behind the façade the rift with China was deepening. By 1964 Nikita S. Khrushchev was drumming up support among the Western and overseas parties for another summit at which Peking would be read out of the Communist movement. The going was difficult, there were objections from many sides, and before long Khrushchev himself was out.

The reconciliation with Peking, which his successors initially sought did not occur, and today the two Communist giants are on the brink of war. Russia's need for the backing of international communism has never been more evident. The impassioned denunciation of Maoism at the conference just adjourned gave the Kremlin a propaganda plank against Peking which it previously lacked. The fact that the conference document does not actually mention China is of secondary importance.

There are indications that some Soviet leaders believe the opposition to Mao's rule inside China is approaching a climax. According to Correspondenza Socialista in Rome, anti-Mao Chinese in Moscow have formed a Communist party in exile, headed by Wang Ming, the predecessor of Mao Tse-tung. Such an organization could have been set up only with the Kremlin's consent.

Therefore, the hawks in Moscow may well have decided that the occasion calls for a "pre-emptive" strike against China's nuclear installations and MIG factories, all in easy air distance of the Soviet or Mongolian border. Russian spokesmen at the United Nations, in Washington and the West European capitals have questioned governments and the media as to their probable reaction if the Chinese escalated a conflict in the Far East to the level of nuclear war.

The question is spurious because, compared with those of the USSR, China's nuclear weapons are minimal. Recent Chinese notes to Moscow show that Peking has become seriously disturbed by the prospect of a Soviet first strike and is taking a more conciliatory attitude. Moscow's hawks may not have it their way, for there is evidence that the leadership is divided.

On April 2, Tass published an advance summary of the issue of Kommunist, the central committee's leading bimonthly, that was due in the first half of the month. According to this report, the magazine would accuse Peking of striking the Soviet Union in the back and of having opened a "second front." That issue of Kommunist was finally released to the printer on April 21, without the sentences quoted by Tass. Such delays and changes of text are usually signs of conflict at the top. In this case the doves seem to have gained the upper hand.

Meanwhile, new reports have come in of Soviet concentrations of rockets, planes and armor in the Far East, in Mongolia and on the border of Sinkiang, where the Soviet radio is wooing the non-Chinese Muslim tribes. No one can foretell the outcome. The only thing certain is that the anti-Mao speeches at the recent summit have strengthened Moscow's hand and could provide the political orchestration for a Soviet intervention in China—which, naturally, would be presented as both defensive and designed to free the Chinese masses of the "Mao clique." Moscow broadcasts have hinted recently that it is a Communist duty to help the Chinese to oust Mao.

The permanent record of the conference is its basic document: it was signed by sixty-nine parties. Two parties (Cuba and Sweden) did not sign because they attended as observers; two other parties (Britain and Norway) must consult their central committees before signing; one party (Dominican Republic) refused to sign because the document was not sufficiently revolutionary.

With seventy-five parties represented, the number of signatures should have been seventy, but sixty-nine is the official figure.

Four of these (Italy, San Marino, Australia and Réunion) signed only the third chapter of the document, the one on struggle against imperialism. Five parties signed with reservations.

Much of the conference document is an exercise in what Italian party chief Luigi Longo has called trionfalismo (triumphalism). Socialism in the past ten years is said to have advanced everywhere, "confirming the correctness of the Marxist-Leninist doctrine. . . . The victory of the revolutionary and progressive forces is inevitable." The Socialist system, it is stated repeatedly, has triumphed in fourteen countries, six of which did not take part in the conference (Albania, China, North Korea, North Vietnam and Yugoslavia; and Cuba was represented only by an observer). That is a far cry from Lenin's prediction at the 8th party congress in 1919: "We shall see the international [meaning world-wide] Soviet republic."

The document refers to contradictions inside imperialism, but not to contradictions inside the Socialist system. In line with customary Communist shibboleths, the United States is descibed as "the exploiter and policeman of the world, the merciless enemy of liberation movements," which, among other things, has "completed the factual occupation of the Indian Ocean," an area in which the Soviets have lately shown lively interest. Moscow's old bogy man West Germany is dealt with more mildly than in the past, perhaps with a thought to current Soviet efforts to develop better relations with Bonn. In all main points the world outlook of the conference document jibes with trends discernible in Soviet foreign policy.

A new note is the emphasis on the cohesion of the imperialist system, internal contradictions notwithstanding, and imperialism's ability to plan in advance and to coordinate its economy. This is something that Marxist-Leninists have hitherto categorically denied. It moves the Moscow prognosticators to stress the need for peaceful coexistence. The defense of peace and the economic strengthening of the Soviet Union and the other Socialist states are described as the principal tasks of all Communist and progressive forces in the present stage.

The basic conservatism of the parties that hold power, and even of some of the large West European parties that have reached understanding with their establishments, is reflected in this line. It is offset by a few revolutionary safeguards. Peaceful coexistence, says the document, does not signify the maintenance of the social and political status quo or the weakening of the ideological struggle, nor does it deny the "inalienable right" of peoples to defend themselves against imperialist aggressors. In an ostensible world survey of just causes in which people now fight against aggression or imperialist encroachment, the document mentions only those that are supported by the USSR. The case of Biafra, understandably, is omitted.

This incomplete, biased and rather superficial analysis of the world situation was criticized at the conference, and accounts for the reservations of several delegations and for the fact that some parties signed only the one chapter.

The admission that Communist parties may hold different opinions and that each party has the right to chart its own course is the most important feature of the document. It can be said that the recognition of the principles of plurality and diversity inside communism, which emerged from the debate, was what the reform movement in Czechoslovakia was about. But thus far these principles are not admitted internally by the ruling parties, and Moscow's dialectical proficiency has worded the conference document so ambiguously that another Czechoslovakia in the name of proletarian internationalism is not altogether excluded.

Thus all participants—as so often happens at international councils of whatever political persuasion—went home with something. The Soviets got a proclamation of Communist unity and of loyalty to Moscow, complete with scores of denunciations of Peking, from a sizable part of the Communist movement. The Italians and other dissidents won recognition of the principles of plurality and diversity. The former colonial peoples obtained a cautious endorsement of their "just causes" and the right publicly to add reservations to the document.

Only such uncompromising revolutionaries as the Communists of the Dominican Republic protested against the document and implicitly joined the other half of the revolutionary movement which either gravitates toward Peking or takes an independent stand.

Probably the only participants to be fully satisfied with the conference, and with the repetitious, double-bottomed document to which it gave birth, are the Kremlin's master dialecticians and the faithful party stalwarts who once again had an opportunity to intone communism's traditional liturgy.

THE GLENVILLE SHOOT-OUT

BAD DAY IN CLEVELAND

ROLDO BARTIMOLE
Mr. Bartimole, formerly a reporter in the Cleveland office of The Wall Street Journal, now writes a biweekly newsletter, Point of View, dealing with politics and social developments in that city.

Cleveland

Sometimes in history it has become politically convenient to sacrifice the socially despised for the "protection" of society. Rationalizations of justice then overpower the judicial process and make it merely the means of legitimizing society's need for a victim. However, such political trials often become, as in the cases of Sacco and Vanzetti and Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, not the end of the matter but only the beginning.

A beginning of that sort may have been the conviction of Fred "Ahmed" Evans, a black nationalist, who has been sentenced to die in the electric chair in September for the murders of three policemen and a civilian in a gun fight between police and black nationalists last July 23 in the Glenville section of Cleveland. A shooting fray of this sort provides some of the classic demands for a political trial: a case involving the seemingly open defiance of established order by a "deviant" who is the product of the very social ills the society seems unable to correct; the eruption of violent conflict at a time when the process of justice is compliant to the political climate of "law and order"; and a need to destroy the legitimacy of any leadership among the socially despised. The prosecution may have summed it up by asking for conviction in the name of "preserving the American way of life." It was crucial, too, that the event took place in a city that had elected a black mayor, thus providing both a possible step toward the problem-solving but also a test of the depth of racism. Mayor Carl B. Stokes had steered the community peacefully through the difficult period after the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. Indeed, at the time of the shooting the Mayor was enjoying his height of popularity. Yet there were strains, especially between the administration and a police department which rejected a black leader. The Glenville episode started on a day when the Mayor was out of town and the police were warning of impending violence and plots to assassinate black leaders, including the Mayor. The police have been and remain eager to raid black nationalists' headquarters and constantly keep alive the concept of themselves as the "thin blue line" between whites they protect and blacks they patrol.

Glenville lies in the northeast corner of Cleveland, not far from the city line of East Cleveland, an older suburban area. The section has short, narrow streets with two- and three-story buildings, mostly housing, with alleys running between and behind the structures. The confusion and conflicting stories of how and what happened to set off the violence have never been satisfactorily outlined. The first alleged sign of activity was a police report that fifteen to twenty armed men, some of whom had arrived shortly before by car, were leaving Evans' apartment. This apartment became one of three main locations where militants and police traded gunfire on the streets serving a compact two-block area about the size of two football fields. At the farthest point from Ahmed's apartment, a police tow truck came under fire; the third location was between these two points, where two militants were killed behind a house that allegedly contained snipers.

Although police listed their casualties as victims of snipers, the initial firing suggests a spreading gun battle at street level. The eruption brought hundreds of policemen into the area where, a police "surveillance team" of undetermined number had been watching Evans' apartment after reports that the militants had armed themselves. The heaviest shooting and casualties came near Evans' apartment in the first hour and a half. Shooting at alleged snipers continued late into the night, but the three nationalists killed and the one wounded were all shot at street level. There have been unsubstantiated rumors, however, that the bodies of dead and wounded nationalists were spirited away.

Evans was charged and convicted on seven counts of murder. Four of these counts arise from an Ohio conspiracy law that states: "Whoever aids, abets, or procures another to commit an offense may be prosecuted and punished as if he were the principal offender." An all-white jury deliberated sixteen hours to convict Evans on all counts; it made no recommendations of mercy. Four other nationalists face the same charges and will stand trial this summer.

This tragic event, which took the lives of seven persons and left many wounded, including eleven officers, could have been viewed as a spontaneous eruption of violence or even a police attempt to eradicate black nationalists; but it has been viewed by officials, press, academics and certainly by the prosecution and police as a conspiracy to kill police.

A Cleveland Plain Dealer headline two days after the outbreak told its readers it was a "massacre of police," a description generally accepted in the community. The necessity of punishment for a "massacre" is self-evident; but the conspiracy charge is flimsy and the possibility of police provocation raises the question whether self-defense, even against police, is not legally permissible.

Ahmed Evans was both a likely and unlikely protagonist. Two years ago, he predicted that blood would flow in the streets of this city in a race war coinciding with an eclipse of the sun. The day passed without event, other than a police raid of Evans' astrology shop. His warnings of doom, however, were given nation-wide publicity through an article in The Wall Street Journal that was picked up by the press across the country. The notoriety changed Evans' image from that of an eccentric astrologist to a leading black nationalist. He also bitterly complained that it made him a target of police harassments and beatings.

Ironically, Evans helped to create the appearance of racial harmony that Mayor Stokes was nurturing. Evans walked the streets to preserve the peace after Dr. King's death, as he had joined with the civil rights leader in 1967. During that summer, Evans and other militants were paid from a private businessmen's fund to "keep it cool for Carl." The calm, many felt, helped Stokes win City Hall. Even at the time of the shooting, Evans was receiving funds from a City Hall program. But Ahmed's peace-keeping activities never made as good copy as his warnings. Defense lawyer Stanley Tolliver blamed the news media for creating the image of Evans as a "black Frankenstein."

"Who shot first? And at whom? Various accounts of where, how and why the shooting started have appeared. Even after extensive investigation, the questions remain unanswered," concludes the study of the Glenville shootout by the Civil Violence Research Center of Case-Western Reserve University for the National Commission on the Causes and Prevention of Violence. Police contend the nationalists fired upon them first; the nationalists contend the opposite. Evans gave this version:

> I was heading for the Lakeview Tavern [a short distance from his apartment] when I heard shots coming from the end of the street. Then one of the brothers passed me. Some policemen in a blue detective's car opened up with a machine gun and he was dead. So I ran into a yard and I began trading shots with a policeman behind a parked car. I couldn't hit him. I wasn't even coming anywhere close to him. And then my carbine jammed.

Joseph Turpin, a country workhouse guard who lives near Evans, testified at the trial that Evans attempted to enter his home about 8 P.M. that night. Turpin said he didn't allow him in but that he made five phone calls between 8:15 and 11:30 P.M. to the police for Evans, who had told Turpin he wanted to surrender. A Legal Aid lawyer testified that a prosecution witness said one of the prosecution lawyers had told this witness that he was aware Ahmed was in Turpin's attic at the time the policemen were killed. (No spent shells were found in the attic by a police search.)

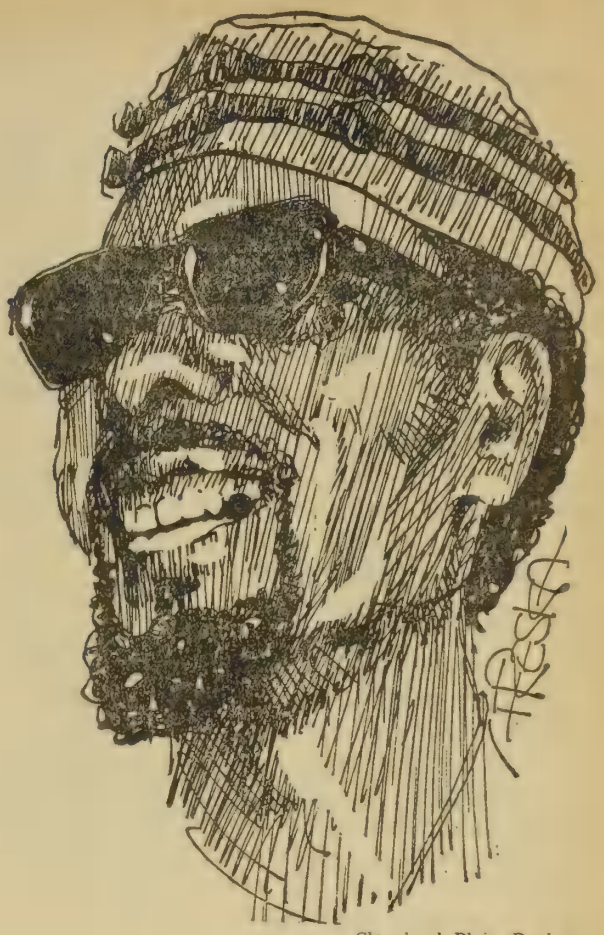
Two witnesses were key to the conspiracy theory of the police and prosecution. One was Sgt. John J. Ungvary, for some thirty years a member and head of the Cleveland Police Department's Subversives Squad—a department that has a reputation for conspiracy theories, especially those involving Communists. (In 1966 the Cuyahoga County grand jury with the help of police blamed the Hough riots on subversives and Communists, though even the Federal Bureau of Investigation dismissed the contention.)

Sergeant Ungvary testified that he had discussed "revolution" with Evans and that the black nationalist had told him it was "inevitable." Evans said, according to Ungvary, "sooner or later there's going to be open warfare between whites and blacks and the beasts will be eliminated." (It was Ungvary who brought information of impending trouble to City Hall the afternoon of July 23. An informant had told him that Evans had been to Detroit and Pittsburgh the previous night for arms and was planning another arms-running trip that night as a prelude to an early morning attack. This was never verified and the informant, according to the Civil Violence report, was suspected of being under the influence of drugs.)

Ungvary's thinking, typical of the police mentality in Cleveland, can best be illustrated by his testimony two years ago before Mississippi Sen. James O. Eastland's Internal Security subcommittee. Ungvary told the Senators: "What we need is a law that would let us charge them all [black nationalists] as conspirators. . . . Wouldn't that be far better than to wait for an overt act?" That concept, blacks believe, was put to use in Glenville.

The second prosecution witness to lend credence to the conspiracy theory was 17-year-old Walter Lee Washington, Jr., who described himself as a member of the Black Panther Party, which he said was a "social club."

Washington testified that a meeting was held at Evans' apartment on the morning of July 23 to discuss a shoot-out with police and that Evans showed those present "how to load and unload a rifle and what to do if it jammed." Here is part of the testimony in answer to prosecution questions:



Q. What was the purpose of the meeting?

A. To tell us when the pop is going to jump off.

Q. What do you mean?

A. When there was to be a revolution.

Washington was an unusual witness for the state. He had been charged on January 23 with first-degree murder in the street-stabbing death of a 68-year-old man. The man was stabbed eleven times in the back. The murder took place in September, after Washington and four companions, according to police, had set fire to a church, a fish market and an abandoned building, all in one night. Police described the gang at that time as terrorizers of residents and merchants in the Glenville area. In addition to murder, Washington had charges of arson, glue-sniffing and theft lodged against him. All those charges have been dropped and today Washington is a soldier in the U.S. Army, an alternative he was offered to standing trial for arson. Though defense lawyers broadly hinted that the prosecution had bought perjured testimony from Washington, the jury apparently believed the conspiracy theory advanced by Ungvary and Washington.

Cleveland Plain Dealer

Fred Evans

Only one person named Evans directly as having fired a bullet, and his testimony was strongly contested. William H. McMillan, a police tow-truck driver, testified Evans was the man who had shot him. However, the registered nurse who treated McMillan and a hospital aide testified that McMillan couldn't identify anyone at the hospital that night, though he was asked several times. "He didn't know what happened or who shot him," the nurse said. Further, she testified that McMillan was more interested in calling reporters about the shooting than in receiving treatment for his wounds.

In talks with reporters, McMillan proposed the theory that the abandoned auto which the tow truck was to pick up was a "decoy," intended to lure the truck into an ambush and subsequently the police too, when they responded to McMillan's call for help. The theory fell by the wayside; it lacked plausibility because pickups of abandoned cars are most unreliable and usually occur two or three days after the initial request. The Civil Violence report dismissed the theory, saying the tow truck "arrived at the wrong place at the wrong time." But the ambush theory lived on in popular imagination.

Mayor Stokes from the beginning blamed a "small, organized gang" for the violence and said it would "meet the full measure of the law." He tried to play down the gun battle, calling it an "incident," as an isolated act of violence. Though the Mayor called down the full measure of the law on the militants, he failed to pursue a number of promised investigations into police activities, including one complaint in which a black private guard was killed. In this case, the city law director arrived and was told by citizens that the shots came from a police car.

The Civil Violence report, release of which was delayed until after the Evans trial on the ground that it might interfere with the trial, echoes the Mayor and the conventional version of the gun battle as a violent act of blacks. The report says: "A small, well-equipped army of black extremists was responsible for the bloodshed (whether or not they fired the first shot)." The sweeping sentence was quickly picked up by the media as the reasoned conclusion of the report and further evidence that the militants were to blame. Though a reading of the report suggests its writers misread their own facts, the headlines of Cleveland papers indicate the effect: "Masotti [Louis H. Masotti, a political scientist at Case-Western Reserve who headed the report staff] Report Hits Fanatics," said the Cleveland Press; "Masotti Blames Glenville Battle on 'Extremists,' " said the Plain Dealer. Masotti told me that he was "sick" that the sentence had remained in the final version of the report, that it was supposed to have been deleted. (The sentence, however, reveals a bias of the report; it concerns itself with escalating black violence without giving equal attention to the possibilities of escalation on the part of the police.)

It was decided at the afternoon police meeting to deploy a "mobile" and "inconspicuous" surveillance of Evans' apartment. The Civil Violence report says "enough cars were available for an effective moving surveillance and the police department would assign to the task as many Negro officers as it could." But the police in the field established a stationary surveillance, with cars full of white policemen parked within easy sight of the apartment. The police disregard of orders was "glaringly evident," said the Civil Violence report, but it never pursued the question of how it happened. The nationalists believed that the police were preparing to spring an attack. "We were ambushed, not the police," Evans said later. (Shortly before the shooting, Evans, armed and disturbed, met with two black city officials and asked them to "get the surveillance removed." The meeting ended when he told them, "Tell the Big Brother downtown that everything is going to be all right." The officials felt it would be futile to ask the officers in the lookout cars to move. They drove away to a telephone and by the time they called City Hall, the shooting had started.)

At this point two other factors, the time when the shooting started and the use by police of two radio frequencies, combined with the disregard of orders, suggest that the official version of what happened in Glenville purposely hides the truth. Masotti admits that there was conflicting evidence on the time factor, and that he was aware the police used two frequencies. The surveillance team was from the tactical unit, which communicates with its headquarters on a high frequency that is not heard by regular patrol cars.

The starting time for the violence was put at 8:25 P.M. by the police and so accepted by the Mayor (who issued an "official" time chronology) and the Civil Violence report. However, one time fact conflicts sharply. Patrolman Louis Golonka was pronounced dead at Forest City Hospital at 8:40 P.M. The official chronology has him shot at 8:35 P.M., which means he had to hear the "all units" call for help at 8:30 P.M., get to the scene, be shot, rescued and taken to the hospital to be pronounced dead—all in ten minutes.

Why would the police distort the time when the conflict started? Some speculate that the tactical unit had made contact with the militants, possibly initiated it, but had not alerted the regular patrol police. As the gun battle spread, the police tow truck became involved, was hit and radioed for help on a low frequency band, bringing regular patrols into the area. The fact that four policemen were shot within a one-minute time span and four others in another one-minute period indicates that they were unprepared for what they encountered.

For certain, militants were armed, engaged in a gun battle with police and probably killed some officers. (The defense suggested that some officers were killed by other policemen. Defense lawyers showed that two of the three officers killed were drunk.) But the argument that black militants planned an ambush and conspired to kill policemen is not convincing. The prosecution showed that Evans and his associates had bought thirteen weapons, including high-powered rifles. But the weapons were bought openly in Cleveland area department and discount stores, and Evans even signed a police document, necessary for the purchase of weapons in one suburb. (Witnesses testified that Evans had formed a gun club and a neighborhood barber testified that in July he had found a practice range for the group's use.)

The defense attacked several decisions of the Cuyahoga County coroner's office which dovetailed with the police version of the shooting. For example, the original autopsy of Lt. LeRoy Jones indicated he was killed by a "shotgun"-caused wound, but that was later changed to read a "gunshot" wound, coinciding with the police claims that militants had semi-automatic weapons while the police had only hand guns and shotguns.

More revealing was the coroner's ruling that James Chapman, a 22-year-old Negro whom police described as a "hero" who helped to rescue police, was killed by a long-range shot, thus by a sniper. Dr. Cyril H. Wecht, an eminent Pittsburgh pathologist, testified categorically that Chapman was killed by a shot fired not more than "six inches" from his head. Contrary to normal procedures, laboratory reports showing that police were drunk were not included in their autopsies.

The political nature of the trial extended beyond being merely an attack upon black nationalism. Charles R. Laurie, the assistant prosecutor, made broad insinuations about Mayor Stokes's involvement. "Why did City Hall let the police go in there unprepared? Why? What were they going to fight back with? Spitballs?" At another point Laurie said: "Under the façade of making dolls and dashikis [the program funded by the city with Evans as its head] in the shop [well outside the area of conflict], they prepared for war against the men in blue. City Hall gave him the money and what did he do in gratitude? He gave them hot bullets in return."

Although common pleas court Judge George J. McMonagle, who heard the case, overruled the defense plea for a new trial because of racism, saying that there "is no basis for such contentions," most would sharply disagree. The prosecution lawyers, both white, several times during the summation, called the two Negro defense lawyers "boys." Laurie badgered one young Negro girl, finally screaming, "You hate white people, don't you?" He then asked her, "Wasn't my color the people that put up the money for these [poverty] programs?"

Of Chapman, Laurie said: "He was a decent citizen and he wasn't even a white citizen. . . ." And in the final plea, he told the jury that they had to take a stand as Americans and warned: "From an acorn grows a mighty tree. A spoonful of ink in a gallon of water gives you a tainted color."

There have been other casualties of the trial. The verdict brought campus disorders to Case-Western Reserve University, where students protested the delay of the Civil Violence report, feeling its release would have aided Evans. The Civil Violence Center at the university is now the subject of a campus investigation and Masotti, in the midst of the disorders, resigned as its head.

Twenty persons have been convicted of contempt of court and given up to one year in jail for disorders stemming from an attempt to bring charges against the police for their actions in Glenville. Prosecutor John T. Corrigan refused to meet with them. They were arrested for blocking the doors of criminal court on the third day that they sought an audience with him. Judge McMonagle, who imposed the stiff sentences, said the group, called the July 23rd Defense Committee, made a "planned assault . . . to physically shut down the courthouse. . . ." He said the harsh punishment was to prevent further disrespect for the law. Since testimony before him in the Evans case told of beating and probably murder by police, the judge's

(Continued on page 61)

MR. NIXON'S URBAN BALLET

HAMILTON E. DAVIS
Mr. Davis is Washington bureau chief of The Providence Journal. Earlier, he headed an urban affairs team for the newspapers of Providence.

Washington

When President Nixon took office, one of his firmest resolutions was to avoid the rhetorical excesses of the Johnson administration, the soaring and pretentious language, the inflated claims, and the orchestrated publicity that led to expectations for programs which, in reality, simply could not be met. To a considerable extent, Mr. Nixon has been successful in this effort.

Yet he faces the problem in a different, and perhaps more serious form. The Nixon Administration has taken office at a time when the need for initiatives in the area of domestic, and especially urban, problems is acute. At the same time, it must cut the budget in order to combat inflation, and it must continue to finance the war in Vietnam. The upshot is that until the war is liquidated, there is no new money for domestic programs; most of them, in fact, will suffer cuts.

What the Administration has begun to do, in response to this obvious dilemma, is substitute choreography for action which, in the long run, is simply another aspect of the Johnson style. While this tendency is not yet widespread, it has been evidenced to date particularly in those programs dealing with the poor—the Model Cities program, and the much ballyhooed effort to funnel money into twenty cities that have suffered riot damage in the past few years. The latter instance was choreography in the grand manner.

Early this year, President Nixon visited the 7th Street corridor in northwest Washington, site of a major riot in April 1968. The President said he was shocked by the sight of rubble-strewn lots and boarded-up buildings. Obviously, little had been done to clean up the area and begin the job of rebuilding. So he ordered a quick study by the Department of Housing and Urban Development (HUD) to see how widespread the problem was, and what could be done about it.

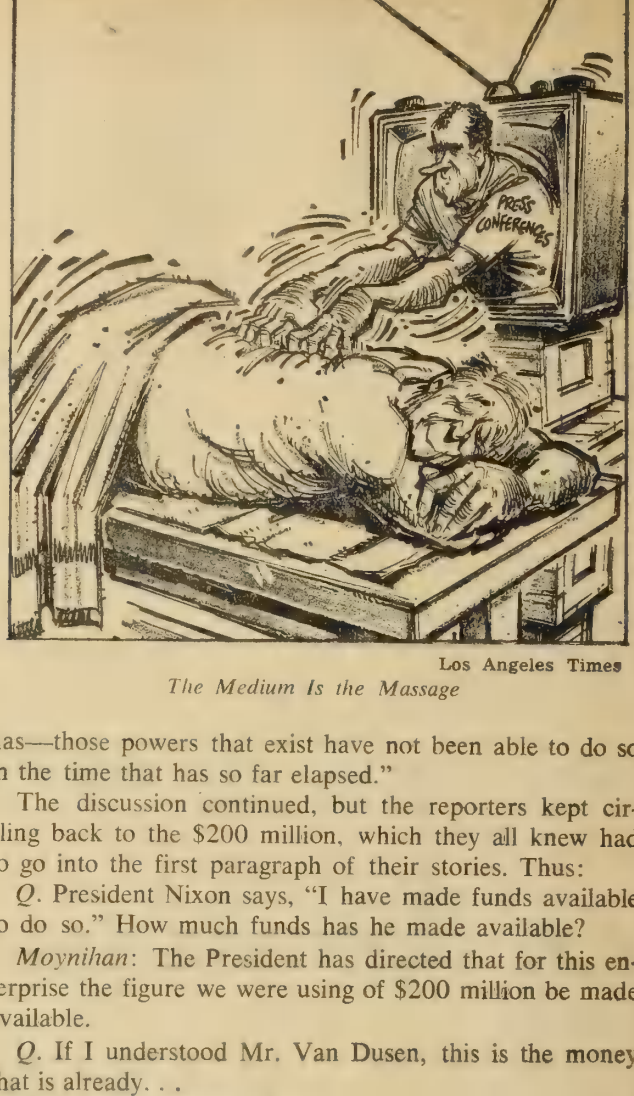
On April 8, the White House announced that a major statement would be forthcoming that afternoon on the urban situation. When reporters arrived in the West Wing, they were given a statement by the President, another by George Romney, Secretary of HUD, and a fistful of pictures of riot-damaged sections of several large cities, including Newark, Los Angeles, Pittsburgh and Detroit.

There to meet them and to explain what was to be done was a group of Administration officials, led by Daniel P. Moynihan, the President's assistant for urban affairs. He was accompanied by Richard Van Dusen, an under secretary at HUD, and Lawrence M. Cox, an assistant secretary at HUD.

The gist of the program to be announced was stated clearly and concisely in the printed statement by Mr. Nixon. First, he said, the Administration would find $9 million in the petty cash account to clean up the actual rubble that remained from the riots. In addition, he continued, roughly $200 million worth of HUD projects had already been approved, or were pending and likely to be approved, for the twenty cities named. "HUD will offer assistance to those cities in accelerating the delivery time of those programs which relate to riot-troubled neighborhoods," he said.

In other words, the Administration would provide $9 million that had not been available before, and it would urge HUD to shuffle the papers more rapidly on $200 million already in the pipe line. If that seems of less than cosmic importance, it is; and that is the point. Neither Mr. Nixon's Administration, nor any other, is going to make a big splash with an announcement that involves a paltry $9 million and some bureaucratic good will about something already available.

To create the impression of initiative and commitment, therefore, it was necessary that the Administration appear to be pouring $200 million of additional money—money that was not available until all this initiative was brought to bear—into the selected cities.



Enter Mr. Moynihan, as follows: "The first fact of this statement is the announcement of a $200 million and more program for the reconstruction of areas of American cities which have been damaged in civil disorders in the past year. . . ." There then ensued an extended, if diffused, effort by the reporters to find out the nature of this $200 million pledge, and a dazzling performance by Mr. Moynihan in confusing the issue, thereby leading at least some of his hearers to accept his first statement at face value.

The first question was directed at a HUD official. "Mr. Van Dusen, tell us about the $200 million program," the reporter asked. "Is this a new $200 million, or is it old money; is it deferred? What does it mean?"

Mr. Van Dusen answered this question twice with a description similar to that of Mr. Nixon, making it clear the money had been available all along and implying that it was not new. So after a few moments, Mr. Moynihan stepped in.

"This money is more than the $200 million involved," he said in part. "We have used a low figure because we haven't wanted to say things that in the end maybe we won't deliver. But this is in the greatest measure new money. That which has been approved in the last couple of months has been approved in the President's directive to find out what is going on here and there.

"This is new money," he continued earnestly. "It is designed to do something that very clearly the government has—those powers that exist have not been able to do so in the time that has so far elapsed."

Los Angeles Times

The Medium Is the Massage

The discussion continued, but the reporters kept circling back to the $200 million, which they all knew had to go into the first paragraph of their stories. Thus:

Q. President Nixon says, "I have made funds available to do so." How much funds has he made available?

Moynihan: The President has directed that for this enterprise the figure we were using of $200 million be made available.

Q. If I understood Mr. Van Dusen, this is the money that is already. . .

Moynihan: Appropriated.

Q. . . . already appropriated and earmarked for these various programs.

Moynihan: We have been earmarking it for the past two months as we have assembled this program and there is about another 40 per cent yet to be [turning to Van Dusen] 40 per cent to go, or what?

Van Dusen: It is difficult to speak in precise percentages.

Moynihan: We are a little soft in the edges and the edges go to well beyond $200 million. This is new money that will be expended in these areas for the purpose of this program.

Q. Is this program for fiscal 1969?

Moynihan (trying to shake off his pursuers): Yes. But maybe we haven't made ourselves clear about the process we find going on. In the normal processes of what is getting funded and what is getting spent, nothing has been happening in these areas and the normal pressures of administration have been to put the money where you can spend it and because of these areas, somehow or other, whatever it takes to get money finally working, get reconstruction, rehabilitation working, here hasn't happened. So the normal pressure of government will take it where it will.

Q. So what we are saying in effect is that this is a plan to expedite the process?

Moynihan: No. What we found was that in the normal process of administration, these parts of American cities where you might expect to have the highest priority for action were getting no action. Nothing was happening.

There was, in fact, a germ of intelligence in this flood of rhetoric. Mr. Moynihan was making the point that many city officials have a tendency to put their program money into areas that produce the quickest and most viable results, rather than into those that need it the most. The Administration, he indicated, would nudge cities into allocating their money to the hard-core slums, which is mostly where the riots took place.

There is nothing wrong with that. Even though there is little likelihood that such an effort will work (the projects involved were already approved, or very nearly so), the Administration has every right to try. But it is a minor flex of the bureaucratic muscle, not an infusion of new money, and certainly not worth a White House press extravaganza. It was, more than anything else, footwork. Choreography.

A few weeks later, Mr. Romney called a press conference to announce major new initiatives to correct the "critical deficiencies" in the Model Cities program as it was administered under Mr. Johnson. He said that the overall responsibility for the program would be vested for the first time in the Urban Affairs Council at the White House; that state governments would be brought into the planning process, although without a veto; that mayors would have responsibility at the local level; and that the restriction of a given project to 10 per cent of a city's population would be eliminated.

While it was clear that these were initiatives, it was equally clear that they left almost untouched the "critical" problems faced by the Johnson administration.

The purpose of the Model Cities program was to take a wide range of federal, state and local programs—anti-poverty programs, urban renewal, job training, educational assistance, welfare and so forth—and pull them together into a concentrated attack on all the problems of a small urban slum area.

This, it was hoped, would lead to a breakthrough that would point the way to solving the broader urban malaise. In the bureaucratic argot, it was to be post holing (a concentrated effort on a few people) rather than leaf raking (a scattered effort that hits a lot of people, but doesn't do much for any of them).

There were two fundamental difficulties with the program when the Nixon Administration took office. The first was the perennial shortage of money. The Johnson budget for fiscal 1970 called for an expenditure of $750 million for 150 cities, which is nearly $300 million less than what the Johnson planners had figured for the programs. The Model Cities money is only a supplement to the money available for the programs that come under its umbrella, but even so the Johnson budget was low.

The second problem went to the heart of the Model Cities concept; the need to coordinate the various programs so as to achieve maximum impact. Somebody who lives in a slum is likely, at any given time, to be in poor health, have a bad job or no job at all, live in a miserable house, be poorly educated, and so on. But the agencies that administer programs designed to alleviate these conditions tended to end up fighting one another rather than cooperating. The Office of Economic Opportunity was running job training, education and welfare programs; the Labor Department also ran job programs; the Department of Health, Education and Welfare ran its programs; and all of these often involved the same poor "clients" in the model neighborhoods.

Not surprisingly, each department thought it knew best how to run its type of program. Moreover, each department wanted to spend its available money according to its own philosophy and priorities.

This was even more true at the state and local levels; the result in many cases has been that the Model Cities legislation turned out to be not a newly forged instrument for urban rehabilitation but a smörgasbord.

The first thing the Nixon Administration did was to cut the Johnson administration budget request by $75 million. While this might have been justified by the state of the economy, it obviously did not enhance the program's chances for success. Moreover, Mr. Romney's decision to raise the size restriction can only dilute it further.

In his press conference, Mr. Romney said he did not mean that every city should rush out and draw model city plans for huge areas. He cited the example of Portland, Me., which needed only a slight increase in the size of its model neighborhood to include all of the city's major slum. However, that still leaves 149 other cities with full freedom to scatter their money and efforts to the extent the local mayor desires; if the rationale behind the Model Cities legislation was valid at all, this dilution can only further reduce the chances of success.

On the second, and even more critical deficiency—the lack of cooperation on the part of various public and private agencies—the Romney moves were in the right direction, but they fell considerably short of what is needed.

In the first place, he said that the responsibility for the program would be vested in the Urban Affairs Council in the White House. Mr. Romney conceded that the policy of considering HUD the first among equals in the administration of the program was not working. Moving the responsibility up to the council, where the President would be looking over the shoulders of the Cabinet members, would insure sufficient cooperation, he said. An indication of progress along this line was

Mr. Romney's statement that each of the other departments will come up with specific Model Cities funds for the programs they operate in model neighborhoods. He did not say how much they would supply, but it is significant that they will be forced to do anything.

On the other hand, there has been no structural change in the administration of the program at the state and local level. The Secretary noted that a previously announced reorganization plan would bring the regional offices of the various departments into a single location and would make their jurisdictions coincide, and expressed his belief that this would be helpful.

It is highly questionable, however, whether this move, or the announced intention to bring the states into the Model Cities planning will eliminate the endemic bickering at the local or state level. As for the regional offices, HUD will still be the first among equals in trying to make the program go—a concept the Secretary admitted did not work in Washington, and which isn't likely to work anywhere else.

If the local poverty agency, the model city agency run by the mayor, the state department of employment security and the state department of education, both run by the governor, fight over money, programs and clients, there is no way, in the present system, or the envisioned system, to do anything about it. There is, in fact, no single person with real responsibility for the program below President Nixon himself.

Until there is, and until there is more money available, the moves Mr. Romney has taken will also not amount to much more than bureaucratic footwork, more choreography.

ANTI-UNION HOSPITALS

BLUE CROSS PAYS THE BILLS

JOEL SELDIN

Mr. Seldin was a member of the editorial staff of the New York Herald Tribune from 1947 to 1965. His specialized reportorial assignments included labor unions and health-insurance programs.

Nearly 1 million nonprofessional hospital workers in this country's voluntary and private hospitals are so poorly paid that if they work five days a week for a full year, and if they are the sole support of a family, its annual income will be below the official level of poverty. If some union or group of unions were to attempt a large-scale organizing campaign (only one-eighth of these workers are now unionized) and if the hospitals were to oppose the unions with large and expensive anti-union campaigns, the employers could recover much of this expense from the Medicare, Medicaid and Blue Cross health insurance programs.

The situation is a classic example of how the social advances of one era can contribute to social problems later. It contains a note of irony because the unions were among the most active advocates of the public and nonprofit health insurance programs, and because a large percentage of Blue Cross membership, now exceeding 65 million, is enrolled through labor-management agreements. It also illustrates some of the complexity that underlies what seems to the uninitiated to be apathy or resistance when unions fail to respond enthusiastically to admonitions that they should organize the unorganized.

A hospital management's potential for recovering the costs of opposing a union exists largely because of formulas used by the health insurance plans to determine a rate of reimbursement that will be fair to both the insured and the hospitals. In theory, the plans should pay the hospitals only the actual cost of whatever service the patient requires. In practice, with an institution as large and complex as a modern medical center, where many intangible elements relate to the quality of patient-care services, and where costs vary even within a single year, determining the precise cost of services to an individual patient is a bookkeeping impossibility. The formulas, which are supposed to determine equitable averages that will include the indirect as well as the direct costs of services, all include an appropriate portion of a hospital's administrative costs, among them personnel and legal costs. Anti-union expenses are ordinarily listed in those categories, but are rarely if ever specified as such.

Despite all the recent concern about health-care services and costs, statistics are still inadequate and late. Some perspective on the insurance-unionism problem can be gained, however, from the figures for 1967, the latest full year available when this was written. In 1967, $16.4 billion was spent for hospital care, of which $13.6 billion went to hospitals most likely to serve insured patients. These "general and other special" hospitals are, incidentally, also the ones most likely to have employees in need of unionization. Medicare payments to hospitals in that period were $3.4 billion, and Blue Cross paid out $2.8 billion. Medicaid's payments, which are smaller, still amounted to some hundreds of millions of dollars. Together, the three insurance plans covered more than half the nation's cost for general and other special hospitals.

Private insurance companies and private patients without insurance presumably would also be charged by the hospitals for anti-union expenses, but this is more like the usual pattern of private employers charging off such costs to operating expenses or adding them to prices. The public and nonprofit plans maintain an aura of commitment to the public welfare that would seem to exclude the underwriting of anti-union activities.

It is almost impossible for a union to organize public hospitals (federal, state, county and municipal institutions) whose employees are covered by civil service or some similar employment system, the provisions of which extend to other hospitals not being organized or to other than hospital workers. Consequently, the ability of public hospitals to fend off a union is not likely to depend on whether they can recoup the expense through health insurance plans, unless they happen to be single units.

When a hospital elects to oppose the unionization of its employees, the costs of the campaign are incurred in a number of ways. There can be greater than usual pay increases to convince the workers that the union is unnecessary. If the workers feel the lack of representation in bringing their grievances before management, procedures alternative to the usual union mechanisms are devised and can require more supervisory time for this activity, perhaps at overtime rates, additional supervisory employees, or both. The costs of meetings, leaflets, direct mail and similar "informational" activities are also frequently substantial. Such expenditures are usually listed as personnel expense.

But the principal cost item in an anti-union campaign is likely to be legal expense. Initially, the planning and administration of such a campaign is most often turned over to one of the "new breed" of labor attorneys, whose specialty is thwarting union organizing drives. Their retainers, expenses and fees are generally high, and they are apt to appear on the hospital's books as legal fees for unspecified purposes. When, as is increasingly the case, the dispute between management and union becomes a "case" before a state or other local labor relations board, or goes to the courts, additional trial counsel may be required. An anti-union campaign that was intended to cover a few months before a union election can easily stretch out over years before the courts and administrative agencies are through with it.

Officials of Medicare, Medicaid and Blue Cross, asked about how their accounting and auditing procedures would deal with the expenses of a hospital's anti-union campaign, agreed (1) that it was unlikely such expenses would be identifiable in hospital cost records as they are now submitted to the plans; (2) that if an auditor identified the nature of such costs he would be concerned with little more than verifying that the expenses were billed by and paid to legitimate firms or lawyers; and (3) that no policy on reimbursing for anti-union expenses has been created and that, in the absence of such policy, it is probable that the appropriate percentage of the costs would be reimbursed.

Privately, the officials felt it would be extremely difficult for any insurance plan to attempt to differentiate proper from improper costs in a labor-management situation. One of them offered the hypothetical case of the cost of moving patients from a struck hospital to assure continuity of care. "How could we disallow such costs when our primary responsibility is to provide health care for our members?" Still, they all agreed that expenses for fighting a union's organizing drive were in a somewhat different category and would pose a problem for the plans.

In the formula of the Associated Hospital Service of New York, which is only one of some 100 Blue Cross plans in the nation, there are some stipulations which could serve to limit a hospital's ability to recover anti-union expenses. These limitations, however, apply to how much added cost a hospital can submit for reimbursement in a given period; they are not related to the nature of anti-union expenses.

The New York Blue Cross Plan assigns hospitals serving its members to groups according to such criteria as: the annual number of patient days; the number of full-time residents in an approved program and the number of their specialties; whether there is an approved intern program and nursing school and the content of their curricula; whether there are licensed outpatient departments and emergency services, and whether the hospitals are voluntary (nonprofit) or proprietary (profit-making). Those with more services related to patient care get a higher rate, and the proprietaries are allowed 7.5 per cent profit on assets used for patient care. In all, there are sixteen groups of hospitals in the New York plan's formula. Within each group, no hospital is reimbursed for expenses that are in excess of 15 per cent above the annual average per diem reimbursable expense for that group.

In addition, the reimbursable expenses of an individual hospital may not exceed by more than 20 per cent the average annual increase in expenses of the other hospitals with which it is grouped. Finally, the aggregate AHS payment to a hosital in one year is not allowed to exceed what the hospital would have charged the AHS members if it billed them as private patients.

In the absence of any direct experience with the question of reimbursing for anti-union expenses, the AHS officials guessed that if a hospital's expenses were low by comparison with those of others in its group, it would be in a better position to obtain Blue Cross reimbursement for expenses incurred fighting a union. Another possiblity, however, would be for a hospital to assign its supervisors to devoting more of their regular time to an anti-union campaign, to allocate some of its regular budget for legal services to the activity, or in other ways to substitute the anti-union campaign for other, continuing activities in the hospital's program. If this did not impair patient services sufficiently to affect the hospital's accreditation, they said, the anti-union costs would not show up as additional expenses or in any way as unusual. So long as the hospital kept its costs within the allowable maximum for its position in the formula, or attributed its anti-union costs to the deficit which most hospitals maintain, they felt, little attention would be paid to such costs.

The New York State Insurance Department has jurisdiction over the AHS formula, as well as the formulas of seven other Blue Cross plans in the state, each of which is somewhat different. In addition, the Insurance Department checks the reimbursements provided to individual hospitals, working with the cost figures provided by the hospitals to the Blue Cross plans, and also with cost figures provided by the hospitals to the state's Department of Health. Spokesmen for the Insurance Department said there was no provision in the Health Department cost reports to make anti-union expenses more visible than in the Blue Cross reports.

"Normally," one Insurance Department official said, "an administrative expense would not be questioned. Whether it is a justifiable expense is a question that starts with whether the Blue Cross plan is willing to accept the expense."

Unlike the Blue Cross plans, the federal Medicare and Medicaid programs set rates for each hospital individually without reference to groups. The basic reimbursement formula is set by the Medicare program and, in practice, followed also by Medicaid, with appropriate adjustments for the difference between the two patient groups. Medicare, for example, since it serves patients over 65, will not reimburse a hospital for the costs of its obstetrical, nursery and child-care facilities.

The "general principle" of reimbursement as stated in the Medicare regulations is that the payments are to be based on "reasonable cost," both direct and indirect, of providing service to patients covered by the insurance. Despite some 30 pages of intricate regulations dealing with such subjects as depreciation, interest expense, bad debts, charity, courtesy allowances, cost of educational activities and cost of research, there is nothing that refers directly to anything resembling an anti-union campaign. However, one section is entitled, "Allowance in lieu of specific recognition of other costs," under which, after allowable interest expenses are deducted, voluntary hospitals are permitted to add an additional 2 per cent to their bill, and proprietary hospitals (already allowed a complicated profit rate) an additional 1.5 per cent. It is estimated that some $100 million annually is involved in these additional percentages alone.

When the new Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare Robert H. Finch tried earlier this year to drop these "in lieu of" charges, he was barraged by protests from members of the American Hospital Association and the American Nursing Home Association. He agreed to review the Medicare reimbursement formula for purposes of making it reflect more accurately the actual costs to the hospitals of patient care. Whether this will increase or decrease payments is still to be seen.

Officials involved with Medicare-Medicaid said there has not yet been, to their knowledge, a case in which anti-union costs were questioned in the reimbursement process. They disagreed somewhat on how the question would be handled if it did come up. One said he thought such costs would not be permissible under "the intent of the legislation," but another felt the agency could not "judge the motivation" of such expenses and that they would be handled "according to the formula." A third felt that despite the lack of "specific procedural barriers" to reimbursement of such costs, there would be "a degree of sensitivity" to whether such costs are "related to patient care."

Whether or not the question will ever come up for Medicare and Medicaid may depend, to a great extent, on the national system of Blue Cross plans. When the Medicare legislation was being debated in Congress, the principal opposition came from the powerful lobby of the private insurance companies. To overcome this opposition, Congress wrote into the law an opportunity for "third parties" to participate in the federal program. As a result, hospitals may elect to have a "fiscal intermediary" between themselves and the Social Security Administration for reimbursement purposes. These intermediaries process and pay the hospitals' bills, applying the federal formula, and are paid for their services.

The private companies have not been eager to get into this aspect of the program. Of 7,900 hospitals participating in Medicare by a recent count, 6,900 had elected the national Blue Cross Association, in Chicago, to be their intermediary. Of the remaining 1,000 hospitals, 639 deal directly with the SSA and the rest through some private insurance company or nonprofit organization other than Blue Cross. Although there are no figures, one HEW official felt the percentage of hospital beds being reimbursed by Medicare through Blue Cross was even higher than the percentage of hospitals.

This means that the initial determination of whether anti-union expenses are reimbursable under the Medicare formula will, in most cases, be made by Blue Cross. Only if Blue Cross decides to question anti-union expenses—if it can find them—could the process be started easily of getting a decision from the HEW attorneys on whether the government has the right to refuse payment.

This potential reimbursement of anti-union costs becomes a problem for the unionization of the unorganized only if the hospitals mount really expensive anti-union campaigns. The response of officials in Charleston, S.C., where a recognition strike has dragged on for months, may be attributable both to their being the heads of public hospitals and to the intransigence of the Deep South. However, the evidence in a New York City dispute between Local 1199, Drug and Hospital Employees Union, and Roosevelt Hospital, one of the largest voluntaries in a "union town," cannot similarly be dismissed as atypical. It is reviewed here to indicate what can be anticipated by way of hospital response, at least in a significant number of cases, should a major unionization effort among hospital workers be undertaken nationally.

The Roosevelt case, well publicized in hospital circles and being studied as a prototype, is now being argued before the New York State Labor Relations Board, which is considering charges of unfair labor practice against the hospital. It is already more than three years old, with legal expenses for the entire period. If either side decides to contest the board's eventual ruling in the courts, those expenses could continue to mount. The hospital is represented by Poletti Freidin Prashker Feldman & Gartner, one of the city's larger firms specializing in labor law. Its fees are not nominal.

In February, Frank Einhorn, a trial examiner for the board, issued an intermediate report after forty-eight days of hearings between October 1967 and June 1968. The evidence he considered pertinent and the conclusions he reached, provide a judicious appraisal of what occurred.

According to Mr. Einhorn's report the union, which had failed at Roosevelt once before in 1964, began a second organizing drive in April 1966. The objective was to sign up a majority of employees other than doctors, nurses and supervisors on cards designating Local 1199 as their representative. Under state law, such a majority showing would require the management to negotiate.

At about the time the union began its drive, the hospital announced an increase in its minimum hourly wage and a 4 per cent wage increase for all nonprofessional employees, which the union charged was an unfair practice. Mr. Einhorn rejected this charge on the ground that the hospital did not yet know about the union drive. He also rejected a similar charge against an increase in Roosevelt's life insurance coverage from $2,000 to $5,000 and an increase in shift differential from $1.50 to $2 because he found that plans for the increases had been made before the organizing began.

Also rejected were charges against some seventeen speeches to employees by Peter P. Terenzio, chief executive officer of the hospital, in January 1967, shortly before an election ordered by the board. Mr. Terenzio told the workers that under the union they would: lose a nurses' assistant grade, between aide and practical nurse; have to wait for wage increases until unionized hospitals caught up to Roosevelt's pay scales; suffer the elimination of merit increases or increases between labor grades; be required to pay dues, participate in strikes, picketing and union meetings, and might have to be discharged if they refused. He urged them to vote against the union. The examiner found the speeches were within an employer's rights.

Mr. Einhorn also threw out charges against a bilingual housekeeping supervisor, Oscar Martinez, who told some twenty Spanish-speaking employees, at a meeting in the head supervisor's office, to vote against the union. Martinez also explained that the two pay checks they had received that week, one for $4 and the other for the rest of their pay, was to show them what it would be like to have union dues deducted from their checks. He did not tell them that the dues were monthly, not weekly. He provided refreshments at the meeting from a petty cash fund. Mr. Martinez "decided to give his views about the Union," Mr. Einhorn wrote, "because he felt that the Spanish-speaking people are the victims of organized labor and he should explain to them about the Union and comparative wages." The examiner did not look into how Mr. Martinez came to Roosevelt from a unionized hospital, and how he became a supervisor in a relatively short time, although both facts appear in the report. Apparently such events are expected in an anti-union campaign and are not considered illegal.

But Mr. Einhorn could not accept as proper a 10 per cent across-the-board pay increase announced by Roosevelt in September 1966, just five months after the 4 per cent increase and one day after the union had shown to the board and to the hospital representation cards for a majority of the Roosevelt employees. Nor could the examiner accept as justified the hospital's refusal of an immediate election and the steps it took to delay the election until the following January. He rejected the hospital's argument that it was protecting its employees by the delay, and noted that after four months of the organizing campaign most workers had made up their minds and were ready to vote. He also noted that the delay, coupled with the 10 per cent pay increase, had made it possible for Mr. Terenzio in his January speeches (the same talks that were not in themselves illegal) to declare that Roosevelt's pay rates were higher than those in unionized hospitals. Mr. Einhorn found that the pay increase was a violation of the state labor law.

The forty-eight-day hearing produced other findings against the hospital, the details of which illustrate the intricacy and expense of an anti-union campaign. When the election was finally held on January 12, 1967, the union lost by a vote of 377 to 220 in a bargaining unit of 650 employees, and immediately charged that the procedure had been unfair. At that point the board began inspecting the 380 representation cards the union had submitted the previous September, and found that 345 of them had been signed by persons in the unit, and that the signatures appeared the same as those in the hospital's records. The cards thus became evidence for the hearing into alleged election malpractice.

The hospital's attorneys asked first for photostats of the cards, and later for the cards themselves, ostensibly so that the signatures could be inspected by a handwriting expert. The examiners permitted the attorneys to have the cards. Although it appeared that the cards were inspected by an expert, the hospital did not contest the validity of the signatures. What it did do is a good indication of the nature of an anti-union campaign. The hospital attorneys attempted to prove that although the employees had signed the cards, they did not understand what the cards meant. Toward this end, they induced sixty-three of the workers to testify that they thought signing the cards merely meant asking for an election, and not that the union should represent them. How this was accomplished is best described by Mr. Einhorn:

> The employees were confronted by the Respondent on Hospital premises with the very same card they had signed or a photostat thereof. . . . Had I been apprized that these cards were to be used for a purpose other than submission to the handwriting expert, I would have insisted upon assurances that their use be restricted, otherwise permission would not have been granted for removal of the cards. It is generally recognized that an employer may question his employees in preparation for a hearing. But such preparation is restricted to questions relevant to the charges of unfair labor practices and of sufficient probative value to justify the risk of intimidation which interrogation as to union matters necessarily entails. . . . There is testimony herein that employees were interrupted by their supervisors in the performance of their duties and, without being told why and without any choice, they were required to report to the office where they were greeted by the Hospital inquisitor. Mingled with apprehension at this approach by the Respondent was resentment towards the Union. Employees when they signed a card believed, and rightly so, that the cards they signed would be held confidential by the Union. . . . An election had been conducted and lost by the Union and long after that event, the employees found themselves confronted by their employer with a card they had signed favoring the Union. They cannot be held knowledgeable of the legal proceeding then in progress. All they knew and saw was that the Union, after having lost the election, had violated a trust. . . .

Mr. Einhorn found no credible evidence that the union had misrepresented the meaning of the cards when it asked the Roosevelt workers to sign them. He felt the critical point was what the workers had thought when they signed the cards, not afterward. He ruled that they had understood the meaning of the cards when they signed them and that the union, when it submitted them, had signed up a majority of the workers. He rejected the hospital's contention that it had declined to recognize the union majority because of "good faith" doubt as to the validity of the cards, and found the hospital guilty of refusal to bargain.

It is in his proposed solution that the examiner, if he is sustained by the board, will establish an important precedent for hospital organizing. Instead of ordering a new election, he declared that the hospital's "vulpine conduct succeeded in both delaying an election and undermining the union. . . . I find that the election . . . was not a fair election and the Respondent's conduct herein has destroyed the required laboratory conditions for any fair election for some time to come. A reasonable vindication of the Act and its purpose will best be served by returning the Union and the Respondent to the status quo ante the unfair labor practices and compelling the Respondent to commence bargaining."

In short, Mr. Einhorn, in his recommendations to the board, rejected entirely the lost election, declared the original showing of majority status by the union to have been valid, and directed the hospital to reach a collective bargaining agreement with the union, an action taken only once before in the state.

Just three days before the SLRB hearing, the United States Supreme Court upheld the principle that when an employer has undermined the election process, after a union has signed up a majority of workers, labor relations boards can issue a direct order to the employer to recognize the union and bargain. There had been conflicting rulings in different United States Circuit Courts. The Roosevelt Hospital attorney, Mr. Moss, argued before the SLRB that this ruling did not really apply in the SLRB's case, indicating that should the board rule against him there is a good chance of an appeal to the courts. He also objected strenuously to Mr. Einhorn's report and recommendations, charging that the trial examiner was not "objective," and that all of his and the hospital's actions in the case had been scrupulously legal.

Should the outcome finally be in favor of the union there will be additional complications involving the reimbursement of anti-union costs through public and nonprofit insurance plans. Although there is no direct recognition of union considerations in the Medicare and Medicaid legislation, there is an overall intent of Congress in other laws to encourage unionism. Medicare and Medicaid officials will be hard pressed if it develops that one effect of their programs counteracts what Congress intended in other actions.

For Blue Cross, particularly in New York State, there will also be complications. The State Insurance and Health Departments, with some supervisory powers over both the hospitals and the insurance plans, will find that they have been approving payments for practices that a sister state agency, the Labor Relations Board, has found to be illegal. State and federal officials said they had no idea how these quandaries can be solved. They felt the solutions will have to be devised either by the legal staffs of their agencies or, possibly, through new legislation in Congress or in state legislatures.

It seems reasonable to expect that it will be some years before all the complexities of this contradictory situation are ironed out. Meanwhile, organizing the unorganized in the hospitals will remain a far more difficult problem than merely persuading some union to go out and sign up members.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The American Economic Empire

THE AGE OF IMPERIALISM. By Harry Magdoff. Monthly Review Press. 208 pp. $6.

JAMES O'CONNOR

Mr. O'Connor is a member of the Collective of Socialist Economists and teaches economics at San Jose State College. He is the author of The Origins of Socialism in Cuba, to be published next fall by Cornell University Press.

Readers will search the index of John Kenneth Galbraith's "international best-seller," The New Industrial State, in vain for any references to "multinational corporations," "international finance," "foreign trade," "foreign aid," "Europe" and "underdeveloped countries," not to speak of "imperialism" and "economic exploitation." Galbraith's failure to acknowledge that the United States economy does not exist as a separate economic entity, and that there are no national economies, only one world capitalist economy, reveals the inadequacy of contemporary bourgeois economic theory.

The problem is not that economists such as Galbraith are incapable of learning from the alternative tradition, Marxism, which is attracting more and more young economists who are fed up with their professors and seek viable alternatives to Keynesian and Marshallian economics. The problem is rather that bourgeois economic theory, committed as it is to defending capitalism and to using all its resources to figure out ways of saving capitalism, is incapable of making an accurate assessment of the facts of economic life.

Studies of the distribution of poverty among races, age groups and occupational categories parade as studies of the causes of poverty. Studies of the impact of government spending obscure the causes of government spending. "Welfare economics" blossoms as economic and social welfare deteriorate. Tax economists spin out complex theories of "equity" and "ability to pay" while private capital escapes the mounting tax burden. International trade theory clings tenaciously to the fantasy that international specialization and the division of labor benefit all parties to trade and investment, even though it is a plain historic fact that the economic development of the advanced industrial economies contributed to the economic underdevelopment of the Third World. Hundreds of young economists realize today that bourgeois economics is thoroughly reactionary, useful only to the corporate ruling class in its search for ways to keep the dollar as the world's reserve currency, make tax exploitation more efficient, maintain the "correct" mix of unemployment and inflation, keep the underdeveloped countries in their place, co-opt the black movement at home and, last but not least, blame the problems of capitalism on workers whose wage demands "threaten" profits, "cause" inflation and are "instrumental" in worsening the balance of payments.

The Age of Imperialism deserves the highest praise as an outstanding description of the American economic empire. It is indispensable reading for anyone uncomfortable with the distortions about the world economy dispensed by the so-called professional economists. Harry Magdoff's book does not make any new theoretical advances (nor does it pretend to), either in the sense of clarifying and developing older theory or breaking new ground. But The Age of Imperialism is the first book to put together relevant facts about American economic imperialism in a clear, concise form.

The first outstanding fact is that a fortress America, especially one that believed its own strictures about the evils of "government interference in the economy," could not survive without undergoing the most profound economic, and subsequent social and political upheavals. In the first place, Magdoff demonstrates what the vanguard corporate leaders have long known—that the metropolitan economy is increasingly dependent on overseas supplies of industrial raw materials. Imports of basic metals such as iron ore, copper, lead and zinc expand more rapidly than local supplies. Imports account for over 80 per cent of the supplies of well over one-half of the industrial materials classified as "strategic." And most of these materials are taken out of the ground in Latin America, Asia, the Middle East and Africa.

In the second place, although U.S. exports make up only 5 per cent of gross national product,* exports plus sales by overseas branch plants and subsidiaries of U.S. corporations constitute a vast and rapidly growing market abroad. Magdoff estimates that this market "is equal to approximately two-fifths the domestic output of farms, factories, and mines." Here we locate the central importance of the huge, new foreign investments in manufacturing and related industries, in specific, the ability of U.S. corporations to compete in, and control, foreign markets directly. To be sure, most of these investments are located in Europe and Canada, where the great mass markets are to be found. But many sales of U.S. affiliates in Europe find their way to the Third World; what is more, U.S. corporations have successfully penetrated the thin markets which are available in the underdeveloped countries. [See "Mexican Auto Swindle" by Leo Fenster, The Nation, June 2.]

Thirdly, and related to the expansion of markets overseas, U.S. foreign investments have been expanding more rapidly than domestic investments, accounting for about 8 per cent of total investments in 1957 and 17 per cent of all investments in 1965. Earnings on foreign investments jumped from 10 per cent of after-tax corporate profits in 1950 to 22 per cent in 1964.

Fourthly, capital goods industries, the basic infra-structure of the American economy, are particularly dependent on exports and on sales to the federal government—mainly direct military purchases and sales of equipment and materials destined for military production. It is well known that industries such as aircraft, ordnance, electronic components, scientific and controlling industries and radio, TV and communications equipment could not survive without government contracts and direct and indirect subsidies. It is less well known that nonferrous metal ores mining, coal mining, nonferrous metal manufacturing, engines and turbines, construction, mining and oil field machinery, and other major capital goods industries sell up to 40 per cent of their output abroad or to the government.

Lastly, and what needs to penetrate deeply into the popular consciousness: overseas investments, markets of foreign-based plants of U.S. corporations, raw material supplies, military orders and commodity exports financed by the U.S. Agency for International Development are all monopolized by a handful of giant corporations. Of the fifty largest industrial corporations, thirty-seven are deeply involved in international operations or military production or both. These companies are concentrated in oil, aviation, chemicals, steel, automobiles, electrical equipment and electronics, and rubber. Magdoff rightly stresses that these corporations' "community of interests" is based on "the interrelationship among the firms via the financial centers of power . . . the direct economic ties [between the federal government and] business. . . . And . . . the postwar merger movement among the industrial giants [which] has intermingled the typically domestic with the typically outer-market directed business organizations."

* In my view, the term "gross national product" is a mystification. There is a single world capitalist system and thus a single world social product. The U.S. "gross national product" measures the share of world social product appropriated by the United States. "Gross national product" is thus a measure of distribution, not production.

In short, it is precisely the men who control the largest and most powerful corporations who have the greatest stake in economic expansion abroad, together with the maintenance of a world-wide military network to protect their far-flung economic interests. Thanks to the recent work of radical historians and sociologists, we know that these are also the men who constitute the U.S. upper class, dominate nearly all of the country's major institutions, and effectively control the Executive branch of the federal government. So long as these men continue to rule there can be no major changes in either the foreign or domestic policies of the federal government, precisely because these policies are formed by the corporate ruling group on the basis of their own interests.

The second outstanding fact effectively obscured by bourgeois economists is that the American empire is in trouble economically. Space permits brief examination of only one of the many stresses and strains which are beginning to tear the empire apart, in particular one described by Magdoff in "The Financial Network," the most interesting chapter of his book.

Despite the growth of sales of overseas branches of U.S. corporations, superior productivity in the most technologically advanced industries, and export subsidies, U.S. commodity exports have not grown fast enough to pay for military expenditures abroad, military assistance and economic "aid" to underdeveloped countries, and foreign investments. But foreigners have accepted the dollar as a reserve asset, and hence the United States has been able to carry balance of payments deficits financed by an expansion of internal credit. Because foreigners have not "cashed in" all the dollars they hold for gold—that is, because U.S. dominance of world trade means that the United States has assumed the role of world banker—the U.S. economy has enjoyed unprecedented prosperity despite the costs of defending the American empire abroad. Had other countries failed to accept the dollar as a reserve asset, in the words of former Under Secretary of the Treasury Robert Roosa, "we might have been forced long ago to cut down our imports (perhaps through deflation in our economy), reduce materially our foreign investments, income from which make a substantial contribution to our current balance of payments, and curtail, perhaps sharply, our military and economic assistance to our friends and allies. . . . Instead of the rapid growth of world trade, we would have witnessed stagnation that would have been harmful to our own prosperity and to that of the whole free world."

Thus the cooperation of central bankers abroad, especially in the other industrial countries, has been absolutely decisive in keeping American imperialism intact—that is, in affording the opportunity for rapid overseas expansion on the one hand, and maintaining the "corporate liberal" consensus at home through regular increases in wages, on the other.

Immediately after World War II, of course, the central bankers had no choice in the matter. Even today, the last thing the European bankers and businessmen want is a depression in the United States. Yet to the degree that their own economies are running out of steam, and to the degree that they no longer fear the Soviet Union (and hence no longer need the military umbrella provided by the United States), they can be expected to defend their own national interests, perhaps mounting a large-scale offensive against U.S. economic hegemony.

Since Magdoff wrote his book, a two-price system for gold has been introduced under the prodding of the United States, and the decline in real wages in this country has shown no signs of abating. These are signs that the dollar continues to weaken, and that the system as a whole is beginning to be buffeted by winds which may reach gale force. More stopgap measures can be expected. In the last analysis, however, the détente with the Soviet Union and growing economic stagnation in Europe may signal the outbreak of national rivalries characteristic of an earlier day, obviously not in the form of imperialist wars but rather in the form of extremist nationalist economic policies which today are not considered "polite" in international ruling circles. This then is one weak link in the chain of U.S. imperialism. On the one hand, economic, political and military dominance tends to weaken the European economies and to force the Soviet Union into a "cooperative" stance. On the other hand, an economically weak Europe, unafraid of Soviet "aggression" and indifferent to China and U.S. interests in Asia, may be compelled to undermine the hegemony of the dollar, and thus one of the key pillars of the American empire.

These then are but two of the contributions—the author's description of the American empire and the role of the dollar—of The Age of Imperialism. Valuable as well are Magdoff's account of the economics of U.S. open-door policies, the extensive U.S. banking network abroad, foreign aid as an instrument of

THE MIRACLE OF THE FRESCOES SAVED FROM THE FLOOD

First nothing but angels
Holding cups of blood.
Wounds, crosses,
Saints and parables,
The busy and the damned.
Slowly the colors
Seep into my mind.
Some of the sinners,
Less preoccupied,
See me staring at them.
Gradually, the Virgins seem not so concerned
With the Last Judgment.
Then the calves and buttocks of the men,
The thighs, eyes,
Hands of everyone,
Remove themselves from the walls.
Even the eccentric halos
Around the Jewish-Italian faces
Become believable;
And Jesus, a human being,
Sitting with his friends,
No more betrayed than anyone.

FLORENCE VICTOR

control of underdeveloped countries, the reactionary role of the International Monetary Fund, and the new patterns of dependence of the underdeveloped countries on the industrial powers.

The Age of Imperialism is in no sense an exhaustive study of the American empire. Magdoff devotes little or no space to the impact of the giant international corporations on the economies of Europe and the underdeveloped world, in particular with regard to the degree and pattern of economic resource utilization. Little is said about the significance of the industrialization programs of the larger underdeveloped countries, and practically nothing about the internal functioning of the U.S. economy. Nor does the author attempt to assess the significance of either the development of the conglomerate, international corporation on the imperialist system as a whole, or the meaning of the extensive cooperation undertaken by the giant corporations based in Europe, the United States, and Japan—that is, he does not take up the problem of whether or not the growth of an "international ruling class" is tending to make extreme national rivalries a thing of the past.

No criticism of The Age of Imperialism is intended by this brief list, merely a suggested inventory of some outstanding problems. Magdoff set himself the task of sketching the major contours of the American economic empire in order to dispel the myth that "economic imperialism is not at the root of United States foreign policy." He succeeds admirably.

The Sanctuary of Imagination

HENRY JAMES: The Treacherous Years, 1895-1901. By Leon Edel. J. B. Lippincott Co. 381 pp. $10.

MARK L. KRUPNICK
Mr. Krupnick is assistant professor of English at Boston University.

The publication of Volume IV in his life of Henry James marks the completion for Leon Edel of forty years' research on his subject. The present volume in particular, with its attempt to provide the key to Henry James's heart, represents the harvest of the biographer's patient and sympathetic identification with the artist. Despite the undoubted difficulties of this long quest for the secret of a writer who dreaded personal exposure and did everything to cover his tracks, Edel's writing shows few strains. The poised urbanity of the narrative contrasts sharply with the muddlement of James himself in these years of crisis.

The current volume, the most inward of the series, is devoted in considerable part to psychoanalytic studies of the stories and novels. Edel argues in his preface that inquiry into the writer's most private fantasies is the proper function of literary biography. "All the rest" he dismisses as "gossip and anecdotage." Such snobbism has its disadvantages. One of the problems of this volume is Edel's propensity to interpret, his overeagerness to explain, point analogies, create patterns. Yet at his best Edel provides a useful account of the surface as well as the buried life.

The external narrative is uneven in interest and sometimes difficult to follow, but the opening section on James's years as a playwright is especially vivid and tightly woven, with its thumbnail portraits of Shaw, Wells and Arnold Bennett, and views of Wilde and Ibsen. In this part Edel writes dramatically himself, suggesting the larger tissue of relations by means of symbolic detail, and building toward the great catastrophe: the disaster of the opening night of Guy Domville, Saturday, January 5, 1895, when James was hooted off the stage by an angry audience. Shaw or Wilde would have held his ground and outwitted the hecklers, but James was shattered. He would remember the event as "the most horrible hour of my life." It was the act of violence that, deep within him, this novelist with his "imagination of disaster" had always, anxiously, awaited.

The hurt initiated a long period of profound bewilderment and withdrawal and a fundamental crisis in James's sense of himself. Psychological breakdown was nothing new in this brilliant and neurotic family. The elder Henry James had suffered a great "vastation" and for two years had been visited by a recurrent sense, as he said, of "perfectly insane and abject terror." Henry's older brother William, when he was 28, had experienced an overwhelming sensation of dread, which he recorded in The Varieties of Religious Experience. Edel's The Treacherous Years is also a story of spiritual death and rebirth, a narrative of conversion and the twice-born self.

What was James doing writing for the theatre that "abyss of vulgarity and platitude," as he called it? Money was a reason, but he dreamed also of popular success. In his childhood competition with William, Henry had learned early the danger of masculine assertion and had retreated into a view of himself as powerless and not quite a real boy. Despite this abdication, however, he retained a "compelling drive to masculinity," as Edel writes, and the dramatic interlude appears now as his last bid to break the pattern of his ivory-tower fastidiousness and impose himself as a man in the world. We find James in his 50s voraciously reading biographies of Napoleon and memoirs of his generals. But Guy Domville repeated the example of earlier failures and proved to be the Waterloo of James's worldly career.

The novelist moved now from his De Vere Gardens flat in London to "Lamb House," Rye. Edel writes eloquently about this ancient and beautiful corner of Sussex, although I miss any mention of James's friendship with Stephen Crane, a near neighbor in Hastings until his death in 1900. We get a sense from James's letters how very important this house and the countryside were in helping him settle his confusions. "It is delightfully quiet and quaint and simple and salubrious," he writes William, "and the bliss of the rural solitude and peace and beauty are a balm to my spirit." A favorite in fashionable London society for twenty years, the inveterate guest who had dined out 140 times one winter "season," now James learned to ride a bicycle and nursed his spirit in his "bath of silence and solitude."

In the novels of these years there is also a marked withdrawal of interest in the outer world. The failure to conquer the stage had driven James back to the sanctuary of imagination. Unlike some artists, Hawthorne and Kafka for example, who experienced the isolation of the artist as a kind of entombment, James trusted his imagination and found it a "house of life." More than ever art became a sustaining faith and discipline. He never returned to the broad social canvases of the 1880s, the decade of The Bostonians, The Princess Cassamassima and The Tragic Muse. Now with the falling away of outer reality, there is the "surrender of experience to fantasy" which Graham Greene noted many years ago.

Reality itself is uncertain in these novels of ambiguity and conjecture, and the confusion about reality is typically a confusion about sexuality, as in The Sacred Fount, where the narrator spends a profitless country-house weekend studying the faces of his fellow guests for signs of who is sleeping with whom. Again and again James renders the corrupting world of adult sexuality from the point of view of a little girl. The stress is on the imaginative effort of these young innocents—there are no Lolitas here—to make sense of the glamorous and terrifying activities of the grownups, and the objective events themselves are left distanced and shadowy. Edel argues persuasively that James was reliving painful childhood experiences in these fables of the death of childhood, but the confrontation with the repressed past is incomplete. Except for The Turn of the Screw, these highly charged situations have been drained of their emotional content; and, despite the wit and charm of What Maisie Knew and The Awkward Age, we are left with a sense of their psychological aridity and evasiveness.

In his personal life James was facing the implications of his late discoveries more openly. The most poignant part of Edel's story in this volume concerns James's belated awakening to the power of sexual love. In his hunger not to have missed his life, James fell in love in the waning days of the old century with a young American sculptor, Hendrik Andersen. The androgynous quality in the novelist's make-up, what Edel calls his "spiritual transvestitism," is evident in the passionately maternal longings expressed in James's letters to this young man.

The language of these letters, of James's comments on living at Lamb House, of his "epistolary elegies" on the death of old friends remind one continually of the writer usually regarded as his opposite in American letters: Walt Whitman. James in these crisis years was reliving the death of his childhood innocence and arriving at a deeper understanding of his mortality, and also of death as the source of beauty and love. At the age of 22, reviewing Whitman's Civil War poems in The Nation, James had been contemptuous: "It has been a melancholy task to read this book; and it is still a more melancholy one to write about it." But in his old age he thought Whitman the greatest of American poets. In her memoirs Edith Wharton evokes the image of the novelist "crooning . . . in a mood of subdued ecstasy" Whitman's great poem on death and the awakening of the poet, "Out of the Cradle Endlessly Rocking."

Edel's interpretation is not persuasive in all respects. I think he mistakes the special nature of James's genius when he links him with Freud and Proust as pioneer explorers of the unconscious. But no book provides more understanding of the emotional sources of James's art and its recurrent psychological patterns. After this volume it will be impossible any longer to regard the later James as primarily a novelist of the international scene, a reporter of the surfaces of civilized society. And his conversion to the supreme sanctity of beauty and sexual love will seem to disqualify him as a Puritan moralist. He will no doubt be more and more appreciated as a visionary poet, and the great fantasies of the "major phase" will be seen not as renderings of the external scene but as projections of the vicissitudes of his own consciousness. The Golden Bowl, the greatest of the last three novels, will then figure for us as a magical fable of the violation and reconstitution of the imagination. In the end James found his theme. It was the traditional, the great theme: the loss and regaining of Paradise.

Landscape of the Heart

SPIRIT OF PLACE: Letters and Essays on Travel. By Lawrence Durrell. Edited by Alan G. Thomas. E. P. Dutton & Co. 430 pp. $10.

JOAN GOULIANOS

Miss Goulianos teaches English at New York University. She has just completed a book on Lawrence Durrell, and has published articles and reviews in various quarterlies and in the underground press.

For Lawrence Durrell, places are holy. Landscapes are as powerful as gods or parents; men are their creations. "We are the children of our landscape," he writes in Justine. "I can think of no better identification." Spirit of Place, the new Durrell collection, is a testament to his lifetime preoccupation with landscape. "I willingly admit to seeing characters almost as functions of a landscape," he writes in an essay in the collection. "The important determinant of any culture is after all—the spirit of place."

Durrell believes that the task of the travel writer is "to isolate the germ in the people which is expressed by their landscape." Travel becomes "a sort of science of intuitions," "the education of the sensibility." To be educated, the traveler must first identify. "Ten minutes of this sort of quiet inner identification will give you the notion of the Greek landscape which you could not get in twenty years of studying ancient Greek texts." Identification seems simple, "for all landscapes ask the same question in the same whisper. 'I am watching you—are you watching yourself in me?' " Durrell's approach is that of the outsider and the romantic; places exist for his sake. They are—as titles of his other works suggest—private countries, personal landscapes. Living on private income and public relations jobs with the British Government, Durrell identifies with the mythic elements and status quo of a place, and closes his eyes to social and political problems.

Throughout his life, Durrell has been moving through foreign landscapes, mirroring himself in them and recording the interaction. Born in India he spent his childhood there, his adolescence in England, his young manhood on the Greek island of Corfu. During World War II he lived in Egypt. At the close of the war he returned to Greece, to the island of Rhodes. From Rhodes he went to Argentina, Yugoslavia, Cyprus. He now lives in Provence and still travels. Not all of Durrell's landscapes have had the same effect on him: "Everyone finds his own 'correspondences,' " he writes, "landscapes where you suddenly feel bounding with ideas and others where half your soul falls asleep. . . . Writers each seem to have a personal landscape of the heart which beckons them." For Durrell, landscapes seem to be either death- or life-giving. In Yugoslavia, Argentina, especially in England, and even in Egypt, he felt suffocated, uncreative. Durrell's landscape of the heart, the landscape that first nourished his art and that always seems to draw him back, is the Greek island.

Alan Thomas, Durrell's old friend, has edited a Durrell collage—a seemingly casual mixture of disparate materials that recalls the mixture in The Alexandria Quartet. Italicized biographical material, arranged by chronology and by place, prefaces some sections. There are letters as rich and as intriguing as the published correspondence with Henry Miller; vivid travel pieces; joyful illustrations by Durrell of some of his landscapes. Poems are interspersed, like the cryptic "Solange," that links sex and cosmology.

Thomas includes two early surrealistic pieces, "Zero" and "Asylum in the Snow," and selections from two of Durrell's little known early novels, Pied Piper of Lovers and Panic Spring. These four works, all written in the late 1930s, are marked by the same skyrocketing imagination that later powered the Quartet. Characters, motifs, symbols, foreshadow the Quartet's creations. Ruth, the dying young girl who appears in both early novels, is a predecessor of Melissa. Tarquin, the homosexual schoolmaster in Panic Spring, appears in Durrell's Black Book and perhaps as Balthazar in the Quartet. In his early works, Durrell, already experimenting with timelessness, merges past and present. In "Zero," he delves into mysticism. He desires to bring to the West the message of the Eastern mystic: "Come. Enter into the creative activity in which you do not need your understandings. Do not mistake truth for the possessive process any longer—ratiocination, knowledge. The real desire is to be possessed." As in the Quartet, in "Asylum in the Snow," Durrell explodes personality. Diving into the spring of the unconscious, he becomes five—Fifi, Hamlet, Pieter, Vasec and the Dancer—figures of all sexes, figures of the imagination. "It is not making what goes on outside," Durrell writes in this early work. "It is what occurs in the inside spirits, where the great beings make their territory."

Inside Durrell's work is a quest for a self in union with the universe, a self-created godlike Eastern being antithetical to modern Western man. Durrell's writings are attempts to "deliver" this self. "Down the Styx," another surrealistic piece included in the new collection, records a journey through the rivers of death toward just such a rebirth. At the conclusion, there is a womb, and "the body of a young boy, lying in a pool of blood. . . . He is the firstborn." He is the same boy who, at the conclusion of The Black Book, written twenty years earlier, is reborn—without parents—out of the dead land, England, into the landscape of his heart's desire, the Greek island.

As a catalyst for rebirth, Durrell seems to need union with stony, sunwashed landscapes, landscapes like the Greek island or Provence, or the place of his birth and childhood, India. His repeated attempts to identify with landscapes like that of the Greek island seem, in part, a result of his longing for the childhood landscape. Uprooted from the foot of the Himalayas at the age of 11 and transplanted to the gray sidewalks of England, Durrell remembers India as a dazzling and holy place. Unhappy in England, he envisioned himself as a foreigner whose "real" self England was murdering. Corfu, the Greek island to which he went after "escaping" England, seems to have been potentially a return to the lost self. Island scenes in many of Durrell's works suggest that his longing for the island masks a longing for the Eden of childhood. There may even be an Oedipal aspect to that longing. In the conclusion of the Quartet, for example, Darley (the main author-identification figure) must cut Clea and himself away from a perfect but sterile island retreat in order to grow up.

Like his own description of Miller, Durrell is "the type of creative man who is making use of his art in order to grow by it." Durrell uses landscape and landscape writing to create and explore a self-image. His places are "spirited" by his compulsion to project himself as a mythic being enveloped by an immortal landscape.

Weimar and Edinburgh

A HEBRIDEAN IN GOETHE'S WEIMAR. By A. Gillies. Blackwells (England). Distributed by Barnes & Noble. 168 pp. $6.50.

GOETHE AND HIS AGE. By Georg Lukacs. Translated by Robert Anchor. Grosset & Dunlap. 253 pp. $6.95.

MARTIN GREEN

Mr. Green is an English writer, teaching at present at Tufts University. He is the author of Re-Appraisals: Some Commonsense Readings in American Literature, The Problem of Boston, Mirror for Anglo-Saxons and Yeats's Blessing on von Hügel (all Norton).

Though both these books are about Weimar, and both are by professors of literature, they are quite comically unalike. Gillies' is a pleasant gossip about a figure on the fringe of significant history, while Lukacs' is a sledge-hammer demonstration of the whole meaning of life and man's chief end, of what real significance and history are. It is Gillies who has the footnotes—several hundreds of them—but his real spirit is conveyed by the cover, a 1650 engraving of Weimar, and by the old-fashioned elegance, the high-necked typography and the slim-volume format, which Blackwells has given him. His biography of James Macdonald is a very British book; history is a repository of striking personalities and anecdotes, whose relation to the present is essentially comfortable, a pastoral domain. Lukacs is described on the cover of his book as a "sovereign" critic, "the most important" and "the most respected," and his criticism is said to be "muscular." The emphasis is all on power; and even the crudities of translation and faults of proofreading seem to express an impatience with the servile and cringing arts of correctness. Neither book is well written, in any sense of the word. But Gillies is just inefficient, pottering on across time and space, retracing its steps, losing our way for us among all the different Macdonalds, and tying up each new figure with so many trivial relationships to the famous ("His second wife's aunt was that Flora Macdonald who . . .") that they stand before us as stiffly beribboned as at a fancy-dress ball. While Lukacs is all severity and abstraction, except for the unpleasantly fawning, lackeylike citations of Marx and Engels. A casual phrase of Marx about the "honest thoughts" of the young Schelling is brought in twice, to justify Lukacs' quoting Schelling on his side.

The contrast is comic in that each brings out the weaknesses of the other. Obviously Lukacs brings out the nonseriousness of Gillies, the anti-disciplinary character of British humanism. But his own performance is vulnerable to the question, "What is all this in aid of? What literary purpose is served, what literary insights elicited, by all this muscularity?" Lukacs has a high reputation, and one can indeed see here, in scattered paragraphs, that he writes with a powerful mind. Certainly the Faust studies at the end of this book have some interesting ideas to put forward. Yet they are all ideas about literature—the relations between classicism and the Marxist interpretation of history, for instance; a parallel between Faust and the Phenomenology of Mind; and one between Minna von Barnhelm and Mozart. These are obviously highly speculative and nonsystematic ideas, despite the elaborate machinery of the dialectic and the severity of the style. Often, moreover, these ideas have only paradoxical interest. They are worth thinking about—for a few minutes—just because their plausibility can be so clearly and firmly denied. Thus his main proposition about Wilhelm Meister is that it expresses the ideals of the French Revolution. Quite apart from the dubiousness of personifying such a complex phenomenon so simply, there can surely be no more than paradoxical truth in associating that manifesto of aristocratic self-culture with, let's say, Robespierre. Above all, these ideas remain about the books, they never lead you into them, or leave you alone inside them.

Lukacs' essays were written mostly in the thirties, except the Faust studies of the forties, and in those decades they would have been much more impressive to read. The traditions of 19th-century bourgeois humanism and the distortions of Nazism were then enemies worth fighting against. But he did not give enough of himself to the books he was writing about, did not subdue his preconceptions to them sufficiently, to achieve truth. We are left with no vivid sense of Goethe, or even of Lukacs' sense of Goethe. He assimilated himself to Soviet communism, in all its crudities and brutalities. He was Soviet communism, in the realm of literary studies; he acquired some of his impressiveness from that likeness; and he must now suffer a similar depreciation.

James Macdonald (1772-1810) grew up in the Hebrides and spoke only Gaelic until he was 12. He was trained for the ministry and became a tutor to boys of noble Scottish family whom he accompanied to Germany and most particularly to Weimar. He became a friend of Wieland and Herder, and a faithful correspondent of K. A. Böttiger, the headmaster of the Weimar Gymnasium, and later the editor of two of the most important literary-intellectual periodicals of the time, the Neuer Deutsche Merkur and the Allgemeine Literatur Zeitung. Macdonald wrote pieces about Scotland for these papers, and pieces about Germany for the Edinburgh Review. He spread the fame of Wieland and Herder in Edinburgh, and of Burns and Ossian in Weimar.

This sort of cultural mediator is important in literary history, yet often neglected and understandably so. Macdonald was not a very interesting critic. He had a certain pungency of phrase, but his opinions are not only predictable, they are in the significant sense defensive. The only person he risks taking a strong line against is Kant, feeling secure in the support of both Scottish commonsense philosophy, and the anti-Kantianism of Wieland and Herder. But of Goethe and Schiller too he speaks without enthusiasm; they were never his Germans. His literary taste was as typically liberal as his politics, which change from radical to conservative step by step in rhythm with the events in Paris and London. In principle he liked the new authors, but in practice he preferred the most backward-looking ones among them, the Wielands rather than the Goethes.

We could as properly call him a typical Edinburgh intellectual for this, as a typical liberal. After the death of Hume, Edinburgh had no really bold minds, though it was still the Athens of the North, outshining London, Oxford and Cambridge. Edinburgh's greatest period preceded Weimar's, and perhaps it was only the accident of Britain's isolation during the Napoleonic wars which rekindled its flame. For instance, Sydney Smith's stay in Edinburgh, without which there might never have been an Edinburgh Review, was an accident of war. He had set out, with a pupil, for Weimar, but the Continent becoming closed to him, took the road to Scotland as the next best alternative. It is in part the relation between the two cities that is so interesting. The two torches fed each other. Edinburgh gave Weimar much of the Shaftesbury ideal of the harmonious personality; Weimar, or rather Goethe, gave Scott the clue to the Waverley novels, in the form of "Götz von Berlichingen." Edinburgh and Weimar were the two great culture cities of the period, the two great centers of education in every sense of that word. The career of James Macdonald reflects the cultural flow that existed between these two centers of intellectual life; for that reason alone it is worth recommending Macdonald to your attention.

Learning About China

ORVILLE SCHELL

Mr. Schell is senior fellow at the Center for Chinese Studies at the University of California. He is co-author, with Franz Schurmann, of The China Reader (Random House).

In the last ten years the United States has become increasingly aware of China. Sadly, however, this new awareness has not grown out of a fascination and concern for a nation which has chosen to modernize in a way unfamiliar to us. American interest in China, long smothered by our sense of betrayal at the "loss of China" to the Communists, by McCarthyism and by the Korean War, has been revived out of fear of that country and the threat which it is said to pose to our own national security. We study China, not because it is instructive and interesting as we might study Western Europe or our own history but because it is an enemy. It has been assumed that China, by nature of being Communist, cannot be other than our enemy.

It has been in terms of our urgent need to understand an implacable foe that China has been presented to high school students learning about Asia for the first time. The country is dehumanized and treated as a crippling disease. The message is simple: every good American has an obligation to understand the nature of this threat before it is too late. As Hsün-Tzu said in the second century B.C.: "Know your enemy in a thousand battles, and win a thousand victories." Understanding China as a "threat" becomes confused with understanding China.

As our policy makers, increasingly concerned with "Chinese Aggression," encourage our educators to offer more courses on Asia in high schools and colleges, a multitude of committees, research centers, curriculum projects and conferences on China have been set up, by both government and private foundations. A tidal wave of books and other materials on China has been produced in recent years. While some have been insightful, most books and pamphlets published for use in secondary school world history courses, which often include sections on Asia, have been dismayingly poor. Writing intelligent and intelligible books for high school students has been a task eschewed by most blue ribbon "China experts" as unscholarly and unprestigious. The assumption seems to be that nothing of real interest or importance about a place as complex as China could be understood by students with little or no background. In any event, high school books do not serve to advance one's academic career in any field. And although some Asian specialists have attached their names to texts as "consulting specialists," the quality of these texts remains embarrassingly low. One suspects that their interest in such books has been more for lucre than love of educating the young.

Until recently the task of explaining China to teen-agers has fallen to a random assortment of second-string cold warriors. Usually only marginally familiar with China studies, these writers pass the old perceptions of China, formed in the fifties, on to the young like a congenital disease. A sample survey of some of their work goes a long way toward explaining why so many Americans, exposed to this and similar material, still understand China in as distorted a fashion as they do.

One of the most popular paperbacks on China for the high school market, The Two Chinas, by Oliver Bell, M.A. (Oxon), published in 1962 and reissued in 1967, is advertised on its fold-out back flap as belonging to a series called the Scholastic World Affairs Multi Texts, each of which "contains everything the student needs to know about geography, history, arts, economy, government, people and international relations of one of the important areas of the world. Written from both an American and a global viewpoint, each book shows how important that area is to the future welfare and national interest of the U.S." Education unabashedly assumes the burden of preparing young Americans for the global struggle. By the time Bell begins his second chapter, "A Wide Land, a Teeming People" (must every student be taught that China's people are "teeming," that China is a "hungry," "restless," "slumbering dragon," an "anthill," or an "awakened giant"?), he has divided the world up into US and THEM. He uses adjectives such as "ruthless" constantly to score the Chinese while our humanitarianism in "restraining Chinese Communist aggression" is unfailingly writ large.

In a later chapter entitled "China's Aggressive Policies," under the subtitle, "Aggression and Expansion," Bell writes that "China has used its military power aggressively to widen its sphere of influence. From Korea in the North, to Vietnam in the South and Tibet in the West, China's armed strength has advanced the Communist cause." Such statements are made as a matter of fact, totally ignoring much recent scholarship re-evaluating China's involvement in all of these apparently incriminating conflicts. "Aggression," like so many other terms, does not seem to warrant deeper consideration and definition. What does "spreading communism" mean? Is he talking about foreign aid, espionage, invading armies, weapons sales or just the spread of ideas? He is never explicit.

Bell sees only two kinds of countries in Asia: Communist and non-Communist. There are no dictatorships, no oligarchies, no democracies, no Socialist states. The "free world" is apparently free of such ambiguities. For instance, Taiwan (the "other China") is described as "an outpost of the free world in the Pacific" in which "President Chiang Kai-shek dominates the government. He or his close advisors make all important decisions." But, "within these limitations, democratic institutions operate fairly well in Taiwan." Is he referring to the legislative Yuan (the "Republic of China's" National Assembly) whose members have not been elected since Chiang was expelled from the mainland some twenty years ago?

Bell talks about China's threat to us, but little about our threat to China. It must appear to a questioning student that China's foreign policy is either made in a vacuum or in the minds of irrational leaders. Do the Chinese have a "national interest"? Is there any reason for them to fear encirclement or attack just as we do? Bell would probably say no, for he does not entertain the notion that another nation might fear the United States as aggressive. Aggressiveness is their sickness, not ours.

Bell's discussion of the Chinese internal revolution is also incomplete, and does very little to help a student understand the dynamics of social change in a backward country. He notes that before 1949 the Nationalists had "ceased to be forward looking" and that "corruption and graft became widespread. The Government did little to help the peasants, who remained poor and oppressed by the landlords." Such facts are presented to the student, but devoid of the revolutionary conclusions that they imply. Bell does not show the causal connection between "oppression," "graft," "corruption," and revolution. This connection is extremely important, and no revolution can be made intelligible without it. If it is missed, one ends up with Bell, explaining revolution in terms of a series of unfortunate problems "skillfully exploited" by means of propaganda by crafty Communists. The revolution sounds like a coup d'état which is the product of the Chinese Communists having "fastened their rule on China." Bell does not convey to the student the sense of absolute hopelessness and despair felt by most Chinese during and after World War II as they watched their country disintegrate under the Nationalists. Nor does he convey the sense that profound revolutionary changes (Communist or otherwise) were inevitable in China, and that legitimate grievances justified the cause of revolution in the eyes of most Chinese. The final struggle between the Communists and the Nationalists is portrayed by Bell as a kind of gamelike struggle between A and B. What is important is that we were rooting for B, not the differing social programs and interest groups represented by each side. Bell typically decries the violence (i.e., land reform and the execution of landlords) of the revolution. But he fails to show the deep institutionalized violence of the whole economic and social system which kept the Nationalists in power while millions starved each year. A revolution, which is not put into its social context where the antagonists are shown to represent different social classes and different social visions, must seem pointless and wasteful to a student trying to understand it. He must indeed be perplexed by the ardor and commitment with which millions of people struggled to death against their own countrymen.

Bell concludes with a few lines apparently designed to relieve the consciences of any students still troubled by our hostile relationship with the Chinese:

> It is tragic that the triumph of communism in China should have caused that great nation and the U.S. to become enemies. We have had a long history of friendly relations. The American people sympathize with the Chinese people's desire for a better way of life, and in other circumstances would gladly have helped them attain it. . . .

Perry Chang of the Economics Department of Northern Illinois University has written a booklet called China: Development by Force for Curriculum Resources Inc., and published by Scott, Foresman. Although he is Chinese, he views China very much through the eyes of a Westerner for whom "economic development" is the only really important criterion of national development. He measures the success and failure of Communist China by the familiar standards used to judge the health of Western capitalist countries, namely, per capita income and consumption. He laments the fact that in modern China, investment capital created by "forced savings" is accumulated at the expense of consumption and personal freedom. But how else could a nation as backward and decimated by war as China was in 1949 accumulate investment capital? Chang uses Taiwan as an alternative and more successful model. Investment capital came primarily from U.S. aid. And the United States is not about to set up an AID office in Peking. Although Chang admits that forced saving ". . . is a desperate method reserved only for a poor country that cannot raise capital from other sources," the fact that China is poor and has no real alternative does not lead him to put the issue of Communist Chinese forced savings in a more sympathetic light.

But there is a deeper and more serious blindness in Chang's kind of analysis. Economics are of course an extremely important part of the whole Chinese revolution. But social development plays an equally important part in Mao's vision of a revolutionary society. In the simplest terms this means the destruction of class lines and social inequalities. It means organic social change, the destruction of all traditionally oppressive social relationships such as those between landlord-peasant, father-son, man-wife, city worker-country farmer, gentry-common man and educated-uneducated. It also means the destruction of traditional values such as the veneration of the past and the aged instead of the new and the young, the quest for harmony and tranquillity rather than struggle and change, and respect for leisure rather than manual labor. These goals are all just as vital to Mao as increasing GNP, upping the growth rate or per capita consumption. While they are also prerequisites for economic development, Mao sees them as good and necessary in themselves. Unless a student is able to evaluate as goals in themselves the collectivization, communization or the hsia-fang movement (in which city people were sent into the countryside to work, where no doubt they were not always paradigms of competence), much of the Chinese revolution will not make sense.

China is not the United States nor is it trying to be like the United States. Mao does not share the visions, social and economic, of Richard Nixon and Lyndon Johnson. If we want to help students understand how the Chinese see themselves and the world, Chinese development must be examined in terms of Chinese goals and values. Only through understanding Maoist theory from the inside can we expect to find logic and reason in events as seemingly irrational to Americans as the Great Leap Forward and the Proletarian Cultural Revolution.

A third booklet, The Chinese Dilemma, funded by a Ford Foundation grant to the Foreign Relations Project, is part of a series of "experimental" units put out by a Midwestern group called the North Central Association of Colleges and Secondary Schools. The author, John Armstrong, who has worked in Burma and Indonesia with a Johns Hopkins teaching group in the 1950s, and who has "traveled widely through Southeast Asia, Europe and Central America," would seem qualified to be writing on China. His title, The Chinese Dilemma, bespeaks the kind of cold-war Weltanschauung which informs the entire work. From his point of view, the impasse between the United States and China is seen simply as the product of unexplained Chinese belligerence; we have done little to deserve such opposition; there is no dilemma at home, only in China. China is portrayed as a crazed, hostile, aggressive, immature child driving its mature, reasonable, law-abiding humanitarian parent (the United States) to the end of its patience. Like exasperated parents who refuse to acknowledge their own involvement in their problem child's behavior, Armstrong absolves the United States of almost all responsibility in the historical formation of China's hostility to us.

He talks of "Chinese pride" and how the Chinese were "subject to political and social humiliation at the hands of the West. . . ." And yet these considerations figure little in his final analysis of the struggle going on between the United States and China today. For instance, he makes no mention of how the West brought opium to China in the 19th century against Chinese protestations in a successful attempt to create a favorable balance of trade. He calls the Opium Wars (1938-42) the "First Anglo-Chinese War." This convenient evasion of facts about the introduction of opium into China would sting the pride of almost any Chinese, especially since China lost that war and every other war with the West since.

There is a failure here to see history through Chinese eyes. The Chinese have historically held an animosity for the West, but they have lacked the power and self-confidence to demonstrate it visibly. And thus it is assumed that the Chinese were "friends of America" until the Communists destroyed all that in 1949. There is an unexplained gap between the good old days of Sino-American friendship and present times when China is ruled by an " 'American hating Chinese dictatorship' which is stirring up trouble around Red China's borders [with] . . . communist methods of subversion . . . too well known to warrant discussion here."

I am sure bright students must wonder: why all this hate? Why all the strident talk directed against the United States and imperialism? Are the Chinese crazy? Armstrong provides few answers. He does not allow history to be used as a framework for the present. He attaches little significance, for example, to the fact that men like Mao Tse-tung have spent their whole lives fighting foreigners or governments backed by foreigners. Armstrong's explanation of Chinese antagonism is sophomoric: "ruthless inspired leadership transformed a battered and disheartened people by means of propaganda, persuasion, and force, into a vigorous and dedicated engine that did the bidding of its masters." One wonders why Chiang Kai-shek, try as he might, could not do the same.

Similarly, Armstrong's approach to China's social revolution, like Bell's, is ahistorical. The terrible misery of the Chinese peasant is mentioned, but not used to explain why so many people in the countryside supported land reform and the Communists when they came. Armstrong talks of the replacement of one government by another. He makes Mao and his coterie of Yenan comrades indistinguishable from a Latin American military junta. But what of the transformation of a whole society? The social dynamics of the Chinese revolution have been overlooked. The Chinese are portrayed as violating and ignoring their interests rather than fulfilling them.

All three of these books have a problem in common which seems typical of the treatment of China in general at the high school level. China's place in the world is not explored in a dialectical fashion. Students do not get the very important message that in studying China, we are also studying ourselves; that much of what China has professed or done has been in reaction to what we have professed or done. The United States and China are locked into a circle of action and reaction, and neither side is intelligible without the other. Our bogy man is communism: their bogy man is imperialism. We each end up afraid of the other out of all proportion to the threat actually posed. Neither side understands why it is felt to be a threat to the other, and thus actions or reactions on both sides seem all the more irrational and menacing.

But there is no reason why high school education need continue reinforcing this doomed cycle. A new generation of Asian scholars (many of them motivated by concern over the war in Vietnam) are beginning to teach and write. It is true that there is probably nothing that can be done to effect a radical change in the ideas of the present U.S.-China establishment. But one need not despair. Like China's greatest contemporary writer, Lu Hsün, in the 1920s long after he had given up hope that the older generation (his own) could save his confused country, one can cry out, "save the children!"

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

With The Lost Man (originally Odd Man Out) following upon Up Tight (originally The Informer) one may hazard the emergence of a trend to transpose the conditions of the Irish struggle for independence into those of black militancy. One can understand why film makers are attracted by this notion: the parallels work out in a rough sort of way, and the IRA generated some first-class drama that can be given an exhilarating rebirth in the American ghettos. I'm not sure, though, that it should go on much longer. Popular theatre does not operate in a social vacuum, and tensions are already sufficiently high without encouraging a general supposition that the blacks are forming themselves into a national underground army for the purposes of terrorism and the eventual seizure of power. The goal of the IRA was to drive the British from Ireland: how far do we want to press that parallel for the purpose of entertainment?

As might be expected from their respective origins and makers, The Lost Man contains considerably less black power rhetoric than did Up Tight. The Informer was a tragedy about the revolution; Odd Man Out was a melodrama with the revolution as background. Jules Dassin is a more intensely social-minded director than Robert Alan Aurthur, and Julian Mayfield, star of Up Tight, is close to the movement, whereas, as far as I know, Sidney Poitier, star of The Lost Man, is not.

Indeed, the latter film should, and I hope will, be taken as simply a superb amusement, relying on one of the screen's most skillful of suspense plots and contributing fine performances by Poitier, most particularly by Al Freeman, Jr., as his reluctant henchman (he believes in protest and confrontation, not in heisting payrolls for the "cause") and a generally compelling cast. The acting level is far superior to that of Up Tight; comparisons at a distance are tricky, but The Lost Man is probably at least as well performed as Odd Man Out. However, its color photography is not in the same class with Carol Reed's black and white.

In all, very refreshing entertainment—as long as people don't take it into their heads that there exists an "organization" on whose behalf Negroes of high moral purpose are prepared to rob and kill. Incidentally, I suspect that the black militants will not be happy about the interracial relationship played by Poitier and Joanna Shimkus, though it is moving and done with great dignity.

For The Wild Bunch, Sam Peckinpah has rediscovered something that I suspect was known to the Elizabethans: if you carry violence far enough, the audience will laugh. In this most expansive, and indeed most artful, eye-filling and mind-boggling of Westerns, men, women and children die in hecatombs; not once but twice a whole town is wiped out; the slaughter is utterly indiscriminate, a handful of desperadoes on either side cutting down the population to get at one another. The director has also picked up, possibly from Bonnie and Clyde, the device of showing the actual instant of annihilation in slow motion, so that scenes of hysterical activity are constantly punctuated by floating, dreamlike vignettes of death. And finally, he has decided, on what medical authority I do not know, that when hit by a bullet the human body bursts like a ripe melon.

At all this the audience laughed (and so did I), not with merriment, exactly, but in tribute to such virtuosity of gore. Any excess is a kind of joke. I know what moral indignation I should express at this unrestrained violence—the words almost write themselves—but in fact I don't feel that way. It may well be that Peckinpah is making a point on "our" side—saying that it is no good showing the likes of the American public an orderly duel or rationally limited casualties, that America is the new Rome and its arenas must be red to the brim. I did think, though, that the outrage displayed by the Yankee outlaws of the film at the cruelty of some Mexican revolutionary irregulars was misplaced. I shared their revulsion but thought they were hardly the ones to express it. The real moral offense of the picture is the implication that an Anglo-Saxon, no matter how wolfish, is a model of compassion when compared to a Mex. The Wild West is a historical amusement, but racism is not.

For the rest, The Wild Bunch is superb scenery, splendid riding, ingenious and reasonably plausible criminality, involving outlaws, bounty hunters, Mexican villages and their ravening exploiters, the intercontinental railroad and the U.S. Army. A picturesque cast is led by William Holden, Ernest Borgnine and Robert Ryan. American movies, when they deal with rough life in the range country can look marvelous—the detail authentic, the performers incredibly adept, the dialogue crisp (and now with the new tolerance they can even talk more like ruffians than like scout leaders). Of course, this kind of film has almost no content, only incident, but that is true also of ballet. Like any well-designed Western, The Wild Bunch is the choreography of our most persistent legend.

Except that its promoters have found in the reviews some enticing quotes, I would not mention The Boys of Paul Street. It is such a terrible film that it seems almost unfair to pan it. A cast of English boys, directed by Zoltan Fabri, who evidently has no idea of how boys look or sound, is set to staging a mock war in a Budapest lumberyard around 1900. The story (incredibly attributed to a novel by Ferenc Molnar) is mawkish and self-righteous; the acting is stupefying (children miserably aping their elders); the dialogue can scarcely be uttered by human mouths. The Boys of Paul Street is being pushed as an anti-war film: it is an anti-audience film.

GLENVILLE SHOOT-OUT (Continued from page 45)

righteousness toward those attempting to put pressure on the county prosecutor rings hollow.

Judge McMonagle said to Evans after the conviction: "Now if it can be said there was any defense that you presented or interposed as far as this case is concerned, it was that you did not agree with our laws, and apparently you were not bound by them. . . ." He charged that Evans had "caused really a dreadful and awesome state actually to exist in our community and nation. You know, actually before we had this Glenville incident, that has been adjudicated as caused really by you, there was never any open display of firearms by youngsters. Now boys of the same age as your followers and who are, however, college students, now feel that apparently it is the proper thing to do and the legal thing to do, to have a show of rifles, shotguns and bandoliers; basically these children are really emulating the example you set as part of the incident which is now coming to a conclusion."

Evans, who did not testify, said to the court: "This will not end by the means that have been used today against the black men who are willing, who are able, who are strong enough to stand up. The electric chair or fear of anything won't stop the black men of today." He said that he was not a murderer, adding, however: "I want it fully understood by all the men that I have known and all the people whom I have associated with, that they are on the right path; because when you are on the right path to righteousness in a world such as we now live in, you are bound to run into opposition, the likes of this."

The Civil Violence Center report concluded that the Glenville battle may have "marked the beginning of a new pattern" away from black violence against property to "violence aimed at personal injury." Its failure, however, to put the same test to the motivations and actions of white policemen at the outset of the conflict opens the report to criticisms of reaching the conclusions it set out to find, if not of succumbing to a racist view of violence. This is suggested by its failure to examine the implications of escalating white violence, despite gory accounts of it in the report. The desire to measure the rise of black violence may produce a self-fulfilling theory as each new black-white confrontation is tested by the question, "Is this an escalation of the black revolution?" Black violence may escalate, and if it does one may be sure that the state and the courts will not condone it. But with the results of the Ahmed Evans case before us, one cannot be so sure of the same opposition to white violence.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

To be a collector of Western art at the Kennedy Galleries does not mean you have to have a taste for Renaissance bronzes, Dutch genre painting, or English landscapes. Here Western art means cowboys and/or Indians on the plains and mountains of the American West in the 19th century. The gallery specializes in the art of the West so defined. With the present amplification of American art history, until recently fragmentary and amateur, Western Scene art has become of increasing interest. It is one of several styles, parallel or tangential to the received outline of recent art history. It is already very expensive, as high in price as Abstract Expressionism, sometimes higher.

Western Scene art is far more extensive than has been generally noticed. There are broadly three main phases: the first, somewhat tentative, exploratory phase treats the Indians in terms of exotic documentary. One of the artists is George Heriot, who described his subject as "the habits of savage life"; another is George Catlin (the best of all the Western artists) who said of the Indians: "they are a dying nation who have no historians." (Both quotations are from the "Kennedy Quarterly," an essayistic catalogue published by the gallery.) Heriot's scenes have links back to the Baroque fantasizing of 18th-century anthropological illustrations (which lagged far behind the literary description of alien societies). Catlin changed this, not so much by his power of formal invention as by the weight of his sympathetic sense of fact.

The second and main phase of sophisticated genre scenes and sublime landscape views belongs historically to the second half of the 19th century. It extends into the 20th century, until about World War I. A theme of great interest in this phase, well shown in the present exhibition, is the annexation of European modes and their transformation here. Probably the best Western Scene painter of this phase is Albert Bierstadt who revised the forest and mountain imagery of German romantic landscape to depict the other West. Arthur Fitzwilliam Tait, one of the artists who provided Currier and Ives with raw material, in the form of paintings, translated the iconography of British sporting art into the new environment: red skins take the place of red hunting coats in his episodes of ambush, chase and death.

The total of such modifications of European art amounted to a major shift. Changes in the thing contained (the subject) gradually altered the form of the container (the work of art). Thus a painting like Frederic Remington's "Comanche Brave. Fort Reno, Indian Territory," 1888, a profile portrait of a rider, is Americanized by its forthright detailing of native gear, its well-observed non-European riding posture, and by its pervasive, but non-impressionistic (i.e., non-experimental) plein-airism.

Western Scene art was international, not only because of its borrowings but in the use made of its subjects by European artists. For example, Paul Troubetskoy, a Russian sculptor in Paris, turned Don Quixote into cowboys, and another sculptor Carl Dauba, cast many of his spiky bronze Indian equestrians in Vienna. Those artists who can be described unequivocally as American, such as Cyrus E. Dollin, maintained some European traces: the form of his Noble Savage sculptures, for instance, have the placidity of overweight neo-classicism.

As European genre was stretched to cover American subjects two things happened: the choice of subjects became increasingly topical and contemporaneous and their treatment ever more dramatic and spectacular. In Europe, genre painting, even when devoted to scenes of military action, tended to remain within the bounds of fine art. (Battle art had precedents going back at least to 16th-century Venetian ceiling paintings.) In America not only did many painters work for magazines but their paintings were partially shaped by the popular iconography of the works done for mass reproduction. Thus Charles Russell's "Indian Maiden" is as much pin-up as symbol, despite an iconographical hint traceable back to Delacroix's personifications of Greece and, perhaps, Liberty. Minor artists like Jules Tavernier and Charles Graham did not fundamentally differentiate the stylistics of their paintings from that of their illustrations for Harper's Weekly. American artists achieved easily the "modernity" that Baudelaire conferred on Constantine Guys, that ability to combine topical sensibility with a humanistic fund of knowledge.

The overlapping of fine art and popular culture is a recurrent feature of American art. The early 20th-century Ash Can school, for example, as grittily urban as the Western Scene artists were frontier-conscious, depended largely on painters with experience as newspaper illustrators. Social protest themes of the 1930s are common to (public) murals and (public) graphics, as well as to the traditionally more personal, more restricted form of easel painting. American Pop art, more than most of its European forms, has benefited from contacts between fine art and popular culture, in this case with comics, advertisements and pin-ups serving as the artists' subjects.

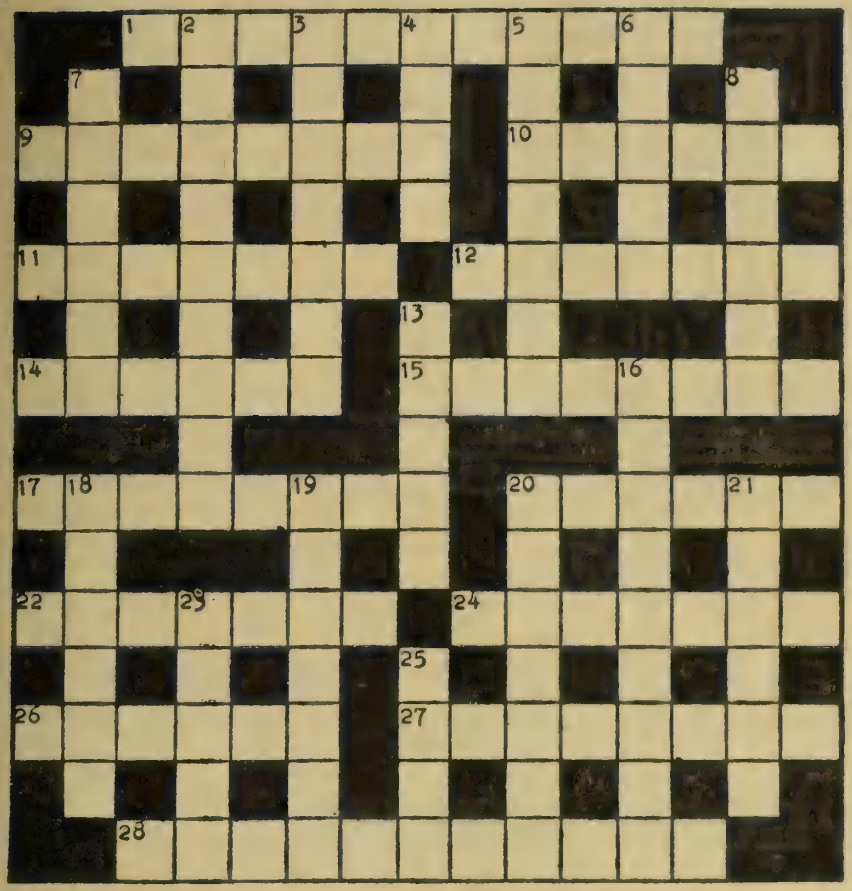
A fair quantity of contemporary Western Scene art and pieces of this third phase is presented by the Kennedy Galleries on equal terms with work of the two earlier phases. In a way, why not? They are the same, except for their flashy virtuosity and labored nostalgia. The weakness of the new work is its dependence on the second phase as classic. As a result, there is in the new work a degree of revivalism that approaches ghost-writing in its abject effacement of original sensibility. The artists are all in reservations now and we know what that does to a man.

The iconography of the great, ebullient second phase has not been lost, but it must be sought in another medium, the movies. (I understand movies to include, in this context, TV Westerns which are, of course, always filmed.) The easy exchange between fine art and pop culture, as it developed through the 19th century, has ceased to be a two-way function in Western Scene art. It was still working before World War I, however, when Charles Russell's paintings and Thomas H. Ince's movies were contemporaneous. Their coexistence prepares us for the fact that the present inheritors of Bierstadt and Remington, Alfred Jacob Miller and Paul Kane, are John Ford and Delmer Daves, Budd Boetticher and Sergio Leone, movie directors and not painters and sculptors at all.

SUBLET WANTED

PROFESSOR and wife need furnished 4-room sublet for year from July or August. Manhattan or Brooklyn. Call 486-1446.

SERVICES



MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 7-14-69
[illegible] 20th Ave., New York 10011
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1306

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Giving out affection, in a spirit of co-operation? (4-2-5)
9 Show up? Quite the opposite to indicate something less than enthusiasm. (4,4)
10 Evidently not a single shot fired! (6)
11 Naturally they aren't liked, being dust-gatherers commonly. (7)
12 Shield. (7)
14 Built like a bird behind! (6)
15 One might make such a pan hot in response. (8)
17 The fabric you pick out might be significant. (8)
20 Tipped—with money, of course! (6)
22 Within range of vision or understanding? (7)
24 Caught slumped around the pole? (7)
26 One ointment about as backward as another! (6)
27 What an Italian road sign might say with a complaint descriptive of 26. (8)
28 What Friday's marketplace might have is somewhat apart from the rest. (11)

DOWN

2 This might be a military order to turn back, in time. (2,3,4)
3 Act purposefully, else a person might stand at the entrance. (7)
4 See 25 down
5 Animal always allowed outside? (7)
6 Certainly not a lady's man! (5)
7 Staple and fold with them? (6)
8 Sound on sound, in three choruses. (6)
13 See 25 down
16 Sips lager brewed for those in a reflective mood? (4,5)
18 Flower book, probably dated. (6)
19 Certainly not like 3, with no way to get in. (7)
20 The quarterback might, with the worker on holiday. (4,3)
21 Some medicines are, to quote yours truly in retrospect. (6)
23 The fashionable crowd, perhaps, include just a small picture within the framework. (5)
25, 4 and 13 down Roman writer with a number of stories, according to sound method of punishment. (3-1-4-5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1305

ACROSS: 1 Disconsolate; 10 Politic; 11 Martini; 12 Surer; 13 Sackville; 14 Redactions; 16 Oder; 19 Part; 23 Invention; 25 Ovoid; 26 Extract; 27 Iberian; 28 Resurrecting. DOWN: 2 Ill-bred; 3 Cataract; 4 Necessity; 5 Osmic; 6 Arrive; 7 Enisled; 8 Apostrophized; 9 Vice president; 15 Not on time; 17 and 20 Innocent bystanders; 19 Riveter; 21 Emotion; 22 Sneaks; 24 Inter.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

PUBLICATIONS

WHAT HATH GOD WROUGHT? Learn little-known facts about religions and psychology. Sample lesson free, no obligation. Box 181, North Madison, Ohio 44057.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

POWER OF THE PENTAGON! Read the 58-page "Congressional Conference on Military Budget and National Priorities" report in the June Progressive. $1. postpaid. Box 181, North Madison, Ohio 44057.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Opening this fall. Grades 10-11, boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational but seriously Christian related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

SUMMERHILL CAMP AND SCHOOL. Freedom with responsibility, learning because its exciting, not compulsory. Summer program: reading, math, nature, swimming, riding, camping, art, music, drama, group discussions. OPEN COMMUNITY SCHOOL, Box 5N, Claverack, N.Y. 12513.

PERSONALS

MEET YOUR IDEAL MATE. Computerized Dating Service (All Ages). "Let TEAM Make You a Team". For FREE questionnaire write: TEAM Project, 245 E. 30th St., New York, N.Y. 10016

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

WHOSE LAW and WHOSE ORDER?

Civil disobedience is the political tool of the 20th century for the American protest movement. Tired of the slow and discouraging pace of "normal channels," dissenters have risked their personal safety and security to dramatize their point of view and disrupt "the machine." But what is the meaning and relevance of civil disobedience today?

CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE: THEORY & PRACTICE, edited by Hugo Adam Bedau, attempts to clarify these questions. In a series of essays, many of them important documents of the civil rights and anti-war movements, the theory and practice of civil disobedience are explored. Represented here are critics and advocates of civil disobedience, philosophical and political thinkers, liberal and radical practitioners.

To receive this enlightening exploration of a critical issue of our time, subscribe now to The NATION. We will send you CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE: THEORY & PRACTICE as a gift for every new one-year subscription. Join us today.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me CIVIL DISOBEDIENCE: THEORY & PRACTICE, edited by Hugo Adam Bedau.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign.)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 7-14

BURLINGAME
JUL 26 1969
LIBRARY

THE NATION

JULY 28, 1969 35 cents

S-7[illegible] PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

The Disney Imperative

WESLEY MARX

New Politics
More Mood Than Movement

JACK NEWFIELD

OUT TO GET THE PANTHERS

L. F. PALMER, JR.

David Joravsky on Kremlinology

LETTERS

ambassador in error

Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIRS: The article on Brazil by Dom Bonafede in your May 26 issue ["Blunder in Brazil: Washington Backs the Pooh Bahs"] contains a number of historical errors which call for correction. . . .

The charge that the U.S. armed forces "acted as counsel and banker" to the Brazilian armed forces when they deposed Joao Goulart in 1964 has no foundation whatsoever. As I testified in Senate hearings in 1966, that action was a purely Brazilian affair. We not only did not instigate it but were unaware of a serious movement to that end until a few days before it happened. . . .

I did welcome the revolution when it took place because the speeches and actions of Goulart over the previous nine months, and especially from March 13 through March 30, 1964, made it crystal clear that he was embarked on an effort to establish a Populist dictatorship of his own, in the pattern of his mentor Getúlio Vargas three decades earlier. I did then believe, and still believe, that success by Goulart in his campaign might well have led to a subsequent Communist capture of power, because of Goulart's own weakness. . . .

The charge that I later became a "virtual viceroy" to President Castelo Branco and "was consulted at every turn" is equally unfounded. My relations with Castelo Branco were cordial and friendly, but he consulted me less than President Kennedy consulted David Ormsby-Gore in Washington. Our AID mission and I did indeed consult extensively and frequently with Planning Minister Roberto Campos and Finance Minister Octavio Bulhoes. . . .

The most extraordinary assertion in Mr. Bonafede's article is that the Fifth Institutional Act of December 13, 1968, and the subsequent extremely arbitrary actions of the present regime, were "inevitable." They were no more "inevitable" than the resignation of President Quadros in 1961, the clash between Castelo Branco and Carlos Lacerda, and many other critical events in Brazilian political history. When I wrote hopefully in July 1967 of prospects for constitutional democracy, it was because much evidence then pointed to the taking root of the 1967 constitution . . . with effective guarantees of press freedom and of individual civil liberties. I turned out to be wrong. . . .

The real tragedy, which goes back to late 1964, is that neither Castelo Branco nor President Costa e Silva made use of the opportunity to build a new political infrastructure for Brazilian representative government on a more stable basis than the three increasingly obsolete and irrelevant political parties that dominated the scene from 1946 to 1964. From early 1965 on, I tried, as a friendly outside observer, to make this point with President Castelo Branco and his associates. . . . It is a true measure of how little a "viceroy" I was that these efforts made no headway.

Lincoln Gordon

Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIRS: It seems that when on the defensive, Mr. Gordon resorts to the blunderbuss technique of claiming "historical error" on the part of his critics, as he did in response to my article in The Nation, and earlier to The New York Times editorial to which I made reference.

However, in a glaring oversight he fails to support his charge against the thesis of my article with substantive evidence. In no instance does he even attempt to cite one error of fact. Instead, he makes an impassioned argument in defense of his ambassadorial role during the 1964 Brazilian revolution. Yet he demolishes the appeal with his own words.

As a case in point, he denies being in on the ground

(Continued on page 83)

EDITORIALS

What Price Moondust?

There is cause for genuine admiration, even awe, at what the Apollo program has accomplished. At this writing, the spacecraft is on its way, and there is reasonable expectation that the rest of the trip will be accomplished on schedule. After the tragic failure in January of 1967, American engineering talent took hold, and the most complex machine ever conceived by man has performed almost faultlessly on every test. The courage and self-control of the astronauts is to be applauded; there may even be some unforeseen benefit to mankind in what they bring back from the moon, but even the most unsurprising results will serve to extend human knowledge of the universe.

But knowledge of another type could be gained from the undertaking: knowledge of ourselves. Our national response to the first Sputnik has astonished the world—including, probably, the Russians. Its appearance in the skies on October 4, 1957, triggered U.S. production of adrenalin to a new record. Not Pearl Harbor, nor Sen. Joseph McCarthy's discovery of the Communist conspiracy, had caused the collective American pulse to pound at such a rate. Had a five-pointed Red Star, in place of the moon, been seen in the heavens the following night, our national panic could not have been greater. The event was subsequently alluded to in NASA's public relations pronouncements as a "disaster," creating a "national emergency." Webb's Magical Flying Circus was off the ground from then on.

Had there been no Soviet satellite in 1957, Americans would not by now be reaching for the moon. Our whole space program has been fuelled by the U.S. reaction to the first and subsequent Russian exploits. A predictable, almost Pavlovian reflex has developed; the Russians and the world have learned much, in the process, of what makes us tick. Have we learned as much about ourselves? Over the past twelve years, we have successively been challenged, enraged and spurred into action—and have demonstrated to all our courage, strength, speed, ingenuity and technical skill.

The Russians' role in the lunar rivalry may perhaps have been as reflexively competitive as our own, or it may have been more sophisticated and more subtly motivated. But with Luna 15, which was threatening at the last possible moment to beat us to the moondust strike (at a small fraction of the cost and risk), Pavlov's bell rang once more. The saliva has already started to flow. Mr. Agnew has urged, as a new objective, a landing on Mars. And Thomas O. Paine, who succeeded James Webb as head of NASA, indicates his approval. It was Paine who, after the successful return of the Apollo 8 astronauts, defended NASA's budget by saying that the technology involved would be helpful in "winning" the next war, a comment that somewhat tarnishes the "Space Olympics" image of the moon race, and a further reason for greeting the agency's annual budget demands with more than legislative huzzahs.

NASA has spent a total of $50 billion since the start, half of which has gone toward the Apollo program. Much has been quite rightly said about the irony of spending billions getting to the moon while the mass of humanity at home lives in a stew of exploding population, poverty and pollution. But all that will be but as a pinprick in our hide, should we seriously decide to strike out for the planets. They are more than a hundred times more remote than the moon in distance, in time, in economic and human cost. The time of decision is here, and the euphoria of the moment—however understandable it may be—must not be allowed to obscure our judgment.

The ABM Debauch

Before much was said about the ABM in the Senate, the public debate was conducted on a fairly high level. It involved technical questions, such as the workability of the proposed system, and questions of foreign policy: would deployment enhance or diminish the chances of reaching an arms-limitation agreement with the Soviet Union? When the issue reached the Senate floor, the usual thing happened—the debate plunged from intellectual responsibility into a political debauch, with the Nixon Administration and the military-industrial complex bidding for the votes of the uncommitted Senators, and some of the latter holding out for the best price they could get in the way of tangible benefits for important interests in their respective states, and the promotion of their own political interests.

It is a natural and perhaps inevitable descent. The technical questions are intricate, and few members of Congress possess the background necessary to differentiate between heuristic arguments and those based on objective engineering analysis. Such matters are alien to their temperaments and remote from their experience. Nor are the majority of Senators and Representatives any more inclined to take a statesmanlike view of the great political questions that the country faces at home and abroad. To a man, they esteem themselves as patriots, but nothing is easier for a politician than to identify his own interests with those of the country—especially when the latter involve the dilemmas posed by 20th-century technology in the service of 19th-century traditions and institutions.

What the ordinary Congressman does understand is power politics, whether in the international arena or in the give-and-take of the legislative process. Getting himself re-elected, and increasing his influence among his colleagues, are the objectives closest to his heart. Thus the story by John Finney in the July 16 New York Times, "ABM Debate Is Becoming a Political Struggle for the Votes of 3 or 4 Senators," though it makes depressing reading, does not come as a surprise. Technical, military and diplomatic arguments may play some part, but such issues as oil drilling in Alaska, a nuclear rocket for New Mexico, a supersonic transport for the state of Washington, a Naval shipyard in Maine, become the preoccupying considerations. And so do promises and pressures known

IN THIS ISSUE

July 28, 1969

EDITORIALS
66

ARTICLES

70 New Politics: More Mood Than Movement — Jack Newfield

73 Latin America: Challenge from the Intellectuals — Manuel Maldonado-Denis

76 The Disney Imperative — Wesley Marx

78 Out To Get the Panthers — L. F. Palmer, Jr.

82 Harry Golden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

84 Kremlinology: Power and Terror — David Joravsky
86 The Poetry of Earth — Armand Schwerner
87 Los Angeles' Golden Goose — Anne Strick
88 Accident (poem) — William Pillin
89 Book Marks — Sara Blackburn
90 Theatre — Harold Clurman
92 Art — Lawrence Alloway
92 The Poor Man Moves Through Washington, D.C.: Spring 1968 (poem) — Eugene Ruggles
93 Music — David Hamilton

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 209
No. 3

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During the summer, The Nation will not appear on the following dates: July 21, August 4, August 18.

only to those concerned. Finney puts it as a "common presumption" that Sen. John G. Tower of Texas, the chairman of the Senate Republican Campaign Committee, was instrumental in shifting the vote of Sen. Winston L. Prouty, Vermont Republican, into the pro-ABM column, when it had been widely expected that he would line up with his senior colleague, Sen. George D. Aiken, one of the ABM's principal opponents.

Or take the case of a New Englander on the other side of the aisle, Sen. Thomas J. McIntyre of New Hampshire, who at this writing is one of the uncommitted. He is the author of a proposed compromise plan under which radar and computers, but not missiles, would be installed at the initial two Safeguard sites. This is a one-sided compromise: one can be pretty sure that the missiles would follow, but since the Administration is obdurate on passage of the complete system, the partial installation satisfies no one and the amendment is expected to lose. Senator McIntyre's inclinations are believed to be against deployment, but he has his worries. One is the pro-ABM Manchester Union Leader, the largest (and most venomous) newspaper in New Hampshire. Then Mr. McIntyre is understandably reluctant to lock horns with Sen. John C. Stennis, who is chairman of the Armed Services Committee, of which Mr. McIntyre is a junior member. Nor can he afford to antagonize the Defense Department, which wants to close the Portsmouth Naval Shipyard.

Yet the vote on the ABM is expected to be close and, as Mr. Aiken pointed out, if the Administration prevails it might be a Pyrrhic victory, since the opposition will have shown formidable strength. As always, Sen. John Sherman Cooper has been a leader on the side of reason. Such men are not invited to the White House and subjected to the Presidential blandishments; it would be a waste of time all around. Frank Church of Idaho is another of this stalwart band. The ABM controversy elicited from Church a brilliant speech on foreign policy which was released July 11 and seems to have produced hardly a ripple of interest in the press.

Mr. Church points out that regardless of the outcome of the ABM debate, our military budget will not shrink significantly as long as our foreign commitments remain at the present level and there is no determined opposition to a policy abroad that rests upon the premise that we must be ever ready not only to repel an attack but to engage in as many as three foreign wars simultaneously. "If we can but liberate ourselves from ideological obsession," Church says, "from the automatic association of social revolution with communism and of communism with Soviet or Chinese power, we may find it possible to discriminate among disorders in the world and to evaluate them with greater objectivity, which is to say, more on the basis of their own content and less on the basis of our own fears." Such observations serve to remind us that the degradation of politics is by no means universal and that men of intellect and enlightened judgment do manage to get into Congress—and sometimes to stay there.

The Indicted Diplomat

David Dellinger has organized numerous demonstrations against the Vietnamese War and is under indictment in Chicago on charges arising out of the clashes during the Democratic National Convention last August. More recently he has been functioning as the American negotiator for the release of three U.S. fliers, offered by the North Vietnamese (not without ulterior motives) to assist in the celebration of the American Independence Day. In these negotiations Mr. Dellinger is in effect representing the State Department, which made it clear to the U.S. Attorney in Chicago and the federal judge having jurisdiction that the travel restrictions imposed by the indictment should be lifted to enable Dellinger to fly to Paris.

On July 8 the State Department confirmed that Dellinger had arrived in Paris to confer with North Vietnamese officials about the release of the prisoners. Dellinger returned to the United States on July 12 and told reporters at Kennedy International Airport that a team of negotiators, of the same persuasion as himself, would leave shortly for North Vietnam to bring the men back. He added that he had assurances that the U.S. Army would not "intercept" the released prisoners after they left Hanoi (see "The Petty Route Home" by Howard Zinn, The Nation, April 1, 1968) and that the arrangements precluded their assignment to further war activities against North Vietnam.

Of course Mr. Dellinger did not act officially on behalf of the U.S. Government. He went to Paris in his capacity as chairman of the National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam. The North Vietnamese had requested that a delegation representing the American peace movement be sent to arrange for the repatriation of the prisoners. The State Department had no choice but to comply or leave itself open to the accusation that it had refused to cooperate in the freeing of the men. Thus it came about that an arch-peacenik was empowered to conduct the talks instead of Ambassador Henry Cabot Lodge, who is not having conspicuous success in the broader task of negotiating an end to the war.

These odd, though not unprecedented, negotiations throw still another revealing light on the political schizophrenia of the Nixon Administration. A few days before Mr. Dellinger flew to Paris, our fatuous Vice President rebuked U.S. critics of the Vietnamese War for allegedly "undermining our negotiations for peace and prolonging the war." It is not enough that those who warned successive administrations against the course that led us into the quagmire should be ignored—now it is they who are prolonging the war! Yet in the Dellinger matter it is most unlikely that the State Department acted without Presidential approval. If so, one of the principal peace activists was assigned by the Nixon Administration to a mission that could not be handled effectively in any other way. Evidently these people have their uses. And where does that leave Mr. Agnew?

'Security' in HEW

The Department of Health, Education and Welfare clings to a security system so redolent of the Joe McCarthy era that it sometimes bars from its consultative committees scientists who are serving the Department of Defense in the same capacity. An investigation conducted under the direction of Bryce Nelson and reported in the June 27 issue of Science implies that HEW is perhaps the most hagridden of the Executive departments—and with the least excuse. The magazine found that several professors who were serving on high-level Defense Department or National Science Foundation advisory panels were not "clearable" by HEW.

That such HEW organizations as the National Institutes of Health or the National Institute of Mental Health should be so afflicted, and should continue to spread their contagions among the country's physicians, psychologists and life scientists, is surely a matter warranting the early attention of Secretary Robert Finch himself. What he says—and more, what he does—will go far toward enabling the scientific community to gauge his ultimate stand in the political conflicts raging within the Nixon Administration, and to make their organizational and personal decisions accordingly.

While HEW has some 100,000 staff employees, Science was not concerned with these. Its investigation was limited to the advisory groups, which draw on outside scientists for counsel. These groups are largely composed of scientists not employed by the government. They are customarily recruited for a few days a year at a fee of, usually, $50 a day plus expenses, practically always on nonsensitive, nonsecurity matters. Why such people should be so rigidly screened is understandable only on the hypothesis that since it is not a defense agency, HEW is so harried by fear of Congressional budget cuts, in reprisal for refusal to continue zealous engagement in the witch hunt, that it will do almost anything to avoid suspicion.

But this defensive posture entails two consequences which should concern Secretary Finch and his top subordinates. One is that debarments on "security" or "suitability" grounds may deprive the department of assistance from the men best qualified. The other effect concerns the scientists themselves. "If you haven't been asked to be on one of these groups," one scientist noted, "it looks as if you haven't made it in your field."

When questioned by Science, Secretary Finch said that he was "looking into" the matter of security and suitability checks for HEW advisory groups. But he must do more than look; if he does not act, inertia will continue to rule in the lower reaches of the bureaucracy. One HEW official remarked: "Most officials take the course of least resistance; we don't have enough people with guts in government." A former head of the National Institute of Mental Health feels that many people in government "run scared" all the time. They are afraid that if they protest the security system, the security people may start to wonder about them.

"Of course," Science concludes, "with some display of interest from Secretary Finch or from the White House, the whole system of security checks for part-time advisers in nonsensitive areas could be thoroughly reviewed and revised." If this were done at the initiative of the present occupant of the White House, it would be something of a miracle, but perhaps Mr. Finch can steer one of Mr. Nixon's zigzags in the right direction.

The Loss of Mboya

A few weeks after the murder of Tom Mboya on a street in Nairobi, world opinion seems to be gravitating to the opinion that the deed was a political assassination brought about by strains within Kenya. It is known that Mboya himself, who two years ago was fired upon by a sentry (officially declared deranged) stationed to guard his house, believed that developments in Kenya increased his personal danger. According to The New York Times, on his last trip to America he told friends here that the general elections planned by President Kenyatta for later in the year would inevitably call upon him, as secretary general of the President's party, to play a leading role, and that his enemies would be spurred to silence him. And on a plane returning to Africa, he wrote to one of these friends, saying that he had determined to hire the bodyguard his American wellwishers had been urging on him.

One thing that his foes held against him was that Mboya liked and was able to communicate with Americans. And another thing was that he had moved out of the tribal context that still thwarts African development in all the new states south of the Sahara, and stood as a leader of his nation. As the New Statesman remarked recently, the fact that he had no tribal base was at once his greatest political weakness and his greatest potential contribution to Kenya. Mboya rose to prominence in a highly contemporary manner: his support from the start came from the detribalized workers and unemployed of the cities, Nairobi and Mombasa, and he acted for them as a modern trade union politician, "educating them," the New Statesman continues, "in nationalist politics."

Tribalism is a sentiment of great emotional power—indeed emotion is the essence of its power—and Mboya may well have spurned it at the cost of his life. Whether or not that was the reason, and whether or not we ever know the reason, it is clear that Kenya, as well as the rest of Africa and indeed the international community, has suffered a loss it cannot easily overcome. Mboya was probably admired more widely than he was beloved—he never minced words over what he saw as the problems ahead, and he never tailored his words to the expectations of his audience. He wrote recently in The New York Times Magazine that whereas there were many similarities between the African and black American struggles for political and economic freedom, black Americans should not hope to find an escape for the problems still confronting them in any "back to Africa" movement, in fact or in spirit. He was a very modern man, of whom Africa has too few; and he was a very straightforward political leader, of whom the world has too few.

More Fat for the Germans

In an innocuous story (buried on the back pages of most local newspapers), the Associated Press recently indicated that West Germany would "cover" about 80 per cent of the cost of maintaining U.S. forces in Germany for the next two years, leaving but a minimal drain on the U.S. balance of payments. As its part of the bargain, West Germany will buy about $295 million in U.S. goods and services (presumably instruments of war). The agreement further provides that Bonn will lend the United States an additional $760 million per year.

And is this supposed to reimburse the American taxpayers for money spent on military forces in Germany? We spend billions in Germany on military installations, and the Germans kindly agree to lend us funds! Meanwhile the German economy becomes stronger, and the German mark among the strongest currencies in the world.

By continuing this wasteful policy, the American Government adds to the German coffers while raising taxes at home. Worst of all, borrowing abroad in order to spend abroad stimulates inflation, and Americans will pay doubly for this government folly.

The Resistance

For a long time, almost the only effective Congressional opposition to the Vietnamese War was furnished by Senators Gruening and Morse, who simply refused to approve the money. Deaf to the argument that they were letting the "boys" down, they voted "no" on the appropriation bills. They knew how fraudulent that argument was. There is always enough material in the pipe line to support combat activities, whether defensive or offensive, for an indefinite period.

Now that Gruening and Morse, to the country's loss, are no longer in the Senate, others have adopted their courageous tactic, and in far greater numbers. On July 9, forty-nine Representatives voted against the Supplemental Appropriation bill, which not only contained funds for Vietnam but increased the amount. These forty-nine cast negative votes, despite the fact that the bill provided funds for domestic purposes to which they had no objection.

The overriding objective was to show disapproval of the war in the most emphatic terms available to a member of Congress. The best people in the House are on that roll of honor: Brown, Burton and Edwards of California, Mrs. Chisholm, Conyers, Diggs, Farbstein, Kastenmeier, Ottinger, Podell, Rosenthal, Ryan, Saylor, Scheuer among them. One may hope they will be joined by a still greater number who will vote against any appropriations for the prosecution of the war, regardless of other purposes that may be served, and will explain to their constituents why they are doing so.

NEW POLITICS

More Mood Than Movement

JACK NEWFIELD
Mr. Newfield is an assistant editor of The Village Voice, New York. He is the author of A Prophetic Minority (New Amsterdam Library) and Robert Kennedy: A Memoir (Dutton).

> The new technology or the new politics—call it what you will—has arrived.
>
> —James M. Perry, The New Politics

The New Politics is becoming a huckster's phrase, invoked by plastic politicians, to con what they think is a gullible electorate. It is as much a cliché as the New Journalism or the New Theatre. It has become like Silly Putty, bent and twisted into dozens of distorted and unnatural shapes by careerists trying to redefine it to their particular advantage.

Jacob Javits, who campaigned last autumn for Richard Nixon, proclaims himself a partisan of the New Politics because "it means problem solving." Theodore Sorensen, who tried to convince Robert Kennedy not to speak out against the war in Vietnam, says he is for it because it "means participation, like giving 18-year-olds the vote." Organization men like Jesse Unruh and Stanley Steingut claim to be part of the New Politics. James Perry and Penn Kimball have written whole books defining the New Politics exclusively in terms of manipulative technology, computers and mass communications. Hubert Humphrey and Fred Harris say they are "for" the New Politics. But then Albert Shanker says he is for decentralization and Mayor Richard Daley says he is for civil liberties. It all makes one recall George Orwell's prophetic quote:

"In our time, political speech and writings are largely the defense of the indefensible. . . . Political language has come to consist largely of euphemism, question-begging and sheer cloudy vagueness. . . . The inflated style is itself a kind of euphemism. A mass of Latin words falls upon the facts like soft snow, blurring the outlines and covering up all the details."

The sociologist Daniel Boorstin has written perceptively about "pseudo events" and "pseudo personalities," but the New Politics just might be the first pseudo movement. It has no program, no money, no leadership, no power, a weak national organization and almost nothing for its citizen supporters to do. An Albany meeting of the cannibalistic New York group in May broke up in petty bickering. Candidates running in the name of the New Politics —Tom Bradley, Henry Helstoski and Herman Badillo— all lost important elections within the last month. Instead of an issues convention, the New Democratic Coalition (NDC) spent its energies last spring organizing a fund-raising dinner in Washington.

At this point, the New Politics is still more mood than movement, more desire than reality, more label than program. I hope in this exploratory and fraternal article to suggest a few reasons why the New Politics groups have been ineffective, and why, since the Chicago convention, they have lost the political initiative to the Nixon Administration, and to the old politics, machine Democrats, corporate managers, union bureaucrats and senior Southern Congressmen.

One reason is that most of the organizational leaders of the New Politics seem wedded to the notion that incremental change should come exclusively through electoral politics. They have geared their state groupings toward the 1970 elections, and are already preoccupied with the personalities of 1972. At their conferences they talk at length about taking over irrelevant, hollow shells like the Young Democrats and the Democratic National Committee. This parochial electoral vision has tended to flood the local organizations with anal technicians and power-tripping hustlers, while turning off the younger activists, who prize ideas and confrontations more than candidates and campaigns.

Up to now, the orators of the New Politics have sounded much too optimistic and impatient. They recall 1968 in shades of victory, and see the Democratic convention of 1972 as a final vision of Armageddon. They are not mentally preparing for a movement that will span a decade or more of hard work in local communities. They have a furtive eye fixed on a short cut. And they see the Democratic Party as the only possible vehicle for reform, even though it was the Democratic Party that involved us in fighting the Vietnamese, ruined the poverty program and sanctioned the police violence during the Democratic convention.

Although I shall speak here primarily of cooperation with grass-roots movements to the left of the Democrats, I also believe that an excessive preoccupation with the Democratic Party is causing the New Politics to ignore the progressive wing of the Republican Party: the Ripon Society, Senators Goodell, Aiken and Percy and Mayor Lindsay.

The Democratic Party still houses the worst institutionalized elements in our national politics: the Meany-Lovestone-CIA complex; the Dixiecrats, the missile contractors and the Mafia. We should try to think of the New Politics as historically ten minutes old, and still view the idea of a new political party, including Ripon Republicans, as an open option. The endless talk of "capturing" the Democratic Party is both elitist and delusional. And much harder than folks think.

This narrow electoral bias seems based on a bad misreading of the history of this decade in America. Since the sit-ins of 1960, history has been pushed forward by insurgent movements rather than by political candidates. The black movement, the student movement, the anti-war movement and the dump LBJ movement should be the models of a new participatory politics. These were—and are—long-term, issue-oriented movements, on the margins of parliamentary politics, that engage thousands of ordinary citizens. At the necessary moment these movements invented their own leader—Eugene McCarthy—and entered the electoral process. By emphasizing infighting over nominations and positions within the Democratic Party now, the New Politics groups are cutting themselves off from the generators of energy and imagination on the campuses and in the ghettos. If the New Politics becomes a broad enough movement, it will once more have the power to create its own leaders at the right time.

Horst: The Express; Cologne, Germany

The electoral strategy also neglects two of the most significant lessons to be extracted from the events of 1968. One is that the basic institutions of liberal politics —the unions, the convention system, the mass media and the Democratic Party itself—are undemocratic. Only by exposing and reforming these institutions—and by building alternatives to them—can citizen politics be made to work. One must remember that Vice President Humphrey lost every primary where his name was on the ballot, and was still nominated because of the power of three men—Mayor Daley, Governor Connally and George Meany. And the convention adopted a hawkish Vietnam plank, even though the policy had been repudiated by 80 per cent of the primary voters.

The other lesson of 1968 is that you can no longer base mass movements on charismatic heroes in this country, because those heroes get assassinated. Any American insurgent movement must be anchored on participation and commitment in order to survive the gunmen.

The New Politics will have to root itself in issues that move masses of people: an end to the endless war in Vietnam, a drastic reduction in military spending; community control, citizen participation, and opposition to the general over-centralization of American life; reform of the draft; democratization of the rules and structures of the Democratic Party; a guaranteed annual income, socialized medicine and the closing of tax loopholes for corporations and the very rich. And possibly most urgently, it must devise a program that addresses the legitimate needs and frustrations of the powerless white working class. Robert Kennedy won the votes of the steelworkers, farmers and cops in Indiana, Nebraska and California, and they can be won again by men who speak in plain Populist language against remote experts and bureaucracy; against big business and the war; and against the casual hypocrisy of programmed politicians.

This should be the agenda of a New Politics, not the small maneuvers for small positions within the existing Democratic hierarchy.

Another shortcoming of the New Politics has been its inability to win the trust—or even the curiosity—of the high school and college activists, a group of about 3 million. I don't mean to suggest that this is an easy thing to do these days. The young today quite properly believe in no adult authority in the country. With Dylan they sing, "I've got nothin', ma, to live up to." But if there is any New Politics, in the sense of ideas and constituency, it is the radical, activist students, from McCarthy volunteers to draft resisters. They are the one authentically new element in the body politic of the country since the union movement of the 1930s.

No current national political leader now expresses the feelings or demands of the students. Worse, none even adequately defends them against the swelling backlash of repression. Yet, they all covet the students as volunteers in their future campaigns to climb the greasy pole.

Rep. Edith Green, who was Robert Kennedy's Oregon campaign manager, is emerging as the major draftsman of the vicious new anti-student bill in the House Committee on Education and Labor. Eugene McCarthy, the man for one inning, refused to testify on behalf of his own delegates when they were on trial in Chicago last spring. Theodore Sorensen tells the National Book Association that the enemy is equally Herbert Marcuse and Ronald Reagan, neglecting to mention John Mitchell, Melvin Laird and Richard Nixon, who hold actual raw power, but whose names lack the safe symmetry of the two cited. No Senator as yet has called illegal the indictments of the eight New Left leaders in Chicago, or dared suggest that Mayor Daley should have been indicted instead, if the grand jury had only read the Walker Report. What Senator has spoken out against the systematic roundups of Black Panthers, or the Congressional probe into SDS? There is a new McCarthyism in the land, and the New Politics has hardly noticed it, much less fought back.

One thing the liberal politicians can do is understand the cultural root of the generational alienation. The kids hate the environment most of them grew up in—impersonal split-level suburbs, homogenized religion, dull 9-to-5 jobs, sex by the marriage manuals, a mass media that promotes banality and suppresses the Smothers Brothers. The young just can't live in that world.

They are in revolt against the most traditional values of the middle class—God, money, status and the family. One small way in which the New Politics can begin to relate to these kids would be to develop a cultural analysis of America that takes the adversary culture of the young seriously.

To summarize: the New Politics seems too committed to the Democratic Party as the one historical agency of renewal. It seems too remote from the para-political movements at the base of the society: blacks, students, the poor, women. It has not begun to raise the idea of redistribution of wealth and income. It is white and elite.

The New Politics should be more activist, more radically concerned with institutions, more concerned with cultural issues, more like a social movement than a political campaign. For example, it should now be leading the opposition to the war in Vietnam, organizing a new March on Washington, or perhaps a national strike. It should lend its support to the basic demands of the campus movements, and not contribute further to the paranoid backlash against the young. It should try to strike alliances with low-income whites on issues of economic self-interest, possibly through the new Alliance for Labor Action. It should be able to grasp the enormity of the present crisis, and realize that the business-as-usual ritual of making good speeches and nominating assemblymen is insufficient as long as 350 Americans are dying each week in Vietnam.

Right now the New Politics hardly exists, except as a simplistic slogan easily appropriated by hacks and hucksters. What we do have, out of the ashes of 1968, are some excellent new politicians: Sam Brown, Adam Walinsky, Paul Schrade, Don Peterson, Julian Bond, Channing Phillips, Representatives Chisholm, Koch and Lowenstein. But we do not yet begin to have a new politics that can generate a new majority for radical reform. I will end by quoting the candid and passionate speech Adam Walinsky delivered to the founding meeting of the National Democratic Coalition in Minneapolis last October:

> We are a rump faction of a party which is sliding—indeed, rolling—into an abyss of ruin.
>
> It would be easy and comforting to attribute this failure to the sins of Humphrey, Richard Daley, or John Connally, to a killer five years ago or a killer more recent. It would be easy—and it would be self-deluding and self-defeating and wildly, catastrophically wrong. . . .
>
> These men, the current villains in the liberal demonology, have played their full part in these events . . . [but] there is no hope for this coalition, no hope for a regeneration of our politics, unless we are prepared to learn from the errors and illusions that have brought us to our present pass; not the errors of others, though they have been more than plentiful, but our own. It is time to face our truth. . . .
>
> This is not only a matter of the war in Vietnam—where we promised peace in 1964 and then stood silent for too long as that pledge was broken and our Administration went to war. It is a matter, sadly, of almost all the great social legislation of the last four years.
>
> We promised education—but our education programs have not taught the children. We promised new cities—but our housing programs have gone far toward destroying the ones we have. We promised health—and our vaunted medicare program has shot the cost of medical care up while doing little or nothing to improve the quality of care for which we now pay so much. We promised help to the farm—and nearly eliminated the farmer.
>
> We promised blacks that patience would bring justice. We promised whites that justice would bring order. We have achieved neither. We promised and promised, passed laws and appropriation bills, taxed and spent. And when it was all over, who is there to say that life is truly better than it was before?

LATIN AMERICA

Challenge from the Intellectuals

MANUEL MALDONADO-DENIS

Mr. Maldonado-Denis is associate professor of political sciences at the University of Puerto Rico (Río Piedras). His book Puerto Rico: una interpretación histórico-social will be published shortly by Editorial Siglo XXI (Mexico). He has just returned from a trip to South America on a Guggenheim grant that was given him to study the role and position of intellectuals in 20th-century Latin American society.

Analyzing recently the realistic possibilities for revolution in the United States, Barrington Moore, Jr., mentions as one of the preconditions for such change "the desertion of the intellectuals" from the existing institutions, that is, their "challenge to the prevailing modes of thought and to the whole perception of the possible causes of and remedies for human suffering." Despite its enormous complexity, and notwithstanding the differences in attitudes and ideologies that divide intellectual opinion in Latin American society, it can be said that this situation defined by Professor Moore now prevails in the southern part of this hemisphere. If the "desertion of the intellectuals" is the signal that a society is ripe for revolutionary change, then Latin American society is on the brink.

In a continent where only 0.5 per cent of the population reaches college and where enormous masses can neither read nor write, most members of the intelligentsia spring from the middle- or upper-middle class. With the single exception of Cuba under Castro, formal education in Latin America is still the privilege of the very few. The fact that the majority of intellectuals have deserted their class and identified with the radical forces vying for revolutionary change goes far to explain why communication between North and South—between the haves and the have nots—turns out to be so difficult. It is illusory to speak of North America being "misunderstood" by its poorer counterpart. On the contrary, I believe that Latin American intellectual opinion understands only too well the true character of U.S.-Latin American relations.

The increasing tempo of radicalization, of the intellectual's alienation from his traditional society, expresses itself in a general mood of despair and protest, of impatience with and contempt for old political formulas echoed by a generation that failed to carry through its promises for a more just society. The United States is in turn made responsible for the ever increasing gap between the underdeveloped South and the overdeveloped North, for its policy of supporting reactionary regimes and for its consistent espousal of John Foster Dulles' famous dictum: "The United States has no friends; it has only interests." The attitude cannot be dismissed as traditional Latin hostility toward the "Yanqui." The facts marshaled by Chile's Chancellor Gabriel Valdés —who can scarcely be called a radical—in order to explain to President Nixon how Latin America is actually financing United States economic development, show to what extent the hard facts of exploitation are voiced even by those who have in the past supported North America's imperial role in the hemisphere.

Insofar as the mass media are in the hands of the traditional ruling classes, this mood of alienation, and the radicalization it engenders, are played down, dismissed as the expression of "a small minority of extremists." Reading the local press in Latin America is one of the most unrewarding and misleading of experiences. And yet this press reflects in a way the gap that exists between the traditional elites and the new generation of intellectuals that has matured in the last two decades. This is the generation of writers and artists who witnessed the moral and intellectual bankruptcy of their teachers and of the political movements that promised a true revolution but once again delivered the status quo.

This new intellectual Left in Latin America seeks to do away, on the one hand, with the rigidity and dogmatism of the traditional Left; and on the other attempts to achieve a truly radical critique of Latin American society. In this sense, support for the Cuban Revolution sets those intellectuals who are truly in favor of a revolutionary change apart from the others who are willing to compromise with the impartial role of the United States.

Cuba has been for Latin American intellectuals what Spain was for European intellectuals during the Civil War or what Vietnam is today for American intellectuals. Before Castro there was at least an element of unity among intellectuals of different ideological persuasions in their common fight against dictatorships. The Cuban Revolution, by raising the expectations for revolutionary change throughout Latin America, helped to unleash the forces of Latin American reaction and to bring to the forefront the role of the United States as world policeman for capitalism. This in turn led to a polarization of intellectual opinion for and against the United States and, of course, for and against Cuba. Santo Domingo and now Peru have enforced this trend.

It is true that there is a great fragmentation within the Latin American Left, the divisions occurring mainly over differences as to strategy and tactics. But one thing serves as a common denominator for all leftist movements: the radical opposition to American imperialism in all its many aspects. The new breed of intellectuals in Latin America are thus united not so much by what they like as by what they detest. And their detestation of American hegemony in the hemisphere is too apparent for even an ostrich to ignore.

The restrictive, and at times insulting, policies of the U.S. State Department in the granting of visas to writers and artists from Latin America hardly improves the atmosphere of mutual understanding. Not long ago Carlos Fuentes was forbidden to disembark in Puerto Rico for only a few hours by U.S. Immigration authorities, who treated him—in his own words—"as a common criminal." Something similar happened to the Colombian writer, Gabriel García Márquez, on a stopover at San Juan on his way to Madrid last year. The harassment and insolence of the procedures for the granting of visas is best illustrated by the following example. Dr. Germán Carrera Damas, Chairman of the School of History at the Central University of Venezuela, was invited by the Dean of the College of Social Sciences of the University of Puerto Rico to deliver a series of lectures. He applied for a visa. The United States Embassy in Caracas said they were willing to grant it, but for one week only. And would he be so kind as to tell them exactly when he was leaving and where he was staying while at Puerto Rico. The reason: they had to report to the FBI. In the case of a Chilean sociologist I met, the situation was even more insulting: he would be granted a visa to enter the United States but would have to report every other day to Immigration authorities. And when Carlos Fuentes was allowed to enter the United States some years ago for five days (he was attending a film festival) he was ordered to restrict himself to Manhattan Island. Needless to say many intellectuals I met refuse to be so humiliated. As a result—and with a few exceptions—the majority of writers and artists who do get visas are those who will tell the American public what Washington wants it to hear—not what it should hear.

Vadillo—Siempre, Mexico

While this process takes place, the other side of the coin is that North Americans of the sort whom Mary McCarthy has dubbed "the paramilitary intellectuals" can roam at will over the Southern continent in pursuit of their research projects. Only when a major scandal occurs, as in the case of Project Camelot in Chile, do some governments take measures against the very real possibility of sociological espionage. Nevertheless the seeds of distrust are deeply planted. The Latin American radical intellectual is as wary of American intellectual "advisers" as his political counterpart should be of the military "advisers." At least in the field of social research, Projects Camelot and Simpático have seriously impeded the pursuit of research projects financed by American institutions in many Latin American universities. In fact, the faint smell of American money behind a research project today dooms it at its inception.

This distrust extends even farther into the literary and artistic fields. The fate of the literary journal Mundo Nuevo, edited originally in Paris and now in Argentina, illustrates further the extent of intellectual polarization. Founded originally under the auspices of the Congress for Cultural Freedom, Mundo Nuevo was meant to be the successor of the much discredited Cuadernos of Paris. Emir Rodríguez Monegal, a man of talent as a literary critic and with a somewhat leftist background (he had been a regular contributor to the Uruguayan weekly, Marcha) was chosen as the editor of the new journal. In his appeal to writers over all of Latin America, he promised to open the journal to every shade of opinion. At this point, several things happened. The Congress for Cultural Freedom was publicly exposed as a CIA conduit. The Cuban intellectuals and Marcha denounced Mundo Nuevo as an intellectual front for United States interests and as an enemy of the Cuban Revolution. (Some leftist writers, among them Carlos Fuentes, took a different position and decided to collaborate with the new journal; they were, however, the exception to the rule.) The very fact that it was financed by an American institution (in this case the Ford Foundation) made it suspect to many writers and artists in Latin America. With the resignation of Rodríguez Monegal, Mundo Nuevo has relapsed into the anti-Communist gimmicks of its predecessor, Cuadernos. It is now practically buried in Buenos Aires, a fitting symbol of the difficulties standing in the way of a true dialogue between those who defend and those who oppose American imperial power.

But perhaps even worse than the distrust bred by American efforts to carry out both military and intellectual counterinsurgency in Latin America, is the mutual ignorance as to the true nature of the respective societies, an ignorance that can hardly be remedied by improvised "crash programs" or by such public relations gimmicks as the Rockefeller mission.

The new "discovery" of a continent heretofore neglected has focused the attention of American scholars and students upon its institutions and its historical and social development. But the tendency to judge economic and social development by the standards of American liberal democracy (even the best of it) dooms many visitors from the North to a repetition of the platitudes about a system that hardly works in the United States itself. With few exceptions they end up by telling the Latin Americans what they ought to do, thus provoking the inevitable angry response.

The new generation of Latin American intellectuals —represented by such spokesmen as Mario Vargas Llosa and Gabriel Márquez—is in no mood to listen to the weary rhetoric of American liberals who come down to Latin America in order to preach the virtues of "liberal democracy." The most influential current among Latin American intellectuals is well to the left, not only of New Deal liberals but of their counterparts in the South: "the Democratic Left." It is to Cuba, not to colonial Puerto Rico that they look for an example of revolutionary change. They admire, not Kennedy or Betancourt but Fidel Castro and Che Guevara.

(Perhaps no one illustrates this radicalization of Latin America's intellectuals better than Juan Bosch. Originally a member of the "Democratic Left," Bosch has become increasingly radical since the American intervention in Santo Domingo. He now speaks against imperialism—which he calls "Pentagonism"—and in favor of a "dictatorship with popular support." Completely disillusioned with representative government, Bosch has turned increasingly away from his former anti-Communist stand. His own party, the Partido Revolucionario Dominicano, has undergone a similar metamorphosis.)

The death in action as a guerrilla fighter of the Colombian priest Camilo Torres (see review by Robert F. Smith, The Nation, June 30) has served as a spur for the emergence of the "Christian Left" in the Southern hemisphere. The Catholic Church itself—one of the strongest agencies of conservatism in Latin Ameria—is being shaken by the increasing radicalization of the young clergy. In Chile a new political party has emerged as an offshoot from the ruling Christian Democratic Party. Led by the prominent economist, Jacques Chonchol (who is to be its secretary general), the Movimiento de Acción Popular Unitaria (MAPU) considers the Christian Democratic "Establishment" too conservative. Its leaders propose more radical solutions to Chile's problems and are willing to try an "opening to the left," including a common front with Communists and Socialists if necessary. A similar process—although on a smaller scale—is taking place among some sectors of the Christian youth in Venezuela.

American support for the military regimes in Brazil and Argentina, noted for their ruthless persecution of intellectuals; the war in Vietnam; the Marines in Santo Domingo; the blockade and continued aggression against Cuba; the black and student revolt within the United States itself, all these events merely reinforce the attitudes described above. And the parallel hopelessness of underdevelopment, illiteracy and exploitation that seem to be the lot of a continent literally plundered by its ruling class and by American interests helps to explain the belief among intellectuals that revolutionary change is inevitable.

Whether this change will come about now or in the near future is difficult to tell. The trend right now is running contrary to intellectual opinion. The swing seems to be toward the right, toward military dictatorships, interference with universities and widespread repression. The United States is not going to reverse this swing. On the contrary, it is more likely to give it an additional push —particularly if things get out of hand, as they did in Santo Domingo. This can only add to the polarization and contribute to a still more marked alienation of Latin American intellectuals. And to their radicalization.

THE DISNEY IMPERATIVE

WESLEY MARX
Mr. Marx is a California reporter.

Santa Ana, Calif.

Recently, a newspaper headline proclaimed that a "game preserve" would be set aside near my home in Southern California. My heart jumped. For many months, I have belonged to a citizens' group that seeks to protect Southern California's last remaining natural bay, Upper Newport Bay, from being compressed into a boat storage area for luxury waterfront residences. This life-giving estuary lies near my home; I dared to envision a bay sanctuary for blue herons, scallops, young halibut and red-berried California toyon trees. However, the game preserve turned out to be a commercial zoo spectacle called Lion Country Safari. It is being sponsored by the same developer who, with the sympathy of public authorities, makes a paying proposition of the bay. If my faith in land developers is justified, a game preserve called Grizzly Bear Rodeo is rising in a jungle clearing somewhere in South Africa.

This curious expression of conservation confirms my suspicions about the increasing persuasiveness of a trend I call the Disney Imperative. It is the compulsion to create artificial environments in place of natural environments. Fantasy thus becomes reality, i.e., Lion Country Safari in Orange County, Calif., and residential marinas atop life-giving estuaries. It is a trend particularly attractive to developers on the make as well as to impetuous architects, and it promises to play more hell with the cause of conservation and environmental quality than the fixations of dam builders and lumber harvesters.

I don't want to hold the late Walt Disney responsible for all the aberrations of the Disney Imperative. However, Disney was instrumental in setting a pretty high standard to inspire disciples for many years to come. I don't have Disneyland in mind. That Magic Kingdom in Anaheim was a dress rehearsal, an entertainment if you will, for the precedent-setting application of the Disney Imperative at a place called Mineral King. If you haven't heard of Mineral King, that's to be expected, because, in terms of the Disney Imperative, Mineral King doesn't yet exist—it is still natural. Mineral King is a glacial valley set in California sequoia country. It contains twenty lakes, numerous cascades, incense cedar and bold rock outcroppings. It lies in the Sequoia National Forest, right next door to Sequoia National Park, which gives you some idea of just how unreal it is.

In Disney's later years, Walt Disney Productions submitted a master plan for Mineral King to the Forest Service. "Disney stressed that his master plan is based on the need to preserve Mineral King's natural beauty," declared a Disney press release. That certainly is a laudable objective. This alpine valley is rather rare, being part of the last remaining 2 per cent of land in the United States in the "wild" category. Ostensibly, the spirit of Smokey the Bear, not Donald Duck, would reign. Yet the means of preservation seem odd, to say the least. Forested hills are to be stripped to make way for ski slopes serviced by fourteen lifts. Mountain peaks will be topped with restaurants. The valley floor will provide space for a conference center, two hotels, a cafeteria, a skating rink, a chapel, convenience shops and a heliport. For some reason, this sounds more like a plush ski resort than natural beauty preserved. Just where does preservation come in? In response, the press release declares that Walt Disney Productions "would preserve the area's natural character by camouflaging ski lifts, situating the village so that it will not be seen from the valley entrance, and putting service areas in a 60,000-square-foot underground facility beneath the village." Remember the alpine trees and the bold rock outcroppings? "Stout columns of timber and concrete set with stones brought up from a nearby quarry will establish the American-Alpine style," declares Disney Productions.

"Preservation" thus becomes an outdoor type of interior decoration to provide a contrived environment. The bulldozers become sculptors' chisels, the road graders become paint brushes, and the chain saws on the tree slopes become magic wands. Nothing cheap like colored snow or litter baskets in the shape of tree stumps. Wilderness is not being desecrated; it is just being out-charmed. The result is a Swiss ski resort 55 miles from Visalia, Calif., a Disneyland with guts. "When I first saw Mineral King more than five years ago," Disney recalled for reporters, "I thought it was one of the most beautiful places in the world, and we want to keep it that way. It is going to be a pleasure to make it even more attractive and accessible so that more people will enjoy its beauty."

There may well be room for such real estate creativity, particularly in the urban environment, but why Mineral King? It is here that one begins to realize that there is more to the Disney Imperative than artistic indulgence. Old-fashioned wilderness preserves don't lend themselves to high-density, high-revenue outdoor activities. While lumber people, mining people and amusement park operators grouse about such public land lying "idle," their buzz saw and pickax enterprise hardly conveys a sense of public service and responsibility. The artificial environment approach, on the other hand, oozes with public service. Skiing interests have been eyeing Mineral King for some time, but their straightforward plans were a bit too brutal even for the Forest Service. About a decade ago, Walt Disney Productions purchased a small amount of private land in Mineral King Valley. After that, came the Disney master plan to make Mineral King "even more attractive and accessible."

And if a suit brought by the Sierra Club, and now before the courts, does not prevail, that is exactly what they will do. The Forest Service is so excited that it has given Disney Productions a thirty-year lease to indulge in its style of wilderness improvements. Walt Disney Productions expects 2.5 million paying visitors by 1976. The National Park Service, albeit reluctantly, will permit 8 million cubic yards of Sequoia National Park land to be pushed about for a high-speed access highway into Mineral King. The highway, which will undoubtedly become a linear butcher block for mule deer and other unwary pedestrians, will be named the Walt Disney Memorial Highway, if the promoters have their way. While this may be a fitting monument, I wouldn't wish this designation on anybody.

This transformation of wilderness into an artistic profit-making venture doesn't miss any bets. During the summer, the fourteen ski lifts will be available for "hikers, campers and wildlife students." While Walt Disney Productions makes no promises to the effect, I have a hunch that chair-borne hikers and wildlife students may find themselves gazing down upon Son of Lion Country Safari.

The Forest Service's willingness to succumb to the Disney Imperative at Mineral King will not be lost on the creators of Six Flags Over Texas, Marineland, Frontierland and other mass-rec promoters. Ski and marina promoters are undoubtedly scanning Forest Service maps and latching onto architects itchy to outdo nature. The ability of the National Park Service to be suckered into this frenzy for packaged fantasy is probably not being overlooked either.

Another semi-natural domain in public hands promises to become an even greater victim of the Disney Imperative. I read recently an advertisement in which a landscaping firm was expanding into "underwater landscaping." I wondered if the market for plastic sharks in Bel Air swimming pools was really that large; then I read on. "Specialists in preserving, restoring and creating special effects in the undersea environment utilizing the natural beauty and ecology of the region," explained the

Conrad; Los Angeles Times

"We Need Offshore Drilling So That You People Can Drive Your Cars to the Beaches and Enjoy Them!"

advertisement. "We travel anywhere. . . No job too small."

Disney sea is already in the making. The Santa Monica shore consists of a long, spacious beach that abuts the metropolitan Los Angeles area. The present use—public beach—is natural enough, in fact too natural. One agency noted for its inventive verve proposes the creation of a giant marina. A 6-mile-long earth-filled breakwater would protect the boats and be the basis for an artificial, i.e., real, offshore beach. Let's see if you can apply the Disney Imperative by filling in the blank. The breakwater will be topped by ————. The answer is not barnacles but freeway. This perhaps suggests the identity of the fantasy maker: it is the California Division of Highways. The Division would set aside generous shoulders on the proposed Santa Monica Causeway to accommodate marinas, high-rise apartments and other institutions eager to leapfrog public beach frontage and acquire high-revenue footholds on the "idle" nearshore. A sure sign of the Disney Imperative at work is the developer's willingness to defy natural laws. The curtaining off of the nearshore into a still lagoon permits the laying of underwater air hoses to keep the pollution circulating. Curiously enough, the Los Angeles City Council has been reluctant to endorse the Santa Monica Causeway project. The highway people have demonstrated that they don't have closed minds about this thing. They have offered to move the freeway off the causeway and onto the present existing beach. To "replace" this beach, underwater artificial reefs would be installed to nurture an artificial offshore beach. The fact that the "perched beach" concept is untested suggests how well the planners are remaining true to the Disney Imperative. Dr. Kenneth Inman, of the Scripps Institution of Oceanography, a beach erosion expert, suggests two possible accidents: the shunting of the sand into deep water beyond recovery and the stimulation of potentially destructive waves. However, a consultant on the project, James Dunham of Moffat-Nichol Engineers, sees the "greatest single problem of the entire project" as being a supply of enough earth fill. Mr. Dunham then goes on to suggest a suitable "borrow pit": a coastal hill range. And once Mr. Dunham gets going, there is no stopping him. Why not, he asks, borrow from the hills in such manner as to transform them into the site for another freeway and for terraced homes?

Other noted fantasy makers have their own master schemes to improve on the nearshore. Airport planners now realize that the solution to airplane noise is not quieter airplanes but the extension of runways out to sea. These runways, seductively tipped with marinas and beaches, are packaged as complete environments, ostensibly soundproofed. At last count, some twenty coastal cities were considering such seaward intrusions. At this rate, the United States itself may become a borrow pit to accommodate the air age. Once installed, the runways have a way of continually growing outward. Kennedy International Airport, outside New York, is even now proposing to push a super runway out into Jamaica Bay, used from time immemorial as a resting and feeding site for migratory water birds. It is feared that this intrusion might put an end to the entire Atlantic flyway by forcing the birds to make too long a jump. Some people feel that San Francisco Airport and Oakland Airport will finally bisect San Francisco Bay, to form the world's first supersonic runway.

There is no end of ways to reclaim the ocean. I heard one planner talk about the "Real Estate Potentials of Offshore Island Development." His inspiration did not come from traditional islands. He suggests that offshore oil drill platforms can double as real estate if mounted on earth fill. He proposes that these oil-inspired islands be connected to the mainland by causeways, there being no sense in having islands entirely surrounded by water.

Natural islands can also be upgraded by recourse to the Disney Imperative. The owner of one pastoral island off Southern California, Santa Cruz Island (being considered for national park status), plans to dredge out part of the scenic shore to accommodate a marina. But he doesn't call it a marina; he calls it an "artificial fjord." Part of the shore already boasts a vacation camp, Polynesian style. Progressive developers in Tahiti may see the light and erect igloo motels.

The craze to redesign the nearshore, particularly as a luxury boat storage area, suggests that we may soon be able to claim that there are more boats than fish in the offshore waters. The hectic transformation of estuaries into high-revenue environments already promises to sterilize the offshore and the skies above. Some two-thirds of our marine catch, as well as our shore birds, are estuary dependent. Yet the fantasy makers even have a way of capitalizing on this purge: box-office aquariums, featuring seals who can balance rubber balls on their noses.

The most disconcerting fact about the spread of the Disney Imperative is its misdirection. There is a place for well-designed, man-made environments that provide underground services and transportation facilities, achieve thematic architecture, diversify recreational opportunities and create an illusion of beauty and excitement. But this place should be the urban environment, not the prime wilderness. Perhaps the greatest service our conservation agencies can perform in the future will be to tell the devotees of the Disney Imperative to get the hell out of the Mineral Kings and go back to Chicago, New York and Newark. The concepts of compact beauty and illusion that Disney employed in Disneyland deserve much larger application, but not in the role of improving nature.

OUT TO GET THE PANTHERS

L. F. PALMER, JR.
Mr. Palmer is a reporter and columnist for the Chicago Daily News, and a special correspondent for the Newspaper Enterprise Association.

A few minutes before dawn on June 4, Merlin Nygren, Assistant Deputy Superintendent of Chicago police and the officer in charge that morning, got the word from his dispatcher: "The FBI has informed us they are going to raid the Black Panther headquarters on Madison Street. They request that all Chicago police cars stay out of the area." The message came through loud and clear; this was going to be a performance by the Feds.

The first thing they did was to seal off the area surrounding the ghetto building at 2350 W. Madison Street, nestled solidly in the heart of the riot-ravaged West Side. One police car swooped down on the intersection of Madison and Western to reroute traffic. An FBI car did the same thing a block away. By sunrise, the operation was under way.

FBI cars with revolving red Mars lights blinking moved in on Panther headquarters and disgorged an array of agents. On their left arms, they had safety-pinned white armbands with red letters: "U.S. Department of Justice." Across their chests, they wore light olive-green bullet-proof vests, harbingers of an expected shoot-out.

Marlin Johnson, special agent in charge of the Chicago FBI office, came dressed in a dark brown suit, white shirt and a wide-brimmed hat, like a businessman. His business was to lead a raid on the black revolutionary organization which is developing a nasty habit of unsettling local, state and national defenders of the status quo.

Several G-men quickly clambered up a fire escape of the building next to the Panthers', jumped to the roof of the headquarters, spread out for escape attempts and in perfect gun position for any action that might occur on Madison Street. Down in the street, more agents took cover behind cars and glued their eyes to the doorway leading to the second- and third-floor offices of the Panthers. Their weaponry included heavy firearms, machine guns, shotguns and tear gas.

When efforts to coax the Panthers out of their offices failed, the G-men took the sledge-hammer route, rushed the headquarters and took into custody—without resistance—eight Black Panthers, two of them female. By the time the G-men left, revolutionary posters had been torn from the walls, lists of names of Panther lawyers, contributors and other supporters had been confiscated. Office equipment and some weapons were carted out and petitions with more than 9,000 signatures seeking an appeal bond for jailed Illinois Panther leader Fred Hampton had disappeared. Cash—something more than $1,700 —was taken. Food for the Panthers' breakfast for poor children program had been trampled and slung around the office. At this writing, only the money had been returned. The FBI raided the Panther headquarters without a search warrant. They carried only an arrest warrant for George Sams, Jr., whom they described as a Panther wanted for murder in New Haven.

Sams was nowhere to be found in the Chicago Black Panther headquarters. But the eight Panthers arrested were charged with harboring a fugitive. Sixteen days later, the charges against the eight were dismissed.

After the Chicago raid, the FBI or police conducted in rapid succession raids on Panthers in Des Moines, Indianapolis and Denver. Panthers have been arrested in Seattle, Eugene, Ore., New York City, Newark, Baltimore, Salt Lake City, numerous California cities, to mention a few incidents of recent weeks.

The nation-wide harassment of Black Panthers, which includes extraordinary means of trying to keep the Black Panther newspaper from being distributed, has reached such proportions that the Panthers scheduled a Revolutionary Conference for a United Front against Fascism in Oakland, Calif. on July 18-21. Hundreds, perhaps thousands, were to gather for what could be one of the decade's most influential meetings.

On the day after the Chicago raid, Black Panther Party chairman, Bobby Seale, said that more than forty Panther leaders and more than 100 members had been arrested across the country in two months. In Seale's words, the arrests are "nothing more than Richard M. Nixon's operations of attempting to destroy the national and state level Black Panther Party leaderships." Describing the G-men as "Fascist FBI pigs," Seale said the reason behind the alleged plot to destroy the Panthers is the federal government's horror of Socialist programs, which the Panthers advocate. He said U.S. officials are employing local law-enforcement agencies in their conspiracy to remove Panther leaders from the streets and thereby kill off the movement. In his annual report, released July 15, J. Edgar Hoover singled out the Panthers as being, among Negro militant groups, the "greatest threat to the internal security of the country."

The Panther party's top leadership has already been skimmed off, each with a different kind of spoon. Minister of defense Huey P. Newton is in prison, convicted of killing an Oakland, Calif., policeman. Panthers view him as a political prisoner. Bobby Hutton, the party's treasurer, was killed by police a little more than a year ago. The Black Panther newspaper declares that "from that point on there have been some twenty Panthers murdered by the nation's pigs and their running dogs."

Eldridge Cleaver, whose best-selling Soul on Ice has made him the party's most widely known member, is in exile. About to be returned to jail on a charge of probation violation, Cleaver vowed he would never go back behind bars and disappeared from sight. He is reported to be living in Cuba.

Seale himself is under federal indictment on charges growing out of the Democratic National Convention disturbances in Chicago last summer. Those close to that extraordinary chapter in American malfeasance know that Seale played only a marginal role in the clashes. Indeed, Jay Miller, director of the Illinois chapter of the American Civil Liberties Union, while searching for a motive for the Seale indictment, was told by a high-ranking official in the Justice Department that "the Panthers are a bunch of hoodlums and we have to get this guy." It is, then, entirely reasonable to come to the conclusion that it is only a matter of time before Seale joins Newton, Hutton and Cleaver in America's peculiar and chilling version of Siberia.

With these formidable national leaders out of action, it appears that many local and federal officials are almost paranoid in their determination that the Panthers shall not continue to ride herd on what they call the "oppressive capitalistic system."

As Donald Freed, assistant to the provost of the California Institute of the Arts, put it: "If what is being perpetrated against the Black Panther Party was being done to any white group, including the Nazi Party, the liberal establishment—from the ACLU to The New York Times —would absolutely refuse to tolerate it further. Since the party began its hot breakfast for children project (now feeding 5,000 a day, which is, in the words of California's Jesse Unruh, 'more than the government feeds'), Panther arrests with charges later dropped, and bail in the millions, constitute an unprecedented national scandal which beggars the fifties." Freed sees official action against the Panthers as "a growing conspiracy which would have the most awful climax this ominous summer."

What has been happening to the Panthers in Chicago provides as good a spectacle as any for Americans who may want to make a serious examination of Bobby Seale's charge that a national campaign is in full swing against the group which calls itself the "vanguard party" of the revolution. The experiences of the Illinois Panthers vary little, if any, from those of the group that founded the party in California and from those of the others that now seek to carry out its aims across the country.

After a few months of underground organizing, the Illinois Black Panther Party emerged in December 1968. Many of its members had attended college and labored in the nonviolent civil rights movement. At that time, few members had criminal records of any consequence. Now the charges against them run into three figures, including one of stealing a garbage can.

Only two convictions stand against the record of the Illinois Black Panthers. Significantly, they are both against the party's top two leaders. Bobby Rush, deputy minister of defense, was convicted in a Champaign (Ill.) circuit court of illegal possession of a weapon, following a visit of Panthers to the University of Illinois. Rush—a husband, father of two and an army veteran—has appealed the conviction. Fred Hampton, the Illinois party's deputy chairman, was convicted of robbing an ice-cream truck driver of $71 worth of ice cream and is serving two to five years in the Menard Penitentiary. Hampton is an ex-Roosevelt University student and former head of the Maywood (Ill.) NAACP Youth Council.

Hampton's conviction came despite his testimony that he was not on the Maywood school playground last April when the ice cream was stolen. In an out-of-court statement, Hampton told reporters: "I may be a pretty big mother, but I can't eat no 710 ice-cream bars." However, the words which attracted the attention of Panther watchers were those of the judge who refused to set an appeal bond for Hampton, dooming him to immediate incarceration: "This defendant admits to me that he advocates armed revolution," said circuit court Judge Sidney A. Jones, a Chicago Negro. "I cannot take the responsibility of allowing him to remain at large."

"The Cops Don' Bother To Wear The White Hats. . . . All They Needs Is The White Faces."

Aside from the fact that advocacy of armed revolution is scarcely relevant to a charge of stealing ice cream, the U.S. Supreme Court on June 9 outlawed Ohio's syndicalism law. This statute, passed by several states during the "Red scare" after World War I, makes it unlawful "to advocate or teach the duty, necessity, or propriety of crime, sabotage, violence or unlawful methods of terrorism as a means of accomplishing industrial or political reform."

The Supreme Court ruling made it clear that convictions cannot be upheld against persons who simply advocate the necessity of overthrowing the government. Under the High Court decision, it is imperative that the advocate actually intends lawless action that would produce violence. If such a judicial opinion holds on a conviction, it would seem that it would be equally applicable to the granting of an appeal bond.

Bobby Rush expressed this same sentiment in somewhat different language: "Cloaked in the black robe that surely smells of the mire that he lives in, pig Jones, black puppet manipulated by the pig power puppeteers of Chicago, has carried out this system's policy of legal and sanctioned persecution. The State's attorneys' every effort was not to show that Fred was a thief, which is what they called him, but it was to show that Fred's political ideas are in direct opposition to his and all others who embrace injustice."

Kermit Coleman, head of the ACLU's ghetto project in Chicago, who has handled many cases of accused Panthers, provides insights into the attitudes of officials who find themselves in confrontation with revolutionary blacks. One assistant State's attorney, says Coleman, opens his prosecutions of Black Panthers by saying: "This is a Black Panther case, your Honor."

Among the cases for which Coleman has handled the defense have been that of two Panthers charged with violating a city ordinance on the use of public ways by selling the Black Panther newspaper. The charges were dropped. In another, two Panthers were arrested for handing out leaflets. The charges were dropped. Other cases involved charges of aggravated battery, disorderly conduct, resisting arrest and a variety of weapons charges. These, too, were dismissed.

"It would seem to me," Coleman says, "that it would be irrational to assume that the Black Panther Party and each of its members is deliberately setting out to get arrested. And yet it seems that every member has been arrested, with the leaders being arrested many times. This raises in my mind a belief that there is a concerted effort among law-enforcement agencies and political forces in this city and throughout the nation to wipe out the Panthers."

Coleman explains why: "They see the political nature of the Black Panther Party as being a danger to entrenched political and economic interests. These are young black people who cannot be bought off with a loaf of bread and the promise of pie in the sky. A great many of their members have come out of the traditional movement after seeing that this kind of protest is not effective."

Coleman expressed what many people, no doubt, have been thinking: "You'll notice that other black groups that are just as active in the community are not getting busted because they are talking about opting for black capitalism. As long as you talk about black capitalism, you don't go to jail. But when one comes out of a revolutionary bag that does not encompass the present political and economic structure, that's when the powers of repression are brought to bear."

That they are being brought to bear was made abundantly clear in this remark by a veteran Chicago police reporter who is about as well informed on such matters as any person in the city: "I can't remember in my entire career witnessing the quantity nor the quality of repressive force unleashed against the Black Panthers. I don't think it is all a matter of a national conspiracy, though I believe this is certainly a part of it. I think this massive repression also results from the naked fear many policemen have of the Panthers. They want to do them in as a kind of self-defense measure."

Repression takes many forms and it certainly is no coincidence that there is a striking similarity between the Washington hearings into Black Panther activities and the probe of Chicago's Blackstone Rangers by the same agency, the Senate Permanent Subcommittee on Investigation. While the Rangers are not considered to be revolutionaries, this former street gang, now known as the Black P. Stone Nation, is—like the Panthers—decidedly at odds with the political ruling elite.

The direction of the McClellan committee's hearings on the Rangers discounted any efforts these black youths were making toward constructive community programming. It also pulled the financial rug out from under an Office of Economic Opportunity project designed to experiment with means of rehabilitating black street gangs. A major performance before the McClellan committee came from a former Ranger who "told all" and who, informed sources insist, was taken off the hook of a criminal charge in exchange for his "exposé."

As the same committee "digs" into the workings of the Black Panthers, it is no surprise that they have come up with a former Panther whose stories of sexual, criminal and exploitative activities are remarkably parallel to those credited to the Blackstone Rangers. Panther leaders, including Seale and Chief of Staff David Hilliand, insist that ex-Panther Larry Clayton Powell was telling the story the committee wanted to hear and that he did so to gain clemency on robbery charges.

The committee has made much of a Panther coloring book which allegedly was distributed to boys and girls at their free breakfasts. The book depicts youths attacking police and the legend under one reads: "The only good pig is a dead pig." Seale told newsmen that the book was "rejected" by the Panther leadership because it is "racist." He said it was never distributed. The McClellan committee, which encouraged the impression that the book received wide dissemination, took absolutely no notice of the fact that for many years a popular slogan declared, "The only good Indian is a dead Indian." After the Indians were all but dead, the slogan was revised to "The only good nigger is a dead nigger."

Out of the Oakland conference may come solid and ominous documentation of America's frightening drift away from a democracy which it has always mouthed but never practiced, toward a version of fascism which it has never mouthed but is practicing with a creeping zeal. I attended the National Black Economic Development Conference in Detroit at which James Forman introduced and gained approval for the Black Manifesto, demanding $500 million in reparations from white churches and synagogues. Shortly thereafter, a federal grand jury was impaneled in Detroit and began to subpoena witnesses for an investigation into the circumstances of the Manifesto.

I received a short time ago a communication from the Interreligious Foundation for Community Organization, which sponsored the conference. The letter, addressed to all who had attended the three-day meeting, said in part:

> Within the last four weeks, the FBI has been systematically contacting persons attending the National Black Economic Development Conference. The agents have represented the investigation as being ordered by the United States Attorney General, supposedly in regard to possible extortion charges against James Forman. We are advised by attorneys that this is a preposterous notion. Although presumably the investigation is on the extortion issue, there is apparent interest in other individuals' roles in the conference, including that of Lucius Walker, Jr. [IFCO's Executive Director].
>
> If the indications we have received are true, there is no legal basis for such a charge, if the purpose of this is intimidation to drive the movement back into the wall, it leads one to believe this is just another effort to hold back the thrust for black liberation. If enough people can be frightened by the massive use of agents across the country, that might be more effective than an actual case. We shouldn't be duped by this kind of strategy.

Nor should white Americans be duped into thinking that the kind of official repression which has been described in this article is limited to Black Panthers, Blackstone Rangers, or other minority organizations and individuals who are aggressive in their challenge of the status quo. As violence breeds violence, so does repression breed repression. Whites can feel the sting, too.

An extraordinary incident which happened in Chicago recently bears this out, and at the same time provides a bizarre commentary on the American racial circus. The Better Government Association, a prestigious civic organization, had planned a meeting with representatives of the ghetto, including several gang leaders. The purpose was to open a dialogue which might reduce dangerous tensions. The meeting was set for the Inland Steel Building in the Loop and was to be a luncheon.

But members of the police department's gang intelligence unit (which was prominent in the Blackstone Rangers hearing before the McClellan committee and which, some believe, promoted the investigation) demanded invitations to the meeting and upbraided the hosts for not telling the unit's head, Capt. Edward Buckney, what they were doing.

Gang intelligence police swarmed over the building, staked out in the lobby, and started shooting pictures of everybody who entered. When the gang leaders arrived and found the fuzz all over the place, they "split the scene," rendering the meeting impotent. Chicago Daily News columnist Mike Royko, who broke the story, described one of the intimidated hosts of the meeting: "Robert Gaylord Donnelley—Credentials: A member of the wealthy family that controls R. R. Donnelley and Sons Company, the giant printing firm (Red Book); Yale '60 and Harvard Business School '63; executive of the First National Bank of Chicago; Social Register, society pages and civic leader. In other words, a top-drawer, white member of the Establishment."

Said the startled Donnelley, after he had recovered from the shock of his introduction to intimidation and repression, American style: "I had never believed most of the things I read about the tactics the police use. Most of the people I know still don't believe it. If this is an example of the type of thing that is happening to black people, then I can appreciate their feelings and their reactions."

The irony is that Captain Buckney is a Negro.

HARRY GOLDEN

The rare-book dealer in New York City, H. P. Kraus, announced recently that he had acquired the papers of Julius S. Grinnell, who prosecuted the Haymarket rioters. Mr. Grinnell's notes dealing with several stages of the legal proceedings are among these papers. Historians and scholars have never seen this material. Grinnell's prosecution was successful. Four innocent men were hanged.

The Haymarket Riot took place in Chicago's Haymarket Square on May 4, 1886. Three anarchists were publicly denouncing police brutality and the clubbing of strikers; a small audience listened. One hundred and seventy-six policemen tried to disperse the meeting. Someone in the crowd threw a bomb, no one has ever discovered who. Eleven persons were killed and more than 100 injured. The police started firing. Anybody was a target.

The next day the police rounded up nine anarchists, including a yeast manufacturer named Oscar Neebe who happened to be visiting one of the arrested men. The state indicted seven of these as accessories before the fact in the murder of police officer Matthew Degan, whom the bomb had killed. An anarchist named Albert Parsons of his own free will came out of hiding to surrender to the court. The jury found seven of the defendants guilty of murder.

The newspapers at the time editorialized that these men had tried to destroy society: in turn, they must be destroyed. Five years later, John Peter Altgeld, one of the first immigrants to become a governor, pardoned the three surviving men in a 16,000-word message. "The jury which tried the case was a packed jury selected to convict," wrote the Illinois Governor who proceeded to list the errors of the presiding jurist, Judge Gary, and reasoned that there was no proven connection between the man who threw the bomb and the men in prison. Altgeld concluded the police were just as guilty, for they had broken up a peaceful meeting and clubbed the heads of workers. Of these labor wars, Altgeld asked, "Does clubbing a man reform him? Does brutal treatment elevate his thoughts?"

The pardons were political suicide for Altgeld. The consequences were clear to him, however. "If I decide they are innocent, I will pardon them if I never hold office another day in my life." He never did.

What has always compelled me about the heroism of Altgeld and the significance of the Haymarket case were the reminiscences of a friend who clearly remembered the day the four men were executed. The schools were let out so the children could celebrate the state's efficiency. Eleven-year-old Carl Sandburg was going home in Galesburg, Ill., and he heard one man hail another with the four words Sandburg says he never forgot, "well, they hanged 'em." The joy with which the information was conveyed shamed Sandburg. The statement struck him as a glad howl, and neither his mother nor his father's defense of the execution diminished his shame.

Whether scholars and historians are ever able to determine the guilt or innocence of the Haymarket rioters will now make little practical difference: dead men are dead forever. But I hope they get at these papers soon. It is surprising how little things change in ninety years. Police apparently do not need strikers if they want to bend their clubs. What we should be reminded of is that when the state exercises its efficiency without the quality of mercy, it is the most terrifying horror in the universe.

floor of the coup but concedes he "did welcome the revolution." Surely . . . Ambassador Gordon's feelings on that vital point were well known to the Brazilian military leaders prior to their take-over, thus providing them with the push they needed to go through with it. . . .

Mr. Gordon insists that a "Communist capture of power" threatened Brazil under Goulart. This old, reliable specter, however, has been pretty much put to rest. James W. Rowe, one of the most respected scholars on modern Brazil, has written: "The revolt of March-April 1964 has most often been interpreted as a reaction of the Brazilian middle classes against the threat of Communist or leftist-nationalist subversion—or else as a reactionary uprising of the privileged classes against the increasingly articulated demands of a reform-minded alliance of Populists and leftists. Neither interpretation will stand careful scrutiny."

Next, Mr. Gordon modestly depreciates his closeness to President Castelo Branco. . . . Yet he acknowledges: "From early 1965 on, I tried, as a friendly outside observer, to make this point [the need to build a new political infrastructure] with President Castelo Branco and his associates." He further concedes having frequent and extensive consultations with Planning Minister Roberto Campos and Finance Minister Octavio Bulhoes. As is well known, Campos was the eyes and ears and often the brains of Castelo Branco. . . . Indeed, one of the private complaints of Costa e Silva is that he has no aide-de-camp of the stature of Campos.

A New York Times story as late as June 1, 1969, identifies Mr. Gordon as "a former high State Department official once closely identified with United States support for the military-dominated Government in Brazil." . . . Need more be said? Dom Bonafede

Columbia's proving ground

New York City

DEAR SIRS: Readers of Frank Donner's fine analysis of the use of the injunction on campus [The Nation, June 9] will be interested to know of the development of the case against the Columbia SDS. The undersigned are a group of parents of Columbia students. Some of us are the parents of the eight Columbia students and former students (all were students through the spring of 1968) who are now serving a thirty-day contempt of court sentence in the civil jail in New York for sitting-in in two buildings this spring. Their demands included open admissions for the underprivileged who live directly outside the Columbia University community, opposition to expansion and militarization of the campus, and support of the Black Panthers. . . .

Of these eight, two have been served with additional arrest warrants while in jail for criminal contempt of court and other legal charges under the penal code. They will be taken directly from the civil jail when they are released, and arraigned under the new charges, which are being pressed by individual Columbia professors (Smith and Coulter) in an unusual use of the injunction proceedings. Columbia has also moved to make the injunction permanent. In addition, the office of Dr. Andrew W. Cordier has yielded the names of twenty-nine students and eight former students, most of them members of SDS, to the Senate Permanent Committee on Investigations, and it is reported that the data included information on the sources and amounts of scholarship aid they had received. Finally, in the court hearings on the contempt citations, Columbia professors allowed themselves to be used as finger men by the administration.

Columbia . . . was the first to call in the cops; the first to use the injunction and the courts; the first to involve its academic staff in punitive legal actions; and very quick to inform on a body of students to a highly discredited investigative committee. [Its] . . . methods are promptly tried elsewhere. The use of the injunction spread to Dartmouth, Brooklyn, City, Queens, etc. Students are increasingly being jailed by means of this handy device. Out of our experience in having lived through McCarthyism, we have learned enough to reject the methods being used to silence the young, and to turn away from the hypocrisy with which they are being lectured. We believe that talk of "force and violence" and "Left fascism" is cant, a highly selective weapon used for highly selective ends. . . .

Elizabeth Bobrick	Joseph Roth
Bernard Cole	Morton Siegelbaum
Leo Hurwitz	Helen Yglesias
Peggy Lawson Hurwitz	Jose Yglesias
Audrey Meyer	Dora Ziegellaub
Martha Roth	and others

New York City

DEAR SIRS: On June 19, thirty-nine members of the Queens College community were sentenced in Queens County Criminal Court. Acting on legal advice, the thirty-eight students and one faculty member chose to plead guilty to the reduced charge of criminal trespass in the third degree, a charge that the District Attorney had agreed to accept. The expectation was that the defendants would receive minimal or suspended sentences. Instead, the thirty-one male students and one faculty member were given sentences of fifteen days in jail, the maximum jail sentence for the charge of third degree criminal trespass. The seven female students were given sentences of fifteen days in jail or a $250 fine. We feel strongly that the sentences in both cases were excessive considering the peaceful nature of the sit-in and sentences in other similar cases. At present we are attempting to have the sentences of the male students reduced and to raise money to pay the fines of the female students. We need a minimum of $2,000 to pay this fine and other expenditures incurred in the defense of the students. Frankly, we are faced with a serious problem in raising this amount of money. The sources from which we can draw are limited and the time is short. Contributions should be sent to: The Queens College Defense Fund, c/o Solomon Resnick, 316 West 94 Street, Apt. 5D, New York, N.Y. 10025.

Solomon Resnick, Frank Warren, Michael Wreszin

flimflam

Hollywood, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Feeling strongly that those of us who wish to view the Beverly Hillbillies or Lawrence Welk or The Dating Game should have that right, and that the same goes for the Smothers Brothers, I wrote to C.B.S. protesting their censorship (and canceling) of the latter.

Ray L. Beindorf, general manager of the local outlet, KNXT, answered me that C.B.S. had no alternative but "to exercise that responsibility [in matters of taste] in a medium that comes into the home and is seen by viewers of all ages." Is Mr. Beindorf reaffirming the old concept once applied to radio that all TV programming be aimed at the 12-year-old mentality?

Even if we accept this unacceptable standard in theory, C.B.S. doesn't accept it in practice. At about the same time the Smothers Brothers were being ousted, C.B.S. Playhouse presented "Shadow Play" which featured (1) a seduction scene; (2) an attempted rape; and (3) two mugging incidents and was seen by viewers of all ages.

Personally, I think this is all flimflam. The Smothers Brothers were fired not for lack of talent, not for moral reasons, not for technical problems but for an anti-Establishment slant evident in their humor. Harry Cimring

Kremlinology: Power and Terror

THE GREAT TERROR: Stalin's Purge of the Thirties. By Robert Conquest. The Macmillan Co. 633 pp. $9.95.

POWER IN THE KREMLIN: From Khrushchev to Kosygin. By Michel Tatu. Viking Press. 570 pp. $10.

DAVID JORAVSKY

Mr. Joravsky teaches history at Northwestern University. He is the author of Soviet Marxism and Natural Science (Columbia University Press).

Kremlinology is the effort to do archival research in high Soviet politics without access to the archives. Its method and appeal are as simple as the local gossip's: supposition turns incoherent bits of information into an exposé of the sin and stupidity that the neighbors try to hide. The details vary endlessly but the theme is quite monotonous: within the Kremlin, big shots only pretend to be deciding great issues of policy; they are really engaged in a sordid struggle for personal power. The unending exposé simply bores most people. Who cares whether Khrushchev really was pushing Ilichev to replace Suslov until Suslov linked with Brezhnev to bump Khrushchev-Ilichev? Or, going back to the time when losers were bumped off, who cares who killed Kirov?

A sensible argument is implicit in rhetoric of this type. Who cares who killed the Austrian Archduke in 1914? In each case a single assassination triggered state power into violence against millions of randomly selected victims. The initial assassinations can hardly be considered significant causes of such enormous processes, except to the gossip mentality, which persistently confuses the discovery of causation with the laying of blame. What caused the enormous convulsion of Soviet terror in 1936-38? Stalin's insatiable lust for power. That is Robert Conquest's main explanation of the Great Terror (he loves to magnify by capitalizing), by which he does not mean the whole spasmodic history of extralegal jailing and shooting, only the spasm of 1936-38. The Russians call it yezhovshchina, the Yezhov thing, after the chief administrator of terror in those years.

Conquest concedes that analyzing Stalin's mind is "peering into the glooms of an extreme reticence"; it is hard "to tell how far he had made his aims explicit even in his own mind." At this point Conquest makes a reasonable guess that should have led him away from Stalin's little dark mind to more important causes of the terror: "What he had, politically speaking, was less definite than a planned control of developments. It was rather the feel of events, the flow." If seriously pursued, this line of thought leads from the flow of events at the summit of the political hierarchy, which cannot be studied in detail until the archives are opened, to broader social processes, which are copiously documented in the public record. For example, one can argue a connection between mass terror and forced industrialization, as Borys Lewytskyj did in his history, Vom roten Terror zur sozialistischen Gesetzlichkeit (Munich, 1961). Conquest ignores the book, and only occasionally touches on the connection, in order to deny its significance.

In 1929-33 mass terror was used to drive peasants, technicians and managers toward the impossible goals of the first Five Year Plan. If the quantity of victims and the qualitative transformation of society are indices of greatness, this convulsion of 1929-33 deserves to be singled out as the Great Terror. But Conquest hurries past it to the Yezhov thing, which obviously damaged the economy by mauling the whole class of leaders and specialists. Pointing this out, Conquest thinks he has disproved the economic function of the terror even in the convulsion of 1929-33. "For it cannot simply be switched off. It builds its own interests and institutions, its own cadres and habits of mind. Any good it may be . . . at a particular moment is likely to be offset at a later stage when it is no longer applicable, but still applied." Unwittingly he has suggested an institutional approach to the Yezhov thing; but remarks of this kind are only momentary departures from wearisome elaboration of his main theme. The Great Terror was a Great Plot, executed with unfaltering mastery by that "political genius," J. V. Stalin, who virtually destroyed the party in order to change "despotism," which he had achieved by the end of the twenties, into "absolute autocracy," which he won through the Yezhov thing.

The difference between despotism and absolute autocracy is not explained, for Conquest is hardly more serious at constitutional analysis than he is at economic. He simply declares that the periodic spasms of mass terror in Soviet history were not the product of evolving systems, whether political or economic, or each acting on the other. An individual was responsible, at least for the Great Terror of 1936-38. Even the belief that Lenin's monolithic party-state predetermined Stalin's terror, a widespread view that Conquest finds attractive, is nevertheless rejected in an introductory discussion that ignores the longest argument for it, Hellmut Andics, Der grosse Terror (Vienna, 1967; recently issued in English by Holt, Rinehart & Winston as Rule of Terror): "The nature of the whole Purge," Conquest insists, "depends in the last analysis on the personal and political drives of Stalin."

With breathtaking boldness Stalin's drives and plots are reconstructed from ambiguous scraps of circumstantial evidence, rumor and conjecture. If a bit of information can fit a supposition that fits Conquest's general theme, the supposition is not only made, it is quickly transformed into a factual basis for further supposition, which in turn becomes fact, and so on to the preordained verdict, quite in the bullheaded style of the Stalinists. It may be poetic justice to turn their method against their great leader, but it is hardly fair to the general public, which still believes that Stalin was omnipotent. Anti-Communists have long cooperated with Communists in spreading this myth. Khrushchev explained the Yezhov thing simply by turning the "cult of personality" upside down, and Conquest does much the same. Not divine but satanic omnipotence is attributed to one person, and with that the search for an explanation stops. Togliatti's famous objection, that this is un-Marxist reasoning, can be recast in the language of common sense: social phenomena must have social causes of appropriate magnitude.

Soviet Communists ignore this truth for fear of condemning their system. Anti-Communists fear that talk of social causes will exonerate Stalin and his henchmen. Such people are confusing moral judgment with historical inquiry, which tries to explain changing patterns of mass behavior. Old-fashioned political history, the story of politics at the royal court, offers a little help, but even that little is not to be found in Kremlinology. It is a guessing game of old-fashioned political historians, whiling away the decades till the archives are opened.

Conquest is not merely a Kremlinologist. He is also a passionate moralist, outraged by wanton destruction of human life (especially when Communists are guilty of it). The result, in his non-Kremlinological chapters, is a masterful description of the Yezhov thing. From many sources, chiefly the memoirs of surviving victims, he has compiled a catalogue of horrors, skillfully driving the shrinking reader along on a current of dismay and outrage. The shootings seem less cruel—perhaps for the simple reason that he has found virtually no eyewitness accounts of them—than the humiliation and torture of the accused, the starvation and freezing in the camps, and the protracted torment of the "wreckers' " families.

The ultimate horror was the futility of the whole thing, even from the Stalinist point of view. Nearly all the victims were not simply innocent of the "anti-state crimes" to which they were forced to confess; they were utterly powerless and even unwilling to think about resisting the state that destroyed their lives. What possible justification could there be for such mad use of the state's power? If Conquest had left that unanswered question reverberating in the reader's mind, his book would have merited comparison with Hersey's Hiroshima. But he confused the problem of justification with that of explanation, which he sought in Stalin's mind. It is as if Hersey had interspersed through his tale of woe the demonology of Tansill and Beard, picturing the war with Japan as Roosevelt's plot.

At the end, Conquest is gloomy. He feels that mass terror will probably be revived by some future dictator. Like the later Roman Empire, the Soviet Union can only oscillate between good reigns and bad, depending on the personality of the man who wins the throne. Michel Tatu, a fellow Kremlinologist, comes to an opposite conclusion, showing once again that Kremlinological data are like bits of colored glass; they can be arranged in any pattern that suits the artist's fancy.

Tatu is not a facile optimist. Mass terror is unlikely to be revived, he argues, for the bosses know how badly they can be hurt. But they are still overwhelmingly the class of '39, fearful young beneficiaries of the terror, now grown into fearful old oligarchs, interested above all in preserving each his own power against encroachment from any quarter. The result is "one of the most conservative administrative structures in the world," ruling over "a conservative, chauvinistic society," which may be entering a long period of stagnation.

In the past, Tatu reasons, personal dictators upset the inherent conservatism of the Soviet system; Stalin by sporadic use of terror, Khrushchev by sporadic liberalization. Each was able to take decisive action on crucial problems because he was able to undercut the opposition, whether real, potential, or imaginary. In Khrushchev's case the opposition was quite real; his bouts of de-Stalinization were linked with administrative reorganizations designed to improve the country's economy and to destroy the satrapies of his opponents. His colleagues in the Politburo finally banded together in self-defense, kicked him out, and stopped de-Stalinization. Thus collective leadership, the Soviet euphemism for oligarchy, is necessarily linked with resistance to further liberalization, which was part of Khrushchev's drive for complete personal dictatorship. Oligarchic stultification or Caesaristic caprice would seem to be the only possibilities for the Soviet political system.

Nevertheless, at the end of his book Tatu predicts a third way: a long-run transformation of the oligarchy into a parliamentary regime. This is the last of his repeated departures from the basic rule of Kremlinology that he endorsed on the very first page: the Soviet Government's "objective problems"—constitutional development, economic growth, foreign relations, the restive intelligentsia—are subordinate to the struggle for power among a few dozen men at the top, driven by "the ancient motive force of the thirst for power." Fortunately, this trivial rule of gossip about personal relationships is repeatedly replaced by analysis of the system. At one point Tatu even admits the fatal weakness of "our science," as he calls Kremlinology: it "lacks sufficient means to enable it to identify the various groups operating in each conflict, and it is still less in a position to fathom the intentions of those groups." He cannot be sure which leaders stand for consumer goods and which are "steel eaters," though the existence of such interest groups is undeniable. The most revealing studies of them are impersonal economic analyses of the shifting policies that result from their conflict.

If the Kremlinological gossip were cut, Tatu's book would be one of the most readable analyses of the real Soviet constitution, that is, the largely unwritten rules deciding which offices and bodies have what rights and powers regardless of the individuals who sit in them. Tatu shows how the political crises of 1957 and 1964 locked the dozen men of the Politburo into a new relationship with the 300 of the Central Committee. In 1957 Khrushchev used the Central Committee to beat down opposition within the Politburo; in 1964 his colleagues in the Politburo played the same game against him. Since then each member of the top leadership has known that "his own team may dismiss him at a moment's notice." The result so far has been a constitutional impasse, paralyzing the government's ability either to proceed with reform or to retreat to full-fledged Stalinism.

The obvious way out would be to make the Politburo clearly responsible to the Central Committee, to increase the power of top officials by carefully defining it. At present Brezhnev "enjoys far fewer prerogatives than the chief executive in a Western democracy." Tatu thinks that Soviet leaders will ultimately see the obvious way out of their constitutional impasse, along with the obvious necessity of increasing autonomy for economic managers. His reason for hope is simple. He assumes that the Soviet rulers are committed to something more than guarding their own power, or rather that they see the connection between political power and economic progress. The painful fact can hardly be avoided, even by fearful deadlocked oligarchs: they are overtaking America at a snail's pace. They have made timid efforts to remove the grosser inefficiencies of their economic system, but the constitutional impasse prevents the enactment of sweeping reforms. Thus Tatu tries to set the political struggles of the leaders within the larger context of an evolving system, primarily constitutional but also socio-economic.

The traditional approach to history must be reversed in the Soviet case. Instead of starting with old-fashioned political history and then going on to the study of evolving institutions, we are forced to start with institutional history and put off knowledge of politics at the royal court until the state begins to wither away, at least to the extent of opening the archives. Must a thorough history of the terror also be postponed? Probably, for this institution was pathologically secretive. But there are two approaches that might produce enlightening studies, while we wait for the archives to open. One would be small-scale studies of the interaction between the terror and some other institutions, as reflected in local, specialized publications, or in statistical data on the changing career patterns of officials.

The other approach would be very broad and seriously speculative. The four great spasms of terror (1918-21, 1929-33, 1936-38, 1948-53) can be compared with respect to methods, types of victim, and changing social functions (and dysfunctions). It is noteworthy, for example, that the intelligentsia suffered in every spasm (though most of all in the Yezhov thing), while other prey varied markedly from one convulsion to the next. Comparisons and contrasts should also be made with pre-revolutionary spasms. Conquest repeatedly drops the name of Ivan the Terrible, but never says anything meaningful about his famous oprichnina. Neither does he say anything about the bironovshchina, the Bühren thing, a pointless convulsion of terror in the 1730s, or about Peter the Great's earlier use of terror to force modernization.

It has been said that the modern state was created to establish peace within the nation and wage war without. It does seem true that modern states kill foreigners more effectively than their clumsy predecessors, while showing greater efficiency in exempting their own citizens from violence. It is tempting to speculate that states in transition to this modern efficiency find it hard to distinguish between the native "us," who deserve the protection of the law, and the foreign "them," who do not. Perhaps the ultimate analogy should be sought in the random processes of natural selection, by which poisonous species of snakes and insects acquire immunity to their own venom.

The Poetry of Earth

TECHNICIANS OF THE SACRED: A Range of Poetries from Africa, America, Asia & Oceania. Edited by Jerome Rothenberg. Doubleday & Co. 520 pp. $6.95.

ARMAND SCHWERNER

Mr. Schwerner's latest books of poems are The Tablets (Cummington Press) and Seaweed (Black Sparrow Press).

Technicians of the Sacred is an anthology in two sections. The first, some 350 pages in length, includes primitive and archaic texts grouped by theme or by geography; the second—the "Commentaries"—tries, in the editor's words "to fill-in the scene or to indicate a little of what the original poets would have expected their hearers to know." As a counterpoint to these "commentaries," the second section furnishes a generous variety of contemporary writing—poems, happenings—by Creeley, Breton, Neruda, Kaprow, Lorca, Wakoski, Gary Snyder, Ginsberg, Apollinaire, Gertrude Stein, Dick Higgins, Emmett Williams, La Monte Young and Jackson MacLow, among others.

What is the function of this double thrust? The wealth of available primitive and archaic materials certainly suffices for an anthology of any size, unaccompanied by writings of another order. The editor seeks to emphasize the bonds and orders common to both ancient or primitive materials and the products of contemporary producers, whether folk rock, random poetry, jazz poetry, concrete poetry, picture poetry, "beast-language" poetry. Perhaps the most insistent problem in compiling such a collection involves the very definition of poem. This is a good time to approach the Sumerians or the Sioux: the republic of poetry is increasingly inclusive; such catholicity allows a contemporary collector—especially a formal experimenter like Rothenberg himself—great latitude in the discovery of poems within archaic or primitive matrices. Rothenberg takes for granted the metaphysical unity of primitive thought, its wholeness evident in the coalescence of dance, song, magic, rite. And that of course is the source of editorial headaches. How do you pick out individual, self-defined units, poems, from within a traditionalist context which makes no such extra-ritualistic separations? Rothenberg's concise—"primitive is complex"—and useful "pre-face" meets the problem head-on:

> Like any collector, my approach to delimiting and recognizing what's a poem has been by analogy: in this case (beyond the obvious definition of poems as words-of-songs) to the work of modern poets. Since much of this work has been revolutionary & limit-smashing, the analogy in turn expands the range of what "we" can see as primitive poetry. It also shows some of the ways in which primitive poetry & thought are close to an impulse toward unity in our own time, of which the poets are forerunners.

There's no news in poetry as nonlogical dream, as noncausal image sequence, as nonlinear and random verbal adventure. What is new is the editor's encyclopedic stress on the ties that bind "us" and "them," a stress validated by Rothenberg's discernment and experience.

Poetry is hard put to retain significance and wide cultural status. This book is a monumental attempt to reclaim these attributes. We are in more trouble than the Britain of 1800, but our problems often bear similar markings. The destructive vise of the modern city has tightened. But with Wordsworth we also are victims of "the great national events which are daily taking place, and the increasing accumulation of men in cities, where the uniformity of their occupations produces a craving for extraordinary incident, which the rapid communication of intelligence hourly gratifies." In the welter of such noisy mass-com irrelevancies, this book asks, what can we meaningfully salvage and depend upon?

No other anthology of which I am aware so adequately manifests what Rothenberg calls the "post-logical" phase of modern poetry; still within the context of Coleridgean organicism and Blakean prophecy, Technicians of the Sacred represents a modern attempt to nourish the sundered spirit. Throughout this book, overtly and inferentially, the editor insists upon what Cassirer found in the "primitive" ethos—"the consanguinity of all living things." And how does man reach out to this experience of common being? Rothenberg answers:

> No people today is newly born. No people has sat in sloth for the thousands of years of its history. Measure everything by the Titan rocket & the transistor radio, & the world is full of primitive peoples. But once change the unit of value to the poem or the dance-event or the dream (all clearly artifactual situations) & it becomes apparent what all those people have been doing all those years with all that time on their hands.

The primitive and archaic materials in Technicians of the Sacred are comprehensive, involving vision, song, spell, exorcism, origin myth, naming sequence, mourning song, event, dream, animal tale—taken from such divergent cultures and areas as Australian Arnhelm Land, Tibet, Aztec, Sumeria, Andaman Islands, Fox, Egypt, Gabon Pygmy, India, African Bushman. And how about that time-trip as a counter to the coming Moon-voyage?

What makes so many of the anthologized entries available to the reader is the frequent high level of translation or adaptation. Done by poets or particularly sensitive ethnological writers, these versions commonly manifest a poetic relevance lacking in much of the primitive or archaic materials so far in general currency. The following magnificent adaptation, "To the God of Fire as Horse," from the Indian Rig-Veda (ca., 1500 B.C.) will stand as instance; the adapter is Robert Kelly:

Your eyes do not make mistakes.
Your eyes have the sun's seeing.
Your thought marches terribly in the night blazing with light & the fire breaks from your throat as you whinny in battle.

This fire was born in a pleasant forest
This fire lives in ecstasy somewhere in the night.

His march is a dagger of fire
His body is enormous
His mouth opens & closes as he champs on the world
He swings the axe-edge of his tongue smelting & refining the raw wood he chops down.

He gets ready to shoot & fits arrow to bowstring
He hones his light to a fine edge on the steel

He travels through night with rapid & various movements
His thighs are rich with movement.
He is a bird that settles on a tree.

This collection of man's oldest and newest poem makings, enriched further by the mass and breadth of allusion, comment and interpretation in the "Commentaries" section, constitutes one of the significant aesthetic documents of the postwar period. Out of its almost infinite variety rises a deeply felt metaphysical monism whose ultimate claim to relevance involves the self-transcendent sense that "we" are "they."

Los Angeles' Golden Goose

ANNE STRICK
Miss Strick has published articles and short fiction, and most recently has written monthly theatre essays for Fortune magazine.

High on a hill, commanding a 7-acre crown in the center of Los Angeles, sits the new three-building performing arts complex known as the Music Center. Costing $33.5 million, the Music Center consists of the Dorothy Chandler Pavilion, and the two structures of the Center Theatre Group: the Mark Taper Forum and the Ahmanson Theatre. The Pavilion is home for the Los Angeles Philharmonic, the Civic Light Opera and the Choral Society. The Center Theatre Group is Southern California's most ambitious regional theatre.

The complex, designed by architect Welton Beckett, rises like an acropolis above the city's squatting gray office buildings, swirls of clotted freeways, and drab scuttle of civic center. The Taper Forum is a low circular structure of sculptured concrete set in a square reflecting pool and surrounded by a colonnade that joins it to the neighboring Ahmanson. It provides 750 seats, rising in fourteen amphitheatre rows around a thrust stage. The Ahmanson is a tall square structure, with proscenium arch and three audience levels seating 2,100.

The Forum was created to deal predominantly with experimental material, and because of its size was expected to have a $300,000-a-year built-in deficit. The larger Ahmanson was to present works of broader appeal, and was expected to cover the entire Center Theatre operation, plus its own production costs, out of income. In 1967, the Center Theatre Group opened in both theatres, and that first year not only stayed within its projected budget but actually made a profit in the Ahmanson. In the red-inked history of regional theatre, that was a first.

Artistically, too, 1967 was admirable. The Ahmanson offered three premières and brought the Royal Shakespeare Company for the first time to the West. Two of the Forum's four plays were world premières, and seventeen short new works were presented in a special Monday night series. There had been only one brouhaha: the Taper's opener was The Devils, John Whiting's play based on Aldous Huxley's The Devils of Loudun, which dealt with religious and sexual hysteria in the 17th-century French church. It is not exactly an unfamiliar theme, these days, but the Los Angeles County Board of Supervisors panicked, and as a result a standards committee was created "to avoid," in the words of a county board spokesman, "future presentations of such controversial selections." However, the flurry died down, The Devils went on, and the standards committee was forgotten.

As a matter of fact, the entire complex was doing very well indeed. The Music Center rests upon an eight-level, 6,000-car subterranean parking structure, and its two restaurants, coffee shop and six bars are all open all day long. Patrons flock to these oases from over the vast civic center area.

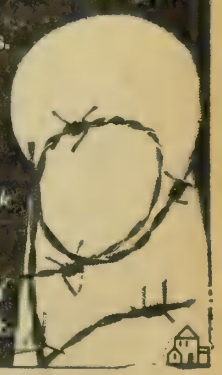
Everyone, then, was happy: artists, public and entrepreneurs. Among the happiest should have been that same five-man County Board of Supervisors. For it happens that the entire Music Center occupies land "donated" by the county, and the Taper and Ahmanson Theatres, although built entirely with private money, were on completion deeded over to the county, as was the Pavilion. Which makes the county landlord—through its arm's-length adjunct, the Music Center Operating Company—of a vast and highly lucrative operation. (The operating company collects the healthy rents and handles maintenance; and since it is officially "non-profit," all profits are promptly turned over to county coffers.)

But apparently the county supervisors weren't quite happy enough, because in the Center Theatre Group's second year, these five elected county officials, under

THEY KNOW HOW MUCH MONEY YOU HAVE. THEY KNOW HOW WELL YOU DID IN SCHOOL. THEY KNOW HOW MUCH YOU DRINK. THEY KNOW IF YOU WERE EVER ARRESTED. THEY KNOW WHERE YOU GO AND WITH WHOM.

They know a lot of other things about you that you just might want to keep to yourself. And they can find all this out without you even knowing. At the push of a button. They happen to be almost anyone.

In THE DEATH OF PRIVACY, Jerry M. Rosenberg tells you how they can do it. How personal information about you is collected, stored and crossfiled on computers and is readily available.



If Congress authorizes a National Data Bank, the end result could be a nightmare of 1984. Because these facts will be collected randomly. Because they will present a picture of you filled with half-truths and exaggerations. Especially if the computer flashes instantaneous misinformation about you.

THE DEATH OF PRIVACY is a warning about an imminent threat, both from government and private agencies. And it is a demand for specific safeguards to protect your right to privacy.

"This is one of the most frightening and fascinating books that you are likely to read . . . [It] is essential reading for all who want to understand and do something about the mechanized assault upon privacy."—Elmer Gertz, Book Week

"The Death of Privacy is a troubling, convincing and necessary book."—John Leonard, The New York Times

THE DEATH OF PRIVACY
By Jerry M. Rosenberg $6.95 RANDOM HOUSE

a statute which permits them to tax their own buildings, levied a 10 per cent tax against the gross profits of the three Music Center structures. Never, in budget or nightmare, had the resident companies contemplated such a drain.

At best, and always, regional theatre is financially marginal. Constant struggle for survival and growth is waged against community inertia, relentless rise of costs, and the specter of box-office flop. How, then, can a regional theatre cope not merely with these expected pressures (and Establishment censorship) but also with a landlord who skims the cream off the top? The Center Theatre Group threads a tricky course.

Los Angeles is a complicated theatre town. Distances are great: even when a show is a huge success, there are no sudden box-office lines as on Broadway; it's too far to drive. So subscription must be the heart of the business. But the city is highly fluid: each year 25 per cent of subscribers move out of the community, the highest figure in the nation. Whole mailing lists are dead after two years. Still, the Ahmanson boasts, at 51,000, the largest regional subscription in the nation; the Taper is 85 per cent subscribed. And plays run for six weeks as compared for instance to two weeks in San Francisco, or one in Cleveland. "By these standards," says a CTG spokesman, "the Los Angeles community is supporting us beautifully."

The critical factor is the 10 per cent tax. Until this season, despite hazards usual and unusual, the Center Theatre Group was on budget. Now, the Center Group is not even in a competing position with other theatres in town; it pays a tax the others don't. Inevitably, artistic quality must be affected: expenditures cut, design concepts limited, productions sparsened. The large Ahmanson will have to forgo new work and limit itself to sure-fire hits. Even so, there is a limit to penny pinching. Scenery, for example, costs a certain basic amount; so do actors and technicians. The costs continue to rise. There is now a deficit, and it is increasing.

Through this economic maze, the Center Theatre Group manages to do excellent, imaginative work. There is a New Theatre For Now program at the Taper, a special series in addition to the Taper's main season. Inaugurated to "give new playwrights some modest production," and backed by a small Rockefeller grant, New Theatre has so far presented twenty-eight plays by twenty-six playwrights. A number of these works have gone on to other life, to Broadway, film, television. Each year the program has been expanded, and there is still more demand than seats. Large audiences with a sense of adventure, are willing to chance unknown works of unknown writers.

A Taper production this spring was The Adventures of the Black Girl in Her Search For God, adapted by Christopher Isherwood from Shaw's novella, and one of two works commissioned by Taper artistic director Gordon Davidson. "Black Girl," says Davidson, "has reached out in a very special way . . . because as soon as you put a black person in a white situation, 1969, you have a whole other thing. A considerable black audience has come, and that's a growth. And we've used the play as a post-performance discussion-catalyst with audiences. I think creating a style means making your own plays. Brecht did. Molière did his own plays with his own company. Martha Graham has a style because she doesn't do anyone else's material, she does her own. That, ultimately, is the mark of a real theatre, and that's what we have to do."

Davidson's drive is to "develop a style and a way of working that has vitality and meaning for this stage and this community. To make a theatre, not just put on plays. But it takes time. . . . We're just beginning to discover the full use of this stage, its possibilities. . . ."

Has censorship by the standards committee been a real problem? Replies Davidson. "Not the standards committee. No. They're responsible members of the community, and have generally approved of the work done. But the fact that one lives in county-owned property, in a big Establishment situation, is a problem. I mean . . . yes, I edit plays. I don't do every play that interests me. It's an implicit pressure. For instance, I couldn't have done Hair. Sure, that's frustrating, simply because any creative person wants not to have to edit in that way."

Elliot Martin, overall director of CTG and an independent producer in New York before coming West, speaks with deep concern: "How desperate is the situation? I'm not sure yet. Of course in the theatre we live on hopes and dreams. . . . But I think theatre is an investment each city should analyze very carefully. When Lincoln Center nearly went bankrupt, it stopped the summer film festival, and restaurant, taxicab, summer convention business all dropped. Action begets action, culture begets culture. And regional theatre needs all the help, from everybody, it can get. Not a drain. We'll have to see. . . ."

Will the Music Center and the Cen-

ACCIDENT

A hundred died in traffic last weekend among them a little girl whom I often saw skipping like a sparrow or tagging like a kitten

after her father, a widower,

whom I now observe picking up her toys off the lawn.
His eyes are broken headlights, his forehead

a furrow of tire-tracks.

I hide from him.
I am ashamed to be seen by him.
I sit in darkness holding with outstretched invisible hands

those I love,

while one by one the shining specks of life sink softly into the night.

WILLIAM PILLIN

Now in paperback — the National Book Award winner

DEATH IN LIFE

SURVIVORS OF HIROSHIMA

By ROBERT JAY LIFTON

"One of those rare works destined to bear witness and change the lives of those who read it."

—SAUL MALOFF, Newsweek

$2.95, now at your bookstore

VINTAGE BOOKS

A division of Random House

ter Theatre Group survive? With enormous enthusiasm, creativeness and a slightly frantic edge, the CTG people have accelerated their drive for growth and community support. An extensive program brings poetry and theatre to schools, teen centers, religious and community groups. Another program raises funds to bring poverty-level adults and children to the theatres. Press conferences are held for college and high school papers, high school workshops are run on the journalistic aspects of theatre production; the CTG's technical people go out to college theatre arts departments to discuss problems and answer questions. Performance level continues first-rate. But the money pressure imposed by the county supervisors may be greater than all the energy and imagination possible can defeat.

Meanwhile, Los Angeles' citizenry is almost totally unaware of the tax that may kill. No shrill of outrage has lifted. And the County Board of Supervisors seems never to have heard the tale of the golden goose.

Book Marks

SARA BLACKBURN

EREBUS. By Robert Hunter. Grove Press. 255 pp. $5.95.

Mr. Hunter, a young Canadian, writes with the enthusiastic desperation of the early Henry Miller. His witty, alienated 25-year-old narrator has selected a nightmare job in a Winnipeg slaughterhouse, and spends the rest of his time drinking, screwing, and despairing over his own life and the more spiritually wretched ones of assorted friends. There are other resemblances to Miller here: the energy, the depressed but funny slapstick humor, and the depiction of women as combination passive nuts/nymphomaniacs. Mr. Hunter has talent, but perhaps too much time has elapsed between the writing of his novel and its publication; his characters emerge as beat generation stereotypes, rendered square and ancient by the passage of a crucial few years. It is an irony that cultural lag is one of the bloodiest battle cries of young Canadian writers, for Erebus is a victim of exactly that.

WHO TOOK THE GOLD AWAY. By John Leggett. Random House. 468 pp. $6.95.

This solemn, thoughtful, and finally ridiculous novel asks us to ponder the fact that values among the privileged at Yale in 1938 just don't seem to hold up in the hurly-burly of the American sixties. Mr. Leggett's two main characters, one rich and one poor, are intended to provide a study in contrast as they move from Yale, Newport and youth to Cambridge, marriage and Washington over a couple of decades. The author's John O'Hara-like concerns are embarrassing. (What are the responsibilities of having money? With what tragedies are people who have money faced? What is integrity in business and personal relationships?) This well-meant but ugly novel equates the failure to achieve money and status with spiritual disaster.

ELISE or The Real Life. By Claire Etcherelli. Translated from the French by June P. Wilson and Walter Benn Michaels. William Morrow & Co. 286 pp. $5.95.

Elise, a working-class girl from the provinces, comes to Paris in 1957 in search of "the real life." In fascinating detail, the first-person narrative records her daily life as a worker in the Citroën plant, her doomed love affair with an Algerian fellow worker, and her understanding—too late—that there is no middle ground between justice and oppression. Elise's voice—personal, direct, absolutely unsparing in the cumulative barrage of accusation against herself and the society she failed to act against—makes this a memorable and important work of fiction. And Mlle. Etcherelli's deadpan, emotionless descriptions of what it was like to be Algerian in Paris in 1957 are unforgettable.

NIGHT WATCH. By Stephen Koch. Harper & Row. 212 pp. $5.95.

Night Watch is an intentionally frozen, Robbe-Grillet-ish account of the events, mostly sexual, which culminate in incest between a teen-aged brother and sister. Mr. Koch's sex scenes are absorbingly clinical, but there is something about this ominous, brutal novel that makes one want to laugh as its rich, tormented siblings move inexorably toward their fated coupling. For all the care and skill which have gone into its construction, the novel depends entirely on the promise and delivery of the incest to gain its effects. Unless one has a suitably creepy emotional response to the idea ("Forbidden!"), the novel is a not very interesting exercise.

THE TIMID ADVENTURES OF A WINDOW WASHER. By Georges Michel. Translated from the French by Helen Weaver. Doubleday & Co. 192 pp. $4.95.

The publisher aptly compares the hero of this very funny and very sad novel with the early Chaplin. Gugusse, a French window washer, is pretty dumb, but he is not too dumb to know that there is something insane about a society in which he's unbearably lonely, abused by his employers, completely ignored by almost all of his fellow citizens, beaten up at a demonstration, and incessantly conned into believing that it would all be different if he had more money to buy more goods. I hope M. Michel's novel is widely read here: he's original, daring, and always directly on target. Helen Weaver's translation of the book is excellent.

EAGLE IN THE AIR. By Rose Robinson. Crown Publishers. 159 pp. $4.95.

People who enjoy Sidney Poitier films will admire this brief and often touching story by a new young black writer. Its heroine, a black girl hitchhiking to San Francisco after some sad encounters with her boy friend and her family, is badly abused and almost raped before her journey with two white hicks shows her that life isn't all bitterness, and whites not all uniformly hateful. Although its silver-lining ethos places it dangerously close to standard commercial fiction, Miss Robinson has a tough, open style that makes one hope another, more substantial novel is in the works.

LONG TIME COMING AND A LONG TIME GONE. By Richard Fariña. Random House. 271 pp. $4.95.

This posthumous miscellany of stories, poems, essays and song lyrics by the talented author of Been Down So Long It Looks Like Up to Me is a disappointing memorial. Most of the stories and essays are either disturbingly dated or imitative, and the poems are pretty ordinary. Joan Baez's superhonest introduction to her brother-in-law's work ends up (unintentionally?) holier-than-thou, and Mimi Fariña's breathy introductory remarks about the respective selections, which might have been deeply moving to a friend, are gooey in print. Publishers' avidity to the contrary, there are still some things which shouldn't be made into books.

THE CENTENNIAL REVIEW

Vol. XIII, No. 3 Summer 1969

HARRY BERGER, JR.
Leonardo da Vinci:
The Influence of World View on Artistic Style

HEINZ POLITZER
Franz Kafka's Completed Novel:
His Letters to Felice Bauer

GEORGES J. JOYAUX
A Further View of the "Revolution of May"

RICHARD WASSON
"Like a Burnished Throne":
T.S. Eliot and the Demonism of Technology

J. DENNIS HUSTON
"The Wonder of Unexpected Supply":
Robert Frost and a Poetry Beyond Confusion

• • •

Subscription Rates:
$1.00 for single copies
$3.00 a year (4 issues)
$5.00 for two years
Available at bookstores or from 110 Morrill Hall
Michigan State University
East Lansing, Michigan 48823

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

The theatre "capital" of my recent one-month excursion to Europe was Bucharest.

In Budapest where I attended a conference of the International Theatre Institute—"The Theatre as Companion of Man," about which I shall speak further on—I was distressed to find the theatre laggard as compared to other cities in Eastern Europe. This may be too hasty a judgment as I was informed by some of my Hungarian colleagues that the better productions—one for instance of Gorky's Lower Depths—were not to be seen when the ITI affair was in session. What I saw were rather dull versions of Hungary's "classics" on heroic subjects occasionally redeemed by effective décor.

The big Budapest hits were Hello, Dolly and My Fair Lady. Noticeable too were revivals of old-time Molnar and Lengyel comedies, recalling a way of life that is gone for good. There are able actors on the Hungarian stage who work very hard to earn a living commensurate with their station as honored artists. To compensate for her meager pay, one prominent actress was playing the lead in Hello, Dolly at one theatre, Electra at another and a movie star at a third —all in one week.

In a play called The Family Tot, a presumably superior contemporary Hungarian play, said to be a lampoon of the Soviet mentality camouflaged under the mask of an absurdist parable, I saw an actor who the next night at another theatre was in Molnar's The Play's the Thing. Many of the actors add to their earnings by undertaking roles in pictures while playing on the stage in the evening.

The Bucharest stage—along with that of Prague—is the liveliest in the Balkan countries. There were no signs of Socialist realism, and there was something "experimental" or adventurous in almost every performance I attended. Literalness or strict fidelity to the texts as the authors may have conceived them seem to be consciously shunned, as if dependence on the play script were a sign of mediocrity or banality. The intention seemed to be somehow to contradict the dramatist. Everyone strains for originality. The results were nearly always stimulating even when they failed to be altogether convincing.

The most satisfying of these productions was the least pretentious. It was a production of Carnival Scenes, a play written in 1885 by I. L. Caragile, a dramatist highly regarded in Romania. The production, tumultuously and hilariously inventive in the wildest sort of commedia dell'arte tradition, is a triumph of gaiety and malice. Where the author was, I am sure, poking gentle fun at local manners, the young and brilliant director, Lucian Pintele, turned the play into extravagantly physical farce in which the scrubby fun of the old days was mercilessly exposed in raffish riot. The acting was superb.

The same director has produced The Cherry Orchard in a mode which would bewilder its author and must horrify those Russians who see it today. However, it pleases the Romanians, who have never been particularly enamored of Chekhov. Chekhov considered his play a comedy; Pintele's production verges on farce. The characters are kidded; pathos is almost entirely absent. The atmosphere is bright, sight gags abound, there are quasi-cinematic effects. The achievement here, the actor-director-producer, Liuiu Ciulei, told me, was to make Chekhov popular for the first time in Romania.

Ciulei plays Danton in his own production of Büchner's Danton's Death. It is scenically so complex a production that it was rehearsed for five months, of which five weeks were devoted to dress rehearsals alone. The most gratifying aspect of this occasion was its detail of characterization. It developed an individual life for each member of the large cast down to the last supernumerary, and there was a wonderfully truthful interplay in the entire company.

The most original production of all was that of Rameau's Nephew, a philosophic dialogue by Diderot which was never intended for the theatre as it is wholly devoid of what is commonly called "action." But it is all action and a visual feast in the amazing staging by David Essig. It employs a battery of man-sized mirrors constantly turned to different angles so that the two speaking characters become multiple images representing many more figures than occupy the stage: they constitute a whole environment, a society. The man who plays Diderot's interlocutor, the no-account, "bohemian" iconoclast who is Rameau's putative nephew, is an extraordinary young actor of fabulous verve, Gheorghie Damisca, who also plays Robespierre in Danton's Death. What makes this production important as well as memorable beyond the fascination of its setting and the graphic power of its acting is that it demonstrates how purely intellectual material can be translated into vivid theatre.

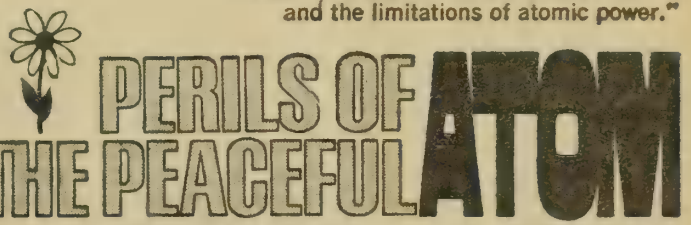
Ionesco too is played with fierce energy and considerable ingenuity. A very young director, André Serban, has made a colorfully handsome spectacle of Brecht's Good Woman of Setzuan with an excellent student company from the provinces. Serban has taken liberties with the text and has made the play much more of a vociferous social protest than Brecht intended his largely ironical play to be. But even the Belgian Ghelderode, a dramatist who was something of a "maniac" (a creator of enormous seminal imagination), would have been astonished by what another director has done with Escorial in which the play's two characters, a king and his jester, are just seen hanging together on the two hooks of what looks like a large anchor. This play, the director explains, demonstrates that the end of the quest for power is always murder.

One of the most highly regarded among the new plays is Jonah, a monodrama in which that personage is immured in the whale's belly. He is never delivered from it: instead he commits suicide. As there was no translation available for me to read I could only surmise that the play reveals the influence of Beckett. No such play could be produced today in the Soviet Union.

Two characteristics were especially evident to me in all these productions. They sought and displayed unusually scenic devices of the most modern (eye-catching) design—always in fantastic departures from realism. Indeed the concern for startling settings almost constitutes a vice, but as they are fleshed by lusty acting there is no real cause for complaint. One manifestation of the robustness in the acting is the continuous vocal forte in virtually every production.

The actors' voices are thoroughly trained as well as strong, so once again I cannot say that I was particularly disturbed by the bellowing. Still I wondered why it was so prevalent. Was it exultation at the freedom the theatre permitted (all the theatres are state supported), or a means of shouting some sort of protest or a cry for liberation (against what and whom?), or was this only an expression of ebullience, enthusiasm, a glorified battle cry? Theatre folk in Bucharest all look satisfied, confident, happy as almost nowhere else in Europe.

I have already referred to the Budapest ITI conference. There was another and more engaging one in Bucharest that was supposed to deal with the training of new directors. Certain significant tendencies declared themselves at both these occasions. The Russians and those who echo them—the Russians themselves said little—emphasized the theatre's function to serve as the "companion of man," by which they meant that drama must be affirmative, encouraging, optimistic. When I interjected that this was all very fine but that I wished the talk would turn to the nature and definition of good and bad plays and that furthermore certain "pessimistic" plays possessed more vitality than some of the "optimistic" ones I had seen in the Soviet Union, a Bulgarian delegate took offense at what she believed was my inference that good plays were written only in the capitalist countries.



Again in Bucharest a Polish critic took exception to what he called my "pragmatism" because I insisted that specific values be discussed rather than ideologic generalities. The lack of "philosophy," the Pole insinuated, explained why the American theatre was so impoverished. I responded that what we needed in the American theatre is not so much a "philosophy" as economic and organizational means to break through the show-biz bottleneck.

Then Charles Marowitz, an American director active in London, chimed in with the thought that the new theatre was totally unlike the theatre both the Polish critic and I had been talking about, for we were both speaking of a theatre that took for granted a reality which no longer existed. The "new" men—and he cited John Cage in this regard—were bent on exploiting the ambiguity or chaos of present circumstances, in making a theatre of permanent revolution, in other words "happenings." Happenings do not intend to represent anything but to foment reaction.

I was tempted to rejoin that some of these latter-day theatre aesthetes made me imagine a person espousing a new school of architecture which consisted entirely in the destruction of all existing

"One of the ugliest clouds overhanging America."
—David E. Lilienthal

"Once a bright hope shared by all mankind, including myself," writes the former Chairman of the Atomic Energy Commission, "the rash proliferation of atomic power plants has become one of the ugliest clouds overhanging America. Whether the pace can be slowed, it is difficult to say; but that this book will have to be answered by those responsible for this proliferation . . . seems to me clear . . . PERILS OF THE PEACEFUL ATOM is far and away the most comprehensive and sensible statement ever made about the hazards and the limitations of atomic power."

BY RICHARD CURTIS & ELIZABETH HOGAN

Just published; $5.95 at all booksellers buildings. One thing did become clear in the prattle that followed on the validity of happenings: there now is a breach (in theory at least) between those who want to "theatricalize" the theatre by doing away with the pre-eminence of its literary sources and those who resist resolving the problem in such negative terms. This debate also struck me as much too abstract to lead to practical clarity. There is more sociological meaning in it (apart from a certain taint of personal pushiness) than artistic relevance. The proof of the puffing will always remain the product in public view.

DOUBLEDAY

Those who find literary texts (especially the "classics") stultifying often set up a great clamor in the name of Artaud, whom they barely understand, and talk about "total theatre," "the theatre of cruelty" and the like; or they give themselves up body and soul to the new Magus, the Polish director, Grotowski, whose work they still know only superficially. Courses on Grotowski's methods are already being given in English schools and theses written about it by Americans for academic honors. I saw students in Amsterdam make hash of a Ghelderode play produced "à la Grotowski," in which I was assured they had no real interest.

If the master is inappositely quoted, imitated, falsified, it is certainly not his fault. I look forward to seeing his productions, some of which will be given in New York in September, and I shall not be prejudiced by what has previously been said, done or written by the hordes of his ready-made epigoni. Everyone knows that Marx was no "Marxist," Freud no "Freudian" and Stanislavsky no "Methodist." Even Brecht finally exclaimed, "To hell with my theories!"

THE POOR MAN MOVES THROUGH WASHINGTON, D.C.: SPRING 1968

"But now on that hill whose mass is hung as a wave behind us. . . . It is not going to be easy to look into their eyes."
James Agee, Let Us Now Praise Famous Men

This afternoon he is walking down the city's sunlight, his vision shaded by the scar tissue above his heart. And he is bringing a load of firewood in his arms.
These are the different logs of his rage.
The identical bones of his children.
The days that have stayed there in his hands, wanting the ashes of evening.
The White House gleams before him ringed with clean National Guard rifles that fire votes.
Against these the poor man owns one pile of belongings, swelling beneath their cord . . .
Pulled from the abandoned slum of his fathers body.
They are penetrated only by the insects.

EUGENE RUGGLES

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

Whereas a great deal of the graphic art produced in Paris between the wars was aimed to preserve the artist's autographic touch, as fleshy and nuanced as possible, the present boom in American graphics allows for greater play with mechanical reproductive processes. Jasper Johns's graphics, seen lately at Castelli, are a kind of research into co-expressibility, a play with crossovers of imagery between the different channels of painting and printing. Roy Lichtenstein's lithographs of Monet's "Rouen Cathedral and Haystacks" (Castelli Graphics) consist of six versions of Rouen Cathedral and seven versions of the double haystacks. Monet showed twenty versions of the cathedral in 1895, all from the same point of view, but each painting a unique episode, an unrepeatable record. Although Lichtenstein shows only six versions, they have a potential for continuation and repetition, because he used a technique of overlap, that connotes machine reproduction rather than uniqueness of experience. Lichtenstein handles architectural form better than loose or casual forms like the plumped-down haystacks, so it is the cathedral façades that I shall pursue here, as more congenial to his formal sense.

The multiple coruscation of Monet's colors are reduced to a combination of two or three one-color screens, the regularly perforated grids of which produce a dazzle effect derived from Lichtenstein's Op Art landscapes of four years ago. A blue-red combination makes the façade jump like a rippling flag, a blue-black combination is dense and secretive, a yellow-black pairing hammers at the retina, and a pure yellow image is as sweetly staccato as a shower of petals. The dots are large, as firm and clear as drops of mercury, and smaller starlike forms appear where superimposed screens overlap. The dots clot and coagulate (without any linear framework to brace them) into zigzagging interstices that set up equivocal readings. We have, as it were, choices of space location in reading the image. Sometimes the façade of the cathedral appears behind the screen of color dots, sometimes it is locked within the lattice, and sometimes it is a mirage in front of the screen.

This is not the first time that Lichtenstein has borrowed the work of another artist. As early as 1962, before people were used to his comic-strip images, he applied his technique of black contours, flat colors, and areas dotted to simulate Benday screens to subjects derived from fine art. His first were a Picasso seated woman and a Cézanne portrait of his wife. Since "Picasso has become a kind of popular object," Lichtenstein remarked, why not paint one of his works as subject matter, which he did. When he painted Mondrian as a grainy reproduction in 1964 he brought out the period look of the geometry in a way that contributed to the subject of his own subsequent Art Déco paintings, in which a style rather than one artist was the subject.

"When I do a 'Mondrian' or a 'Picasso' it has, I think, a sort of sharpening effect because I'm trying to make a commercialized Picasso or Mondrian." The impulse to "switch" (a word Lichtenstein used in conversation with Alan Soloman) the work of Monet to a commercial technique is more complex, because at least the other artists are linear to start with (the Cézanne was mediated by a compositional diagram). Lichtenstein's intentions apropos Monet can be clarified by an observation he made in an interview with John Coplans: "There is something humorous about doing a sunset in a solidified way, especially the rays, because a sunset has little or no specific form." And there is something "humorous" in switching Monet's painting to a flat, hard, systematic graphic technique. (Lichtenstein has also done paintings after Monet, but with the same graphic technique of overlays.) Monet's subject was not only the west front of Rouen cathedral but its appearances at different times of day and perceived with different emotional stresses. The sensuous and the momentary are quantified by Lichtenstein as a Morse code of color separations.

I don't want to get into one of those dutiful apologies for tough words bruising tender pictures, but one difficulty of art criticism should be mentioned here. It is possible to project too much art history onto contemporary artists, overlooking the fact that the knowledge of artists does not necessarily square with that of critics and historians. Nevertheless, Lichtenstein's hardening of Monet does have a historical precedent. The Haystack series influenced Mondrian to do a haystack series of his own around 1908. A little later Mondrian developed a plus-and-minus form of drawing derived from the west front of a church in Paris. This form of notation, in which systematic small points serve as a code, are in the background of Lichtenstein's own use of dots. (In a way these lithographs are like a neo-Impressionist revision of Monet, done not by Seurat but by Signac with his large and blunt version of Seurat's pointillism.) Thus Lichtenstein, after imitating Mondrian, has gone back through him to Monet, or so it seems. The sequence is not in the least esoteric or theoretical, as both Mondrian's early work and Monet's series-paintings have become very familiar in recent years. The subjects have the congenial currency of clichés, which would make them available to an artist without his becoming a graduate student.

Lichtenstein has a firm design sense, usually rather traditionally employed, with a reliance on graded checks and balances, and his forms are usually stable in relation to the edge of the picture area. However, the function of allusion in these firmly composed works is not so settled; in fact, a radical notion of cliché as subject matter is proposed. Lichtenstein has declared that by selecting existing subjects to paint, he is freed from having to invent them (a stand he shares with abstract painters, who repeat single images in series to escape the drama of invention). His work is nonabstract without being realist. By choosing unknowing collaborators, to whom he leaves the chore of invention, Lichtenstein frees himself to switch a comic strip by an anonymous or unknown artist into a fine art content, or a work of art that belongs in one system of values to another set. Thus at the heart of the picture, where we expect the property called meaning, the work's humanistic validation, Lichtenstein places a problem of conversion. In this slightly demoralizing collaboration, the dimension of cliché claims the status of meaning. Actually, Lichtenstein's act of switching is his equivalent of the act of invention, but his annexing of existing sign-systems has a malicious ambiguity that his formal neatness deceptively shields.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

The musico-theatrical opportunism evident in Krzysztof Penderecki's first opera, The Devils of Loudon (given its première on June 20 at the Hamburg State Opera), was not exactly a surprise in the light of his previous works, notably the St. Luke Passion (well performed last season in New York by the Minnesota Symphony; recorded on Victrola VICS-6015) and the Dies Irae (on Philips PHS 900-184). The recent vogue for this exceedingly primitive music may be seen as one possible consequence of an ill-informed listening public, as could the fad for Carl Orff in the 1950s. The latter's Carmina Burana adapted the rhythmic procedures of Stravinsky's Les Noces to an easily acceptable harmonic context, with vast success among an audience then hardly acquainted with the original source.

Penderecki's means are, of course, different (for one thing, meter is out of fashion nowadays), but the principle is related. Using an amalgam of tone-cluster harmonies and flashy instrumental sound effects, he conjures up a spectacular surface that is totally novel to the traditional oriented listener—although tone clusters have been around for decades, and most of the textural effects can be traced back at least to the music Xenakis was writing more than ten years ago (at a time, incidentally, when the much younger Penderecki was writing music that clearly demonstrated the direct influence of Orff: see the Psalms of David recorded on Polish Muza XL 0260). The secret of success in this context—and the root of the objection—is not the eclecticism but rather the superficial, nonstructural use of the borrowed techniques: the "novelty" is used only in a trivial way, no demands are made on the listener, and much less resistance encountered than is normally the case with "advanced" contemporary music.

Thus, in the St. Luke Passion, the harmonic basis of much of the piece consists of a series of progressions from a single note to a cluster of all twelve tones, a tightening of the screw from repose to maximum dissonance, and the only large-scale movement is the progress from one to another of those single notes, ending with a Great Big common chord of G major that has all of the associations, if none of the functions, of a point of arrival. Similarly, the instrumental and choral devices operate purely as sound effects for narrative illustrations and—frequently—shock value. Add to

For insights into youth's disenchantment with contemporary bureaucratic values!

ROBERT PRESTHUS'

The Organizational Society

— Over 50,000 copies sold —
($1.95 at your bookstore)

A VINTAGE BOOK (V-528)

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

AMERICA—Change It or Lose It. This bumper-sticker, 35c each or 3/$1.00. Send to: Revolutionary Playthings, P.O. Box 25335, West Los Angeles, Calif. 90025.

POEMS WANTED FOR QUARTERLY PUBLICATION. Submit short poems.— POETRY PAGEANT, Box 3677-NMZ, Washington, D. C. 20007.

ATTRACTIVE OPPORTUNITY for volunteers International Human Rights efforts associated with the U. N. Hours optional. Write: Room 1121, 156 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10010.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE — requires protein containing lysine. Make contraceptives free everywhere. Grand Central Sta. 4069, New York City.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

The Best Way To Get

THE NATION

THE NATION 7-28-69

333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10

☐ Two Years, $18

☐ 6 Months, $6

☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Address .....

City .....

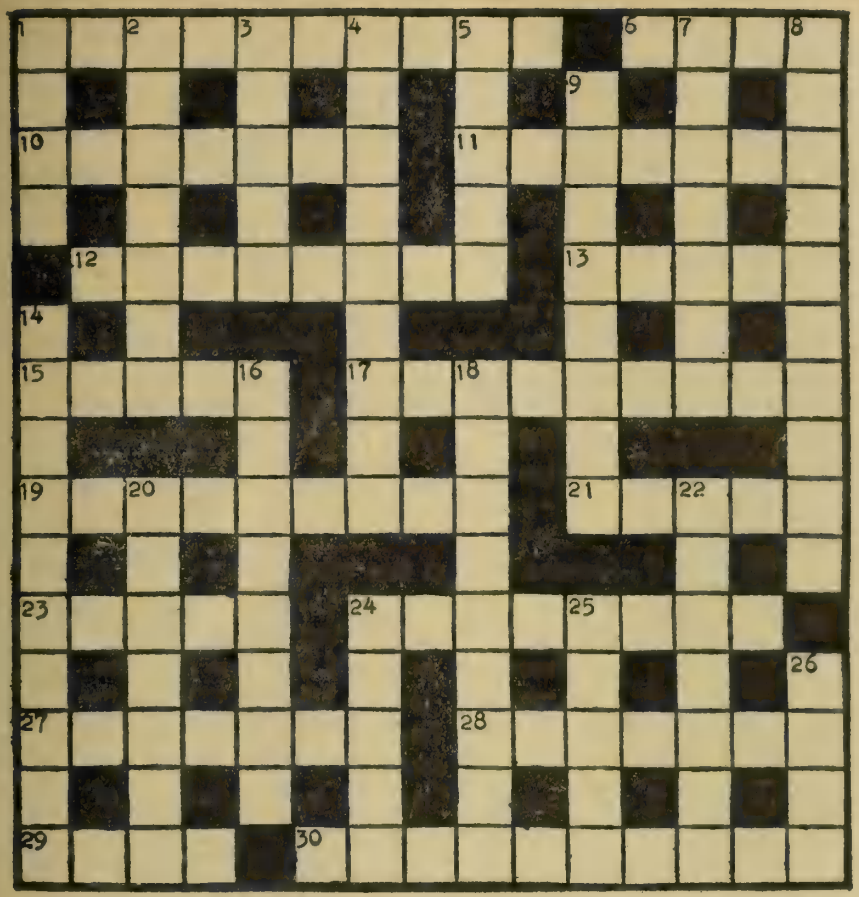
State ..... Zip No. .....

this the friendly associations of Gregorian chant, and you have sure-fire "modern music for people who hate modern music" (it is also probably true that Penderecki's position as a Catholic composer from a Communist country tends to predispose audiences in his favor).

The new opera, interestingly enough, found little favor with the Hamburg audience and press, but I would be hard put to apportion this response among the various possibilities: local opposition to Rolf Liebermann's directorship, the theatrical ineptitudes of the work, and growing awareness of the insubstantiality of this particular emperor's "new" clothes (the reception at Stuttgart, a few nights later, is said to have been more favorable). The composer made his own libretto from John Whiting's dramatic adaptation of Aldous Huxley's book; for the most part, it is simply a crude abridgement, with a few characteristic additions: extended passages of liturgical Latin, and elaborations of the Grand-Guignol aspects. What is left, pretty well stripped of its political overtones and many of its narrative points, is a bare tale of sexually motivated diabolism, pivoting around a series of ever more elaborate possession scenes (rather reminiscent of the traditional structure of pornographic novels, in which each orgy surpasses the previous one in quantity, variety and perversity).

Of course, the librettos of many successful operas have little more substance than this, but they compensate by the consistency, relevance and organization of their musical content. Much of The Devils follows Penderecki's well-worn paths, with sonic Grand-Guignol to match the visual (up to and including what I do not doubt is the first musical depiction ever of an enema). Backstage choruses scream, laugh, mutter, hum and even sing, while the orchestra alternates between long-held notes or clusters and dense clouds of quick notes: most of this made its obvious intended effect. The surest danger sign of the composer's basic unwillingness to come to terms with the problems of operatic composition, however, was the extensive reliance on spoken dialogue, even in crucial scenes, many of which are simply played straight over those interminable pedal notes and clusters, thus in no way relating to even the primitive musical ideas present elsewhere. It is true that nearly every word of the text could be easily understood—but if your only means of achieving this is to speak the text, why bother with music at all? Aside from the ululations of the possessed sisterhood, the only consistently profiled musical material was that allotted to the chemist and the surgeon, modeled with embarrassing directness on the doctor in Wozzeck.

The Hamburg staging was slick and professional, carefully underlining the work's sensationalism, adding a company of grotesque whores, dwarfs and idiots who cavorted obscenely about the stage between and during the scenes. From what I heard about rehearsal circumstances, it seems likely that many details of the score were not accurately realized—they are not in a number of the "official" Polish recordings of Penderecki's music, for that matter—but an examination of the score suggests that this cannot have mattered too much, given the considerable imprecision of compositional conception to begin with. (A recording was said to be in preparation, so doubtless this point can be verified at a later date.) Among the singers, Tatiana Troyanos as the Ursuline Prioress confirmed the exceptional impression she made during the New York visit of the Hamburg company in 1967. The conductor was Henryk Czyz.



The Devils was the major event in a season of contemporary opera presented in Hamburg in conjunction with the festival of the International Society for Contemporary Music (about which I hope to report in a later column). I was also able to hear another recent Hamburg commission, Die Reise by the Swedish composer Lars Johan Werle. Its trite, densely symbolic plot—the futility of modern life, the eternal triangle, man's need for a quest or cause—is expressed in an endlessly repetitive series of epistolary flashbacks, and the music relies far too heavily on pastiche and montage effects. Nevertheless, for the first third of the evening, Die Reise was a skillfully paced amalgam of traditional and modern orchestral clichés, contemporary pop sound, and taped concrète material, enormously enhanced by the stage design of Josef Svoboda, whose virtuosity with multiple film and still projections should be put to use by one of the New York opera companies (in the unlikely event that they should undertake an appropriate contemporary work). Unfortunately, Werle eventually bogged down in an overextended parody episode and never recovered even the superficial theatrical flair of the opening scenes, let alone a really convincing musical continuity.

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1307

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 What some tourists look up to, suggestive of "Fiddler on the Roof"? (10)
6 and 1 down It might indicate how to take off and roll up the hose. (4,4)
10 What Baum's lion didn't have of yours and mine inside his bars. (7)
11 Stand for just about anything? (7)
12 The disorderly type gain a Nilotic example, perhaps. (8)
13 One might take it on board ship, but not when associated with the log. (5)
15 It has fragrant rootstock. (5)
17 Such cotton is not found around the eye.
19 Estimated to be a very quiet sign erected. (9)
21 Only a vegetable comes back to oppose by contrary proof! (5)
23 See 5 down
24 One should look out for a horologist. (8)
27 At least it's close to the funny bone! (7)
28 Point to a returned article on grammatical form—the garden variety, perhaps.
29 Complete absence of a person being in order, one hears. (4)
30 They don't see things so good! (10)

DOWN

1 See 6 across
2 It's impossible to get it, though you might look. (7)
3 Commonly the best bite. (5)
4 The Red, perhaps, in a person's makeup, shows what most of you readers are! (9)
5 and 23 across The mysterious character of Dickens. (5,5)
7 Descriptive of the strife of crowds? (7)
8 Might be roasted, not necessarily charged, and perhaps set to go off. (10)
9 Type of current automobile; stick around for the game! (8)
14 Occasionally a form of present and past. (3,3,4)
16 and 22 down Commonly established essentials for some safaris, but they should hold their colors well. (8,7)
18 Ties saved by those that lower functional activity. (9)
20 How to hold up a person—one the stage coach might rely on. (4,3)
22 See 16 down
24 How to ruin a stew, and make it worthless? (5)
25 One that might be pursued in the game with a number of quarters, but not for the men. (5)
26 Girl who might raise something joined with 6. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1306

ACROSS: 1 Hand-in-glove; 9 Play down; 10 Volley; 11 Vacuums; 12 Protect; 14 Astern; 15 Antiphon; 17 Material; 20 Heeled; 22 Insight; 24 Snagged; 26 Balsam; 27 Aromatic; 28 Standoffish. DOWN: 2 As you were; 3 Doorman; 5 Leveret; 6 Valet; 7 Pleats; 8 Reecho; 16 Pier glass; 18 Annual; 19 Inhuman; 20 Hand off; 21 Emetic; 23 Inset; 25, 4 and 13 Cat-o-nine-tails.

EDUCATIONAL

SUMMERHILL CAMP AND SCHOOL. Freedom with responsibility, learning because its exciting, not compulsory. Summer program: reading, math, nature, swimming, riding, camping, art, music, drama, group discussions. OPEN COMMUNITY SCHOOL, Box 5N, Claverack, N.Y. 12513.

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Opening this fall. Grades 10-11, boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational but seriously Christian related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor, Self Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor seeks a socially-minded, non-political organization to sponsor the endless line of Symbolical World Presidents. First choice, Methodist Council of Bishops. Reader, contact Methodist Bishops.

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

GANDHI'S WRITINGS. 200 titles. Also, out-of-print books about Gandhi. Free list. Greenleaf Books, Canterbury, N.H.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

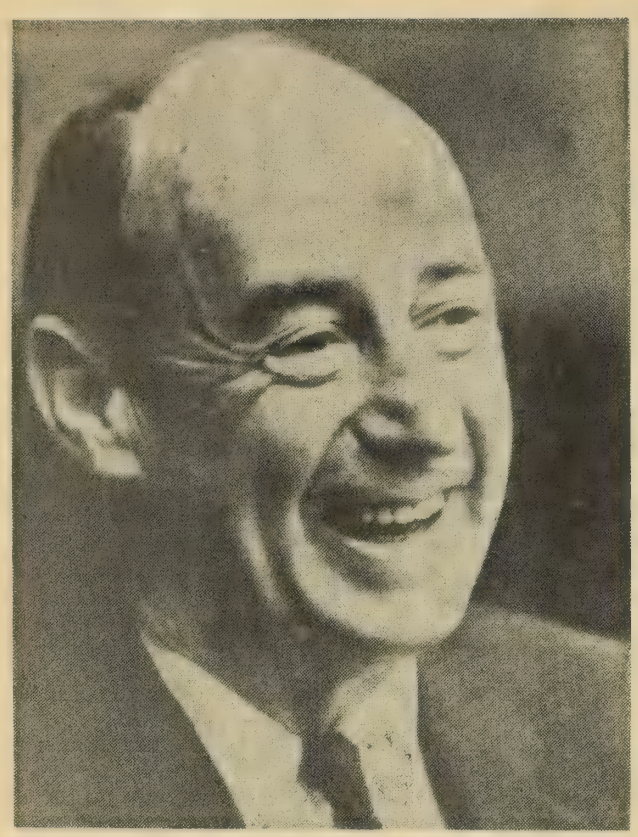
Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Advertising Rates

CLASSIFIED

74c a line (6 words) Three-line minimum



CLASSIFIED DISPLAY

$7.42 per inch (minimum)

The NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

It wasn't all smiles...

Adlai Stevenson was a man of peace and a dedicated opponent of unilateral military action by the United States. Yet he was also the man who defended before the United Nations such U.S. interventions as the Bay of Pigs invasion, the Dominican crisis and the Vietnam War. Many have asked the question: why?

Richard Walton has attempted to answer this question in THE REMNANTS OF POWER: The Tragic Last Years of Adlai Stevenson. As principal Voice of America correspondent to the UN from 1962 to 1967, Walton had a unique opportunity to witness Stevenson's crisis years as our UN Ambassador. The result is an indictment of U.S. foreign policy.

The NATION has a long history as a magazine presenting the truth to the American public. We at The NATION feel that THE REMNANTS OF POWER offers valuable insights into one of our most distinguished statesmen and the foreign policy aims with which he came into conflict.

So that you can have this important book, we are offering THE REMNANTS OF POWER as a gift to each new one-year subscriber to The NATION. Join us now.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free THE REMNANTS OF POWER by Richard Walton.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6.

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 7-28

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

THE DRAFT SHOULD GO JOHN M. SWOMLEY, JR.

THE NATION

AUGUST 11, 1969 35 cents

5-70R P
BURLINGAME
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 940

BURLINGAME
AUG 1 ? 1969
LIBRARY

The Panthers' White Conference

ROBERT A. JONES

CROSSROADS OF AFRICA

ETHIOPIA'S UNKNOWN WAR JACK KRAMER

AFTER TOM MBOYA STANLEY MEISLER

Campus Witch Hunt

THE COLLEGES PLAY BALL FRANK J. DONNER

Florence Howe on Doris Lessing

LETTERS

for scenarios

Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIRS: I found the article by Yorick Blumenthal, "Scenario Society" [The Nation, June 23] superficial in the extreme. While it is possible and necessary to deplore the silliness and ill effects of Pentagon scenarios, this hardly makes a convincing case for doing away with them in general.

Scenarios are nothing new, for military purposes or any other. If one substitutes "plans" for "scenarios," very little is lost. . . . Now, plans may "profane the imagination," but they may also help people deal with the future. For instance, a good scenario (a realistic one) may help a person anticipate the consequences of his own actions; I wish the United States Government would try to do more of that. . . .

Ronald Westrum

offshore rights

Joplin, Mo.

DEAR SIRS: I notice in your editorial "PR Diplomacy" [June 16] a reference to Ecuador's insistence on a 200-mile territorial limit offshore. During World War II Roosevelt pressured Peru and Ecuador to establish this 200-mile jurisdiction. So Peru and Ecuador are at present within their rights to act on it, and the United States is simply wrong.

W. A. Seiler

masculinists

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: In my review, "Women's Liberation" [The Nation, June 16], I described The New Masculinist, a category developed by Caroline Bird, and included David Riesman as an example. In fact, there is no evidence in Mrs. Bird's Born Female that Professor Riesman endorses the view of The New Masculinists. She reported only that he has "stated the prevailing view."

Nancy Reeves

he has his own

Boston, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: The author of "yet another of those liner notes that blindly and uncomprehendingly repeat the composer's opaque farrago of pseudo-musical pseudo-science" [The Nation, June 9] would like to ask if David Hamilton inherited the typewriter as well as the staff position of Benjamin Boretz.

Harry Neville crossed wires

Akron, Ohio

DEAR SIRS: In the June 30 issue of The Nation, Arthur E. Rowse ["The 'Failing' Newspaper Probe: The Press Dummies Up"] includes Knight newspapers as one of the "chief backers" of the "Newspaper Preservation Act." Mr. Rowse is in error. At no time have we participated, either publicly or privately, in behalf of this legislation.

John S. Knight, Editorial Chairman
Knight Newspapers, Inc.

Mr. Rowse informs us that he based his statement on the testimony of Morris J. Levin, an attorney and chief lobbyist for the bill, who said he was speaking "on behalf of all the publishers who are engaged in joint newspaper operations."

The Editors

EDITORIALS

Mr. Nixon's Journeys

The British would call him a "tripper." He has always been more interested in foreign affairs than in the domestic problems of the Executive, and no one will begrudge him the opportunity, if he feels it will give him fresh insights or a broader perspective, to acquaint himself personally with the views of his opposite numbers in other countries. With modern means of travel he can cover a great deal of territory in relatively little time and, once started, he might as well continue around the world as retrace his route. But it does seem that this President has spent a rather disproportionate part of his first six months on the move, or in dealing with foreign affairs while at home. And, so far, there is not much to show for it all.

Mr. Nixon's most urgent problem is, of course, Vietnam. Related to Vietnam but on a larger scale, is American policy toward the countries of Asia generally, and particularly those that are in substance military and diplomatic allies of the United States. It is difficult to see how the current trip has clarified either situation; if anything, they are more muddled than before.

As to Vietnam, Mr. Nixon is caught between popular opposition to the war at home and the reluctance of his military commanders to abate the fighting. His distress is compounded by a desire to conclude an "honorable" peace, i.e., one that will not grossly compromise American status as a great power (by definition undefeatable) nor damage his Administration irreparably in domestic politics. In trying to end the war on these difficult terms Mr. Nixon seems to be trying to placate both the hawks and the doves, with the predictable result that he satisfies neither. Somewhat the same mechanism seems to be operating in the area of general Asian policy. The contradictions are swathed in vague language compounded of a desire to keep the local dignitaries happy and dissatisfied parties off the Presidential back—at least for now.

Thus, starting on his journey to apprise his hosts that the United States did not intend to move masses of infantry into Asian countries threatened by subversion, in Bangkok Mr. Nixon attempted to allay Thai fears with the statement that the United States "will stand proudly with Thailand against those who might threaten it from abroad or from within." "Stand," of course, might mean anything; still, the statement, while perhaps reassuring to the Thai satraps, is at variance with a statement Mr. Nixon made four days earlier on Guam, where he seemed to promise a reduction of American involvement in Asian defense. The difference is that any such reduction is poison in Thailand (among the governing elite at least), while from Guam it is relayed home, where it may boost Mr. Nixon's rating in the popularity polls.

Badgered by the newsmen, the unhappy White House press secretary, Ronald L. Ziegler, insisted that Mr. Nixon's remarks in Bangkok were "totally consistent" with what he had said on Guam. Later Mr. Ziegler produced a written statement which Mr. Nixon, or someone in his entourage, had prepared on the flight from Jakarta to Bangkok. "Our determination to honor our commitments," Mr. Nixon wrote, "is fully consistent with our conviction that the nations of Asia can and must increasingly shoulder the responsibility for achieving peace and progress in the area." But when he was accepting the keys to the city he stood "proudly" against those who might threaten Thailand from abroad or from within.

From Bangkok Mr. Nixon flew to Saigon. Although he had seen President Nguyen Van Thieu in June, apparently it was necessary to reassure him. Whatever the reason for this side trip, the opportunities for additional mischief seem greater than those for clarification. In fact, when one reviews Mr. Nixon's foreign policy record to date, does this judgment not seem to apply generally?

The Kennedy Ordeal

If a ruthless political enemy of Edward Kennedy had seized the opportunity placed in his hands to destroy the Senator's career, we might have witnessed some such scenario as that which followed the accident of July 18 on Chappaquiddick Island. We make no such assumption, of course, but the fact is that, following the accidental drowning of Mary Jo Kopechne, the long sequence of actions and omissions by the Senator and his family, friends, advisers, lawyers and even the court and the press, have struck a dismaying blow to his heretofore promising political future. Nearly everyone involved seems to have cooperated to escalate a tragic accident into a full-scale disaster. Disclosures have been made to seem sinister, silences to seem guilty, and the rash, impulsive, understandably ill-considered acts of the central figure have been made to appear as disingenuous attempts to conceal, deceive, or mislead.

We sympathize deeply with the Kopechne family; we sympathize also with the Senator and his family who, counting the cost of a moment's inattention at an unmarked bridge, must be finding it unbelievably high. Condolences are also in order for the millions of disaffected Democrats, young and not so young, who have been looking to Mr. Kennedy to lead them through convention and election in 1972. Predictably, the Democrats of Massachusetts have rallied to support of one of their own. But in the rest of the country it is another matter; it is doubtful that the Kennedy name, for some time to come, will have its former appeal. Honest disbelief, jealousy and resentment, and the persuasion that the terrible jam he is now in must be largely of the Senator's own making, have been getting in their work.

The events preceding and following the death of Miss Kopechne, even the time and exact manner of her death, have not been ascertained and made known. Many questions which should have been answered as a matter of course in circumstances such as these have not even been asked. It is understandable, perhaps, that local authorities would hesitate to question aggressively a Senator of their state or his associates. It is much less understandable that the press would not do so, yet at

NOV 24
MAR 8

IN THIS ISSUE

August 11, 1969

EDITORIALS

98

ARTICLES

102 Front Against Fascism: Panthers' White Conference — Robert A. Jones

Crossroads of Africa

104 Ethiopia's Unknown War — Jack Kramer

106 After Tom Mboya — Stanley Meisler

108 Why the Draft Should Go — John M. Swomley, Jr.

110 Harry Golden

111 Campus Witch Hunt: The Colleges Play Ball — Frank J. Donner

BOOKS & THE ARTS

116 Narrative, History and Prophecy — Florence Howe

118 Since Malcolm's Death — James Weinstein

119 The Arithmetic of Silence — Leslie Epstein

120 A Note to Morning (poem) — Terry Moser

121 Architecture in Mexico — Nathan Silver

122 Poems

Words out of Darkness — Sister Maura
To Ripen — André du Bouchet
Tattoo — Nancy Sullivan
Sea Horses — Flora J. Arnstein
Goose Island — John Judson

125 Music — David Hamilton

125 Films — Robert Hatch

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 209
No. 4

this writing they have not. But it is beyond belief entirely why answers—complete and satisfactory ones—to the obvious questions in this case have not been forthcoming voluntarily from those who participated in the events. A few of the unresolved matters:

(1) The car turned sharply off the macadam road leading to the ferry dock, onto a narrow dirt road, and proceeded to the bridge more than half a mile away. One may imagine a number of innocent or understandable reasons why Senator Kennedy made this detour, and doubtless the real cause is among them. But it could not have been a mistake: nobody in condition to drive a car could confuse a dirt road with a macadam one. Why did not the Senator, in all candor, explain this diversion? Was he advised not to do so, and by whom? The worst possible construction is being put on his lack of frankness here, as was inevitable.

(2) The car, a late model Oldsmobile with a curb height overall of about 4½ feet, was lying on its crushed-in top and the wheels were out of water at low tide. High tide at Edgartown that night came at 3:54 A.M., and its rise and fall is only 2 feet. The accident, if it occurred around 11:30 P.M., came at about two hours after low tide, and therefore there could not have been much more than 4½ feet of water, and perhaps less, at the point where the car lay. The bottom is presumably sandy, since the entire island is made of sand. Senator Kennedy gives credit to Messrs. Markham and Gargan for having "dived" at "risk to their lives" in an attempt to reach Miss Kopechne. It would be more appropriate to refer to wading and stooping. And in water where a person could easily stand, it would appear that the only life that was in hazard was that of the girl trapped in the car. Mr. Kennedy's graciousness seems ill bestowed, and one wonders if he was reminded later, when his shock had worn off, of the great risks taken by his associates.

(3) There is no disputing, however, the serious risk run by a man who, having undergone a severe trauma, a blow on the head, intense physical effort, and with his back in a brace, plunges in the dark into a tidal channel and swims unaided 150 yards to the other side. His chances of making it would have been nil had the current, which in Edgartown runs fast, not been at its slack stage around 1:48 A.M. One wonders why his friends, who had so recently been "risking their lives" in a venture so much less hazardous, did not restrain him and insist he take one of the available boats. Why, indeed, did they allow him to go off alone into the night?

(4) The most crucial question of all is why the police were not informed, either immediately or within the hour. Had this been done, there is some indication that the girl might have been saved with the equipment and manpower which could have been brought up; medical opinion is said to estimate the time of death around 3 A.M., and persons have been known to stay alive for hours in sunken automobiles. Mr. Kennedy, understandably and by his own admission, was in a state of shock and confusion, and cannot be wholly blamed for this failure—which he himself called "indefensible." How defensible, then, is the inaction of two men, in full possession of the facts, not in any state of shock, trained in the law and politically astute? The legal technicality trotted out to explain the failure to do this obvious, necessary and vital act is that a lawyer in Massachusetts cannot take action without the consent of his client. This seems monstrous. A life was at stake. Kennedy was not a client to these men. He was their friend. They proved no friends to him.

Senator Kennedy has been tragically ill-served. His televised statement to the people of Massachusetts, presumably largely the creation of the high-caliber advisers who came and went in Hyannis through the week following the accident, was perhaps sufficient to enlist the voters of his state to his support. But it was woefully inadequate to the needs either of justice on Martha's Vineyard, or to the demands which this country makes of a potential President. He will know this soon enough.

He cannot initiate another statement, of course, but some things could be done. Markham and Gargan could be sharply interrogated by authority empowered to demand answers, instead of the insolence meted out to the press. District Attorney Dinis' call for an inquest is a constructive step. And Senator Kennedy could make use of the press to let the whole story be known. That is easily arranged, and until it is done the Kennedy haters will continue to have a field day, and the future of a young man who has already proved himself a valuable legislator and whose prospects were exceedingly bright will continue to dwindle away.

The Times Does It Again

The story is of major spread and significance. It starts on page one of the July 29 New York Times and runs over into a full page and nearly two columns. The reporter is Walter Rugaber. The subject is testing of new drugs for harmful side effects and collection of blood plasma. It therefore concerns everyone who takes medication—that is to say, the great majority of Americans. In some cases, it would seem that the fewer prescription drugs one takes, the better off one might be.

Asked about precautions in testing new drugs, the average well-informed layman would reply that the manufacturer first tests it on animals, then, with due caution and every possible control, on healthy human beings, and that the Food and Drug Administration supervises the procedure in detail and will not allow the drug to be marketed until it is completely satisfied that it is safe and that such side effects as may be encountered will be publicized within the medical profession. Many physicians are probably under the same impression. This description does not fit the facts, and what is most astonishing and dismaying is that it took our foremost newspaper—but still a newspaper—to ferret out the truth, while the medical press seems to have been oblivious to it.

The facts are that the testing, on behalf of some of the most important pharmaceutical houses, has largely been done on prison inmates by an Oklahoma-born physician,

Dr. Austin R. Stough, who started this work after a brief career as a general practitioner and without formal training in pharmacology. Further, Mr. Rugaber adduces evidence to the effect that the prisoners who were used as test subjects were under only cursory conrtol, and had incentives not to report adverse effects in that their supplementary income depended on their continuing to receive the drugs. Some are said to have failed to swallow the pills, some failed to report illness resulting from the pills they did swallow, and stringent laboratory checks were lacking. All this, according to the Times, was known to the manufacturers and to agencies within the Department of Health, Education and Welfare, but because of bureaucratic lethargy, loopholes in the law and eagerness on the part of the manufacturers to get their product onto the market, no significant corrective action was taken.

None of the states in which Dr. Stough operated (Alabama, Arkansas and Oklahoma) was satisfied with his operations and these were eventually halted in all three. Moreover, serious hepatitis epidemics occurred in some cases where Stough technicians collected blood plasma from prison inmates. Many of those who participated in Dr. Stough's experiments have sickened and some have died. But the drug houses continued to employ his organization. Some officials of these houses were disturbed by what they saw, but one of the largest, Cutting Laboratories, continued to pay Stough hundreds of thousands of dollars because of his "contacts" and because it was through him that permission could be obtained from prison officials to operate the program. He is even now seeking prison connections in new areas.

On the day after the Times published the Stough material, and quoting liberally from it, Sen. Gaylord Nelson (D.,Wis.) said that he would propose legislation to take the responsibility for testing new drugs away from the manufacturers and place it with the Food and Drug Administration. There a testing center would be set up, to which all pharmaceutical companies would submit new drugs on a fee basis. Senator Nelson also announced that the monopoly subcommittee of the Senate Small Business Committee, of which he is chairman, would began investigating Dr. Stough's activities.

The Times is to be congratulated for its enterprise, and the public can be grateful that, at least on this occasion, a newspaper has exposed a shocking and dangerous situation which government authorities and the medical profession should have acted on long since.

But the Problem Remains

After a tumultuous session, the Organization of American States succeeded in establishing peace of a sort between Honduras and El Salvador. Subjected to protracted arm twisting, El Salvador informed OAS that it would withdraw occupation forces from Honduras. The announcement by Dr. Francisco José Guerrero, the Salvadoran foreign minister, was greeted with cheers and applause by the assembled foreign ministers. It remains to be seen whether a durable peace has been achieved. El Salvador insists on security guarantees for its 300,000 nationals who live in Honduras, and it may withdraw its troops only slowly and reluctantly while this question remains in abeyance.

What underlies the two-week war between these two small countries is the poverty and social injustices that plague all of Latin America. The war may have a useful side effect in calling attention to a situation that is certain to result in further outbursts, very likely on a larger scale. Honduras has about four times the land area of El Salvador and a low population density—about twenty-three inhabitants per square kilometer. In El Salvador the population density is the highest in Central America—158 per square kilometer. Consequently some 300,000 Salvadoran peasants migrated to Honduras; this, rather than a riot at a soccer game, precipitated the war.

But even this disparity does not get to the bottom of the conflict. In both Honduras and El Salvador land tenure is on a feudal basis, with 1 or 2 per cent of the farms covering half of the arable acreage. In Honduras the United Fruit Company is one of the large land owners; in both countries wealthy families, allied with the military, are the government. And in both cases American military missions cultivate good relations with the local militarists, lest communism gain a foothold.

Faced with the threat of severe economic sanctions, El Salvador yielded. But as long as Latin American countries are ruled by feudal oligarchies liberally supplied with American arms, peace will exist in name only.

SUMMER SCHEDULE

During the summer, The Nation will not appear on the following dates: August 4, August 18.

Law and Conscience

When sincere moral conviction stands in defiance of the law, the conscience of a democracy is placed on its mettle. It is a sound argument that private principle may not be allowed to override public laws; and indeed those who break the law in the name of a higher compulsion do not often seek to evade the legal consequences.

But when a man stands convicted for acting as his conscience commanded, the law seems blind and unresponsive if it treats him as a common criminal. That, one presumes, was the belief that guided District Judge Carl Muecke when he recently sentenced an Arizona State University draft evader in the federal court at Phoenix. Instead of sending Rodney Bias to jail, Judge Muecke placed him on probation for three years, provided that he work during that period for the government, a nonprofit organization or a charitable institution. Thus the sanctity of the law is upheld, the power of conscience is recognized and a young man of character is sent off to useful work instead of to degenerating confinement.

PANTHERS' WHITE CONFERENCE

ROBERT A. JONES
Mr. Jones is on the editorial staff of the San Francisco Bay Guardian.

We must make a distinction between the enemy and ourselves. We must not treat our comrades as we would the enemy. We must not adopt an antagonistic stand, and there must be no ridiculing.

—Quotations from Chairman Mao Tse-tung.

And when those dirty racist provocateurs tried to interrupt our meetings, we took care of them, didn't we? Right on.

—Bobby Seale, congratulating Black Panther officials after the Conference for a United Front Against Fascism, Oakland, Calif., July 1969.

The people Bobby Seale referred to as "dirty racist provocateurs" were a few white radicals who had, on the opening night of the Panthers' conference, attempted to shout down one of the Panthers' speakers. Failing in that, they walked out, and having walked out, they were barred from the conference. The next day they returned to pass out leaflets condemning the conference. A Black Panther guard grabbed the leaflets; a student grabbed them back. The Panther swung and the student went down, the leaflets fluttering in the air.

A tight circle formed around the two, and for a moment the Panther and the white student looked silently at each other as if they were puzzled. Then the student stood, gathered the scattered leaflets, and left.

"You are witnessing," someone said to his friend, "the reason why the Left will always lose to the Right. It's easier to punch a kid than a cop because the cop has a gun. If the Left has no internal differences it will create them and call a conference to settle them, all to delay facing the cop. You know what we're gonna do at this conference? We're gonna spend three days telling ourselves we're united, and then go out and fight about it."

The genesis of the First Conference for a United Front Against Fascism in America began, according to Seale, almost a year ago when the Panthers and the Peace and Freedom Party, for different reasons, saw the need for support from other militant groups. The Peace and Freedom Party had all but withered after the elections in the Fall of 1968. The Panthers, depending on your interpretation, were about to have the best of years or the worst of years. Huey Newton, the Panther co-founder, would be jailed for two to fifteen years for manslaughter; Eldridge Cleaver, perhaps its best-known leader, would flee the country; two more Panthers would be assassinated in a Los Angeles power struggle with another black militant group; still more would be arrested in New York, some accused of the murder of a fellow Panther, others for an alleged plot to blow up several Manhattan department stores and the Penn Central-New Haven mainline tracks that pass through Harlem. Increasingly, wherever there was racial trouble the Panthers would be charged and a few carted off to jail. In June, with the McClellan investigations well under way, Attorney General John Mitchell gave up all pretense of specific cause and began raiding Panther offices across the nation.

Sometime during the year, according to Seale, plans began to formulate for a mass meeting of "all proletarian type organizations." Lasting a week, it was to construct a single organization from the mass of farm workers, laborers, students and minorities.

Although the Panthers had, in the past, formed alliances with predominately white groups, as in the Peace and Freedom Party coalition in 1968, this was the first time they took the initiative. The pre-conference literature was hopefully and carefully worded to avoid hints of racial bias. The accompanying pictures repeated the symbol of oppression common to all groups: a policeman with a menacing club or gun. As James S. Kunen, recent college graduate, hitchhiker and nationally syndicated columnist has put it, "Everybody I know has been hit by a cop."

The conference began in the moderate splendor of a summer night in the Oakland flatland. The smog wafted softly in the trees. On the lawn in front of the Oakland Auditorium the young, and many not young, gathered in what looked like a huge picnic. Although the police had several carloads of men ready blocks away, they were well out of sight and would remain so throughout the weekend (except that, some time between 8 A.M. and 10 A.M. on Saturday, every parked car for blocks around the auditorium was ticketed for violation of the one-hour parking limit). On Friday evening the air was warm and relaxed. When the doors opened almost two hours behind schedule, the 4,000 or so white students, blacks, Chicanos, Indians, Japanese, laborers and farm workers lined up, were frisked at the door, and the conference started. If for nothing but its composition, the meeting was remarkable.

But, as one local priest lamented on the last day, the heterogeneity of the participants was much more theoretical than real. In fact, at least 85 per cent, and perhaps 90 per cent, of the crowd was white, and almost all of these were students. Of the remaining few per cent, almost all were black.

There were other reasons for apprehension on the first night. Despite repeated denials of racism and separatism, the Panthers sat in a closed semicircle of seats in the rear of the auditorium. Usually their section was silent and staring. A Panther leader passed by, glanced at the faces and smiled: "Don't look so evil, brothers."

Even among the huge body of militant whites there was a mosaic of loyalties, shaky coalitions and open competition. As the evening began a young man gathered names for a petition. After one signature he asked the signer:

"You in any organization?"

"Peace and Freedom Party since October 1967. I helped found it."

"Yippee."

"Yeah, yippee. I guess you're Progressive Labor."

"That's right."

"Shit."

"Yeah, shit."

Understanding the gamble that was inherent in such an organizational collection, Seale used his keynote address to focus the conference away from rivalry and onto its principal villain: the police and what Seale identified as "the two chief weapons of fascism—demagogy and terror."

> You must understand the two faces of fascism in America today. On one hand you see some lying politician like Mussolini Mafioso Alioto [Joseph Alioto, Mayor of San Francisco] saying that what he wants is academic freedom in San Francisco, and on the other hand you see that same man on the same day sending his personal storm troopers, the tactical squad, out to San Francisco State to bust heads and kick asses of anyone and everyone willing to tell the truth.
>
> Fascism means the brutalizing terror that the state uses against the people to enforce their enslavement. We will not sit around and wait to fight fascism just because 6 million people are not in concentration camps—yet.

Seale had struck both the tone and the content of the weekend. In the three days more than fifty speakers would repeat what he had said. The prescribed categories for the sessions, Women vs. Fascism, Workers vs. Fascism, Students vs. Fascism, and Religion vs. Fascism, would be largely ignored. Arriving late on Saturday night, I asked another reporter what I had missed. "Were you here last night?" he asked. "Yes," I said. "Then don't worry about it."

There were a few exceptions. In the three days no one caught the mood of the audience as well as a stocky Southern boy who had moved to Chicago, lived for years in its northside ghetto, and eventually formed the Young Patriots, a white copy of the Panthers. "When I go up before that McClellan committee," he said, and his voice tapered in a practical drawl, "I'm gonna bite off that old man's head and spit it in Tricky Dick's eye." The crowd went wild.

But as speeches followed one after another, an uneasiness settled on the conference. The organizational meetings that were to form the structure for the Front were not taking place. On Saturday night the SDS caucus was called and called off three times. The few meetings that did take place accomplished little. Mrs. Margaret Wright, a high school teacher from Los Angeles, described the closed caucus of the conference women: "The woman who was leading it got up and said 'Now ain't this great; all these white radical women together in one room.' Well, I stood up and said, 'Well, there were a few blacks here,' and walked out. Hell, it wasn't nothing anyway; a bunch of females going off to a corner for some intellectual masturbation. Going off to some room to talk about revolution. Shit. Wasn't one in the bunch willing to face down the men, to tell them we want power or we're getting out."

Mrs. Wright leveled her eyes over the crowd at De Fremery Park (renamed by the Panthers Bobby Hutton Memorial Park) where the afternoon session was holding forth. A dozen microphones carried the speeches for blocks into the surrounding Oakland ghetto. "I'm going back to Los Angeles," she said. "Look out there. Here we are, in the middle of a black city, and how many blacks do you see? See those old folks on the porch? You know why they don't come over to the park? Cause they think we're a bunch of nuts, that's why. A handful of blacks fooling around all day with thousands of white college kids, talking about socialism and capitalism. Shit."

Seale, who seemed to understand the dangers of cornucopia rhetoric better than any other leader at the conference, struggled to give structure to the Front at the last meeting. Producing maps and charts, he outlined a petition campaign for the decentralization of police into neighborhood districts, with each district controlled by the neighborhood. The campaign, he said, would eventually be run by fifty or so chapters of the United Front Against Fascism throughout the country. In addition to the decentralization campaign, the Front's main task would be the release of political prisoners, support for Panther lawyer Charles Garry's legal seminars for attorneys defending political prisoners, and pressure tactics on local politicians.

But the last meeting was still 85 per cent white, and Seale had lost the enthusiasm of his audience. For three days the Panthers had supplied speakers who stoked the fires of revolution, and now they were offering a program that was reformist at best and smelled faintly of liberalism. A steady stream of people began to ooze out the back door. "We've been used," muttered a girl to her boy friend. "No," he answered. "You're just mad because we didn't use him."

Not only did the students believe that the Panthers' program was far too moderate; they felt that it was a Panther program and nothing more. "Most political prisoners are Panthers, most decentralization programs will be in black ghettos, and most political pressure is obviously intended for black ghetto problems," said William Shire, a Berkeley graduate student.

The high enthusiasm of the opening session died slowly in the three days. By the time the program had ended, the auditorium was half empty. And when the conference finally closed, a loud staccato chant of "Power to the People" shook the building—but it came from the rear of the auditorium, from the tight semicircle of Panthers, and from almost nowhere else.

CROSSROADS OF AFRICA

1. Ethiopia's Unknown War

JACK KRAMER

Mr. Kramer, who graduated from Leland Stanford in 1965, has worked on the Southern Courier, the civil rights newspaper circulated in Alabama and Mississippi, and for a group of provincial newspapers in England. He has been to Vietnam twice as a journalist, in addition to the recent trip to Ethiopia. Mr. Kramer is enrolled next fall as an International Fellow at the Columbia School of Journalism.

Henry Kissinger stood by the White House gate early last month, explaining American deaths in Vietnam to a group of pacifists. As Dr. Kissinger spoke, His Royal Highness Haile Selassie, Emperor of Ethiopia, strode by, flanked by a squad of armed Marines.

The coincidence was chilling. Infrequent but highly reliable reports coming from the Horn of Africa indicate the barely suspected but perfectly real possibility that Dr. Kissinger may some day be explaining to a group of pacifists American deaths in Ethiopia—while many more than a squad of Marines protect His Royal Highness, and at a point considerably distant from the White House gate.

Just before he left Washington, the Emperor spoke with President Nixon about "the Biafran conflict in Nigeria." There was no report that they discussed a more germane issue: the Eritrean conflict in Ethiopia.

The war in Ethiopia goes largely unreported. In a full-page article anticipating the Emperor's visit, the July 14 Newsweek gave only one sentence to "the serious revolt in former Italian Eritrea." (The rebels refuse to be called Ethiopians, insisting on identification as "Eritreans.") Engaging the Addis regime daily, the regular forces of the insurgency fluctuate between 10,000 and 30,000 men, and by now are in virtual control of the countryside in an area of northern Ethiopia that includes all of the empire's seacoast. Moreover, the guerrillas are organized into a uniformed, disciplined "Liberation Army," the military arm of a disciplined, Chinese-supported, "Liberation Front." The soldiers of the Front are armed with modern Kalatchnikov automatic assault rifles, Czech Stens and Chinese rockets and mortars.

The United States, in turn, is giving the imperial regime more economic aid, and more military aid than it extends to any other African country. U.S. "advisers" are involved. American spokesmen have admitted that as early as 1965 a U.S. helicopter, manned by U.S. Army pilots, was brought down while flying reconnaissance against the guerrillas.

There are activists within the Front, particularly senior activists of the exile organization in Syria, who tend to play down its leftist politics, and even entertain a notion of American neutrality. But a considerably more radical attitude holds among the young cadres in the field. They believe the United States is using Ethiopia as a client state, through which America can dominate the Organization for African Unity (its headquarters are in Addis Ababa) and all of Africa.

The conflict derives in large part from social unrest mounting throughout the empire, even among Haile Selassie's own ruling Amhara tribe. The little Emperor, who from the rest of the world elicits reflexive clichés about game courage and true nobility, looks at home like one more American-sponsored generalissimo.

But the war in the north has deeper roots, going back to the defeat of the Italians after World War II. Eritrea —the northern and Red Sea coastal areas of what is now called Ethiopia—had been an Italian colony since the 19th century, whereas inland Ethiopia (Abyssinia) was an Italian colony for only five years. The emperors of inland Ethiopia historically coveted Eritrea's Red Sea ports, but were never able, totally, to conquer them. After the defeat of the Italians, the big powers and the UN gave Ethiopia what she had never been able to win by force of arms.

Eritrea, over the protests of its 40 per cent Muslim population, and of many Eritrean Coptic Christians, who comprise another 40 per cent of the population (20 per cent of Eritreans are standardly reckoned as "animists"), was "federated" with Christian-ruled Ethiopia. In 1962, the pretense of federation was dropped and Eritrea was made an imperial colony. The Coptic governor had fled and is now the Vice President of the Front. Intensive Ethiopian repression followed: the virtual liquidation of the Eritrean civil service, which was taken over by Amharas; the imposition of a foreign language (Amharic) as the exclusive state language; criminal penalties for publishing in natively spoken Arabic, Tigré or Tigrinya; tight secret police surveillance; mass arrests; in the countryside a campaign of official terror which has now led to "fortified hamlets"; the euphemism for detention camps originally coined by the Americans in Vietnam. By now the bulk of the Coptic population in Eritrea has followed the example of its former head of state, and supports the Muslim-led Front either overtly or covertly. Young Coptic "freedom fighters" are trained along with their Muslim compatriots and other Africans —by the Chinese on the Tanzanian island of Pemba, and by Arab officers in Iraq and Syria.

The Front is not free of its own problems; indeed, the war might have escalated to Vietnamese proportions already were it not for them. Largely, they are the difficulties of most revolutionary movements in Africa—tribalism and religion. Though joined by their Coptic compatriots in the struggle against the empire, the Muslim Eritreans have been reluctant to cede any power to them. In the words of one Copt, a young revolutionary of considerable dedication, and probity, "Muslims have difficulty separating religion and politics." Two years ago, the political commissar of the largest of the five revolutionary districts, a Copt, defected to the Addis regime.

Still, the revolution builds apace, impelled by the force of a fundamentally revolutionary situation: an unresponsive, oppressive ruling regime, propped by foreign support, against a popular guerrilla movement. Osman Saleh Sabbe, the Front's secretary general, a Muslim, speaks without rancor of the defecting Coptic commissar; indeed, almost apologizes for the condtions that led to his defection. Such an attitude would seem to indicate that the Eritrean revolution is well beyond the stage where the immediate enemy is what Latin revolutionaries call the vendido brother. Energies are directed at the larger enemy. The Italian weekly L'Europeo earlier this year described Asmara, Eritrea's capital, as "surrounded" by besieging guerrillas.

Asmara, as if its situation weren't perilous enough, is also the site of a major U.S. national security agency monitoring base, the full function of which is classified. The State Department nevertheless manages to deny that the war is even happening—"anymore." Late last year, the U.S. consul at Asmara told me the same story one hears from the Addis regime—the only trouble now is with the shiftas (bandits); the revolution is dead. When I asked about a young European journalist who had been with the guerrillas several years before, the consul told me it could never be done again, that any guerrillas operating in Eritrea would be detected and apprehended almost immediately; and if a white man were with them, they would be caught even sooner.

In fact, I had just come from twenty-five days with the guerrillas. Nor was the effort anywhere near as suicidal as he indicated it should have been. Ethiopian security, so far from detecting our group immediately, never detected us at all during an overland march from the Sudan border in the sparsely populated west to Keren and Asmara in the much more heavily populated east.

The Ethiopian war is not altogether unreported. In addition to the article in L'Europeo, mentioned above, François Debré reported in Le Monde last May that the Eritrean Liberation Front had the major part of the Ethiopian Army—two divisions—pinned down. But noting the territory's isolation and its barbaric customs, he acknowledged that there might be some confusion between shiftas and guerrillas.

It is true that the customs of the area are barbaric. The tribes of the territory are those whose bridegrooms Sir Richard Burton described as presenting their prospective brides with gifts of human gonads; they were notorious for castrating Italian soldiers.

However, it is impossible to confuse guerrillas with shiftas. Burton's tribesmen are still as fierce (at least to look at)as ever, in flowing burnooses, with wild heads of hair, staves, knives and sabers. But when a young man enters the Liberation Army, he is transformed utterly. His head is shaved, his robes discarded, and he puts on a standard uniform. Moreover, there is no question of shifta activity in the areas the Front controls. Our group, always small and armed only with World War I Enfields (the Kalatchnikovs being reserved for assault troops), with only one camel that we rotated among us, might easily have been overcome. Yet we were not only unmolested by any of the tribes during our twenty-five days across Eritrea but welcomed, fed and entertained by them. Except for the few days we spent with various large concentrations of troops during periods of battle, we were literally dependent for our survival on the tribes we met, and they never failed us.

Cover from propaganda leaflet distributed in Ethiopia by Eritrean Liberation Front. The style suggests a Chinese source.

More than a refutation of the shifta myth, their behavior is a measure of popular strength. And the strength is growing. In Addis, on the other hand, even Amharic students are rebelling; arrests and riots are frequent. There has been liaison with the Eritrean insurgents.

The Eritrean Liberation Front is developing with the Third World movement generally. In late March, an Ethiopian Airlines (read Pan American) Boeing 707 parked at the airport in Frankfurt exploded into a worthless heap. It was the work of Eritrean "fedayeen," who did their job more cleanly (no lives lost), and more efficiently than the Arab "fedayeen" who trained them. Recently, at Karachi airport, they struck again.

The West may overestimate the cultural weaknesses which inhibit this fury. Africa, and the Arab world particularly, are seen as hamstrung by primitive and inefficient habits. Until recently, for example, the Sudan, ostensibly "Arab Socialist," was severely restricted in its foreign and domestic policy by a vicious war to subdue the Christian and pagan tribes of the south. The Khartoum government, ridden by corruption, had a modus vivendi with Haile Selassie whereby each agreed to do nothing to disturb the other's oppressive wars. That meant, in effect, no Cambodia-like sanctuary for the Eritrean Liberation Front. On May 25, a leftist coup took Khartoum, determined to settle differences in the south, and the Ethiopian modus vivendi has already begun to fall apart.

2. After Tom Mboya

STANLEY MEISLER
Mr. Meisler is the Africa correspondent of the Los Angeles Times.

Nairobi, Kenya

The aftermath of the murder of Tom Mboya has mocked what he stood for. Mboya, who seemed to represent all that was modern in Africa to the rest of the world, always shunned the appeals to tribal allegiance that have crumbled political stability elsewhere in Africa. His constituents were mainly the urban workers groping for a modern way of life. Yet his assassination on the first Saturday in July unleashed intense tribal hatreds. Kenya faces a long and dangerous period of instability unless the government can somehow placate his grieving Luo people.

Mboya was shot and killed in downtown Nairobi on a street crowded with shoppers trying to make their last purchases before stores closed for the weekend. Two weeks later, police charged a young African with the murder. They released no details about him but his name, but that was enough to confirm all the suspicions that had been excited by tribal passions. The name, Nahashon Isaac Njenga Njoroge, identifies the accused as a member of the dominant Kikuyu tribe, the people of President Jomo Kenyatta. Without a shred of evidence, most Luos, whether educated townspeople or illiterate peasants, had decided from the beginning that the killer must be Kikuyu. Now they had proof.

The Kikuyus are the largest tribe in Kenya—perhaps 2 million of the country's 10 million people. Aggressive, better educated than other tribes, solidly behind the government, the Kikuyus have dominated independent Kenya, holding the presidency, several key ministries, and a disproportionate share of top civil service positions. The Luos, the second largest tribe with 1.3 million, have never gained their share of the fruits of independence. Their political divisions have hurt them. A large number accepted the leadership of Mboya and supported the government. He was a founder and the general secretary of the ruling party, the Kenya African National Union (KANU), and the minister of economic planning and development in Kenyatta's cabinet. But many Luos, perhaps the majority, followed the tribal call of Oginga Odinga, a Luo chief who was a long-time enemy of Tom Mboya and the leader of the opposition Kenya People's Union (KPU)

As soon as news of the assassination reached them, the division was healed. Most Luos blamed KANU, Kenyatta and the Kikuyus, and reasoned that if Kenyatta's KANU did Mboya in, they all must support the other party, Odinga's KPU. "Tom, why did you join with them?" they shouted in Luo as the funeral procession brought Mboya's body back to Luo land. "When things get worse," a mourner chanted at the graveside, "there is only one man who can save us. That is Jaramogi [Odinga's Luo title]. Where is he? I am looking for him in the crowd." Ironically, Mboya's old political enemy, Odinga, became the hero of the Luos mourning for Mboya. Tribal hatred had melted political alignments.

On July 8, jeering, mostly Luo crowds in Nairobi hurled stones and shoes at the long Mercedes of Kenyatta as it took him to a requiem mass for Mboya in the Roman Catholic cathedral. The crowds chanted the Swahili word, dume, and stabbed their right thumbs upward in the air. Both dume—the Swahili word for bull—and the upward thumb thrust are symbols of Odinga's KPU. The jeering and the stone throwing frightened and enraged the police, who began swinging their axe handles at the crowd and firing tear gas. The outburst set off three hours of rioting, which damaged scores of cars and killed two persons, including a young German, stoned as he drove home from work.

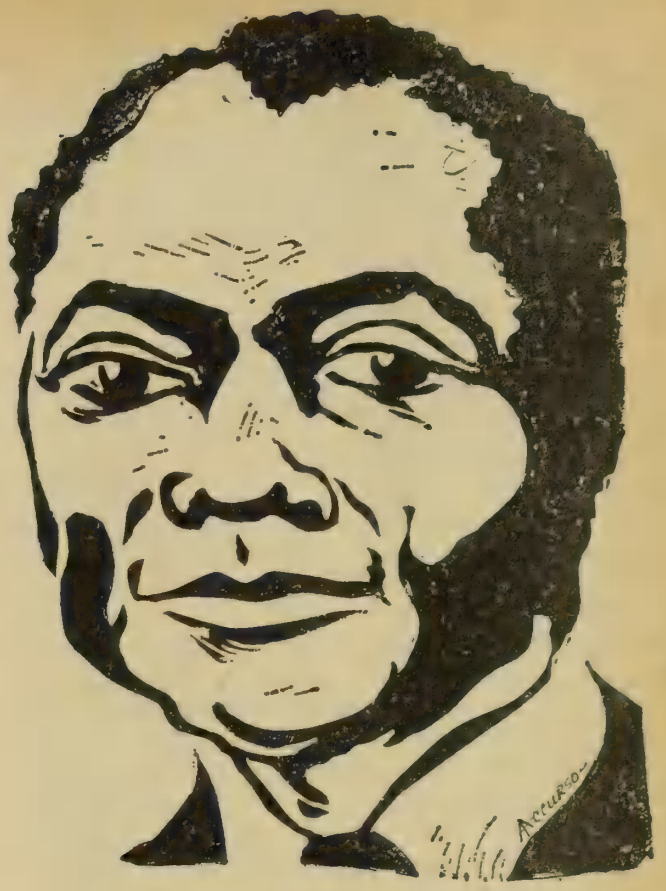
It was a sad and singular day for Kenyatta, the mzee or old man of Kenya politics. Never before had Africans jeered him publicly. The old African nationalist, now almost 80, had long been looked on as the father of the young country. But blinded by hatred and anguish, many Luos now saw him more as the leader of his Kikuyus than of his country. Tribal feelings were even more raw in the Luo areas of western Kenya. When word of the killing spread, Luos hunted for Kikuyus in their midst. One was beaten to death, and the government had to evacuate

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

all the Kikuyus from the rural areas of the Luo people.

The anti-Kikuyu feeling was intense at the burial of Mboya in his traditional family homestead on Rusinga Island in Lake Victoria. "War, War," Luos shouted. "War with the Kikuyus." A self-proclaimed witch doctor chanted, "May the wombs of all Kikuyu women dry up." Another mourner shouted, "Where is Jomo Kenyatta? If he were here, even if he were guarded by 100,000 soldiers, I would kill him." Every non-Luo member of the cabinet stayed away from Rusinga Island.



Mboya, who was 38 when he died, had made many enemies during a political career that began when he became a labor union leader in 1953. Other African politicians resented his popularity abroad. Jealous and annoyed, they felt the rest of the world saw him as the magazine cover boy of Africa. In addition, Mboya had an arrogant manner that lost him political friends. He was cold, tough and superior, and that frightened or angered many of his colleagues.

Odinga, resentful that this young Luo had not stepped aside for him, always tried to thwart the ambitions of Mboya. Before independence, Odinga helped revive the popularity of Kenyatta to frustrate any hopes Mboya might have had to take control of the country. The young Kikuyu politicians also sided very quickly against Mboya, even though they all belonged to the same party. They were jealous of him, for he had won renown in the Mau Mau years when the British had banned all political activity by the Kikuyus. They believed that the place held by Mboya rightly belonged to them.

As long ago as 1962, Mboya told me: "There is no doubt that the young Kikuyu intellectuals are against me. I am aware of this. It is nothing new. The problem is that there is no second man to Kenyatta whom they see as the leader of the Kikuyus. I represent a threat to them."

But at the time of his death, Mboya's chance of succeeding Kenyatta as President seemed slight. His path was blocked by an alliance between these same young Kikuyu politicians and Vice President Daniel arap Moi, a member of the small Kalenjin tribe. Few outsiders, however, were ready to count Mboya out completely. He had a way of outsmarting hostile alliances.

Since the assassination, Nairobi has been inflamed with rumors about the identity of the plotters, since few believe that Njoroge acted on his own. The rumor mongers have little evidence to back up their accusations, but some facts should emerge when the trial of Njoroge begins. Whatever its outcome, however, Kenyatta's government must deal with the tribal hatreds unleashed by the killing. As the Rt. Rev. Maurice Otunga, an Abaluya tribesman who is the Catholic bishop in the Luo area, put it, "Mzee now has to show that his government is not a Kikuyu government." But the government's response to the threat of tribal conflict was at first hesitant and vague. Eleven days passed before President Kenyatta made a radio appeal to the nation for "unity, love and peace." Meanwhile, Vice President Moi had hinted, in an unclear and stumbling way, that the government would try to prove that Communists were behind the murder. Mboya's death then could be laid to outside Reds rather than inside Kikuyus. Luos, however, would have had difficulty believing the theory.

Later, the government began to move more decisively. On July 24, Kenyatta appointed Joseph Odero-Jowi, a Luo and close friend of Mboya, to succeed Mboya as minister of economic planning and development. A second Luo was named to take Odero-Jowi's place as minister representing Kenya on the East African Community. Kenyatta picked still a third Luo as assistant minister for foreign affairs. To soothe Luo feelings, however, the government must also start appointing more Luos to posts in the civil service.

Tribal conflict is not the only legacy of Mboya's assassination. His murder destroyed the touchstone of Kenya's politics. For years, its politicians had one main issue on which to align themselves: they either sided with Mboya or ganged up against him. With Mboya dead, a new politics will have to develop; the murder has crumpled all the old assumptions.

Kenya also will feel the loss of Mboya's technical and organizational skills, rare in a developing country. An American adviser to the Kenya Government once said that Mboya was the only minister in Kenya who had the ability to fill a cabinet post in Washington. He had the hardest job in the Kenya cabinet, running the ministry that coordinates all of Kenya's foreign assistance and tries to insure that its economic growth remains orderly and constant.

Perhaps more significant, Mboya was always called upon by fellow cabinet members, even those who disliked him, to push unpopular legislation through parliament, to defend them against embarrassing attacks, and to organize their election campaigns. The government may founder without him.

Finally, Mboya was an irreplaceable salesman for Kenya. In his many trips abroad, he always seemed to make his audience feel that he was one of them. Despite all the depressing news about Africa, he somehow managed to inspire confidence in the continent. His death shatters that image. Kenya, with an economy dependent on tourism and foreign investment, will surely suffer. And so will Africa.

WHY THE DRAFT SHOULD GO

JOHN M. SWOMLEY, JR.

Mr. Swomley, former director of the National Council Against Conscription, is the author of The Military Establishment (Beacon Press) and of Religion, the State and the Schools (Pegasus).

The United States has had military conscription for almost thirty years, and few Americans now remember how little influence the armed forces had in the nation's life when the draft was first adopted in 1940. Conscription and the increase of military influence have gone hand in hand, so that for many Americans military values and compulsory military duty have come to be a part of the culture.

The reluctance to abandon conscription is today evident chiefly in liberal circles where largely new arguments are being used. These imply that conscription is needed to foster anti-war values, to encourage a limited war strategy instead of nuclear war, to keep the Army from becoming all black and thus forcing Negroes to bear the brunt. An examination of these and similar arguments is essential if they are not to become part of the popular wisdom.

One major argument for the draft is stated simply: A professional-volunteer-career army is more of a threat to peace or to involvement in empire than a citizen army. However, "citizen army" is a term not to be equated with conscription. It refers basically to militia such as the National Guard, which could be raised either by voluntary or compulsory means. The essence of a professional army is an officer and noncommissioned officer group that makes a career out of the military. Such an army may enlist short-term volunteers or use a draft. The United States today has a professional force which uses the draft as a method to raise additional manpower—during the war in Vietnam, the Air Force, the Navy, the bulk of the Marine Corps and the Army have been made up of volunteers.

Conscript armies are no less destructive than volunteer armies. The armies of Napoleon, the Kaiser, Hitler and Stalin were raised by conscription and supported either imperialist or totalitarian purposes. The United States used volunteer armies in the Mexican and Spanish-American Wars to add foreign territory to its empire. It has employed volunteers to invade Latin American countries and conscripts to invade Vietnam or occupy other Asian countries. Drafted men do not prevent the use of armies for imperialism or war. The crucial decisions are made at a different level, by generals, presidents or emperors.

A second widely held belief about the draft is that campus and GI protests against the war in Vietnam would have been much less vigorous if the government had been able to get along with volunteers only. Campus protests are only partly draft motivated. There have been significant protests against military recruiters, Dow Chemical personnel recruiters, ROTC and university involvements with military research. Although the draft is part of this whole complex it cannot be said to have motivated students in the early protests when all students including graduate students were automatically deferred. This argument implies also that the resistance within the Army has come chiefly from conscripts, whereas much of the evidence points the other way.

Most men subject to the draft who resist the military do so before induction by filing as conscientious objectors, accepting voluntary exile in Canada or going to prison. According to Arlo Tatum of the Central Committee on Conscientious Objectors, "the majority of deserters in Sweden are volunteers." His colleague, Mike Wittels said: "The volunteer is a man who wants to control his own life, and is more likely to resist." My own contacts with numerous friends and relatives of those who visit military prisoners in the Army Disciplinary Barracks in nearby Leavenworth confirm this impression. There are, however, no reliable statistics. What is certain is that both volunteers and draftees have resisted war duty.

Sometimes it is asserted in support of the draft that its repeal would result in smaller armed forces and would mean, therefore, greater reliance on nuclear weapons. There is, however, no necessary relation between the draft and the size of the armed forces. It is possible to have a pre-Vietnam size army without the draft if, as a Pentagon report indicates, adequate pay were used as an inducement for enlistment. Or the military could have a combat army of the present size if civilians were hired for noncombat work in the United States. Only about 20 per cent of the army is ever involved in combat. Or it could lower recruiting standards, since not all army jobs demand the high test scores now required of recruits.

Neither is there a necessary relation between the absence of a draft and reliance on nuclear weapons. Nuclear weapons were developed and used during World War II when the largest draft army in United States history was in the field. Both bomber and missile installations have been equipped with nuclear weapons during the peacetime draft. If nuclear weapons were used for other than deterrent, pre-emptive or retaliatory purposes (none of which has any relation to a draft) they would be used to escalate a conventional war when defeat seems otherwise likely. In that case it would be possible to argue, as President Truman did, that nuclear weapons were employed to save the lives of drafted men, or to win the war more quickly or decisively or because an adversary permitted no alternative.

Another argument is that an end to the draft would mean an increased reliance on troops of the developing world to fight our wars, as British and French imperialists relied on Asian and African troops. One response to this is the historical record that the United States has relied on South Korean troops both in Korea and in Vietnam while there was a draft. During the draft, United States troops were not used in Iran, the Congo, Guatemala or elsewhere where the CIA with ample funds managed coups d'état or assisted pro-American native forces to consolidate power.

The Army has steadily pursued during the peacetime draft a policy of training for counterinsurgency the armies of Thailand, Latin America and other nations. The United States did not rely fully on the troops of the South Vietnamese Government only because they were unreliable, showing a high desertion rate and an unwillingness to kill other Vietnamese.

It is frequently asked: "But wouldn't a volunteer army mean a mercenary army?" The word "mercenary" refers to the hiring of foreign troops to fight a nation's battles as the English employed Hessians during the American Revolution. In the United States Army, all officers and enlisted men, whether volunteers or draftees, are paid at the same rate for their rank. The presence or absence of a draft has nothing to do with whether men are paid. The only point at issue here is that the Pentagon, to raise an all-volunteer army, might have to offer an adequate wage to men of the lower ranks.

Some political leaders have claimed that foreign policy changes must come first, including big-power agreements for disarmament; only then, they say, will nations be secure enough to end the draft. Such a position assumes that nations want disarmament, or that foreign policy is changed independently of the military capabilities of nations. Military power is one of the most decisive factors influencing foreign policy. It is the ability of the United States to garrison other nations and invade, with or without invitation, nations such as Vietnam and the Dominican Republic that makes possible the dominance known as the Pax Americana. Such actions can be undertaken with or without the draft. But the draft, even in stand-by form, gives the Joint Chiefs of Staff and the President a blank check on the nation's manpower to escalate any overseas action into a major war without Congressional approval. It thus helps determine foreign policy.

If we assume, first, that nations will ever negotiate disarmament and, second, that the draft is essential to real military strength, then a vigorous campaign to repeal the draft would be an important way of telling those in power to begin serious negotiation toward an international abolition of conscription. Any way one looks at it, foreign policy and military policy are intertwined; both must be changed. Support of the foreign policy goals of the military-industrial complex necessarily implies whatever means are essential for such support, such as access to unlimited manpower via the draft. Likewise, support of the means, including a blank check on manpower, nuclear weapons, etc., is support of the goals of those who can use these means.

Leaders who are disinclined to talk disarmament say the United States needs the draft until such time as we work out binding treaty arrangements with China and the Soviet Union, since these nations are the chief source of potential military threat. Even if the United States were to draft its every man, woman and child we would be outnumbered by the Chinese millions; no military man suggests the draft as a way to subdue either China or Russia. Nuclear weapons, missiles, submarines, control of air, seas, etc., are much more in the minds of military strategists than land warfare against more densely populated nations with larger land areas. The proposal that we need the draft until we work out agreements with China and Russia is an excuse, not a reason. We have made little or no effort to explore the overtures of these nations toward nonaggression pacts or other treaties decreasing tensions.

Sometimes racists and sometimes liberals, for differing reasons, claim that a volunteer army would probably in time be all black, since black youth is denied access to other jobs with decent pay and turns in increasing numbers to the Army. This argument is based on the fact that the black re-enlistment rate is currently higher than the white. But white initial enlistment is higher than black even at existing pay rates. If higher pay for recruits were authorized, the Army would attract ample numbers of young white men as well as those from other racial groups.

Among the factors discouraging black enlistments are the following: (1) Black militants encourage youth to avoid the army because it serves the white power structure. (2) The black discovery of power, begun under Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., has made it necessary for hitherto white schools, businesses and industry to employ Afro-Americans if they are to receive black support. This competition for skilled or educated personnel is likely to continue. (3) Because of inadequate economic, educational and other opportunities there are not enough qualified black youth among the approximately 250,000 who turn 18 each year to fill up the armed forces even if every qualified black youth did enlist.

Still another argument against ending the draft is the idea that a volunteer army is better trained, shows higher morale and a greater eagerness to fight, and is, therefore, a greater threat to world peace. The level of training is determined by length of enlistment. If a man is drafted for two years and re-enlists, is he more of a threat to world peace than he was when a draftee? If so, this is an argument not for the draft but against re-enlistment, and for requiring the armed forces to discharge everyone before they can develop a vested interest in war. No advocate of the draft seriously suggests ending all voluntary re-enlistment or enlistment. In fact, the Air Force and Navy are built with volunteers and the Army relies chiefly on re-enlistments.

Finally, it is claimed that the injustice and inequity of the draft can be corrected by modifying rather than repealing the law. Against this is the argument that a lottery or any other chance approach is not more equitable than human decision. The lottery, whatever its impersonal values, has two serious defects. First, it assumes that inequality of treatment is the primary defect of the draft and that the national or world interest is served best by disregarding a man's abilities, education and potential when forcing him to enter the Army. The second weakness in present lottery proposals is the camouflage it provides for a traditional army demand. The Army has always wanted boys in their teen-age years, when they are most malleable and least able to resist complete regimentation. Liberals in Congress are now offering teen-agers to the Army under the guise of an "equitable" lottery instead of via the more naked military formula of the younger the better.

Actually, the draft can never be equitable because some will be drafted and others not; of those who are drafted some are sent to battle and others remain in safer areas. Some are killed in battle; others not. The fundamental injustice is that a man who is compelled to enter the Army feels a loss of freedom. The American system of freedom, insofar as it operates in employment, is one of persuading or inducing persons to engage in work rather than in compelling them to do so. It is a cardinal point in our religious faith as well as our democratic philosophy that ultimate values reside in the individual human being. The idea that the individual must be subjected to the state, or that compulsory "service" is preferable to a voluntary society, contributes to the alienation of young people. The power to reach into every family, to take a boy from his home and subject him to complete military discipline for months or years is the most serious limitation America places on freedom.

In the final analysis, the issue is freedom, rather than equality under compulsion.

HARRY GOLDEN

Charlotte, N.C.

"Church bells ring, are ya listening?"

Thus the eternal ditty on the radio sponsored by religious groups, the WCTU and probably the North Carolina bootleggers, who know a good thing when they see it. The bells were ringing because the General Assembly of North Carolina was taking a vote on whether to permit liquor by the drink. The church bells tolled all day to warn that John Barleycorn was about to wreak havoc on the most progressive state in the South.

North Carolina has local option; the counties can vote themselves wet or dry. One of our counties has been dry since 1909. No one there has ever confessed a thirst but that is because the dry county adjoins a wet county. Just drive over the line and tote it home. You can have your drink and feel good, too. It is probably the only way to defeat the hangover: get drunk in Mecklenburg but sleep it off in Rowan.

The wet counties boast ABC stores, liquor stores staffed and run by the state, the profits of which go toward support of the public school libraries. The limit per customer is one gallon. To stage a big party, therefore, a hostess must enlist the aid of friends. You can bring a bottle of liquor into a restaurant as long as you keep it wrapped in a brown bag. Brown bagging was finally legalized by the legislature after the superior court had ruled the practice was breaking the law the Prohibitionists had written.

Everyone in Charlotte hoped for passage of a bill permitting liquor by the drink under local option. Charlotte loses many conventions because it has a dearth of restaurants and a dearth of what the conventioneers like to call "night life." Liquor by the drink would probably induce the restaurateurs to open gaudier establishments and we'd probably be able to boast three night clubs instead of the old Pecan Grove, which is so staid that even the Baptists have conventions there.

If a certain number of legislators had absented themselves, the representatives from the big cities, Charlotte, Greensboro, Raleigh and Asheville, would probably have put liquor by the drink over the top. But the ministers found out which legislators intended to "walk" again and the ministers and their congregations kept up the pressure. Church bells heralded the defeat of the liquor by the drink. It was like having Christmas in June and you didn't have to hand out presents even.

The defeat takes the breath out of the city boosters. Having to transport that fifth of whiskey into the restaurant is hardly the height of sophistication. If the nice folks would lay off our moral welfare, say the Chamber of Commerce fellows, this town would really go somewhere.

The night the bill for liquor by the drink lost, I went to see the movie, 100 Rifles, which starred the colored football player, Jim Brown, and Raquel Welch. The love scene between these two which has been extensively described in magazines and newspapers was missing. I asked the manager about it. He said the city of Charlotte had asked him to cut this section.

The irony of it was that battle scenes which portrayed bloody, dying men constituted three-fourths of the picture. To show a battle scene and cut out a sex scene is as ridiculous as life itself. The additional irony, which I received from the headquarters of the State Police, was that arrests for drunken driving have risen constantly over the years no matter how the legislature votes.

CAMPUS WITCH HUNT

THE COLLEGES PLAY BALL

FRANK J. DONNER
Mr. Donner is a New York attorney who specializes in constitutional law and civil liberties cases. He is the author of The Un-Americans (Ballantines).

> We have grown weary of being promised a dialog. What we urgently need is a meaningful response. . . . We are asking that you allow us to realize the very values you have held forth. And we think you should be with us in our request.
>
> —From Meldon E. Levine's Harvard Law School Commencement Address

In May the Subcommittee on Investigations of the Committee on Government Operations (the "McClellan Committee") turned its investigative eye from urban riots and civil disorders caused by racial unrest to the problem of student disorders.

In connection with the investigation, subpoenas for the production of documents were served on a number of universities, including Columbia, Harvard, Cornell, Stanford, the University of California, The College of the City of New York and Brooklyn College. These and at least ten more institutions which had experienced campus disorders are required to identify individuals and to produce records of organizations (including the names of their officers and faculty advisers) involved in campus disorders. The Columbia subpoena, which is typical, requires the trustees to > produce any and all records from January 1, 1968 to the present date showing the identity of students or other persons or organizations who took part in the seizure of Columbia University buildings or parts thereof without the permission of university authorities as well as records showing the identity of officers and faculty advisers of Columbia University student organizations including Columbia University Students for a Democratic Society, Students for a Restructured University, Student Afro-American Society, Hamilton Hall Steering Committee. Also records showing the extent and nature of assistance rendered during this period of time by any agency of the United States Government or by any legal entity exempt by United States law from taxation, to any student or other person whose name is provided in compliance with the terms of this subpoena.

It must be stressed that if the committee were really concerned with reviewing or implementing the denial-of-benefits legislation passed in the last Congress as a means of policing campus rebellions, it could merely have sought the number of grant recipients who engaged in disorders. It could then have questioned university authorities as to what extent the statutory sanctions had been applied. But the committee wants the universities to identify each participant and then to specify those who receive grants.

Not to put too fine a point on it, the McClellan committee is powered not only by the same jurisdictional mandate as was the McCarthy committee but by the same spirit. McClellan's investigative subject matter—federal subsidies to campus lawbreakers (remember his committee is confined to "government operations")—masks a highly personalized attack on individuals and organizations. Through this punitive use of the legislative power, McClellan hopes to force credibility into the thesis that campus unrest is the fruit of a subversive conspiracy of bad guys ("hard-core revolutionaries"). It would then follow that, once they were identified and purged (by college administrators, informers and Red squad operatives), tranquillity would descend on the campus.

McClellan has used this same technique of counterfeiting a legislative purpose in order to conduct a conspiracy-informer exposé in his now two-year-old probe of urban riots. His committee has become a forum for name mongering and irresponsible defamatory references by local security narks and an assortment of racists. Most recently, the use of these tactics by a member of the Chicago Police Department's "Subversive Unit," testifying before the committee, drew the outraged protest of a new panel member, Sen. Charles Percy, who was a friend of his victim. As The Washington Post bitingly editorialized, "Not everyone slurred in a proceeding of this sort is lucky enough to have a Senatorial friend on hand to spring to her defense."

That the committee's goal is names has been made quite clear by the extraordinary comprehensiveness of its probes. During the urban riot hearings and in the campus hearings up till now, endlessly repetitive testimony and identifications have been received into evidence. The universities' subpoenas seek the exposure of everyone involved in disruptions. This exhaustiveness is justified by the committee staff on the ground that it is "building a record" of an intricately coordinated subversive conspiracy, national in scope. Both the earlier ghetto and the present campus investigations elicit from police witnesses arrest records without indication of conviction or acquittal. When Sen. Abraham Ribicoff protested the inclusion of these records in the hearing transcript, the practice was briefly halted. But he left the hearings for two weeks and the record was again loaded with the names of arrestees.

The decor of the hearing room gives the show away: the walls are petaled with "power-structure" charts of the singularly structureless SDS and Black Panthers, together with pictures of "activists" in both organizations. Names and photos are selectively leaked to reporters for local and regional coverage. This scapegoating technique is reflected in the roster of witnesses, carefully chosen to echo the prejudices of chairman McClellan and Senator Mundt, who fill the record with warnings against "outside agitators"—the Johnny Appleseeds of campus rebellion.

The campus hearings are already almost exclusively the forum for hard-line witnesses such as S. I. Hayakawa and Bruno Bettelheim. The youth rebellion, according to Dr. Bettelheim, mirrors pre-Hitlerite developments; young people need a "youth service program of a few years' duration," a compulsory civilian program alternative to the draft which would melt away the rebellion and reduce the following of its leaders, for whom substitute emotional experiences or psychotherapy should be provided to get them back on course. Eric Hoffer testified that "it would have been a wonderful thing if Grayson Kirk got mad and got a gun and killed a few"; and cartoonist Al Capp denounced as "totalitarian" the moving anti-war speech of Harvard's Nobel Prize winner, George Wald.

In this wearisomely familiar script—a parallel version is being performd by HISC (formerly HUAC) on the House side—there is no role for the student. The rage for change which has inspired the great mass of students—not only in this country but world-wide—is attributed to manipulation through, in Senator Mundt's favorite phrase, a "master plan." The major testimonial role of the college administrator is to confess to overpermissiveness in the past and to promise toughness in the future, coupled with business as usual. There is no room in the script for the causes of campus discontents or an exploration of feasible reforms, even when a few mea culpas pointing to the need for change are offered by the educational establishment. The Senators want to use their power to force universities to keep the lid on the status quo.

The committee conveniently dramatized the whole legislative swindle a short time ago when President Nathan Pusey of Harvard appeared for questioning before the panel but never actually testified—even though, as Dr. Pusey vainly protested, he had shortened a vacation and risen at 4:30 in the morning to keep his committee date. Dr. Pusey cooled his heels because the testimony of a teaching fellow at Harvard was delayed by an argument as to whether he would supply the committee with names, the panel refusing to hear this otherwise "friendly" witness until he came across. The fellow (who called himself a "moderate," but who is known on campus as the "resident Fascist") finally agreed after the luncheon recess to supply the names in executive session—a ploy invented by HUAC long ago.

Having recited the eagerly sought list of names in camera, the witness spent the rest of the afternoon reading into the record an article he had written for The Wall Street Journal, as well as a mimeographed 32-page transcript of his testimony. This recitation appears to have been encouraged for the express purpose of keeping the president of Harvard waiting, since the usual practice is to accept such material, unread, for inclusion in the record. (The incident has stirred amused speculation in Cambridge as to whether McClellan may have radicalized Pusey as much as the April police bust radicalized the student body.)

The committee's insatiable hunger for names mocks its profession of a legislative purpose: a bona fide legislative investigation deals with some subject matter, a presumed evil, and only incidentally with individuals. Nor is this a garden-variety exposure hearing; the committee's real agenda is highly political. For more than a century the response of repressive governments to the challenge of student unrest has been to develop an undercover surveillance and dossier-keeping network. These practices intimidate and demoralize the radical movement in its day-to-day activities. More important, they are directed toward the future as well; identification and dossier keeping are the pillars of the politics of deferred reckoning, the classic means adopted by the state to insure that its youthful critics will be dealt with when the time is ripe.

But the mechanism of domestic intelligence developed in the United States during the 1930s has become rusty and obsolete, its old Left norms no longer appropriate to a changing political scene, its files choked with millions of useless dossiers. It is no secret that a modern surveillance and dossier-keeping technology is being developed to combat the new political Left with an up-to-date intelligence network institutionalized on the federal, state and local levels. Legislation which plausibly might be directed at student unrest furnishes pretexts for intensive surveillance activity. In an exchange at the Senate Appropriations hearings in May, Assistant Attorney General Jerris Leonard let the cat out of the bag when he was prodded by Senator Byrd about the use of a civil rights statute that prohibits interference with beneficiaries of federally funded programs as a weapon against student unrest. Leonard stated that he had just been working in two situations together with an associate "in which we had a briefing from the local police department, which had movies and pictures and had undercover agents on this particular campus and we are reviewing information from that campus with an eye or with a possibility in mind of prosecuting there. . . . We . . . need a [task] force of two or three lawyers . . . and some intelligence input, as I indicated earlier, from outside of the Department itself, military type intelligence. . . ." On the basis of Mr. Leonard's testimony, the Appropriations committee approved funds for thirty new employees in the civil rights division. But when the testimony came to light, Leonard smoothly denied that he was seeking to organize a task force to gather intelligence for use in quelling campus disorders.

We are entering an age of political surveillance and informing on a scale undreamed of in the past. The real mission of the McClellan committee is to amass for this new operation dossiers of student radicals, and it intends to extract them from university administrations which have custody of information otherwise difficult to obtain. These subpoenas will set up an estimated 1,000 quarries for the security apparatus.

The false legislative façade of the hearings conceals another illicit aim—the use of investigative power for law-enforcement purposes. The Department of Justice has seized on the anti-riot rider already deployed against the Chicago convention demonstrators as its "chosen instrument" against student leaders, hoping that proof can be found that they engaged in interstate travel to disrupt campuses. Undercover agents are scouring the campuses and infiltrating student groups to develop such evidence. And in a press conference on July 15, Attorney General Mitchell announced that he "expected a number of indictments" under this criminal statute. The McClellan hearings are designed to support this activity—hence the repeated stress on "outside agitators" and their "master plan." Thus, universities that cooperate with the committee risk exposing student leaders to criminal conspiracy indictments and furthering a thesis about the causes of campus unrest that they must know is both fraudulent and dangerous.

All the universities which I have named complied completely or partially with McClellan's subpoenas, turning over to the committee some or all of the names demanded. The surrender of the names verifies the charges of student protesters that our universities have betrayed their basic ends; it will surely widen the breach between students and administrations. It comes at a moment of strong legislative pressure to take the student Left to the woodshed, and the almost inevitable result will be a campus witch hunt on federal and state levels. Already in New York City, state Senator (and mayoralty candidate) Marchi has plastered the city university with subpoenas for records of individuals; and similar probes are being hatched in other states, among them Pennsylvania and New Mexico, quite apart from the anti-student legislation enacted and pending.

In 1966, HISC subpoenaed lists of names from Stanford, California and Michigan [see "HUAC: From Pillory to Farce" by Frank J. Donner, The Nation, September 5, 1966]. Compliance by the three universities resulted in a nation-wide wave of protest and self-questioning by college administrations, faculty and students. The American Civil Liberties Union circularized almost 1,000 colleges, urging adoption of a policy of resistance to such subpoenas on the ground, substantially supported by constitutional arguments, that enforced disclosure of names violates the protected freedoms, threatens the independence of the university, invades the confidentiality of academic records and collaborates in the punitive exposure of campus dissenters. In response, some universities promised to resist such subpoenas in the future, while others changed their record-keeping policies so as to eliminate or narrow the problem.

The most forthright response to the ACLU's appeal came from Columbia's Grayson Kirk, who wrote in December 1966 to ACLU's executive director, John deJ. Pemberton, that in the event a name-seeking subpoena were served on the university, "every attempt will be made to resist legally requests for such information and to foster in all appropriate ways freedom of expression and inquiry." Kirk's vow that Columbia would resist was ignored by his allegedly more liberal successor, Acting President Andrew W. Cordier.

When the McClellan committee served Columbia with a subpoena this spring it was almost the first important business confronting the new university senate, a representative body that had been approved by the trustees earlier amidst cheers that self-government was finally being introduced on Morningside Heights.

The majority of the university senate representatives uneasily acquiesced in Cordier's initiative after he told them that it would be dangerous to rock the boat during delicate negotiations between the university's lawyers and the McClellan committee staff. As a result of these negotiations, he assured the senate, he was sparing the student members of the "moderate" SRU and SAS and was releasing only SDS names (more than thirty in all). This "compromise" was presented to the senate as a great victory. The fingered students were not notified that their names had been submitted to the committee until long after the event.

Compliance was publicly justified on the odd ground that the university's objective to defeat repressive legislation would be furthered "by voluntarily responding to the subpoena rather than being forced to do so on terms which might be much less to our liking. . . ." Acting President Cordier further explained that the university had successfully shielded SRU and SAS because "they have conducted themselves peaceably and have acted constructively as organizations," a poorly concealed admission of a deal to assist the committee in harassing the SDS in exchange for protection of the "moderates."

Particularly disingenuous was the university's reliance on a federal court decision dismissing an attack by SDS members and others on the Columbia subpoena. "This decision," Cordier announced, "reinforced the legal obligation of the university, which had never been in serious doubt, to comply in an appropriate manner with the requirements of the subpoena." The decision did nothing of the sort. It does not deal with the merits of the case at all but rests on purely technical grounds.

If the faculty members of the senate were uneasy about Cordier's "victory," its student members were outraged—not only at the fact that the university's newly created instrument of self-government had been by-passed but because the university had failed to make a legal challenge of the subpoenas. The students were especially disturbed because names of students had been submitted who had been merely charged with disruption but not convicted under internal disciplinary procedures. Their protesting resolution recited: "By submitting the names of students whose cases are still pending, the university administration has violated campus due process" and, moreover, supplied information not demanded by the subpoena. The faculty at large, most notably the signers of a New York Times advertisement, "The University as a Sanctuary of Academic Freedom," were silent.

At CCNY and Brooklyn College, at Cornell and Harvard, the same sad tale was repeated. According to the complaint filed by the university senate of the City University, in a legal action challenging the CCNY and Brooklyn College subpoenas, comprehensive committee demands for names of students, faculty members and organizations, were served on both college administrations and were complied with despite faculty objections communicated to the administration as well as to the Board of Higher Education. (Brooklyn College turned over about 100 names.) At Cornell organizational records of campus radical groups and SDS officers' names, together with the SDS faculty adviser, were supplied; Harvard identified those involved in the April bust who had received financial aid from federal sources.

The University of California turned over the arrest and disciplinary records of some 298 students and ninety-eight nonstudents; also faculty members. The list even included names of individuals arrested but subsequently cleared. The university also supplied names and titles of officers of eleven campus organizations specified in the subpoena; they ranged from the campus branch of the American Federation of Teachers through the Radical Students Union, the SDS, the New Left Forum to the Third World Liberation Front.

At California, as at all the other subpoenaed institutions, the matter of compliance was decided, not by counsel familiar with the workings of anti-subversive committees or civil liberties experts but by the university's general counsel, T. J. Cunningham. Executive Vice Chancellor Earl Cheit vainly implored Mr. Cunningham to withhold the records, especially of those who violated the rules "in a moment of passion or in what they believed to be an act of idealism." He urged that beyond the legal issues, the university's responsibility for its students raised a strong moral question.

Chancellor Roger D. Heyns in transmitting the names to McClellan urged that they be kept confidential. Wistfully appealing to "the committee's sense of justice and fair play," he pointed out that "under California law misdemeanor records of minors may be sealed or expunged" and pleaded also that "public exposure would further punish those already disciplined by the court, the university, or both."

Stanford's President Kenneth Pitzer issued a defensive public statement: "For the university to disobey a lawful order of a governmental body would be to turn our backs on the very standards by which we are attempting to govern ourselves." The administration identified twenty-three aid recipients but expressly repudiated the inference that those identified had been involved in or associated with campus disorders. It also supplied the names of sixteen persons "taking part in campus disruptions."

In a talk to the student legislature on the day after the service of the subpoena, Stanford Provost Richard W. Lyman warned that universities are in for "several seasons" of legislative probes but admitted that the university had "every intention" of complying. Student leaders were not so resigned. The university's student governing body denounced the subpoena as "a clear assault on the university's right to handle its own affairs internally and on the freedom of students and faculty to pursue their academic activities no matter what their political beliefs and irrespective of their group associations."

The response to the McClellan subpoenas shames the widely shared resolve not to permit a repetition of the 1966 compliance. A perceptive analysis of the earlier fiasco by a University of Michigan faculty committee notes that the administrators gave "no explicit consideration to any threat to the civil liberties of those" whose names were surrendered, "to the autonomy of the university, or to the basic freedoms of the university."

If such consideration had been expressed by the universities now subpoenaed to a lawyer specializing in this field, it is almost certain that he would have counseled his clients to resist. He surely would have explained that a great American university possesses standing and resources not available to a lowly "unfriendly witness." An experienced lawyer knows all too well the might of the phrase Quod licet Jovi, non licet bovi when dealing with Congressional committees.

What were the risks? If a move to quash the subpoena failed in the federal district court, there still remained appellate possibilities, with ultimate recourse to the Supreme Court on a precedent-protected First Amendment issue. And what a powerful case could be made to demonstrate lack of legislative purpose! At the very least, the Court could be expected to limit the scope of the compelled disclosure to the committee's narrow jurisdictional boundaries and a clearly defined legislative purpose, a restriction which would undoubtedly obviate the name requirement altogether.

Even ultimate failure to quash the subpoena could not result in a contempt citation without a vote of the entire United States Senate—assuming the full committee voted such a citation. And before the committee submitted its citation of a representative of a great national university to a Senatorial vote, it would seek to minimize the risk of defeat by offering—there is precedent for this even in the case of a recalcitrant witness—the university administrators an opportunity to purge themselves by compliance. Resourceful and aggressive when wooing power and money, the universities bumbled and cringed when their values were threatened by the security establishment.

It is precisely the universities' failure to take risks in support of professed principles that makes their compliance so pitiful—if not tragic—in the light of the value crisis now engulfing the entire educational establishment. As a bitter student member of the Columbia University senate put it to me:

> I am convinced that a powerful resistance to the subpoena is possible. Even Cordier says that compliance is distasteful, but that the subpoena is legal because his Wall Street lawyer told him so. Cordier desperately needs credibility if he expects to run Columbia. Isn't it worth buying a little credibility by refusing to bend the knee to the bastards? Suppose he loses in all of the courts including the United States Supreme Court, the only risk he or the trustees face is a possible fine, or more probably, an order to comply. What a cheap price for an institution to pay for the defense of a principle. I'm sure that if a threat to the University's property were presented by a Congressional subpoena, the path of resistance would be a natural choice.

The widespread compliance underlines the fading of th faculty voice even in matters that trench to the heart of university freedom. Faculty were uniformly not consulted in the decision making about the response to the subpoenas and only sporadically demanded to be consulted—even when subpoenas called for identification of faculty members.

The approval of administration compliance by some university faculties—even though half-hearted—and the apathy of individual faculty members, many of whom feel caught in a tightening regent and legislative squeeze, will undoubtedly further convince student critics that the privileges of the professoriate have converted even the liberals into a tenured gentry. Still, lawsuits were brought by faculty bodies attacking three subpoenas (Prof. Douglas Dowd of Cornell joined the SDS as a plaintiff in the Columbia action). And faculty response might have been more extensive and vigorous had the issue not risen so late in the term and had they been more freely consulted by the administrators, a few of whom dealt with the matter in tight secrecy.

But the overall pattern of compliance supports the charge that the university is incapable of independence because it is hopelessly indentured to reaction. A more troublesome question is also raised by the compliance: will the American university—like its counterpart in 19th-century European autocracies—permit itself to become a clearinghouse for a political intelligence network redesigned for deployment against a new generation of rebels?

The meaning of McClellanism is illuminated by three decades of anti-subversive investigations. If the university is to be harnessed to the needs of corporate America, the power of Congress must be used to exploit the long-range objective of a small student group in order to destroy the independence of the university and to thwart desperately needed institutional reforms. In a grimmer replay of the fifties, the fear engendering myth of a student-inspired threat to the national security, Aristotle's invented terror, is being feverishly revived to meet the challenge of a new time.

McClellan has launched this new strategy with a successful raid against an unprepared and unresistant enemy. Ignoring his claimed legislative purpose, and without even waiting for the conclusion of the hearings, he has just now filed a savagely punitive bill that would make campus "disruption" a federal offense. Will the university fight back while there is still time?

Narrative, History and Prophecy

THE FOUR-GATED CITY. By Doris Lessing. Alfred A. Knopf. 614 pp. $7.50.

FLORENCE HOWE

Miss Howe teaches English at Goucher College. She has written other essays on Doris Lessing for The Nation. With Paul Lauter, she will be publishing a book later this year called Rebellion or Service (Macmillan).

The Four-Gated City is bulkier by far than any one of the four preceding novels in the series known as Children of Violence (Martha Quest, 1952; A Proper Marriage, 1954; A Ripple from the Storm, 1958; Landlocked, 1965). Like them, it is a chronicle of change, a Bildungsroman of character and history. Unlike them, it charts not only a decade and a half of the recent past (the previous four volumes together cover about two earlier decades) but moves on to view the apocalyptic years that will conclude this century. It is thus not only narrative and history but a stab at prophecy as well. For that reason and one other, The Four-Gated City is more important than its four predecessors.

The other reason has to do with turning a corner into mostly uncharted regions. Here, the concluding novel reminds me of The Golden Notebook, published in 1962 and generally considered to be the best of Lessing. As in that book, the immediate scene is England in the fifties. In both novels, the heroines move toward a descent into madness and then release from it, though the terms and values of the experiences differ significantly.

The heroine of The Four-Gated City, Martha Quest/Hesse, now 30 years old, continues to be particularly useful for Bildungsroman, since she is never finished learning. Living is for her "simply a process of developing different 'ears,' senses, with which one 'heard,' experienced, what one couldn't before." The four earlier novels have seen her through adolescence, two bad marriages, one meaningful love affair, a conversion to communism, and a decade of left-wing politics in Zambesia (Rhodesia). Her life has coincided with the rise of fascism, the Second World War, and the ultimate victory of racism in Rhodesia. Now, in Volume 5, she has wrenched herself free of family, friends, politics and "nation." She is the conventional exile of our time: an intellectual with political skills she no longer wishes to use; intelligent, resourceful, energetic, dependable, but suffering from self-doubt, a sense of shattered or evasive identity and a lack of purpose. She is nearly as war-torn, in short, as the England she lands on in 1950.

For the following fifteen years, Martha is hooked into British life (and its international reverberations) when she agrees to take a job as secretary to novelist Mark Coldridge and to reside in his large house on Radlett Street, Bloomsbury. The Coldridge family, significantly involved in public life, becomes the vehicle through which Martha observes and participates in the history of the fifties and early sixties. At first, Martha attempts detachment, but her life is transformed when the cold war strikes directly at Radlett Street and she is sucked into the muddy waters of a holding action. Mark's scientist brother Colin defects to the Soviet Union, leaving his wife to commit suicide and his 6-year-old to be cared for by Mark (and Martha). Mark's simple loyalty to his brother results in a siege of the house by reporters, friends-become-spies, and hysterical relatives. Martha supports Mark through his conversion to communism, and eventually, in spite of the cynical feeling that she has been all through it before, joins the "unconstituted committee," a growing alliance of the now tiny, fragmented Left in London.

These are the politics of frustration and paralysis, broken up as unaccountably and incomprehensibly as they began—by the death of Stalin, by Hungary and Suez. In 1956, an "idea of change" is in the air, new "movement" begins to alter the surface of British life. Some Coldridges help organize the series of Aldermaston peace marches, the younger generation join the Committee of One Hundred, and the older become leaders in the Labour Party. The political Left and the two generations now begin an internal struggle. But Mark and Martha remain, though for different reasons, peripheral to the politics of the next decade. Mark returns to writing novels, then to trying to understand what has happened and is happening, then gives up the present entirely to plan for the future. He believes that there is no point either to party or to street politics. For we are headed inevitably toward an accidental holocaust: "What will happen is a development," he writes in a memorandum, "of what is already happening and what has been accelerating, out of control, since 1914 and the green light for mass extermination." At the end of the novel, therefore, he gives up life in London to become planner of a new "city in the desert" for refugees from the destruction to come.

But to summarize the novel in this way is to do it a disservice. I have omitted other strands of Martha's life and Mark's, chief among them the children they raise together and Mark's "insane" wife Lynda who lives with them from time to time. Most of all, I have not caught the novel's essential character, its layered quality. In truth, it does not have the felicitous form of The Golden Notebook: ordered chaos made possible by the creation of a single novelist/political/heroine who keeps a set of four notebooks. That compendious work now seems, when weighed beside this new compendium, neat and self-contained. The Four-Gated City is not built on consistency or uniformity but on variety. At first sight, Mrs. Lessing seems to be doing just what she will. If she wants to stop her narrative for an essay on the Labour Party or for several paragraphs on the error of reading novels as though they were autobiography; if she wants to stop for an interpolated summary of her hero's novel about an Ur-city or the early biography of other characters; if she wants to include portions of her heroine's diary as she deliberately experiences "insanity"; or if she wants to write in the form of notes or scenarios, she simply does so. But there is method here. For example, almost at the center of the book, just before the breakup of the cold war, we leave London for Johannesburg, where Martha's mother is about to follow her daughter into exile. We are baffled, perhaps irritated by the shift, but then we are seduced by Mrs. Lessing's story of a black child named Stephen, the first black person whom Mrs. Quest talks to in thirty years of life in Africa, the first black person to touch her physically and emotionally: "You have a black heart, missus, you are my mother," Stephen says one day, and Mrs. Quest, having been rejected by her own children, can only weep in response. It all seems casual, even roughly done. And yet, coming where it does in the novel, and in the series of novels, it is hardly that.

Martha's history has always included guilt for the racism of her English parents and fear of a past she has wanted only to deny. Each of the previous novels has carried in it, moreover, the image of her mother, exemplar of the middle-aged woman Martha does not want to become: useless, hating and hated by her children and fearing the country she was forced to live in, bitter and destructive, an appalling human whose ultimate function is only death. Martha, who has coped efficiently with the Coldridge household, including a number of children, and the exigencies of the cold war, cannot face her own mother. The visit brings Martha to crisis about herself, a dangerous one at age 35. Her first response is characteristic: "Somewhere in Martha's life it had been instilled in her, or she knew by instinct, that one should never read anything until one wanted to, learn anything until one needed it." She sets about, therefore, reading the "equivalent of a university course" in psychiatry and emerges "with one essential fact. That these practitioners of a science, or an art, agreed about absolutely nothing." Hence it is up to Martha's intelligence to solve her problems. But as she tells the psychiatrist she decides to see anyway, "what her intelligence said had no effect at all on her emotions"—a typical enough complaint. And Martha's own solitary "work," as she calls it, of "resurrecting her past," does not seem either, by itself, adequate to solve her problems. Her mother's visit thus begins by changing Martha from nurse to patient. But after she has gone and Martha is declared officially well by the psychiatrist, Martha's critical intelligence remains turned inward. She becomes absorbed by the question of how minds work.

Her experience has led her to question the line usually drawn between neurosis and psychosis, especially in relation to hallucinatory "seeing" or "hearing." Why does Dr. Lamb declare one patient (Martha) "entirely rational" and another (Lynda) schizophrenic? Presumably because of the distinction between hearing "real voices" and hearing voices that one knows are simply in one's imagination. Lynda had been unwise enough as an adolescent 14-year-old to tell her father that she could hear what her future stepmother was thinking. Martha, on the other hand, knows enough at age 35 to put the case to Dr. Lamb as a supposition: "suppose I insisted I had seen Dorothy's suicide exactly as it was. . . ." Dr. Lamb remains caught in his professional distinctions: Martha is not shouting and insistent; ipso facto, she is sane.

The inadequacy—and even the irrationality—of Dr. Lamb's judgment is clearer when we remember how carefully Mrs. Lessing has prepared for this moment. She has laced the early chapters of the novel with accidental extrasensory experiences of Martha that are entirely convincing. Very soon after her arrival in London, Martha spends time walking "the interminable damp hostile streets of this doomed city, all cracked and thinned and darkened by war." Especially when she is tired and hungry, she finds a "wavelength," a mental "space" in her mind. To get there, she has to move first into a "band of noise," "a din of appalling sound, music, voices, screaming, the sounds of war." Sometimes she finds that it is possible to separate the sounds to hear something useful, but mainly she has to reach "through not being afraid of or irritated by the silliness and jumble of this area, a state of quiet and distance. . . ." This is not a drug experience: the book may be read, in fact, as a tract against the use of drugs even for some mental patients. Martha enters the "door" to the mind in the ancient manner, as a "reward of not-eating, not-sleeping, using her body as an engine to get her out of the small dim prison of every day." In the last quarter of the novel, Martha's teacher becomes Lynda. Nursing her, Martha enters "Lynda's country," hears her voices, and communicates profoundly with her. In a final, climactic episode, Martha arranges a a three-week experiment in self-induced and controlled "insanity." She lives in one room, on coffee and little sleep, and passes through various "Stations of the Cross" that are cultural (in the Jungian sense) as well as personal landmarks. The experience takes her back again into her past, into anti-Semitism and racism, for example, and purges her emotionally and intellectually as the hours of deliberate, cognitive "resurrecting" earlier had not.

I have sketched only the bare outline of the single and most important thread of the book. It is not one that Mrs. Lessing's readers will expect from her. With a correct instinct, she anticipates some hostility by describing Martha's own reluctant conversion. As she begins to read the literature of Eastern and Western mysticism, Martha is aware at first of a sense of "distaste" which she recognizes as "a form of fear," "identical with" what "she had experienced in politics. . . ." But then she describes "a prickling challenging liveliness, a vitality at work. But not in the backwaters of 'rationalism' which was the official culture, and not in the mirror of the official culture"—astrology and other forms of pseudo-scientific occultism. Nor is her discovery Rimbaud's notion of the necessary disordering of the senses, nor the simple spontaneity and impulse-hunting of contemporary youth's response to bureaucratization. Martha's discovery is different not only in kind but in a social purpose, in having an end beyond personal freedom.

As in The Golden Notebook, mental breakdowns of all kinds are, in part, a response to the politics of the West, the bureaucratization, the incipient fascism, the irrational violence, and to the dehumanized, propaganda- and drug-addicted culture we live in. But for Mrs. Lessing in 1969, madness is not merely a debilitating affliction or an escape, or even a novelist's tool. Developing particular forms of what Western man calls "madness" may be the only way out of his afflicted culture. Can anything —any persons or organizations—Mrs. Lessing asks in this novel, call halt to the inevitable destruction to come, given the growth and movement about the earth of mad machines, on the one hand, and the lack of internal human commonsensical and moral controls, on the other? Her answer is unequivocally No. Our dulled apathy to the condition of daily life and to the cries of war signals what Robert Bly has called "the deep longing for death," a suicidal rush to annihilation, as though the half-drugged of us were longing for total immolation, for the relief of the end. Mrs. Lessing, on the contrary, envisions a struggle toward life, through the use of extraordinary sensory powers by intelligence and a moral consciousness.

In this respect, Mrs. Lessing is a perfectly consistent novelist. When at the end of The Golden Notebook, Anna Wulf decides to take a job as a marriage counselor and to begin working for the Labour Party, and, perhaps, some day to write another novel, she is following her concept of the intellectual's function: to be a boulder pusher, that is, a teacher of the humane principles—freedom, nonviolence, for example—that a few great men have promulgated. Hence, living means pushing Sisyphean boulders up endless series of mountains —a struggle with "human stupidity." At the end of Martha's experiment in insanity, she comes to several conclusions, the most important of which she labels the "central fact," that "without knowing what I know, through Lynda, I'd not have been able to hold on." For the experience had sent her "over the edge"; she judges it finally as "not only very dangerous, but extremely inefficient." And yet, she is also telling us that, however "defective," her experiment had taught her that the mind stretched "was not all chaos, it was not just a jumble: one could make some kind of sense of all this by using one's ordinary faculties of memory, judgment, comparison, understanding. In short, one could use one's common sense here, in this uncommon area, just as one could in ordinary life." When the novel per se ends, we do not know precisely what Martha will do, though it is clear that she will not leave England with Mark and his group. She will work where she is. From the "documents" in the 55-page Appendix to the novel, we learn that she becomes an organizer and teacher of people with similar extrasensory knowledge and equipment, in preparation for the destruction that comes. In the tradition of teacher still, Martha's last act before her death, sometime between 1995 and 2000, is to write a long document describing her incarceration with some seventy others on an island off the coast of Scotland, their methods of survival, the culture they establish, and most significantly, the "new" children born on the island.

Martha, we may note, ends where she begins—on an island. It is no casual happenstance. The epigraphs with which Mrs. Lessing introduces the novel's four parts chart the movement of her book: from the geography of Rachel Carson that can be read mystically to the mysticism of the East that we can see as a map of the future. A quotation from The Edge of the Sea describes green mangrove seedlings that drop into the water along the Florida coast to "root firmly in any muddy shoal" and eventually "create new islands," Mrs. Carson describes the ecological process as "eloquent of a continuing change now actually in progress, a change being brought about by the life processes of living things." It is obviously also a description of Mrs. Lessing's novel and her reading of human history. The novel's final epigraph (from The Sufis, Idries Shah) is plain enough: "What ordinary people regard as sporadic and occasional bursts of telepathic and prophetic power are seen by the Sufi as nothing less than the first stirrings of these same organs." The "new" children born on the island, of several races, can both "see" and "hear," and as Martha describes them, they "are our guardians. They guard us."

In her final volume Mrs. Lessing has given narrative form and significance to ideas that, as Martha says, others are also feeling. Readers of The Nation may recall a recent essay by Ronald Sampson, lecturer at Bristol University, titled "What is a University?" (May 5, 1969). Sampson describes "student unrest" as reflecting "a fundamental questioning of and dissatisfaction with the very philosophy of knowledge on which the university as an institution is ultimately based." He analyzes the "metaphysical" basis for the "cultural crisis of the West" and concludes that Western culture "rests on a false condition of human consciousness." He continues, "More and more people become aware of Blake's 'mind-forged manacles.'" It is these manacles that Doris Lessing's novel is ultimately concerned with. The Four-Gated City challenges many if not most of the central tenets of our culture: our definitions of sanity/insanity; rational/irrational: our understanding of how people learn and the purpose of knowledge: even our guesses about mutation, genetics and the future of the human race. With bittersweet optimism, Martha describes the "new" children of the future as naturally nonviolent. These ultimate children of violence "include" and "have transcended" the history of our century: "They include us in a comprehension we can't begin to imagine." Sampson's essay ends with a sentence that might stand as epigraph for all five volumes of Children of Violence: "A true metaphysic makes explicit the human obligation to mitigate and reduce suffering, to strengthen the unity and freedom of mankind—without violence—in a world surfeited and nauseated by violence."

Since Malcolm's Death

THREE-FIFTHS OF A MAN. By Floyd McKissick. The Macmillan Co. 223 pp. $4.95.

ELDRIDGE CLEAVER. Edited with an Introduction by Robert Scheer. Random House. 211 pp. $5.95.

DIE NIGGER DIE. By H. Rap Brown. The Dial Press. 145 pp. $3.95.

JAMES WEINSTEIN

Mr. Weinstein is the author of The Decline of Socialism in America, 1912-1925 (Monthly Review Press), The Corporate Ideal in the Liberal State, 1900-1918 (Beacon Press) and, with David W. Eakins, the forthcoming For a New America.

In the last fifteen years of public agitation and struggle, Afro-Americans have developed three distinct, if sometimes overlapping tendencies. There are the liberals (the "Negroes" in current black parlance), the cultural nationalists (including the Muslims), and the revolutionary nationalists (led now by the Black Panther Party). Of these, the first and the last speak directly to different groups of whites with the aim of enlisting them, or allying with them, to change the American social structure: the liberals by gaining admission for blacks into the existing social order, the revolutionary nationalists by the overthrow of corporate capitalism and the establishment of a Socialist democracy. The cultural nationalists seek a solution apart from white America, which they despair of changing, and into which they disdain to integrate.

The goals of each group define the broad outlines of its politics and roughly determine the way in which it relates to whites of various groups and classes. The liberals ultimately direct their appeals to liberal corporation, trade union, religious and political leaders. They seek to win the support of those who hold power, either formally or informally. The style of the Negro liberals varies from the deferential pleading of a Whitney Young to the angry warnings of a Floyd McKissick, and from an appeal to conscience or rational interest to threats of social disruption or disaster. But the content is essentially the same: grant Negroes equality (or, at least, equal opportunity for advancement) or face continued (or accelerating) disruption and turmoil. Give some real power and resources to the responsible (liberal) leaders, or be forced to deal with the revolutionaries.

At one time, prior to the emergence of the mature Malcolm and revolutionary nationalism, Negro leaders and organizations could be classified by their degrees of militancy. All those who related purposively to whites fell within the civil rights movement: all were liberals. Beside the liberals (militant and nonmilitant) there were only the earlier nationalists, who rejected white society in toto. Nationalists of all kinds, both the then dominant cultural nationalists and the emerging revolutionary nationalists, were condemned by most white leftists as racist, separatist, even as allies of the Ku Klux Klan.

Since Malcolm's death all that has changed. It is clear now that militancy per se means little, that there are two distinct movements among Afro-Americans relating directly to white politics, and that these movements have their counterparts in white America. One need only read Floyd McKissick's Three-Fifths of A Man to be struck with how quickly and how much things have changed. For McKissick was one of the most militant leaders of one of the most militant civil rights organizations (CORE), and yet his book is strikingly archaic. Its mood is neo-boogey-boogey-boogey: it is another warning that unless comfortable white America makes room for the blacks on the basis of absolute equality there will be guerrilla warfare to the death. To be sure, McKissick is intelligent, militant and sophisticated. He fully understands the importance of black nationalism, and of its development from Garvey, through Elijah Muhammad, to Malcolm, Stokely Carmichael and H. Rap Brown (although he has not yet assimilated the Panthers). And he makes it clear that he believes most blacks choose not to integrate into white society, but desire their own communities, as economic equals to the whites. But how to achieve such self-determination and equality? It is there that McKissick is back with the liberals. His solution is the Constitution combined with black nationalism; it is an appeal for governmental transfer of ownership of land, business and educational facilities in the ghetto to the blacks—either as individuals or collectively.

All that is lacking, McKissick insists, is will on the part of "the American Government," since it has "the power, money and resources" to initiate such a program. To evoke that will, McKissick conjures up Che Guevara and the possibility of violent revolution. "It may still happen in the manner Che expected; in fact it is highly likely," he writes. "But," he adds hastily, "it need not be so."

Perhaps not, but it does seem a hopeless endeavor to appeal to an abstraction called "the government" to transfer substantial amounts of property and capital goods from the corporations to the black masses, when "the government" is the political incarnation of those corporations. Such a massive redistribution of wealth might take place after a prolonged and successful struggle—as a means of preventing even more drastic consequences. But what McKissick asks is clearly beyond the realm of what even the most flexible liberal men of power are prepared to consider at present.

In sharp contrast to McKissick, Eldridge Cleaver addresses himself to the mobilization of the black masses and to those whites whom he and the Panthers see as allies or potential allies in the struggle for socialism. The book, a collection of writings and speeches since the publication of Soul on Ice, was hastily thrown together after Cleaver's flight to escape reimprisonment. It is a very good book, one that reflects Cleaver's integrity and constant intellectual and political development, as well as the reasons for the emergence of the Black Panthers as the leading black revolutionary organization. The book is valuable, among other reasons, because it provides the reader with a sense of the development of the Panthers' political thinking. In it, Cleaver emphasizes the hostility of the Panthers to racism in any form, and stresses the earnest desire of the BPP to form alliances with white groups, such as the Peace and Freedom Party. He also writes about Ronald Reagan, Humphrey and George Wallace; but while he indicates that their politics sets the framework within which Panther politics must operate, he makes it plain that the Panthers are not in the business of pleading with, cajoling, or threatening the whites in power in order to gain concessions. Cleaver and the Panthers stand for Socialist revolution; it is for that reason that they address whites; and it is white radicals, particularly students, to whom they speak.

Die Nigger Die, in contrast to Eldridge Cleaver, is not a good book even though the politics of Cleaver and H. Rap Brown are similar. The book is most valuable as a partial biography of Brown, and as an example of his agitational style. Too much of it, however, is Brown honking his own horn, or else pure jive. The strongest and most compelling aspect of the book is Brown's determination to help create a culture of struggle—to flesh out Cleaver's aphorism that either you're part of the solution or you're part of the problem. Mostly the book consists of exhortations to blacks to struggle. Unfortunately those to whom it is directed will not likely read it, while those who do will not learn much.

The Arithmetic of Silence

YOU MUST KNOW EVERYTHING. By Isaac Babel. Translated by Max Hayward. Edited by Nathalie Babel. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 283 pp. $5.95.

LESLIE EPSTEIN

Mr. Epstein's fiction and essays have appeared in New American Review, Tri-Quarterly, Partisan Review and Yale Review. He teaches English at Queens College.

The recent publication in the West of the novels of Bulgakov and Solzhenitsyn, together with the endless stream of stories and poems smuggled into the hands of Italian editors, must confirm what the readers of Babel, Pasternak and Sholokhov could only assert: that the national literature of greatest merit in our times is Russian. What is astonishing about the vigor of Soviet writing, of course, is that it has been sustained under a regime whose initial impulse has always been to hound recalcitrant talent to death. The paradox can be explained any number of ways. The revolution opened an immense gap between what was promised and what was achieved, not altogether unlike that dislocation of desire and fulfillment that is the stimulus to the creative process itself. Moreover, despite or because of that revolution, Russia has remained a 19th-century country, full of horses and onions and 19th-century arts. McLuhan applies here much less than he does throughout the rest of Europe, which is to say that the Russian people are among the few who have not discovered the irrelevancy of reading and words. Apart from the global village, they have been spared much that is debilitating in the international style. But the most crucial factor in the stubborn excellence of Soviet writing has been the attempt to suppress it. In our era the censor, the commissar, the goon represent a species of restriction which, in the absence of all other formal limitations, may actually do more to preserve an art than destroy it. There should be no need to say that I do not recommend repression in the arts any more than I would, say, anti-Semitism in religion. It is just that, in certain circumstances, and on balance, the effect of such policies is far from what was intended. Hence Russia is the last land with a great national literature, and, despite its repeated forays into anti-Semitism, the only nation where the Jewishness of its Jews is still preserved.

Which brings us directly to Isaac Babel, about whom the question must be not only how did he write so well but why did he write so little? Babel always answered this question with studied irony and deliberate camouflage:

> Q. Readers are puzzled by your more than lengthy silence.
>
> A. It puzzles me too, so in this respect there's not much difference between us. To tell the honest truth, I am simply not very well equipped to do this job, and I wouldn't do it if I felt in a better position to do something else. But this is the only job that, with a great deal of effort, I can do more or less decently. That's the first thing. In the second place, I have a well-developed critical sense. In the third place, we live in stormy, revolutionary times and I am among those people who are not so concerned with the word "what." . . . By temperament I am always interested in the how and why. These questions need careful thought and study, and you have to approach the business of writing with great honesty in order to answer them in literary form. That's how I explain [my silence] to myself.

Virtually every critic I know has seized upon the ambiguity of such remarks to turn Babel's silence into a case study of the conflict between artist and state. As his daughter remarks, quite typically, in her preface to You Must Know Everything: "His style [did not] improve according to the Leninist-Stalinist theories of literature. Instead, Babel chose silence rather than compromise—he wrote for himself." To a certain extent—Babel was, after all, murdered by Stalin—such judgments are accurate. But the chief virtue of this book is that, quite by accident, and largely in the appendices, it forces us to realize that the causes of Babel's silence lay not so much in the demands of the state as in the exigencies of his own art.

These appendices—the last third of the book—consist of an interview with Babel and four brief reminiscences of him by colleagues and friends, most prominently Ilya Ehrenburg and Georgy Munblit. In these pages, certainly, we hear much about terror, panic, torture, loneliness, hiding, pursuit, but is is not the tyranny of Stalin to which these words refer but the torment of writing:

> You have to have strong fingers and whipcord nerves to be able to rip out of your drab prose, until it bleeds, those bits you happen to like most but which are needed least. It's like self-inflicted torture. Why did I get into this hellish writing business? I just don't understand it. I could have gone into agricultural machinery, like my father.

[The same sense of obsessive devotion to his craft emerges from the portrait of Babel in Konstantin Paustovsky's "Isaac Babel Talks About Writing," The Nation, March 31.]

The main reason Babel wrote so little, stopped altogether, is that silence was always intrinsic to his method of creation and at last simply overwhelmed it. He would sit for days on end, squeezing out a half a page, a quarter of a page, and then tearing it up. One story, "Lyubka the Cossack," was rewritten twenty-six times. A lifetime was spent in search of the perfect period, the full stop, in paring away as much descriptive material as possible. "If ever I write my autobiography," he tells his interviewer, "I'll call it The Story of an Adjective." At one point he even speaks of words as a kind of disease, an infestation of parasites:

> It's wrong to think that talent for writing is a matter of being able to rhyme or think up abstruse, startling epithets and metaphors. That used to be my trouble, and I still have to squash these metaphors in what I write, just as some not very clean people squash the vermin they find on themselves.

In a sense, Babel was the greatest editor who ever lived. And in that capacity he even refused to call his own work writing.

> Babel always spoke with contempt about wordiness. Any unnecessary word in a piece of prose made him feel outright physical disgust. He crossed out unneeded words with such fury that his pencil tore the paper. He hardly ever said "I am writing," but rather, "I am composing."

A NOTE TO MORNING

No one knows when beaches began mouthing the sea, their surface the smooth, wet inside of lips.

In low tide docks ride high on the sand and dogs are careful.
The morning fog brings strange birds to pick where kelp tried to follow the water.

The beach is naked then (naked as my trail here
I meant to say,
but that's half a lie)
When the moon's lode rocks the sea to madness, it can toss docks high as birds and vomit dogs like spittle.

There was no death when beaches began,
only the quiet dying.

TERRY MOSER

The sum of such reduction must be zero, and the portrait of such an artist must inevitably resemble that which Munblit paints from memory: Babel sitting firmly upon a battered trunk, inside of which his manuscripts moldered, safe from "prying eyes," brought out "only to correct a line or a word, after which the yellowing pages were put back, doomed to lie there undisturbed for many long months, if not years, to come."

Babel made at least one attempt to escape the agony of this arithmetic. "One should write novels," he told Munblit with a kind of bitter facetiousness, "long novels in installments, and turn them out quickly, easily and efficiently." "The Jewess," the longest story in this book (at 15 pages the longest Babel ever wrote), is his attempt to follow that advice. It is a disaster, a weary saga full of padding and cluttered with details, redolent with sentimentality ("I must keep something from sixty years of my life besides the ashes in my heart and the tears"), wholly dependent upon redundant abstractions ("Boris held passionately, even morbidly, to the spirit of comradeship and the honor of the group. It was perhaps because his people had for so long been denied one of the finest of human feelings—that of comradeship in the field of battle—that Boris felt such a hunger for friendship, a need to defend comrades and display loyalty to them"), and devoid of the irony, the compression, the irrationality, the weirdness of Babel at his best. Nathalie Babel, who does not understand her father's work, remarks that with "The Jewess" Babel "finally achieves the 'objectivity' for which he had always striven," and goes on to ask, "Why did Babel leave 'The Jewess' unfinished? Why did he abandon a work that shows such mastery of craft, originality of conception, and a development toward a different view of the world?" Babel gives the answer—though it is obvious enough from the story itself—in the interview at the back of the book.

> Let me tell you a secret. I have wasted several years trying, with due regard to my own tastes, to write lengthily, with a lot of detail and philosophy—striving for the sort of truth I have been talking about. It didn't work out with me.

The ellipses at the end of "The Jewess," the three dots, the years that came to stand between all Babel's work, do not, then, represent a response to pressure from without, the state, the revolution, but are a sign that Babel realized he was doomed, as he put it, to five minutes of reality at a time—or four, or three, and finally nothing.

Most of the twenty-five stories in this book, with two or three exceptions, are quite worthless—scraps from a diary, youthful sketches that were later transformed into more complex and successful works, exercises in translation and editing, false starts and abandoned manuscripts, straightforward journalism full of unlikely moralizing, experiments that went awry, and now and then simply a bad story that Babel himself discarded and hoped never to see again. To impose such things upon a writer, an artist, as excruciatingly self-conscious and selective as Babel is very nearly a criminal act. (So was publishing his entirely unedifying letters in The Lonely Years, another effort of Miss Babel's.) But there are the exceptions—the story "Sunset," for example, in which Benya Krik, soon to be the king in the wonderful Odessa series, plots to kill his father and take over the business. There are no tears and ashes in the heart of Benya's mother; instead, she confronts her family and rolls on the ground:

> "Mendel Krik and my sons, my bastards. What have you done to me, my bastards, what have you done with the hair on my head, what have you done with my poor old body, where are they, my teeth? Where is my youth?"
>
> The old woman howled, tried to tear her nightshirt from her back, and, getting to her feet, began to turn round and round on the spot, like a dog trying to bite its tail. She scratched her sons' faces, kissed them, and dug her nails into their cheeks.

And there is the heretofore unpublished title story, "You Must Know Everything," the first Babel wrote. In it, a young Jewish schoolboy walks through the familiar streets of Odessa, remembering how he once looked in through the window of a girdle and corset shop. He arrives at his grandmother's apartment and has a wonderful traditional meal. Then—after a full day at school—he forces himself to study some more, after which he reads a few pages in Turgenev's "First Love" and becomes upset by a scene in which one of the characters is struck by a riding crop. Then, while the room grows progressively hotter and stuffier, he endures two more lessons, in music and Hebrew. It is night by the time they are over and in a neighboring apartment a woman starts to sing, "Why do I love you so much?" To the accompaniment of tea and the breathing of the old dog, Mimi, the boy's grandmother tells him grotesque stories of God's solicitude for Jews:

> "Go in peace," the rabbi said to him. "The government inspector will quiet down." The Jew went home. He found the inspector on the doorstep of his inn. He was lying there dead, with his belly all purple and swollen up.
>
> Grandmother fell silent. The samovar hummed away. The neighbor was still singing. Everything was covered with blinding moonlight. Mimi began to wag her tail—she was hungry.

Nothing further happens, except that the old woman falls to thinking of her dead husband and suddenly declares:

> Study! . . . Study and you will have everything—wealth and fame! You must know everything. The whole world will fall at your feet and grovel before you. Everybody must envy you. Do not trust people. Do not have friends. Do not lend them money. Do not give them your heart!

The maid breaks a saucer, the grandmother rages at her and dismisses her, and she and her grandson eat a late evening supper without exchanging a word.

This is yet another silence that works its way through Babel's writing, a profound stillness in which all the parts of the universe—a samovar, a song, moonlight, the slap of a hungry dog's tail—discover one another and, despite the greatest disorder and madness (a corset and girdle, the sting of a whip, senile temper, a swollen purple belly, bullets, finally, pumped into cavalrymen's brains) stay clinging, hushed.

Architecture in Mexico

NATHAN SILVER

Mr. Silver is an American architect teaching at Cambridge University, and is architecture critic of the New Statesman. He is the author of Lost New York and is working on a new book with a Guggenheim Fellowship.

I went to Mexico to see some modern architecture and to look at the sites of the pre-Spanish cultures. I also had the hope of generally sizing up a visual culture still pretty much national and in focus, unwhirled by the Laundromat of industrialization and urban predominance. When I lived in New York, Mexico wasn't for Europe-oriented me. It was the place where fancy friends would go for long weekends and short vacations in early spring. At the other end of a cheap flight was a country where you could get at half-price the goods available at Fred Leighton's in the Village: tin candelabra, clunky silver bracelets, goblets that looked as though they were blown from melted-down dirty Coca-Cola bottles. I thought Mexicans were gold-toothed hotheads like that bandit in The Treasure of the Sierra Madre, or drunk, or lazy, or callous like Los Olvidados. That was before I saw it, and only some of it turned out to be right.

From England, Mexico seems to be neither the nearby source for craftsy bargains nor an extended Hollywood back lot. It looms in the imagination as the most exotic country in the world for myth seekers ready to generalize from appearances, and if T. E. Lawrence had other favorites, there were D. H. and Malcolm Lowry. I'm not sure which remote regions suck at the imaginations of other Europeans, though the French at least appear to find affinities in South America: Brazil and Peru. Mexico—locally it's a serious gaffe to classify it otherwise—is in North America (sometimes "Mesoamerica" to archaeologists), just beyond the frontiers of the English language, a colony manqué in English affections, starting at Sonora.

Certainly this applies to Mexico City, as North American a place (visually) as there could be. The tall buildings in the center of the vast urban area look like those on Manhattan's West Side, and some of the suburbs, like the Pedregal Gardens district, match Beverly Hills wealth for wealth, and folly for architectural folly. Except that in Mexico the stupefying exhibition of idiosyncratic personal pelf is modified by the walled enclosures of Spanish tradition. The characteristic element to be seen in Pedregal Gardens is the wall. Even where materials garishly change every 100 feet, these walls produce altogether a well-mannered public exterior lining the streets and also contribute to a suburban concentration possible only through enclosed privacy. The display of wealth being paraded in suburbs like this came to me as a shock, but one learns that Mexico is among the ten or dozen richest countries in the world, another thing making it more like the United States and Europe than like its southern neighbors.

Even after the building boom encouraged by the 1968 Olympics, the hotel situation remains tough in Mexico City during the big tourist months of February and March, though it is hard to believe this is true when you look around at the quinity of super-luxury hotels. The city remains better equipped for Grand Tourism than for mass tourism. The airport tips you off when you arrive—it is an overworked terminal dating from a less crowded past, now becoming dirty and souvenir-crazy. What the Olympics has mainly led to in the way of public improvement is what Expos and other such affairs usually contribute: a few sleek highways out to the activity's site, an impetus for posh new transient accommodation, a city "beautification" program, and a collection of leftover buildings to be adapted afterward. Now Mexico at least has some useful stadiums, with an attractive one just across from the university. The "Olympic village" has been converted to public housing. The excellent Olympics graphics remain on view all over the place.

A noteworthy national resource exploited for a change during the Olympics was the virtuoso ability of Luis

WORDS OUT OF DARKNESS

(for Nelly Sachs—Nobel Prize Recipient, 1966)

When the packed cattle cars stank into Belsen and Dachau, she fled to Sweden with nothing left but language.

All the children whose hair would never again need to be brushed, all the men whose tongues had licked up latrine flies,

all the women whose wombs had been filled with experiment never left her thought.

The flesh of prophets tore on the barbed wire fences; wings of angels were gnawed by hungry rats.

Solomon kept a journal in the attic of Anne Frank.

Distance is more terrible than presence. Horror the mind envisions copulates with sleeplessness.

In Sweden Yahweh burned like snow.

SISTER MAURA

TATTOO

(for Leonard Quirino)

I had forgotten the butterfly that lights up your skin, spread out in a bright stain of wings.

"It's my soul," you said,
and I believe it.
Now
it is obvious.
But you knew first and had to remind me.

The soul,
a brave little carnival right there on your arm.

NANCY SULLIVAN

SEA HORSES

The mottled swimming hordes,
Profiles and lidless eyes,
Circle aquarium walls,
As though mere fin and tail
Defined all motion.

Only the sea horse, perpendicular,
Erects his Gothic stance,
Turns in a slow periphery
His claim for starkness,
The acid edge of cliff and crag.

FLORA J. ARNSTEIN

TO RIPEN

(Translated from the French by Anthony Rudolf)

The sky pulls me too hard out of here

I wander through the street of the earth which sweats and shines its tyranny

fruit

the sparks from the cold and heavy page

the wind will not allow me to die

ANDRE DU BOUCHET

GOOSE ISLAND

A napkin tumbles through a bed of dried-up daisys like a yellow ghost or a summer poem, bouncing from briar to bittersweet to birch.
Given enough time, the wind takes everything, drives it into the marsh where papers hang like flags from grass and scrubby trees.
They'll be captured in the spring by park attendants, if their schedule and the truck allow them that mobility.
Hosed and on their backs, the picnic tables rest like cross-kneed, stiff green beasts, tickled to death or into hibernation by the leaves.

Here, we don't need an Ishmael to drive us waterward, we drift like a slow herd outflanked by wind, as if in search of what all these tossed containers once contained, until the whole family is stopped at the slough's edge, left with skim ice, the waterbirds, or what beavers salvage from the state to live within.

Like scouts grown keen-eyed in the autumn light,
we shout to flush our food from sanctuary,
and as three white forms thrash their wings to rise, feel our slow natures taken by their need.

JOHN JUDSON

Barragán, whom I have come to regard as Mexico's finest architect. For most of his long life he has been a cranky loner: a designer for a few of the rich or a consultant to other architects on gardens, walled courts or fountains—these being Barragán specialties (Louis Kahn got him to design the central terrace for Kahn's Salk Institute in La Jolla). The sparsity of Barragán's work is partly explained by his preference for connoisseur clients, which is a pardonable outcome of the social role of architects in Mexico. (They enjoy the high professional standing of MDs in the United States and lawyers in Spain. The University of Mexico architecture school is colossal, to train thousands, though only a small proportion ever practices. For most, architectural degrees are top credentials in society, politics, business or scholarship.)

Barragán was one of the architects who worked on the sprawling, usually overpraised university campus, but some of his most characteristic designs were for the French Riding School in the Las Arboledas suburb several years ago, and his recent project for the nearby stables and house of Mr. and Mrs. Folke Egerstrom. The Riding School is a big landscape with details—a series of walls, fenced enclosures, watering troughs, fountains and pools, all around and through an immense double avenue of eucalyptus trees. Something as simple as a mounting block becomes an elegant marker along the heroically scaled riding trail, though materials still remain simple.

Barragán's design kit is made up of log sections, stucco walls painted pink, vermilion and yellow, and concrete slabs poised over sheer wall planes. Water often bubbles or pours over the walls in sheets, or lies in vast dark rectangular pools. It's all on the scale of the horse, to be seen from 10 feet up and at a canter. The Egerstrom rancho began a few years ago with one of the neatest stables anywhere, beautifully detailed box stalls in a long building covered by a low sloping roof. The stable wing also makes a covered entrance to the compound where horses exercise within an enclosure surrounded by a looming pink wall, an orange one, and a great flat pool fed by water pumped through one of the walls. Dark thoroughbreds look even more marvelous as they are walked around the courtyard. The house with swimming pool continues beyond with the shameless haut bourgeois values that Barragán doesn't mind laying on as thick as he wants. But his design is a perfect response to the climate, the culture and the environment, as well as to the money.

Las Arboledas is near Pedregal Gardens. The whole suburban district bears Barragán's marks, because he once started to plan the subdivision of land in detail. As it is, the garden he built for himself remains (though he now lives elsewhere): great black lava boulders in concrete terraces with wild vegetation (magnificent lines of branches) growing out of them, all played against the delicacy of a white, thin-membered tall iron fence. The highway from the center of town branches off to Pedregal with an interchange the old man designed, and using the simplest means—boulders set in the concrete shoulders like nougat candy, crisp earth forms—it is breathtakingly better than the other highway exits.

Back closer to the city, Barragán, before the Olympics, was consultant for some monuments on traffic islands. The one on the Pedregal Gardens road is a set of towering concrete prisms of various heights, painted orange or yellow like a magic city along the nebulous highway. Small plots in Pedregal Gardens (no more than about a third of an acre each) were made by Barragán into great rectangular basins of water with sluices gushing down into them from brightly painted planar slabs of concrete above. For public works, each of these projects is really very modest in size and cost, yet they have in common a surprising visual importance that comes from using natural elements such as the native stone (pedregal means lava), and elementary geometrical forms in contrasting juxtaposition to one another. This suggests a scale larger than life size. Man-made surfaces are often simplified, denatured, with stucco or paint or both, and the colors—characteristically Mexican of course—make a finish which is effective and cheap (though the paint jobs to be seen now, mostly ten years after completion, need to be renewed). One simple wall in Las Arboledas at a street intersection, about 10 feet high and 100 yards long, breaks only once, vertically, as it drops out of sight over the hill. The uniformity of the stucco finish gives it an incredible kind of minimal art presence (but it's not a trendy conception, this was designed years ago).

In these days the personal style of Luis Barragán can be seen more easily than formerly because it is everywhere at the new Camino Real Hotel near the center of Mexico City, though how much of the Barragánesque was the result of a fee-paying consultation and how much was a faithful imitation by disciples is, as usual with him, unclear. The hotel's architect of record is Ricardo Legorreta, interiors were by Knoll International; Luis Barragán is listed as consultant for "landscaping and art." Still, considering Legorreta's other hotel work (the nearby Alameda) and what I know of Knoll's facile stylistic adaptability, I think Barragán deserves credit for the spirit of the place. Our stay at the Camino Real was fortuitous, since the room shortage meant we had to book at a place much more expensive than we had planned. Though the guest rooms had been rushed to completion for the Olympics, some of the ten different restaurants and night clubs were still being decorated. Completely finished or not, it was about the best commercial hotel we'd seen, though the old designation "commercial" may not mean much any more since many rooms run about $35 a day for a double, and a lot of recreation facilities in the open spaces of the courtyard plan make it more of a resort hotel. The furnishing and decoration of rooms and passageways is expensive and good but the public spaces—lobbies and courtyards—are what show the Barragán hand. The hotel main entrance is an opening in a perforated street wall. Inside, cars turn round a large pentagonal courtyard paved with white stone. A fountain in the middle sprays a column of mist by day; for contrast at night there isn't a pillar of fire but a watery difference: wave action like the ocean, surging noisily in the fountain's hemispherical marble bowl.

One side of this crisp space marked by white light and the sound of water is a glass wall, with the relatively dark lobby behind. The side you enter is not a side at all: it's an open slot, or rather an open room without a front wall. A bright green carpet that must be a quarter of an acre in area runs right down to the curb where the limousines stop. Above is a concrete slab roof the same size as the carpet, without a column or

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION

333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10011

a beam for support over the vast two-way span—just that flat plane of concrete. A line of square concrete stumps is the only "furniture," holding lights for the back wall; this enclosed croquet field of carpet is where bags get set down and guests gather to embark on tours. Beyond come the real doors to the real lobby, a two-story space with another vast ceiling unbroken by structure. Then the public spaces go on and on up giant staircases, around corners, through courtyards and past interior shops. This is the Camino Real's sprawling "royal road" and its terms of invention are those of the public areas in Pedregal Gardens: plaster finishes painted solid bright colors on top of homely building materials; impressive contrasts of space; ingenious expansions of apparent size. The courtyard gardens have groves of huge transplanted trees in them. When large trees are transplanted some branches must be cut to allow for the loss of roots that have to be left behind. Normally this is done by thinning, with careful tree surgery designed to make the trees look the same as in nature; but Barragán's gardens seem always to be explicit about nature in the service of man. His branches are lopped straight across, and the trees become personal sculptures.

Despite all his fancy clients and rich man's aesthetics, the influence of Barragán will probably become more and more valuable to Mexico as it somewhat accidentally bleeds into the culture at large. Of more direct sociological importance—or anyway, of more obvious and accessible public significance—is Mexico City's building of the National Museum of Anthropology, completed in 1964. I was keen to see the museum itself as well as the collections, because the architecture had been praised highly. However, the praise had largely come from laymen.

To start to understand the museum's unsubtle display of richness and opulence, let alone its scale (44,000 square meters indoors; 35,700 square meters outdoors—besides car parking and gardens), you must contemplate Mexico's "heritage," as guidebooks say. Archaeologists have unearthed native Mexico back to the earliest farming societies. There used to be scores of cultures, changing slowly and mostly independently of one another; there were dozens of languages. An incredible profusion of artifacts has been uncovered, mostly only since 1865, and despite gross looting and exporting, the archaeological riches have hardly been scratched. A systematic program of investigation since 1938 suggests that there are at least 13,000 mappable settlement sites perhaps worth a look, so the discoveries, vast as they are, will become vaster. Faced with all this, the government had didactic reasons for placing materials from early cultures on display, beyond the usual scholarly and artistic ones. It was a matter of public social education. Many Mexicans are still Indians literally—for example the Mayan language, incredibly, lives on in Merida, capital of Yucatan; there are also calendar seers who still interpret for interested parties the 260-day count of the ancient Calendar Round. So a big objective was, as the mangled English of the handout on the Anthropological Museum puts it, "to make studies and urgent acquisitions in virtue that the progress of the country, drives more and more the native groups to a fundamental change in his original characteristics of life."

If those words mean what I think, the extravagance—indeed, the vulgarity—of the museum may be justified at least according to the narrow requirements of public propaganda. The museum is undoubtedly intended to be a means of flattering provincials and making them proud to join up with the rest of the Mexican Great Society. Attendance records do suggest that this is happening, so, as with the thick surface of "culture" literally laid onto the exteriors of buildings at the University of Mexico, maybe the trustees know best. Certainly the basic decision at the National Museum of Anthropology, the one that kept it from being a mere art museum with a lot of dubious, patronizing and changing aesthetic distinctions to be drawn from the contents, was correct—the displays are anthropological, which is to say scientific, and things are classified rather than ranked or rated. I wish New York did the same with the collections there of "pre-Columbian art."

The trouble at the Mexico museum comes from the fact that it's always folly to play up some old culture with a supposedly sympathetic modern architectural counterpart. Here not only does this swamp the museum's priceless artifacts in a tacky environment whose intention is all too well-meaning and obvious; but the look-alike forms and materials even confuse objects with their backgrounds in display spaces that are necessarily crowded to begin with. The result is that the displays are very bad because the architecture tried to make objects more wonderful than they already are. The exhibits conflict, upstage one another, and are horribly lit. A big outdoor courtyard serves as a convenient area of circulation dispersal for the various sections of the museum, but even this unprepossessing idea is ruined with a mind-boggling piece of structural exhibitionism—a vast canopy supported by a single column, which spouts water and is covered with bronze reliefs.

The Mexican countryside, with its volcanoes, deserts, strange foothills and dense jungles, is all but unbelievable, and as we drove through it circumstances were always reminding us that we weren't to believe our eyes—kids holding up snared iguanas by their tails for sale along the roadside, small ruined chapels with tall fronts cut out as if by cannon balls for vanished bells, easily recognizable marijuana plants growing wild everywhere. It is clear from appearances that the 1910-36 revolution was fought between the forces of Coca-Cola and the armies of Pepsi-Cola. Whole villages and towns still declare allegiance to one or the other. Sometimes one leaves a Pepsi village to read "Coca-Cola" painted in large letters on the guerrilla-occupied hill just opposite. Presumably the war goes on, with 7-Up an anarchist faction having a toehold here and there.

We stayed mostly at cheap hotels, we mostly ate at wonderful ones like the Hacienda Vista Hermosa between Mexico City and Taxco, and resolved to return to stay. Then we attempted thorough coverage of southern Mexico in a limited number of days. As a result we discovered that we had elected to fly in planes of a sort that made even my disgust with BOAC and hatred of TWA take a back seat (as it were) to the by now almost recherché emotional perils of twin-engine flying on obscure internal carriers. One day some Ralph Nader of the airlines will expose the hazards of the equipment being used on Mexican hops, and when that happens tourists will be forced to return to the ground, to the savannas and the forests. We flew over them instead to get to Oaxaca and Merida, in order to see those cities, and also the ruins of Monte Albán, Mitla, Chichen Itzá and Uxmal. We had motored earlier to the pyramids of Teotihuacán from Mexico City, and we never visited Palenque at all, since it lies some distance from Merida and is most easily accessible only by short-runway plane.

One soon gets a feeling for archaeological sites. We regretted missing Palenque later when tourists with better tans than ours reported about it. As a Mayan settlement it isn't supposed to be as good as Chichen Itzá or Uxmal, but those two are in flat savanna country (Chichen Itzá in a well-manicured park), while Palenque emerges peeping from the thick undergrowth, allegedly a thrilling sight. This probably exposes the Grand Tour mentality we all shared on those juddering planes: not how excellent (beautiful, etc.) was this place, but how wildly ruined? How remote? It explains also, perhaps, the real nature of the popularity of Angkor Wat and the hot tourism to Machu Picchu, which is a third-rate Inca settlement but a marvel of the picturesque. To state my opinions in these superficial terms, I came to admire Uxmal and Teotihuacán for their architecture, and Chichen Itzá for its extent.

Besides their looks, two things impressed me about Mesoamerican settlements. One was that, unlike the Incas, the main Mexican cultures did develop written languages; this gives norteamericanos a leg up on the score for attributes of civilization. On the other hand the Maya, at least, never developed true cities; those so called are apparently loosely called—they were elite centers, rather, with their native populations scattered far into the hinterland. A leg down on the Maya civilization for not building cities, unless perhaps they should be credited instead with a very advanced Los Angeles-type urban structure. My main sources of information on the whole Mexican trip were a pair of the best general introductory books I have read, and the best guidebook I have used: Mexico and The Maya by Yale anthropologist Michael D. Coe (Praeger, $3.45 each) and Terry's Guide to Mexico by James Norman (Doubleday, $5.95). These proved to be thorough, scholarly and truly entertaining handbooks in their respective areas of competence. I only regret they didn't satisfy the dark suspicions we had that the extensive restorations the Mexican Government is now carrying out on the most popular archaeological sites are neither scientific reconstructions, nor show even sensitively intuitive guesswork about the original appearance of structures, the locations of steles, and so on. The archaeologists should have the support of people accustomed to using their eyes, and with a notion of how buildings are sited and made.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

Arnold Schoenberg's visionary opera, Moses und Aron, is at once a statement about religion, politics and art, with the incompatability between Moses, prophet of an inconceivable, indescribable idea of God, and Aron, who interprets—and thereby distorts—that idea for the people of Israel, symbolically operative on at least these three levels. The musical embodiment of the Moses-Aron dichotomy begins with a basic textural concept—Moses as a low speaking voice, Aron a high singing voice—and continues down into the work's deepest structural levels. Basically a Wagnerian dramatic conception (the similarities to Meistersinger, also an opera about artistic communication, include a degree of parallelism between the first two acts that emphasizes the Hegelian thesis-anti-thesis structure), it is nevertheless set forth in some of the most original, imaginative and forceful music that Schoenberg ever composed. The writing for multiple choruses, both speaking and singing, still sounds original today; that it was composed in 1932 is remarkable.

In the nearly two decades that remained of his life, Schoenberg never succeeded in composing the music for his third-act libretto. In 1950, apropos a projected performance in Florence, he suggested that the third act (presenting the synthesis of the conflict) might be performed as spoken dialogue, or it might be omitted entirely. Since the 1954 concert performance in Hamburg (recorded on Columbia K4L-241), the opera has received five stage productions, of which those in Zurich, London and Boston chose for the two-act form. Scherchen's Berlin version and the 1968 Düsseldorf staging (which I heard in June at the Maggio Musicale Fiorentino) used the spoken version—but with musical accompaniment: in Berlin, a reprise of the opera's opening scene minus the solo parts; in Düsseldorf, Schoenberg's 1945 Genesis Prelude for orchestra and wordless chorus (I understand that the third act has been dropped from recent Berlin performances).

Obviously, there is reluctance to present the scene without any music at all; after what has preceded, the results would almost certainly be anticlimactic. However, the Berlin and Düsseldorf "completions" introduce serious musical problems, for what one hears from the orchestra pit is far from the synthesis implied by the words spoken on stage. The Genesis Prelude, in particular, is a complete irrelevancy; however superficially similar the musical idiom, a five-minute piece will not function effectively, in terms of musical time scale, as the conclusion to a two-hour opera. In practice, the second act finale has been generally accepted as presenting a satisfying and moving conclusion, rounding off the first two phases of the opera's dialectic and representing the conflict's fundamental insolubility. Unlike Berg's Lulu, there is not enough material extant on which to base any legitimate musical "completion" of the opera, and there is reason to believe that Schoenberg would have regarded his failure to complete the work as fated (he was a superstitious man) and would have preferred to be judged by the work as it stood.

With this said, there can be little but praise for the musical accomplishments of Günther Wich's Düsseldorf ensemble, which performed the work with the sort of security and familiarity that one expects to encounter in a standard repertory opera. It was as good a performance of the opera as any I have heard, as remarkable an achievement in its musical way as Sarah Caldwell's Boston production was on the visual side, demonstrating once and for all that the opera is effectively performable by a competent opera company. (The Deutsche Opera am Rhein serves both Düsseldorf and Duisburg, cities with a combined population less than that of Cleveland; there is a moral here, which I will leave for our cultural managers to deduce.)

Unfortunately, not as much can be said for the visual production, which returned to the kind of abstraction characteristic of the Zurich performances, eschewing the trend toward literal interpretation of Schoenberg's explicit (and explicitly composed out) stage directions for the Dance Around the Golden Calf evident in the London and Boston stagings. That the opera can make such an impression even when so statically presented—for the repetitive group gymnastics of the Düsseldorf ballet were nothing if not static in effect—speaks well for its dramatic power.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Since Easy Rider is the film that is said finally to separate the men from the boys—at a time when the generation gap has placed a stigma on being a man—I want to point out that those who make heroes of Wyatt and Billy (played by Peter Fonda and Dennis Hopper) have a reasonably acrid dose to swallow at the start of the picture. Wyatt and Billy (names borrowed from the fumigated memory of the two outlaws of the Old West) make the bankroll on which they hope to

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 8-11-69
[illegible] Sixth Ave., New York [illegible]
☐ One Year, $[illegible]
☐ Two Years, $[illegible]
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

live a life of easy-riding freedom by smuggling a considerable quantity of heroin across from Mexico and selling it to a nutty looking addict in a goon-chauffered Rolls Royce. Pulling off one big job and thereafter living in virtuous indolence is a fairly common dream of criminals, and dope peddling is a particularly unappetizing way of doing it. Is it thought O.K. on the other side of the gap, to buy freedom at that price? If so, grooving youth has a wealth of conscience to spend.

Clearly the makers of the film think it O.K., and they are Fonda, Hopper and Terry Southern, the very knowing, if no longer very young, trio who in various combinations wrote, directed and produced. Wyatt and Billy are presented as attractive and enviable; gentle, courteous, peaceable, sliding through the heroic Western landscape on their luxurious touring motorcycles (with the swag hidden in one of the gas tanks). It is true that they come to a bloody end, gunned down by a couple of Southern rednecks for their long hair. But it is not retribution; indeed, they might have passed safely if the cretins in the pickup truck had realized that they were big traders on holiday.

And another question I would like to shout across the gap is why, if these two are so freely doing their thing, they are so morose about it. They seem crushed speechless by melancholy, and though I understand that taciturnity is the preferred style—each initiate being absorbed in his private secretions—I noticed that Wyatt and Billy came at least wanly to life when they picked up a rebellious and alcoholic young lawyer in a crossroads town (Jack Nicholson). His imagination, wit, curiosity and love of life seem effervescent (and he is only the rich-boy drunk of a very small town) by contrast with the flat impassivity of the others.

It is true that every night over their campfire Wyatt and Billy smoke pot, achieving thus a sudden irrational loquacity, accompanied by inane giggles. They pity friend George for his addiction to booze. But, so the script goes by these knowing men, when George is sober he is wide awake; when the other two are not high they are merely low, if indeed not half asleep. It may only be coincidence, and marijuana may yet be recognized as the cure for what ails us all, but the demeanor of Wyatt and Billy does not seem to prove the point.

I should say something of the picture. It is a beautiful evocation of America as a ribbon of road through magic lands. The scene unreels like a silky, hypnotic dream, because the odd effect of the strident rock and roll that blares from the sound track is to make the action seem wrapped in eerie silence. And the two men look like fair warning, outriders of apocalypse, as they glide past in their schizoid costumes (one dresses to hide oneself in fantasy) on their indolently powerful mantis-like bikes.

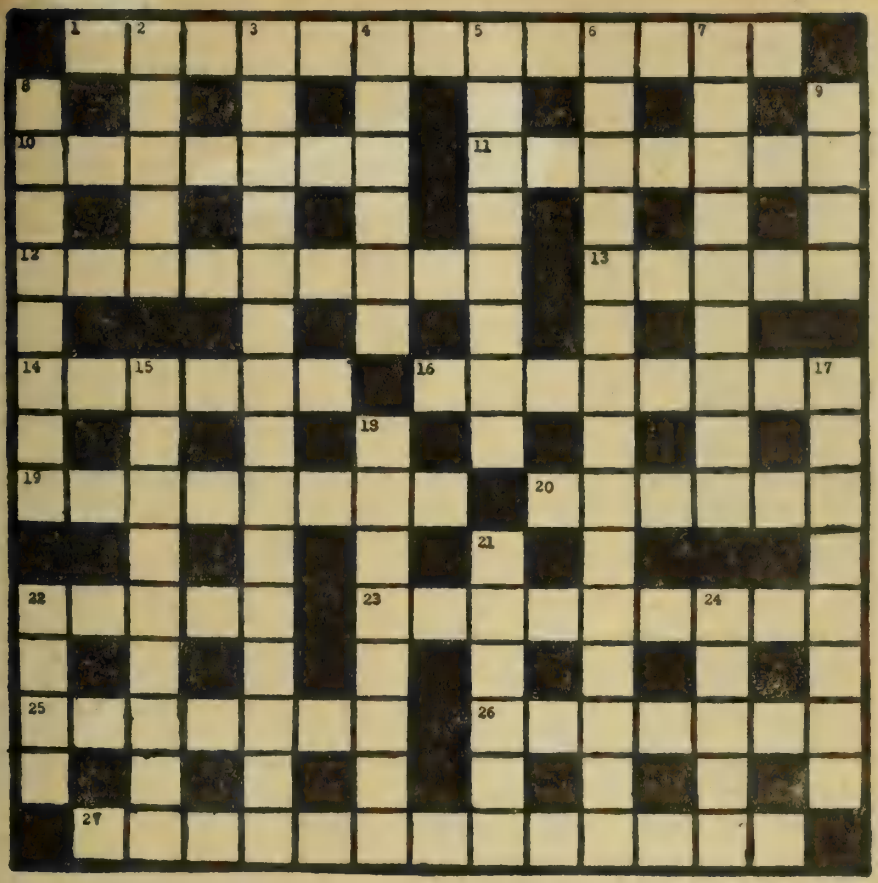
There is a beautifully sustained episode of suspended animation at a hippie commune, where again the air is gentled by pot, all human relationships seem easy and entertainers of abysmal incompetence absorb the benevolence of the chemically pleased. The tragedy is that these young have escaped from something genuinely destructive into something that is only an illusion of new birth. Americans are forever bruising themselves on utopia; now it is the turn of the flower children.

Once it reaches its destination, New Orleans, the picture falters, losing its momentum in a sequence of innocent larking with a pair of girls from the town's finest bordello that suggests the film makers know more about motorcycle vagrancy than they do about the customs and manners of prostitution. There is also another of those strobe-and-free-association passages that attempt to approximate the subjective effects of LSD and succeed only in producing headaches.

And then follows quickly the concluding outburst of hate, really a repetition, since drunken George had died earlier in an encounter with the locals. The hate is that of Fonda, Hopper and Southern: they hate the element in American life that tries to destroy anyone who fails to conform, who demands to ride free. And it is quite right that they should. But Wyatt and Billy are more rigidly conformist, their life more narrowly obsessive than that of any broker's clerk on the nine to five. The ads say they went looking for America and never found it, but what they really went looking for was freedom, and of course they never found it. Which is what Easy Rider seems to mean on my side of the generation gap. But I would rather know what it means to those on the other side, who stand in block-long lines all day and all night to see Wyatt and Billy, those cosmetic derivations from American myth.

It was hard to get a grip on Putney Swope until it occurred to me that Robert Downey, its author and director, is an admiring student of the Marx Brothers. The film is a compilation of visual and verbal gags, strung together for the purposes of lampooning entrenched respectability, flouting convention, upending pomposity and thus providing merriment. Situations and characters are introduced, less because they augment the story than because they are thought to be intrinsically funny (which they may or may not be, as the humor strikes you). There is no reason why a minor character should contribute a jabberwocky monologue while seated on the toilet, and there is no reason why the President of the United States should be presented as a midget (on second thought, though the President is scarcely necessary to the film, his stature may be relevant). This willingness to interrupt the show for what look like ad lib inventions—and the tendency to repeat a device that seems to work—produces some bumps in the general bounciness, but the pace is so fast that one rarely suffers much from loss of momentum.

All that is standard comment for the Marx Brothers, and beyond it Arnold Johnson, who plays the title role, has the voice, an approximation of the lope and very much the lethal dead pan of Groucho. Johnson is black, whereas the Marxes were Jewish, but even so the parallel holds—the outsider gets his kicks by preying on the relatively slow metabolism of the ruling squares.



What is not at all the same, of course, is the times, which is why it took me a while to realize that I was watching a legitimate descendent of The Coconuts and Horsefeathers. The Marx Brothers flourished when the bases of American society were assumed to be so sound that its chicaneries and foibles were fair game for burlesque. Their stock in trade was peccadilloes. Johnson's Swope is dealing with the degeneration of affluence into commercial whoring and with the militant racial confrontation. You expect a movie on such themes to proclaim the word—and the basic joke of Putney Swope, perhaps, is that it does not.

What it does instead is brandish the slapstick with an evenhanded disregard for color. Swope is pretty well free of pigmented bias because he has pretty well given up on the whole human race. He takes over a moribund advertising agency, rededicates it to truth and soul, hires brothers in eccentric garb to work for him (his own garb fits his moods, which are always violent) and turns out TV commercials (these in color) that mock the sanctity of maidenhood and the verities of the market. He is deftly lecherous (his followers are lecherous, but hardly deft), and unimpeded by scruples. He does suffer the illusion that his staff would rebel if he took on advertising for cigarettes, booze or war. When that proves not so, he scrams—taking a pot of money with him and leaving the agency in disarray and the audience exhausted.

This just might be therapy disguised in motley. The derisive disgust of Putney Swope, expressed in monosyllabic obscenity on occasions when custom demands emollient cant, is broad-based enough to imply that racial hangups are a wasteful diversion at a time when all the boys and girls are up to their knees in the garbage of a stalled domocracy. No doubt, Swope would have a crisp word for that moral, but then he's much tougher than I am.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1308

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 A little horse trading on Wall Street? (5,8)
10 I have to state shortly how to operate in secret. (7)
11 He'd sell mixed nuts may be! (7)
12 Marked adherence to the unusual. (9)
13 Not much capacity in small quarters! (5)
14 By the sound of it compare one of the compound plants. (6)
16 One might find this appealing. (8)
19 Dis-hinge those of which one might be tender? (8)
20 Returns to pry around a show. (6)
22 They used to cry so before pillaging! (5)
23 One might with one, if properly suited. (5,4)
25 Keep back! The aggressive type are commonly so loaded! (7)
26 Conducts the wrong score a little way back. (7)
27 Such get-togethers as Uncle Ari's sons might organize! (5,8)

DOWN

2 Part of the joint comes up with what some acrobats use. (5)
3 Fair game for Mao's watchmen, perhaps. (7,8)
4 Watch the cover! For good sleeping, one would expect it to be down. (6)
5 One would have expected the British to properly hang such a window! (8)
6 Americans wouldn't be without him! (7,8)
7 Startle by possibly putting on a special coat? (9)
8 Modified the effect of a painting so that even the lowest types appeared wounded? (8)
9 Sounds like what the summer might do to a number in the entrance. (4)
15 Now Kennedy should get to make a statement in one type of zone! (9)
17 One of the most valuable grains? (4,4)
18 One who makes capital, perhaps. (8)
21 Office furniture? (6)
22 A fit of resentment offered by a wolfish threat? (4)
24 Pinafore, perhaps, as part of the stage.

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1307

ACROSS: 1 Skyscraper; 6 and 1 down Windsock; 10 Courage; 11 Whatnot; 12 Egyptian; 13 Cabin; 15 Orris; 17 Absorbent; 19 Appraised; 21 Tuber; 24 Watchman; 27 Humerus; 28 Verbena; 29 None; 30 Pessimists. DOWN: 2 Younger; 3 Champ; 4 Americans; 5 and 25 Edwin Drood; 7 Ignoble; 8 Detonators; 9 Baccarat; 14 Now and then; 16 and 22 Standard bearer; 18 Sedatives; 20 Prop man; 24 Waste; 25 Harem; 26 Lass.

Readers are invited to send for a free copy of Mr. Lewis' "ground rules." Address Puzzle Department, The Nation, 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Opening this fall. Grades 10-11, boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational but seriously Christian related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

SUMMERHILL CAMP AND SCHOOL. Freedom with responsibility learning because it's exciting, not compulsory. Summer program: reading, math, nature, swimming, riding, camping, art, music, drama, group discussions. OPEN COMMUNITY SCHOOL, Box 5N, Claverack, N.Y. 12513.

PERSONALS

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

AMERICA—Change It or Lose It. This bumper-sticker, 35c each or 3/$1.00. Send to: Revolutionary Playthings, P.O. Box 25335, West Los Angeles, Calif. 90025.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

PUBLICATIONS

WITCHCRAFT TODAY, $5.00 postpaid Century Book Shop, 434 East High, Lexington, Kentucky 40508

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor, Self Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 282 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor calls on President Nixon to call for a permanent World Congress of the heads of every nation to seek to prevent or arbitrate all wars. Readers, contact President Nixon.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Printed by Millard Publishing Inc., Millard, Conn.

What do they think of the moon landing?

The NATION has some ideas on what's wrong with America—and what can be done about it. We'd like to share these ideas with the people who count: you and people like you who are dismayed by the seemingly endless blunders made by our government.

For this we need your help. Start with a one-year subscription to The NATION and we'll send you four bonus issues free. Then, why not send a gift subscription to a friend? Each additional subscription will cost you $2 less than the regular price.

A subscription to The NATION won't make any miracles — but it will bring you and your friends twelve months of honest reporting and critical analysis of world events. Join us now.

THE NATION, 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

BONUS OFFER: If you are ordering one subscription, either for yourself or for a friend, enclose $10 and four bonus issues will be added to the year's subscription. If you are ordering more than one subscription, enclose $8 for each additional one.

☐ I am enclosing $10 for one subscription for myself.

☐ I am enclosing $10 for one subscription for a friend.

☐ I am enclosing $8 for each additional gift subscription.

☐ Enclose gift cards.

My Name .....
Street .....
City ..... State ..... Zip.....

Please send gift subscriptions to:

Name .....
Street .....
City ..... State ..... Zip.....

Name .....
Street .....
City ..... State ..... Zip.....

N 8-11

THE NATION

AUGUST 25, 1969 - 35 cents

BURLINGAME
AUG 25 1969
LIBRARY

Pop Sex Among the Squares

DESMOND SMITH

Belfast: 'In Glorious Remembrance'

CAREY McWILLIAMS

DRAMA: INTENT & CONTENT

Eric Bentley
Isaiah Sheffer
Julius Novick
Albert Bermel

LETTERS

moonshine

Peekskill, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: It is an ominous sign that a number of Senators who have been critical of our government's war policy in Vietnam made speeches as the astronauts were returning, urging national unity behind the President's "peace" proposals. According to The New York Times:

> Seven Republicans and one Democrat took the floor for a half hour to pledge their support of the Paris peace negotiations and urge North Vietnam to make some response to the announced American troop withdrawals.
>
> The demonstrations were organized . . . after conversations with Henry A. Kissinger, President Nixon's chief foreign policy adviser in the White House. Mr. Kissinger was reported to have encouraged the project.

Isn't it obvious that the great achievement of our scientists and the heroism of our astronauts are being used to strengthen the policy that has already cost 40,000 American lives and millions of Vietnamese casualties?

Those who understand the terrible danger of a nuclear and chemical-biological holocaust have the responsibility to speak out now and not let our people or Congress get moonstruck. . . .

Walter Lowenfels

R.I.P. for Ripon

Rockville Centre, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: Jack Newfield's mention of the Ripon Society in "New Politics: More Mood Than Movement" [The Nation, July 28] is a little out of date. I am a member of Ripon, and have come to sense a smell of successful cooptation, a neutralization achieved by bringing a couple of Riponeers near the seat of power, while the power continues to be wielded by Laird-Thurmond ideas.

Newfield's ignorance of this fact (if it is a fact, as I suspect) prompts me to suggest that you assign a piece on "What Did Happen to the Idea of Liberal Republicanism and the Ripon Society?"

Howard N. Meyer

off again

Hollywood, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: From time immemorial our philosophers have wrestled with the question of why man was put on earth. Now Richard Nixon has come up with an answer. Commenting on the moon landing, he said that it was "the greatest week in the history of the world since the creation. . . ."

If that is true, then man was put on earth so that he could ultimately escape from it.

Harry Cimring

wrong twist

Edmonton, Alberta

DEAR SIRS: For shame, Nation! The drawings in your article ["Drew Pearson: An Interview" by Robert G. Sherrill, July 7] show a Washington Ferris wheel, not a merry-go-round. You would not have made such an un-American error if you had remembered that the Pentagon spins like a roulette wheel.

Robert F. Fischer

Yes, we knew. But a Ferris wheel was what the artist drew, time was short, and we thought the spin was the main idea.

The Editors

EDITORIALS

The Illusion of Good News

Paul Bern, a movie producer of the thirties, used to say that when you set out to make a picture, you must ask yourself what the masses lack in their everyday lives, and give it to them in fantasy.

A similar principle seems to be the key to success in current politics. About the only cheerful piece of news in recent years is the flight to the moon and the safe return of the astronauts to earth, precisely as decreed by President Kennedy. Otherwise, in foreign and domestic affairs alike, the public sees nothing but problems for which there is seemingly no solution, and wars to which there is seemingly no end. As a result, a tremendous appetite for good news has built up, and this gives President Nixon, himself a showman of no mean ability, a chance to substitute the illusion for the reality. Most notably in Vietnam, he has not overlooked the opportunity and, with few exceptions, the publicity media have given him unstinting support.

Thus the Presidential announcement of a 25,000-man troop withdrawal was heralded as the beginning of American extrication from the baffling situation in Vietnam. True, 25,000 out of at least 540,000 (not counting Naval forces, CIA operatives, et al.) was really no more than a token reduction; moreover, the Americans were to be replaced by Vietnamese units of equivalent capability. Still, it was enough to make headlines. But even the meager promise of peace that the troop withdrawal held out has no basis in fact. By the end of August U.S. strength in Vietnam was to be down to 515,000 men. Now it is said that this level may be reached by the end of September, but for the present the manpower level is rising, not falling. The men who are being transferred had completed their tour of duty in Vietnam and were due to be sent home, or to other stations, in any case. "There was a little overrun into September," Sen. John Stennis, the chief explainer for the Pentagon, says soothingly. Senate Majority Leader Mike Mansfield joins in bipartisan apologetics. The President is placed in an embarrassing position, he tells newsmen, but it's not his fault. "It may be his subordinates in the Department of Defense didn't carry out his orders." Apparently they are not aware that they are subordinates, or they realize that it is all fantasy anyway and the important thing is to keep the public happy, or at least less miserable.

Viewing the scene from Saigon, Arthur J. Dommen of the Los Angeles Times—no dove he—reports that the war looks as if it is quite "out of control. . . . It could become another Thirty Years' War, sweeping millions into the armies, regular and irregular, as the only steady source of livelihood, depopulating the countryside, overcrowding the rural slums, destroying the cultural heritage of those fortunate enough to survive the killing." Mr. Nixon would like to see the war end, of course, yet if Dommen's prognosis is correct, the President may find himself occupying the doghouse Mr. Johnson vacated.

Laos, ostensibly neutral by the terms of the 1962 agreement, is also in the grip of civil war, and just what the U.S. commitment in Thailand may be only the Pentagon knows. Besides the treaty obligations the United States has assumed in Thailand, the Pentagon has a "contingency plan" which, Sens. Frank Church and J. W. Fulbright suspect, may call for intervention by the United States with ground troops if Thailand is threatened with internal subversion.

Probing a little way beneath the surface, the public will only find more disquieting information of this type. But Mr. Nixon, capturing the headlines with his round-the-world trip and vague promises of a circumspect U.S. policy in Asia, keeps the public hopeful. The comfort the public gets from the newspaper astrology columns is scarcely more illusory.

One Cheer

A striking example of the ebullient market for "good news" is the manner in which press, public and a sizable section of the political leadership of both parties hailed President Nixon's welfare message as though it were a Magna Charta for the poor and oppressed. Actually the message is designed to relieve not the poor but political pressures which expanding welfare costs have generated. Politically it is exceedingly clever: one must favor the proposals as against the existing state of affairs if only because, by providing long-needed federal standards for assistance, a great many poor, primarily in the South, would benefit by them. In brief the message—at the bleakest reading—merits one cheer. But the program it outlines is not nearly so progressive as it has been made out to be; the press should give it a second, third and fourth reading by way of correcting first impressions of its real thrust and meaning.

In general—one must wait for specific details—the President's proposals would help welfare recipients in the South and in other areas which have low welfare standards. The "working poor," of whom there are sizable numbers in the South, in the agricultural areas of the Midwest and in the far West, would also benefit. These are, of course, areas in which the President has a particular political interest. If his proposals are adopted, he will have added a new dimension to the political base he is building in the South.

At the same time, what he proposes will please another political constituency: lower-middle-class and middle-class home owners concerned with rising real property tax rates, which many attribute to soaring welfare costs. In the North, many of these elements will feel a sense of relief on three counts: the flow of Negroes to Northern industrial areas will now—they think—abate (as a matter of fact it has been tapering off for quite some time); "the welfare system," so they imagine, is about to be abolished (it isn't); and, finally, the President's resounding reaffirmation of the Protestant ethic offers reassurance that "all those loafers on welfare" will now have to go out and get a job. Who knows? It may

OCT 20
NOV 18
NOV 24
MAR 16

IN THIS ISSUE

August 25, 1969

EDITORIALS

130

ARTICLES

134 Poisons, Profits and Politics — Ruth Harmer

137 Belfast: "In Glorious Remembrance" — Carey McWilliams

142 Pop Sex Among the Squares — Desmond Smith

145 The Fallacy of Decentralization — Amitai Etzioni

BOOKS & THE ARTS

148 The Theatre of Interpretations — Eric Bentley

150 Poetry:
The Release — Arthur Gregor
Worlds of Different Sizes — Sandra McPherson
Music in Michigan — William Hunt
Moths at the Window — William Hunt
Mount Kearsarge — Donald Hall

151 Black Theatre in America — Isaiah Sheffer

152 Order & Freedom — Julius Novick

156 Closet Openings — Albert Bermel

157 Music — David Hamilton

158 Art — Lawrence Alloway

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 209
No. 5

even be possible again to get domestics at "fair" wages.

The President's proposals will not help the poor in the Northern industrial states, where most of the ghetto Negroes reside. Nor will they provide much financial relief to the big cities. On this score, it would be interesting to know the private views of the President's proposals held by the Republican governors of such states as California, Michigan, Illinois, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Massachusetts and New York. To what extent Mr. Nixon's proposals would strengthen family structures is not clear. A Negro mother with, say, six or seven children—all minors but all over 6 years of age—might well feel that her primary duty was to care for her children rather than "go out and get a job" in order to provide for them.

And what jobs? At what rates of pay? The President says nothing about making the government the employer of last resort or of providing new jobs. To the extent that he "cools" the economy, there may be less, not more, jobs, particularly decent, well-paying jobs. An unemployment rate of 4.5 per cent is already being forecast for next year. But his proposals may well have the effect of indirectly compelling more people to take low-paying or substandard jobs.

As to manpower training, the federal employment service is precisely not the agency, on the basis of past experience, to which this responsibility should be delegated. One suspects, in fact, that manpower training may turn out to be a camouflaged form of relief. And it is by no means sure that the President's friends in the Senate from the South will want to see their constituents "spoiled" by the welfare standards which he proposes; the effect might be, for example, to raise the rates for plantation labor. The one sound proposal—the imposition of federal standards—was probably dictated by recent court decisions as much as by any desire to correct an obvious injustice of long standing.

But the President's proposals may open the door for other plans which have more merit. Following his message, Reps. John Conyers (D., Mich.), Charles W. Whalen, Jr. (R., Ohio) and Jonathan Bingham (D., N.Y.) introduced a comprehensive public income assistance plan which would provide a family allowance of $3,200 for a family of four, as well as coverage for single individuals, childless couples, and couples with grown children. So in the end it may be that the President has opened more doors than he has closed. But for his message, one cheer is really all it deserves.

The Pastore Bill

Initially FCC licenses were granted for six-month periods; gradually the licensee's tenure was extended to three years. For thirty-five years the quality of programming was never an issue. Actually the Federal Communications Commission, with only four employees assigned to investigate program deficiencies, could not possibly cope with 7,200 broadcasting stations (AM, FM and TV). Consequently licenses were renewed automatically—a situation which was naturally much to the liking of those who held the licenses. Until recently, the FCC would not permit ordinary members of the public to file petitions to deny license renewals. It took a mandate by Chief Justice Burger (then on a lower appellate court) to force the FCC to entertain such petitions.

However, opposition petitions are not an adequate remedy. It takes large amounts of money to fight such cases—up to $250,000 in some instances. Few groups and even fewer individuals can spend such sums to defend the public interest, but a considerable number of people would like to acquire a license worth millions by taking it away from an existing licensee who can be proved to be using it with little or no regard for the public interest.

Faced by this threat, the long-established licensees have turned to their good friend in the Senate, John O. Pastore (D., R.I.). Mr. Pastore has introduced a bill (S.2004) which would, in effect, bar competitive license applications. Such applications could be filed only in those cases in which the FCC had first revoked an existing license for disregard of the public interest. Since the FCC has never taken such punitive action, the broadcasters would feel safe if S.2004 were enacted into law. At most a few licenses, in cases where disregard of the public interest had been particularly flagrant, might not be renewed.

Senator Pastore's rationale is that no one does his best when "scared to death." But no one was scared, even slightly, during those decades when the FCC ignored its responsibilities, yet programming got worse year by year. The opposition to the Pastore philosophy is led by Sen. Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.). He tells the broadcasters: "You don't own the broadcasting channels and we don't own our Senate seats. You knew when you went into the business that your term was only three years."

The real fear in the industry is that if challenges are permitted, they could become the means of breaking up the concentration of ownership and control that currently exists. This fear is not confined to the owners of broadcasting studios and transmitters. The press does not seem overly eager to take Pastore's proposal apart, for the simple reason that many newspapers are tied in with radio-TV ownership and self-interest blunts their sense of public responsibility.

The public interest in this area is being defended by the National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting, 609 Fifth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10017, of which Thomas P. F. Hoving is chairman. A particularly brilliant statement of the case against the Pastore bill was presented by Earle K. Moore, general counsel for the Citizens Committee, before the Senate Communications Subcommittee on August 7. "If S.2004 is adopted," Mr. Moore concludes, "there will be virtually no effective way in which the public interest in broadcast channels can be protected by the Commission, and the small group of monopolists who now hold licenses for the most valuable channels will be free to exploit public resources as they please." This is the usual outcome of such controversies, and the best hope of averting it in this instance is for broadcast listeners and viewers to support the efforts of the Citizens Committee.

Varieties of Patriotism

From Warner Robins, Ga., UPI brings the news that Mrs. Miles Stewart, whose 22-year-old son was killed in combat in Vietnam last April, has sent the American flag from his coffin to President Nixon. Mrs. Stewart, described as a prominent businesswoman of her town, took this step after writing letters to Congressmen and military authorities asking what the war was about. Frustrated by the "cold" responses of these functionaries, she addressed the same question to the President, who failed to reply. If the letter had reached him, he might have found it an awkward one to answer, since he decided subsequently that this war represents one of America's "finest hours."

Mrs. Stewart sees it differently. She told the President, "I do not want a flag which represents a country which is sacrificing her young men as this country is doing." She said she hates the flag for what it stands for in Vietnam, but loves it for what it is supposed to stand for. Thus Mrs. Stewart joins those Americans—a minority but one numbered in millions—whose pride in their country has been turned into aversion by an involvement from which Mr. Nixon is supposedly trying to extricate us, but at a leisurely pace comporting with his own political prospects and his usual balancing act between contending factions.

A few months ago another lady, who had likewise lost a son in Vietnam, told newsmen that she did not see how the war had been worth a single life. This mother did not limit her concern to American lives, but appeared to recognize that Vietnamese mothers have feelings too. After more than two decades of cold war, and mass indoctrination of far greater antiquity, it is not to be expected that many American women will openly defy the convention holding that the most sacred of woman's duties is to sacrifice her son at the behest of the military. Yet the mood of the country in this war differs sharply from that in World War II, where the atrocities of the Nazis and the attack on Pearl Harbor made synthetic justifications of the necessity for America to fight unnecessary. The Gold Star mothers of that earlier war have no counterpart in the current squalid embroilment, and few intelligent Americans, even among those who support the war, have been able to swallow the current rationalizations without gagging.

Capt. Levy and the Green Berets

Washington

On August 4, Dr. Howard Levy was released on bail from the federal penitentiary in Lewisburg, Pa. He had gone to jail for refusing to train medical aides destined for service with the Special Fores—better known as the Green Berets—in Vietnam.

On August 6, the Army admitted—after two weeks of secrecy—that it had arrested eight men of the Green Berets, including Col. Robert B. Rheault, their commander, in connection with the murder of a Vietnamese official. The concurrence was ironic.

At his court-martial in 1967, the most dramatic defense offered by Levy was his belief that the men he was asked to teach a kind of "first aid dermatology" would in fact pervert their training once they went into action. Regular Army medical servicemen seldom carry rifles; Green Beret medics are trained to kill as well as to cure, Levy argued. The Green Beret medics are first of all killers because they are first of all Green Berets, and Green Berets are notorious for shutting their eyes to political assassination, torture, forced labor, and the unnecessary destruction of villages—all in violation of the Nuremberg code.

Thus went his argument; it was impressive, and included testimony from Green Berets themselves. Capt. Peter Bourne, an Army doctor who spent four months in the jungles with the Green Berets, told of protesting the killing of prisoners by the native forces under the supervision of the Green Berets, and being told: "Don't rock the boat."

Robin Moore, author of the book Green Berets, told the court-martial that he knew of at least one instance in which the tough American advisers were training native troops as "assassination teams" to take care of Vietnamese politicians who are on the enemy's side.

The Levy defense also listed the methods of torture practiced by the Green Berets' native helpers, like tearing out fingernails by the roots, cutting off fingers, attaching electric wires to a man's (or woman's) breast, squeezing testicles in a vise, and wiring a man's hands to his face by running the wire through his hands and cheeks. It was never proved that the Green Berets themselves did these things, but one former sergeant testified that "the normal practice was that when it [torture] started you turned around and lit a cigarette."

Looking back on that trial, one of Levy's attorneys spelled out the inevitable conclusion: "The chilling fact is that the Army . . . continues to protest that American soldiers do not themselves practice torture or commit murder, as if that fact alone released them from all charges of complicity. Adolf Eichmann lodged a similar protest at his trial in Jerusalem when he said, 'With the killing of Jews I had nothing to do. I never killed a Jew, or a non-Jew for that matter—I never killed any human being. I never gave an order to kill either a Jew or a non-Jew. I just did not do it.' And so the Special Forces do not practice torture in Vietnam. Torture just happens, murder just happens, war crimes just happen. No one does it. No one is responsible. It's called complicity."

But the judge ruled finally that Levy could not use the specter of war crimes as a defense. "While there have been perhaps instances of needless brutality in this struggle in Vietnam," he said, there was no pattern of war crimes.

So Levy went to prison. For the next two years one heard little more about the brutalities of the Green Berets. And then, two days after he left prison, the truth of his defense came to the surface again.

The Army will doubtless continue to claim that these are only isolated instances, but the savageness of the latest crime, and the fact that seven officers and a sergeant in the elite corps are under suspicion, make one wonder if there is not a pattern. Newsmen investigating the murder case report that the victim was possibly tortured first. And at least one responsible reporter, Richard Homan of The Washington Post, states flatly what Levy's attorneys were forced two years ago to handle as theory: "While no one talks about it in public, torture and murder are part of the clandestine activities of the Special Forces established as an elite group by the United States Government." ROBERT G. SHERRILL

POISONS, PROFITS AND POLITICS

RUTH HARMER
Mrs. Harmer teaches at California State Polytechnic College and is the author of The High Cost of Dying (Macmillan) and the forthcoming Unfit for Human Consumption.

California regulates more closely than any other state the use of pesticides—the vast arsenal of "economic poisons" employed since World War II in an all-out attack on the biosphere. For that reason it is instructive to consider the following account by a state public health official of the recent death of a 16-year-old farm laborer assigned to spray a field of strawberries:

> The permit to purchase and apply the pesticide had expired, so that it was purchased and applied illegally. The highly toxic phosphate ester was applied by hand duster, a primitive and entirely unsafe method of application. The container label was not read by anyone until after the illness was discovered. No advance arrangements were made with a physician for prompt, adequate care for an emergency. The worker was not instructed about hazards and precautions for using the pesticide. He was not provided with protective clothing. When the boy was taken to a physician, no one could provide any information about the pesticide the worker had applied. The supplier of the pesticide did not check the number of the permit given by the purchaser to assure that the permit was valid. The product was also misbranded; it contained two-to-four times the phosphate ester pesticide specified on the label.

In addition, noted Dr. Irma West, coordinator of the Injury Control Project with the California Department of Public Health, the medical instructions on the label could be confusing and needed re-evaluation. "I know of three deaths in which these instructions have proved detrimental," she added, "and I know of no benefit from them in an emergency."

Who was held responsible for the boy's death? No one —yet every one of the series of grave errors was also a violation of laws and regulations, and the avoidance of any one of them might "easily" have saved his life.

Dr. West's carefully documented report of that and hundreds of other cases of injuries and deaths occurring each year to workers exposed to toxic chemicals was part of the testimony presented earlier this year by attorneys for the AFL-CIO United Farm Workers Organizing Committee at a court hearing in Bakersfield. The union was seeking dissolution of a temporary restraining order—a temporary order that has been in effect since last August —instructing the Kern County agricultural commissioner to keep secret the records of pesticide applications by crop dusters there. The records are public records.

"We will not tolerate the systematic poisoning of our people," Cesar Chavez, UFWOC leader, has warned growers. "We will be damned—and we should be—if we will permit human beings to sustain permanent damage to their health from economic poisons."

Without information about what is being sprayed, by whom, where and when, the union says it cannot provide workers with adequate safeguards—medically and contractually—against the "ever-increasing danger." Growers have been incredibly lax, it argues, in exposing workers to the battery of economic poisons, some of which are so toxic that a single drop on the skin can kill an adult. State agencies charged with administering and enforcing the regulations have been equally lax, it adds; and offers as evidence sworn statements from field workers describing injuries received after having been sprayed while working in the fields and after having been sent into sprayed fields too soon after spraying.

Jerome Cohen, the union's chief counsel, initiated action last summer after appeals by a group of workers who had been forced to seek medical attention for relatively severe cases of conjunctivitis, nausea, dermatitis and other gross symptoms of pesticide poisoning. The place to begin, he decided, was at the office of county agriculture Commissioner C. Seldon Morley, who is required by law to keep for inspection records of the commercial pest control operators: the date of treatment, material and dosage used, the number of units treated and other pertinent items. Individual farmers, even the corporate ones, are not required to file records.

Commissioner Morley said the records had been given to him "in confidence." The visit, not a particularly sociable affair to judge by courtroom recollections, ended with Cohen's promising to return in a day or two to get what he considered "vital public information."

Within two hours after the union attorney had left Morley's office, three applicator corporations, acting on behalf of themselves and all other members of the county Agricultural Chemical Association, had obtained a temporary restraining order. Mr. Morley, who had been named as defendant, was now enjoined from disclosing the records. Judge J. Kelly Steele, whose anti-union decisions have not endeared him to organized labor, signed the order with remarkable promptness, considering that the trade association's attorney, Stephen E. Wall, had admitted that "in the very limited time available due to the urgency of the situation we have not been able to accomplish much research on the point and we have not found direct authority on the point. . . ." Mr. Cohen petitioned the appellate court in the district for a peremptory writ of mandate. That was turned down on the ground that the issue should be resolved at the trial-court level.

Great changes have occurred since the days of the Joads in Kern County, which lies at the southern end of the San Joaquin Valley—probably the world's most fertile region. U.S. 99, twisting down from the Tehachapi Mountains and leveling north past Arvin, Weedpatch and other towns on the migrants' route, is now a broad highway. Nondescript public buildings in Bakersfield have been replaced by glittering steel and glass rectangles of ultramodern design. The "Okies" and the "Arkies" who survived the great hunger have adopted the attitudes and manners of California farm folk, even to snarling "union" just like the Establishmentarians.

But once inside the handsome paneled courtroom, changes seemed less fundamental. The old issues were still the issues, dividing the courtroom and the case right down the center: human values vs. business license, philosophy vs. technology, concept vs. coin. In the spectators' seats to the right of the entrance sat the crop dusters, those technological experts who defy the laws of gravity by their ability to fly "right on the deck" and who challenge the laws of biology at great risk to themselves as they wage chemical war in the fields. Their work-day confrontations with nature have given them toughness and arrogance.

In the spectators' seats to the left were the farm workers. They, too, had been stamped by their work. Their faces, more varied in structure and richer in hue, ranging from black to brown, yellow and white, had the settled patience of persons who regard nature as process rather than enemy. With them were a number of young men—well educated, totally engaged—for whom Delano and Cesar Chavez have become the center and symbol of a struggle to redefine justice in our time. From their ranks had come the attorney spokesmen: 25-year-old David Averbuck, who went to work for UFWOC last summer because the job ". . . jibes with my concept of what it's all about," and Jerry Cohen, who became UFWOC general counsel two years ago for similar reasons. Like a good many other young attorneys today, they have rejected the prevailing professional notion that law is an abstract game for the affluent to be lost or won on points. For them, law is a vehicle for delivering justice to all the people.

Beyond the two factions, on the raised bench under the golden state seal, sat Judge George A. Brown. Courteous, grave, interested in the issues, he indicated himself as a man deeply appreciative of the dignity and the proprieties of the law. His task was formidable and of far-reaching consequence. On his decision depended an answer to one of the overwhelming questions of our time: To what extent can the law and will the law curb the agricultural and chemical entrepreneurs from jeopardizing the health and lives of other men and contaminating, perhaps forever, man's greatest natural resource—the earth itself?

The union received strong support from experts in its efforts to prove that farm workers and the general public need protection. A first step, the young lawyers said, is to set up a clinical testing program for agricultural workers, similar to the one now used for pest control company employees. Although scientists are still of divided opinion about the effects on human health of the chlorinated hydrocarbons (the other principal category of insecticides, which includes DDT), they are universally aware of the hazards of the organic phosphates. First developed extensively during the 1930s, some proved so toxic that they were immediately turned over to the military as "perfect" weapons of chemical warfare—deadly enough to wipe out the population of an area without damaging property. One of the more commonly known insecticides of this variety, TEPP, is so poisonous that a single ounce of the stuff is enough to kill about 500 men.

Like other nerve gases, the organic phosphates inhibit the action of a neural enzyme, cholinesterase, which regulates the mechanism by which nerves relax and control muscles. The first symptoms parallel those of relatively harmless irritants: the nose begins to run, vision is blurred. Then the chest is constricted, and breathing becomes more difficult. Finally, the victim's respiratory muscles are fatally impaired. He dies by asphyxiation.

Since death follows so quickly upon the first overt symptoms, the cholinesterase level of persons working commercially with agricultural chemicals—manufacturing, formulating, and applicating—is checked frequently. If it is below what is normal for them, they are taken off their jobs until the level has built up again—sometimes they must give up the work, permanently. The need for similar protection for farm workers was underscored by Dr. West's affidavit, which contained the "classic" case of the 16-year-old boy. She described a number of other alarming incidents. In August of 1963, she noted, more than ninety of 6,000 peach pickers in one area became sufficiently ill from parathion (one of the most commonly used organic phosphates) to seek medical aid. Health officials, as a test, checked seventy others in the group who displayed no signs of poisoning. They found that 50 per cent of them showed "significant reduction of red cell and plasma cholinesterase levels, but were either asymptomatic or had not sought medical attention for their symptoms."

Additional evidence of the need to provide safeguards for workers was offered by Edward Lester, director of test laboratories in Fresno and Bakersfield. Contrary to his own financial interests—pest control companies are among his major accounts—he supported the union appeal for tests for farm workers. "Obviously I feel quite strongly about this," he told me later. "I see so many critically ill persons, including children and young people. If proper precautions were taken, people wouldn't die."

The witness who revealed perhaps most clearly the nature and extent of the problem was Dr. Robert Van den Bosch, professor of economic entomology at the University of California. An internationally recognized authority, Dr. Van den Bosch cited economic and biological as well as philosophical and moral reasons for halting the unilateral use of insecticides and substituting an "ecological approach."

"Pest control now," he asserted bluntly, "is largely a matter of merchandising." California farmers are being heavily penalized for the "overkill" program, which has often engendered more serious pest problems than those it set out to control. "Good" insects as well as "bad" ones have been ruthlessly exterminated by broad-spectrum materials, creating an ecological imbalance that has often given many species of parasites "license to explode."

By preserving the complex of predators and parasites that affect the whole chain of life, by promoting intelligent crop management and agricultural hygiene, by using highly selective pesticides and biological controls, farmers could realize enormous savings in money, land and men's health and lives. In addition to taking issue with the merchandisers, Dr. Van den Bosch expressed concern about the inadequacy of the tests made by the U.S. Department of Agriculture and with the failure of legislators to declare a moratorium on DDT. "What we are talking about," the scientist said, "is a philosophy."

That was not what some people in the courtroom were talking about. From the standpoint of the pest control operators, the duty of the law was clear and simple: to maintain business as usual. Mr. Wall based his case chiefly on the escape clause in the new California code. Although the code holds access to information about the people's business to be "a fundamental and necessary right of every citizen of this state," it also precludes disclosure of records of law-enforcement agencies and—of obvious interest to big businesses—records possessed by other agencies if they contain trade secrets, geological and geophysical data, plant production, marketing and crop reports "obtained in confidence." The records of pesticide applications contain trade secrets, Wall insisted, that had been given to Commissioner Morley "in confidence."

Arguing forcefully to support Wall on the "trade secrets" clause, as on other points, was county counsel Ralph Jordan, attorney for the defendant, Commissioner Morley. It is novel in a courtroom to find the attorneys for plaintiff and defendant on the same side of the table, sharing the same witnesses, citing the same precedents, making the same appeals. And the alliance between public officials and private operators in this instance was rendered more ironic by another "chemical case" going on. At one point, the hearing was recessed so that a jury could bring in its verdict and Judge Brown could pass sentence. Defendants were two rather frayed young women; one very blonde, one very brunette, both looking sadly in need of vitamin D. While working at a place called the Hillbilly Ranch, they had sold—according to the felony charges for which they were given prison terms —$6 worth of seconal and amphetamine tablets to a police informer. The prosecuting attorneys, like the jurors, wore expressions of outrage at the violations of public health and safety—to say nothing of public morality.

Mr. Jordan expressed even greater outrage about the union's demand to see the records. In his zeal to protect the trade secrets of Wall's clients, he questioned Dr. Van den Bosch so fiercely that Judge Brown was once forced to ask him to "stand back a little, please." He scoffed about the "somewhat ethereal question of whether the public interest of confidentiality"; he dismissed affidavits of injured workers as "a pile of garbage."

Commissioner Morley was so solicitous about the applicators' trade secrets that he could have been mistaken for Wall's confidential clerk. Animation is not the commissioner's distinguishing characteristic, but one of the occasions when he seemed more person than portrait occurred in the corridor outside the courtroom after Dr. John Swift, another University of California entomologist, had testified. He had been summoned by UFWOC's opponents chiefly, it seemed clear, to counter the testimony of his colleague. The commissioner was delighted with Dr. Swift's performance: "They were trying to put you on the spot," he thwacked the expert on the shoulder heartily, "but you came through fine, fella."

It was thus easy to understand the passion in Cohen's voice when he talked about UFWOC as public defender. "I think it is inefficient to rely on government agencies," he retorted sharply to a comment by Mr. Wall. "We don't trust government agencies. We rely on ourselves and would rather rely on public law."

That even in best regulated California, laws governing pesticides are not firm enough to warrant anyone's reliance became more apparent in the months that followed. Four weeks after the concluding summaries were presented, Judge Brown formally instructed Commissioner Morley to continue to keep the records secret. Disclosure, he said, "would seriously hamper the essential cooperation existing between all segments of the pesticide industry and the farmers on the one hand with the commissioner on the other."

Supporting his decision, Judge Brown referred to the applicators' argument that if their records were disclosed, unlicensed grower-owners would do the spraying themselves. That they could take on the job is an open question, since commercial application has become a big business in California, which now uses about 25 per cent of the nation's agricultural pesticides. Furthermore, if and when growers did indicate that they were willing to get the equipment and manpower, the state could insist that as "commercial applicators" they must obtain licenses and keep records.

The important issue, by-passed in the decision, is that pesticides are no longer anyone's private business. Every person in this country and in most others carries within himself appreciable concentrations of economic poisons. There is no hiding place: pesticide residues have been found in creatures at ocean depths and mountain heights from the Arctic to the Antarctic. The milk of some nursing mothers in the United States contains such an intolerable level of residue that if it were cow's milk it could not be sold.

Because of problems of drift and persistence and biological magnification, both Republican and Democratic legislators have been joining Sen. Gaylord Nelson in seeking to ban the ubiquitous DDT. Arizona declared a year-long moratorium last January after its dairy and honey industries were threatened; Michigan acted this spring when the condemnation of coho salmon from its principal lake jeopardized a commercial and tourist boom; California's legislature is considering a bill submitted by state Sen. John A. Nejedly to impose a gradual ban on its use —in his original measure even the possession of DDT would have been outlawed. A formidable case was made in Wisconsin by conservationists working with the Environmental Defense Fund. And early in July, the U.S. Department of Agriculture emerged from its lethargy long enough to order a thirty-day suspension for DDT—time out for "review."

The rising voice of protest occasioned by the speed with which Rachel Carson's "fable for the future" is being translated into current scientific reports is not without danger, however. A ban on DDT—and it should be banned—may lull the country into the comforting delusion that the problem has been solved. Although other chlorinated hydrocarbons are less likely to drift and are less persistent, neither they nor the highly toxic organic phosphates are being employed selectively enough so that people, both workers and nonworkers, can be protected.

Scientists are no longer asking if pesticides pose a health hazard. Their problem now is to determine to what extent all human beings—who are unwittingly serving as guinea pigs in the vast uncontrolled field tests—have been damaged, perhaps irreversibly. Responsible investigators associate the chemicals with a terrifying list of afflictions: toxic hepatitis, many varieties of cancer, disfunctions of the enzyme systems, embryonic malformation, kidney disorders, and other chronic and degenerative diseases. And the toll will continue to mount, according to recent reports about their mutagenicity.

Several weeks ago Charles A. O'Brien, chief deputy in the California attorney general's office, took significant action to support the UFWOC appeal from Judge Brown's decision upholding the sanctity of "trade secrets." Explaining his intervention in a suit filed by a farm worker in Riverside against the county agricultural commissioner, O'Brien said: "We believe there's a constitutional right to know on behalf of the public which transcends the cloak of privilege." At least 1,000 Californians were injured by pesticides last year, he noted; the agriculture files cannot remain closed since "they may involve life and death for future Californians."

He, like others, expressed concern that the regulatory agencies "too often" are oriented toward the regulated rather than the public. It is no secret that they, along with educational institutions, have been too intimately involved with the merchandisers. The thalidomide trial now going on in Germany and other episodes involving the drug industry offer terrible warnings about the risks incurred when chemist-businessmen dictate public policy. With pesticides the risk is even greater. It may well be, as some experts say, that the contamination of the biosphere has passed the point of no return—that the dose already administered has been fatal.

Belfast: 'In Glorious Remembrance'

CAREY McWILLIAMS

On the afternoon of July 11 the Union Jack flew from virtually every house in Protestant working-class areas of Belfast. Youngsters were gathering materials for the big bonfires of the night to come: rubbish, scrap lumber, old divans and chairs, ironing boards, old auto tires, anything flammable, in huge piles. In windows and from wires stretched across streets with such distinguished English names as Earl, Brougham, Spencer, Canning, various representations of King William of Orange astride his mount, in full battle regalia, were flamboyantly exhibited "in glorious remembrance" of his victory over the Catholic forces of James II at the Battle of the Boyne, July 12, 1690.

As darkness descended, I walked the streets watching the fires. The flames shooting high, the pall of smoke, and the ominous roll of drums created a weird voodoo effect.

The smoke, forming strange shapes as it billowed upward, set the stage for this strange Walpurgis night scene. At midnight the fires were still blazing, their plumes of smoke caught in the overcast, and the air was thick with grime and soot and the stench of burning rubbish. Firemen were spraying water on the walls of homes and storefronts in an effort to reduce the fire hazard which, to an outsider, seemed grave indeed. Police were everywhere, in the alleys, at street intersections, in riot cars parked in side streets. I saw some fights and witnessed a few arrests; the Orange club contingents had been arriving all day, by car, bus, train, boat and plane, and the baiting and brawling had started.

During the early hours of the evening I watched dozens of these groups as they poured out of the railway station:

men, women and children, old and young, country folk for the most part. Boys and girls moved in separate packs, yelling, dancing, whooping it up. Later I watched these invaders move slowly out Sandy Row to "the field" on the outskirts of the city, where the big meetings and the speech making take place. Auto traffic was heavy and the sidewalks were crowded. Many country boys were drunk for the first time—beer-drunk—and lampposts were sprayed with vomit. Tired, drunken old men swigged and muttered on steps and curbs. All over Belfast big black plumes of smoke met the overcast and the acrid stench of burning rubbish got worse as the night wore on. The drums never stopped beating, the yelling grew louder, and the street and sidewalk dancing increased in tempo. I followed the procession part of the way "to the field" and then dropped out, shaken and slightly nauseated by what I had seen and heard and smelled.

The next morning I had a marvelous view of the two-hour march of 40,000 Orangemen—325 lodges, more than 150 bands (pipes, accordions, flutes, "silver," military, brass, mixed, most hired for the occasion)—from the second-floor windows of the Irish News. To the staff, the Twelfth is an old story. Most of them, as most Catholics in Belfast, try to ignore it. But a few of them had assembled to brief me and, for the occasion, had a bottle of excellent Scotch and glasses ready, by way of seeing to it that I was braced as well. They had told me, a few nights before, that the parade had to be seen to be believed. I saw it but am still not sure that I believe what I saw. Twenty such demonstrations were held this year; the march in Belfast was the largest of the lot, but the others were not exactly small; 100 lodges and bands paraded in Enniskell. The demonstrations are attended each year by contingents from the south of Ireland, from Glasgow, Toronto ("the Belfast of Canada") and elsewhere. David Holden reports in the London Times that there is nothing now left in Britain remotely like the combination of prayer and patriotism, swagger and piety, and crude bacchanalia of a Twelfth celebration, and I believe him. This year's was the largest ever and the most intense. The graffiti, I was told, were more insulting and obscene than ever. The July 12th demonstrations are staged as a calculated provocation, designed to beef up the self-assertion of the Orangemen and to demonstrate that they are, and intend to remain, top dogs.

Leading the Belfast parade this year were some devotees of Dr. Ian Kyle Paisley, selling photographs of their leader. Then came the various clubs and lodges, most of them preceded by bands. The first contingents were the best dressed, with bowler hats or "Anthony Edens" (Homburgs), in their Sunday best, with white gauntlets, orange sashes and the collarette of the Orange order, puffed with pride, ruddy with stout. Some of them carried scythes, spears and drawn swords but the umbrella seemed to be the favorite weapon or badge of distinction. Some wore sprigs of orange lilies or carnations with fern leaves in their lapels. Many lodges were preceded by a man who carried a Bible, reposing on a purple or red cushion under glass, with a cross over the case. Some bands had one or two girls or a majorette but it was distinctly—and emphatically—a parade of adult males. Some wives, I was told, those who go shopping in ankle socks and hair curlers, are more "true blue," loyal to the order, than their husbands. In the entire line of march there were few beards and not more than half a dozen young men with long hair. The lodges toward the rear were less well-dressed, more miscellaneous types.

Orangemen have a distinctive strut and swagger as well as several special dance steps. The marching tunes get monotonous but the bands beat up a storm of sound. The bands used to play jazz tunes or popular songs, but this year the music was strictly Orange-martial. On and on the lodges came, each with its banner. "The Whitehill Temperance Lodge," "The British Defenders," "The Albert Hall Total Temperance Lodge," "The Ulster Defenders," "The Rising Sons of Portadown," "The True Blue Loyal Lodge," "Belfast Heroes," "The Lord Carson Memorial Lodge," "The Duke of Kent Memorial Lodge," "The Belfast Dockers," "St. Luke's Defenders," "The Loyal Bakers," and so on; and the bands: "The Mayhill Flute Band of Glasgow," "The Wellington Flute Band," "The York Road Girls" (accordion players, very natty in red and blue costumes), "The Fairhill Fife and Drum Corps" and more of the same. The Glasgow bands were the wildest. Lodges carried huge banners with such inscriptions as: "In glorious, pious and immortal memory of William III," and "My Faith Goes Up to Thee."

The street crowds were smiling but did not seem ecstatic. One got the impression that they had turned out, mostly oldsters, wives, and small fry, to wave to their menfolk as they strutted past. Almost every lodge carried a temperance banner but whenever a contingent paused in front of the Irish News office, as many did, a half dozen or so would hastily remove their Orange regalia and rush into the back door of a pub across the street for a quick one before rejoining their brothers in temperance. The parade, despite the yelling and boozing of the night before, was orderly enough, but the Twelfth has little in common with, say, St. Patrick's Day in New York. It is not the kind of spectacle in which the entire community can participate; it is partisan, arrogant and provocative. Year after year, there are fights, brawls and violence. And in some years the 12th of July is followed by further demonstrations on the 12th of August, when Orangemen celebrate the lifting of the siege of Londonderry in the year 1689. (This was written before the riots in Londonderry on August 12.)

The next day, July 13, a Sunday, I visited Londonderry (Derry if you are Catholic). There had been a wild night of street fighting. From the top of Waterloo Street to the intersection with Williams Street at its foot, and along Williams Street for several long blocks, nearly every shop window had been smashed and most of the stores gutted. The streets were thick with broken glass. Cars had been overturned and burned. Crowds were milling up and down the streets, surveying the damage; oddly enough, hey were smiling and pleasant. Those I spoke to agreed hat the trouble had started the night before when a contingent of Orangemen, full of beer and Ulster exuberance, descended into the city from the old walls on the hill. They had begun to bait the street crowds who had baited back and the fighting had started. The police were unable or unwilling to stop it. The battle began about 10 o'clock in the evening and went on until about 5 A.M. More than 103 persons were injured, including fifty police, and one man was killed. Again and again I was told there would be more trouble, and after a look around Londonderry I could well believe it. The unemployment rate is very high, the slums wretched, and the Catholic "underclass," particularly the young, are angry and rebellious. Some British papers reported that the fighting had been started by Irish nationalists, but the clear source of the unrest is to be found in the massive oppression of the Catholic minority and the systematic discrimination practiced against it. This discrimination—in housing, employment, voting rights, education (for example, the decision to locate a new university in Coleraine rather than in Londonderry)—has been thoroughly documented and is beyond dispute. Now and then the sole Protestant resident in a predominantly Catholic block may complain of harassment, but it is minor compared with the treatment of the Catholic minority.

King William III

Of the numerous senseless antagonisms of this wicked world, none is more absurd than this "Remember the Boyne!" "Kill the Pope!" foolishness. Joseph Devlin, the gentle-mannered, kindly editor of the Irish Weekly, told me he thought it would take "about two generations more" before the madness would abate. Martin Dillon, his assistant, a young man in his 20s, agreed. They may be right. At the moment there is little evidence that the fervor of the Orange element is abating; lodge membership has increased. Oddly enough the Orange order, founded in 1795, stems from the Republican tradition of the period but was later commandeered by the landed gentry and became, as it is today, the driving force in the Unionist Party. Some estimates give the order a membership of 200,000 which is quite a force in a Protestant population of 1 million, and membership is virtually a precondition for nomination by the Unionists. Despite the fact that its membership has increased, the Orange order is worried. It is trying to get still a tighter grip on the Unionist Party and, in the process, is creating new tensions in the party. As Dr. Daniel MacSparran, publisher of the Irish News, put it to me, the order is currently exhibiting "the violence of uncertainty."

And worried it should be, for winds of change are blowing in Northern Ireland. For one thing, a good deal of time has elapsed since Ireland was partitioned. Some of the bitterness has subsided. The emergence of a responsible government in the South—one that has leaned over backward to be fair to its small Protestant minority —has been reassuring. The meeting between Sean Lemass and Terence O'Neill on January 14, 1965—the first meeting of Prime Ministers of the two parts of Ireland—was a sign that times were changing, even if little came of it. Thanks in large part to the influence of Pope John XXIII, Cardinal Conway notes "a very marked change in the Church in Ireland." Television—particularly British programs picked up in both the North and South—has broadened perspectives. Tourism has had a similar influence. The activities of I.R.A. gunmen in the North, which never failed to stiffen Unionist intransigence, have largely ceased. Rising educational levels have helped also. A member of the faculty at Queen's University told me that the abler students of the better-off Protestant families are now attending British universities in increasing numbers; many do not return to Northern Ireland but those who do often take an enlightened view of religious differences. At the same time, more of the abler Catholic students are attending Queen's, which is vaguely Protestant, and tend to remain in Northern Ireland. Catholics constitute 37 per cent of the population, but number about 51 per cent of the children of school age. Some of them emigrate later, though, and since more Catholics than Protestants leave, the growth of the Catholic population relative to the Protestant is not as significant as one might expect. But even so the long-term increase in the Catholic population is said to have convinced Mr. O'Neill that some means would have to be found to broaden the base of the Unionist Party. By Unionist standards a fair-minded man, O'Neill agreed to meet with Lemass and, later, in response to mounting civil rights pressures and protests, promised certain minor reforms. But in the end he failed to win the backing of his party and resigned. However, the fact that he promised reforms is itself a significant admission that winds of change are blowing.

A more significant sign of change is the emergence of Ian Paisley, a Presbyterian cleric who beats the Orange drums with a vengeance. Politically he threatens to split the Unionist Party into three elements: Paisleyites, i.e., hard-liners; a middle "commercial" element under the leadership of Brian Faulkner, Minister of Development; and the landed gentry. Paisley is an embarrassment to the more sophisticated among the gentry, who have controlled the government of Northern Ireland since 1920. His manners are objectionable and his obduracy a threat to the established leadership; he has viciously assailed many prominent British religious leaders, much to the embarrassment of the British Tories and Anglican elements in Northern Ireland. Some of the landed gentry leaders have been forced out of the Orange order and others have left; the more knowledgeable know that the government must bend a bit, must make some concessions, but Paisley bars the way. The present Prime Minister, James Chichester-Clark, is a transitional figure and will probably be succeeded by Brian Faulkner, an able, energetic cabinet officer who has a business or "commercial" background. Should he succeed Chichester-Clark he will be the first Prime Minister not to belong to the gentry. Less liberal than O'Neill, Faulkner has at least adopted the "One Man, One Vote" position for local elections, but with no promise that election districts will be drawn more fairly.

In brief Paisley threatens the Unionists with what they have always feared, a split in the party. The traditional Unionists have strong ties with the British Tories who find themselves embarrassed, to some extent, by what has been happening in Northern Ireland. British Tories are becoming increasingly ecumenical in outlook, more responsive to small-nation pressure in the UN, more inclined to maintain privilege by political means rather than by strong-arm pressure. A major blow-up would be deeply embarrassing to them as well as to the British Labour Party. Relations with the United States, the Common Market issue, concern over nationalist trends in Scotland and Wales, the world-wide ferment over civil rights, not to mention the size of the Irish vote in Britain, make both British parties extremely sensitive to the situation in Northern Ireland. The Cameron Commission has completed its investigations and its report is due this month. Whatever its findings and recommendations, the report is more likely to add to the civil rights ferment than to dampen it.

In spite of the fact that the Unionists, backed by Britain, have entrenched themselves in power by every known gerrymandering device, the opposition could, in theory, mount an effective attack on the one-party system. The Unionist Party shows the familiar symptoms of blindness and ineptitude that forty-eight-year tenure of office might be expected to produce. It has had no effective competition and has fought every campaign since 1922 on exactly the same issue—the connection with Britain must be maintained at all costs. With no experience in office, the opposition parties have found it difficult to project new policies and programs. For one thing, they suffer from a dearth of data: they have never had a chance to examine the archives. More important, the opposition has been unable to achieve the unity which the Unionists have maintained until now. The Irish Nationalists have harped on partition and have been largely concerned with defending the Catholic minority rather than building support for a winning coalition. The Labour Party is split. Belfast is a strong union town but Protestants have for years monopolized the skilled crafts, with most Catholics relegated to the unskilled trades. Belfast labor has fought some great battles on strictly trade union issues but the leadership shies away from political issues—partition for example—that, if pressed, might divide the labor movement. Then too most Belfast unions are affiliated with British parent organizations. Union leadership, as one might expect, is largely in Protestant hands.

For a number of shopkeepers, government employees (at all levels), and white- and blue-collar workers, a card in the Orange order is a guarantee of employment; in effect a meal ticket. Protestant workers support the order not so much because they dislike or distrust Catholics as because there aren't enough good jobs to go around. The correlation of religious affiliation and job status is striking. For example, most of the shops and stores in Belfast are Protestant owned and operated but the liquor shops and bars are a Catholic preserve. To get drunk, Orangemen must patronize Catholic owned and operated pubs. If it came to a showdown on a key issue, many Protestant workers would vote for the Unionists, not for Labour; in fact many of them vote that way most of the time despite their labor union membership. There are some splinter parties but they have not been of much importance. Suffice it to say that the "out" parties have never been able to function as an effective parliamentary opposition. In the last election the Unionists ended up with more seats in the Stormont—the local parliament—than they had held when the election was called. The elimination of proportional representation has not made it any easier for the divided opposition to win seats.

But the emergence of a new force—the civil rights movement—is now shifting the old alignments. The movement has drawn Protestant as well as Catholic support, and has some support from elements of the faculty and student body at Queen's University. Initially the movement sought to concern itself solely with civil rights in an effort to win the broadest support. But it is now clear that it must increasingly be concerned with social and economic issues. "One Man, One Vote" needs to be supplemented with "One Man, One Job." Essentially the hope for a "new politics" in Northern Ireland consists in the possibility of convincing Protestants, particularly the young and educated labor elements (teachers, for example), that their interests can best be served by breaking the Unionist monopoly of power and bringing in new programs, new policies and a new leadership. Fifty years of Unionist rule have not been exactly glorious. But issues broader than civil rights and partition are needed to build an effective coalition. British subsidies, notably for social services, have created vested interests in "the connection" with Britain, at least for the time being. The Republic of Ireland cannot match these services at the present time. Social services were late in arriving—they have come along for the most part since the war—and they do not yet measure up to British standards, but they are fairly administered so that even Catholics have a stake in them.

Most of the persons I interviewed were inclined to soft-pedal partition for the moment but ultimately it is the crucial issue. In many respects the border is quite unreal; people move freely back and forth across it (I saw border posts that were unattended by guards). Important organizations function on an all-Ireland basis, including the churches and the Orange order. Nevertheless, unification would enable the energies of all the people, North and South, to be focused on critical economic problems, such as development of a power grid, the establishment of an atomic power plant, the development of fisheries and the fishing industry, tourism, industrialization, agriculture and trade. There is some trade now principally in cattle, but the die-hard Unionists hold back out of fear that flourishing North-South trade relations would lead to political unification. Unification would not solve Ireland's economic problems but it would release energies that could be focused on these problems. A partitioned nation is essentially a crippled nation.

Unification will not be brought about "by the gun." It could happen, I was told, in one of two ways: serious disorders might force the British to intervene or, in time, the opposition might win a majority of seats in the Stormont. The theory is that British military intervention would destroy the mystique of the British "connection." But no British Government is likely to intervene unless asked to do so by the government of Northern Ireland and such aid would not be requested short of conditions bordering on civil war. The government—that is the Unionist Party—has 10,000 special forces and the Royal Ulster Constabulary (3,000) at its disposal. These are not impartial forces. Overwhelmingly Protestant in composition, they function as a partisan arm of the Unionist Party. The Ireland Act of 1949, although passed for a different purpose, contains a provision that "in no event will Northern Ireland or any part thereof cease to be part of Her Majesty's Dominions and of the United Kingdom without the consent of the parliament of Northern Ireland." So the most obvious way to end partition is to win control of the Stormont.

The key to political change is to be found in the possibility of getting the younger and better educated elements, Catholics and Protestants, to work together. That this can be done, the experience of the civil rights movement attests. Many Protestants suffer from what might be called an "identity" problem. They think of themselves as "British" but they are more Irish than they know. As Betty Sinclair, secretary of the Belfast Trades Council, said to me: "They have to work in Britain a while before they realize they are Irish." On the other hand, many Catholics were, until recently, so discouraged by the weight of discrimination that they had abandoned hope of change. When the civil rights movement decided to stage a sit-down protest in Londonderry, journalists converged on the city to see what would happen. One reporter told me that he had been assured, by excellent local sources, that the sit-down would be a bust. The people would not support it and the attempt to stage it would merely advertise Catholic weakness.

It was raining as the hour approached for the sit-down. Only a handful of people had assembled and they did not seem to know just what to do or why they were there. Some newsmen took one look at the scene and were prepared to phone in stories that the demonstration had not come off. But then an old man, in a cap, slowly removed his raincoat, folded it neatly and sat down on it in the rain. Others began to do the same and miraculously the courtyard began to fill with people. The new surge of confidence and hope in the Catholic sector is as much a miracle, in a way, as the sight of Catholics and Protestants marching together in the Dungannon protest—the first major civil rights demonstration.

The energies which the civil rights movement has released will not dissipate; the causes for the unrest are much too basic. New and effective means of protest—marches, demonstrations, and the like—have been tested and will be repeated; and, thanks to television, the world, including the British public, is getting the message. (Currently an attempt is being made to induce television to practice a form of self-censorship in covering protests but it is not likely to succeed.) The appearance in Westminster of such spokesmen as Gerry Fitt and Bernadette Devlin has forced Parliament to pay some attention to what is happening in Northern Ireland. A group of a hundred or so MPs have banded together to express their concern. No British Government, Labour or Tory, would want to see the situation there get out of hand; hence there will be sustained pressure from London for a measure of reform. And more and more Unionist leaders now recognize the necessity for change. In an off-the-record session with newsmen, a Unionist cabinet officer confessed that the recent disorders had seriously set back the government's efforts to induce foreign firms to open plants in Northern Ireland. The die-hard Unionists will not yield their monopoly of power without a fight, but this monopoly cannot be preserved much longer.

Northern Ireland is a small country, 1,500,000 population, 5,242 square miles. You can hike across and around it with no great effort. But within its borders most of the major political issues of the modern world can be studied in microcosmic form. Precisely because the scale is so small, the meaning and ramification of these issues can be seen with exceptional clarity. Name the issue and Ulster has it. "Partition" politics (Ulster is the classic case), colonialism, neo-colonialism, regional discrimination (the way Belfast and the east coast ports discriminate against the West), ethnic differences, the techniques of demagogues, the interaction of class with religion and race, and of religion with class, politics and economics, one-party politics, the problems of small states, all these and many other issues of comparable importance can be studied to advantage in Northern Ireland. In Pareto's terms, "derivations" and "residues" abound and even Sorel could have learned something about myths and the uses and limitations of violence from the charged and heady politics of this minuscule state. It may be the graveyard of politicians but it is a happy hunting ground for political scientists.

POP SEX AMONG THE SQUARES

DESMOND SMITH
Mr. Smith, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is on the staff of C.B.S. News.

Not long ago, Russ Meyer, who likes to think of himself as America's top "nudie" film maker, produced Good Morning . . . and Goodbye! The New York Post called it "a smutty sex show" and complained that the dialogue "would embarrass a third-rate burlesque comic." But weep no tears for Russ. Every one of his more than twenty movies has grossed at least four times its cost. And his early masterpiece, The Immortal Mr. Teas—made on a G-string budget of $24,000—has returned well over $1 million.

Al Goldstein and Jim Buckley put up $175 apiece to start Screw, a 50c-a-copy tabloid that promised in its first issue to "uncover the entire world of sex. We will be the Consumer's Report of sex, testing new products such as dildoes, rubbers, and artificial vaginas." Two months ago the editors flatly rejected a $50,000 offer to buy them out. "It sounds silly," Jim Buckley told Claudia Dreifus of New York Scenes, "but one day I'd like to see a giant skyscraper. 'The Screw Building'—it would be penis-shaped, of course. One of these days, you'll see, we'll be so big that the building will be called Time, Life and Screw!"

Jacqueline Susann, who told The Wall Street Journal that she is a "conservative moralist," made her fame and fortune typing Valley of the Dolls, a book that sold 10 million copies and is now in its fifty-third paperback printing. Miss Susann's latest stint at the typewriter begat The Love Machine, a novel which deals with the sadistic love affairs of a TV mogul named Robin Stone. Wrote Nora Ephron in a favorable New York Times Book Review article: "Sweaters are always being ripped open in Miss Susann's books. Pants are always being frantically unzipped. And everyone is always wanting everyone else." Sold to Columbia Pictures for $1.5 million and number one on the best-seller charts, Miss Susann's only rival is Portnoy's Complaint. "It's wild," Michael Korda, editor in chief at Simon & Schuster, told the Times. "You have these two giant books out at the same time and their merits aside, one of them is about masturbation and the other is about successful heterosexual love. If there's any justice in the world, The Love Machine ought to knock Portnoy off the top simply because it's a step in the right direction."

Meyer, Goldstein, Buckley and Susann are in the "if you got it, so flaunt it, baby" tradition. Each has found the big dollar in catering to what Russ Meyer calls "the pant-and-drool crowd." One might guess that in the waning 1960s—the "Late Sensate" period, Herman Kahn calls it—spectator sex is the opiate of the people. One might also suppose by studying the thematic material—wife-swapping, flagellation, sadism, autoeroticism, nymphomania, homosexuality, Lesbianism, masochism—that the private sex life of America is completely wrecked. Only partly true. The pop pornographers don't have the complete file yet, but they're working on it.

A decade ago, the Granahan committee of the House denounced the billion-dollar-a-year mail-order commerce in salacious materials; today it appears to have mushroomed into one of the most competitive of the new "growth" industries. Pop pornography, which is the slick version of what once was called "smut," has become the bluest of the blue chips. What has happened is what always happens to any industry that enjoys extraordinary profit margins: unless it is enjoined by statute or possesses an ability to control the market, it must make elbow room for sharp-eyed competitors lusting to share those juicy profits. For reasons that will be explained later, it is above and beyond all else a peculiarly middle-class phenomenon. Pop pornography is the new white-collar obsession. Lingerie manufacturers and Sunday newspapers revel in it. The Ladies' Home Journal abandons faithful Princess Grace and the Duchess of Windsor in favor of serializing Jacqueline Susann. Kenneth Tynan approves. Time profiles it. Broadway musicals extol it. Suburban housewives pant and lust for it. And, since the United States is a consumer society that thrives on satisfying wants and desires, what is pop pornography if not the ingenious one-handed icing on the manufacturers' cake? In short, sex has become very big business indeed.

In the 1930s D. H. Lawrence wrote:

> The plain and simple excitement, quite open and wholesome, which you find in some Boccaccio stories is not for a minute to be confused with the furtive excitement aroused by rubbing the dirty little secret in all secrecy in modern best-sellers. This furtive, sneaky, cunning rubbing of an inflamed spot in the imagination is the very quick of modern pornography, and it is a beastly and very dangerous thing.

Thirty years later he would almost certainly feel the same way if he could walk the aisles of the drugstores of America and examine the latest selection of paperbacks and magazines.

When our mass magazines, to name but a single source, tell us we are "liberated" and enjoying the "sexual revolution," why are some of us suspicious? A large part of the answer is that this so-called "new permissiveness" has the ring of the cash register about it. It is a liberalization of sexual morality within prescribed institutional limits. The kind of true sexual freedom that must evolve out of continuing social change, pace Fromm and Marcuse, is still light years away from any kind of reality.

What we are now observing is a commercial happening, like Father's Day or National Shoe Week. As a merchandising technique it has added untold points to the Dow Jones average. Sex sells. So what is now taking place is an industrialization of our ideas and our dreams. In case you haven't been paying attention, your subconscious has become part of the Gross National Product. To latch onto the head-over-pillow profits in sex the pop pornographers—writers, movie makers, advertising men, journalists and manufacturers—have had to package the erotic element in sex, and to package sex they have had to restructure the national psyche. Tougher to remove than any household stain has been that bugaboo, the Puritan ethic. In recent months, as you have no doubt read, it looks as though the big breakthrough has finally occurred—the orgasm has finally replaced the old rugged cross as the joyous symbol of what we are all about. "The 60's," says Dr. William Masters (Human Sexual Response) "will be called the decade of orgasmic preoccupation."

The mirror image of that phallic symbol of America's technological prowess—Saturn V with its 2 million functional parts—is the "Love Machine," the pneumatically endowed Playmate who implores us to "take it all off" in TV commercials, examine her unshaved genitalia (next to a whisky advertisement in Playboy, live the good bad life in best-seller novels, and join her in the Dodge "rebellion" down at the nearest automobile showroom. ("Mother warned me that there would be men like you, driving cars like that. Do you really think you can get to me with that long, low, tough machine you just rolled up in?") The programming that supports this decaying morality is grounded largely on a syntax of manipulation. Women, says Roxanne Dunbar in A Journal of Female Liberation, "are particularly the victims of the machination, programmed as we are to be wife, mother, childbirth expert, sex object, career woman, stay-at-home, mechanic, chauffeur, and yet offered as the stylistic model a mod, free jet-setter. What this does is keep her buying things which symbolize those roles, since playing all of them is impossible, and buying things that symbolize freedom like bright-colored clothes, jewelry, etc. . . ." Like the astronauts we are becoming extensions of the market technology. And as the moon shot was reduced to a blatant sales pitch for American free enterprise, albeit subsidized by the taxpayer ("The soles of the boots you saw are made of GE silicone rubber. . . . NASA has been launching a missile the size of a building. If some time soon, they launch a building, it will be a Hilton—the Lunar Hilton," and so on), so too is the sexual sphere reduced to a commodity—a cluster image that possesses neither humanity nor grace but simply another merchandising lever. Much of this new attitude and most of pop pornography's expansion has come in the last twelve years.

It was the Supreme Court's decision in Roth vs. United States (1957) with its ambiguous definition of obscenity, that gave the pop pornographers the impetus to expansion, rather than any sudden erotic renaissance. In that decision, involving a California bookseller, the Court measured obscenity by "whether, to the average person, applying contemporary community standards, the dominant theme of the material taken as a whole appeals to prurient interests." The grotesque notion that Sam Roth, with a twenty-six-count indictment covering the mailing of obscene pictures, photographs, magazines and books, could pose as the champion of literary freedom had important consequences. As far as pop pornographers were concerned, the Roth decision prepared the way for other departures from the claim of community conscience. It was like the first visit of a respectable citizen to the town brothel. As he sneaks along in the half-light he hopes his neighbors will not observe him; if they do see him and say nothing, the next time he takes courage, until he is as indifferent to being observed on his way to the brothel as on his way to church. The Roth decision has of course touched everyone, but it has had its biggest impact on middle-class America. Twenty years ago the white-collar class was already the willing victim of an exploitative society. The cheery suburban American way of life illustrated by Norman Rockwell, the strong happy-go-lucky Western families who settled a Big Valley or a Ponderosa were all magazine or prime TV time mythology by 1950. The absence of any order of belief "makes him [the average citizen] excellent material for synthetic moulding at the hands of popular culture—print, film, radio, and television," wrote C. Wright Mills in the early fifties. "As a metropolitan dweller, he is especially open to the focused onslaught of all the manufactured loyalties and distractions that are contrived and urgently pressed upon those who live in worlds they never made."

The commercial exploitation of the Roth decision can now be found—a decade later—in a massive take-over of our fantasy life. So the sexual sphere becomes the new marketing mode; it is what consumers have in common with one another; it is the steady destruction of the ultimate human freedom in commercial bondage to the sexual. The mentality of pop pornographers can be studied by examining the kind of movies they produce, the magazines they edit, the newspapers they print, the advertisements they write. The really astonishing thing common to all such material is its generally sex-negative attitude. The mirror they hold up reflects a middle-class America in which there is a great deal of sexual misery. Characteristically, the new sex vendors fail to provide the clues to understanding the national sex hang-up. The profit side of the ledger is to be found in merchandising the debasing, dehumanizing, degrading aspects of sexuality; it is sexual adventurism rather than sexual love that is the true grit of this trade.

Despite the popular belief to the contrary—a belief created by confusing the availability of pornographic material (no matter how vicious) with sexual health—the pornographic racketeers have never shown the slightest enthusiasm for a social morality that might precondition man for genuine sexual freedom. So in sex education. Its grace is what it means to be a man or a woman, a subject long under the interdict of the common bigot. In the elementary and secondary schools of Houston, otherwise known as the base camp for the moon, the children of space-age technicians learn that plants and animals have reproductive systems, but when it comes to people their teachers stand silent. Sex education is not allowed in the schools of Harris County, nor, for for that matter, in more than half the schools of this nation. So because the franchise of sexual health is at the mercy of religious fundamentalists, minor political aspirants, and bumper-sticker conservatives, sex in most communities is still taught as it was when President Lincoln was in the White House—behind the candy store or in the dark. Now for the answering results. One in three brides pregnant at time of marriage; a national divorce rate that is rising half again as fast as the marriage rate; venereal disease among teen-agers: more than 90,000 cases reported in 1968, an increase of 80 per cent since 1956; about a quarter of all military draftees unfit for duty due to neuroses of familial or sexual origin. It is, pointedly, one of the horrors of growing up—and growing up, especially for a middle-class kid, is nowadays a genuine horror—that the young are confronted by so much hypocrisy at home. What you behold, sweeping a glance over suburbia, is the end result of this bogus, commercially inspired "pleasure ethic." It is there, out among the Big Boy power mowers, Sears drapes, and the Sentinel burglar alarms where the porn is really green.

Pop pornography is aimed at the widest possible market—the groin of suburbia. Here are the avid consumers of the breathy novels of Jacqueline Susann, Irving Wallace, Harold Robbins and the rest of the rich and prospering school of one-handed fiction; of movies such as The Fox, Prudence and the Pill and Three Into Two Won't Go; of the women's magazines that have followed Cosmopolitan's market break into the New Sex ("Adultery for Adults: Probably the Farthest-Out Advice You'll Ever Read on Marriage!") and Mademoiselle ("Sex: The New Status Symbol. What, Why, and Where It Is Sexy. The All-Time Like-It-Is Roundup"). Here on the coffee table is the interior fantasy world outside PTA, Laundromats, office squabbles and school lunches. Meanwhile for Dad's brief case and bathroom reading is Playboy. Embraced by Business Week recently as the magazine totally right for the late 1960s, Playboy (5.5 million copies a month, read by 12 million men) has reached the point where, from its wholly owned 37-story headquarters (topped by a "Bunny Beacon") chief stockholder and publisher Hugh Marston Hefner can look out on an empire that includes Playboy ($25 million in ad revenues last year) and a nineteen-unit chain of Playboy clubs and resorts, and a motion picture division, and a syndicated TV series, Playboy After Dark. "Ten years ago," says a media buyer at J. Walter Thompson, the world's largest advertising agency, "none of our clients would have dared use Playboy. Today it's a routine buy."

Sex sells. And by any yardstick this commercial take-over of the middle-class subconscious must be reckoned a prodigious financial success. Giving pop pornography respectability has been a fantastic challenge, and a challenge that has involved jettisoning the Gospel of Work for the fun ethic. A far tougher nut the pleasure merchandisers have had to crack is organized religion in America. At the heart of things, beyond all the slippery arguments for a healthy hedonistic society, the question curls: hedonism for what? Hefner has chosen to meet the religious question head-on, recognizing that his main job is not to sell Playboy but to give moral permission to have fun without guilt. "By stressing self-denial and heavenly reward," argues Hefner [religion] "has kept man from enjoying, without guilt, the fruits of his earthly labors and to that extent is incompatible with the free enterprise system." Given the kind of demand the pop pornographers have created there is no reason why sales and earnings will not continue rising in the years ahead. Pornography, in a few brief years, has moved from an under-the-counter item to an open-market commodity, a part of the capitalist system.

Scenting the sweet smell of success, Maurice Girodias, once the supreme pornographic publisher of Paris, has immigrated to these shores. In an interview with The New York Times (that's the kind of press pornographers receive these days) the reporter noted: "He is looking forward to making his first million dollars within the next six months, thanks to such recent titles as Curtain of Flesh and A Sea of Thighs. As he smilingly acknowledged, 'There seems to be an endless demand for the stuff.'" And Mr. Girodias is going to do his best to make sure the supply does not dry up. That's in the American free enterprise tradition: in 1969, just about everyone is reaching out for a share of the "Sexual Revolution." As for the future, Rabbi Jacob J. Hecht recently observed: "The home of the future will consider pornography as commonplace and necessary as a color TV or dishwasher."

The Fallacy of Decentralization

AMITAI ETZIONI

Mr. Etzioni is professor of sociology at Columbia University and author of The Active Society (Free Press).

In 1947, I was delivering hay from Tel Yoseph, an Israeli kibbutz, to Ein Harod, another kibbutz less than a mile away. The farm manager of Ein Harod signed the delivery papers for twenty-eight bales, and I filed the papers with the office of Tel Yoseph. "How much will Ein Harod be charged?" I asked the clerk. He was astonished by my question. "By Afula prices, of course." Afula is a town not far from both kibbutzim. While the kibbutzim neither use money nor set prices in their internal transactions, they charge each other the prices which prevail in the "free" (i.e., capitalistic) market of Afula. The national kibbutz associations help fledgling kibbutzim, but in general the mechanisms for transfer payments are very weak. No wonder that rather well-off kibbutzim are to be found next to extremely poor ones. And over the years, the rich kibbutzim get richer while the poor ones remain poor.

The kibbutz movement is of considerable interest to those who favor decentralization as a way of providing a genuinely participatory system. But it also illustrates the fact that decentralization often serves ineffectively those values which require a national mechanism that is sufficiently powerful to reallocate sources among local units (a prerequisite for social justice) and the handling of many other "inter-unit," nation-wide issues and values (e.g., the financing of institutions of higher education which would advance the movement).

I am far from being an expert on Yugoslavia, but I understand from those who are that the relatively considerable decision-making power given to small residential and work units generates some similar, symptomatic problems. Thus, for instance, I am told that there is little "income transfer" from the more affluent parts of Yugoslavia to such poverty-stricken, underdeveloped regions as Macedonia, Yugoslavia's equivalent of our South. Efforts to establish inter-local bus lines, especially, those which require inter-regional coordination, are said to face difficulties similar to those encountered in attempts to establish rapid transit systems in our cities, when the consent and financial support of a large number of independent local governments are needed.

To generalize, a truly decentralized participatory system will tend to be highly responsive to the needs of the members in each participatory locality, but will tend to neglect inter-local, inter-regional and national needs, both of the allocative (e.g., social justice) type and those which are best served collectively (e.g., a priming of the economy).

Decentralization offers a significant basis for participation. It fosters a citizenry that is informed and in control, tending to make society and its governance more humane. Hence, it is not surprising that many attempts are made to explain, or to explain away, the drawbacks of decentralization. Some anarchists suggest that the values fostered by decentralization are of such high priority that its disadvantages are more than acceptable. Laissez-faire liberals say, as Kenneth Boulding has argued, that once we have a large number of small, competitive political units, the laws of free competition will operate so as to promote various "inter-unit" values without the need for an institutionalized "super-unit" (or national) mechanism.

Another "automatic" solution comes from the New Left; Berndt Rabehl has written, "How will the structure of the city look? It can be divided up into many, individual collectivities of three, four or five thousand men, who center themselves around a factory. Thereby the factory becomes not merely a work center, but a place offering all possibilities for the unfolding of life. Computers will be used to figure what has to be built, how the plans must look, what dangers may appear." This approach ignores moral and political questions, making all of the issues seem to be merely factual. In short, it may be said that what we seek for America is a system that is less centralized than the existing one, but not a system which is completely or even highly decentralized.

This brings up the question of the nature of our national system and what its decentralization would entail. As I see it, the formulation of military, foreign and space policy is centralized, especially those decisions which may involve life or death for millions in nuclear war. If there were a realistic way by which these decisions could be decentralized, the welfare of all of us would probably be enhanced. (Even here, however, there would be a hidden assumption: that people are good, at least peace-loving, while governments, ours at any rate, are evil and war-oriented. Possibly the increased participation of citizens in foreign-policy decisions would have the desired effect only when the citizens themselves were liberated from the effects of the centralized society. How we might survive the transition period is a problem almost as intractable as the original one of a decentralized power to declare war.)

For domestic policy, quite a different system seems to prevail in the contemporary United States; hence an approach quite different from decentralization may be required to make the governance of society in this area more participatory and humane. While the foreign-policy state is run chiefly from Washington by generals and bureaucrats in coalition with national power groups, the domestic state is largely fragmented and controlled locally from city halls, state capitals and "private governments" (such as universities and hospitals) in coalition with local power groups and with only spot interference from Washington. Thus, for example, it is empirically incorrect to assume that anyone in Washington has effective control over the educational system; decisions are made by fifty state Departments of Education, thousands of local school boards, and the trustees of 2,000 colleges and universities, with surprisingly little coordination. The same holds for police departments, health and welfare services, etc. Even the funds which come from Washington are spent largely according to local decisions. When national standards exist at all, they are frequently not effectively enforced; the HEW guidelines for desegregation are a case in point.

Domestic policy cannot be much more decentralized than it is now. And in considering whether or not to decentralize further, one must take into account that, by and large, the domestic services provided by the federal government—while highly bureaucratic, too-late too-little, slow to reflect innovations, and more slanted toward the middle class than the underclass—are more responsive to human needs, minority groups, etc., than those provided by most local authorities. Some, actually surprisingly few communities, are progressive but the administration of most cities and states (and, I suspect, of the remaining villages) is significantly inferior to that provided by federal agencies on all conceivable criteria. On the local level, power elites can gain their way more readily, nepotism and unvarnished corruption are more rampant, civil service standards are lower, the cost per unit of achievement is higher, and disregard for minorities is greater. It is the pull of national forces—both the organization of people on relief, and HEW—which increases the level of welfare payments, while most states seek to keep it down; the desegregation that has occurred is due largely to nation-wide efforts by such forces as the civil rights movement and the Department of Justice, and so forth. It is quite unclear, at least to me, why the sum of the parts of this country is less reactionary (when one reviews domestic programs) than most of the parts taken singly, but I am quite sure that it is so.

Those who favor decentralization, at least if they come from the Left, will say that they have in mind units smaller than states or cities. But even these units—South Boston or East Palo Alto—tend to be monopolized and corrupt in their governance. The reformers may say that they seek still smaller units, like the student communes, but these are at best a way of life for a very tiny minority. Moreover, they are too small to attend to most human needs, and the coordination of scores of such units to provide the needed services collectively is nearly impossible.

It is further said that local units can more easily be made participatory. This may be true for a few communities, mainly campus towns and select suburbs, but is not the case for most localities. On the contrary, it seems to me comparatively easier (though still far from easy) to gain participation in decisions made on the national level and to achieve the measure of transformation (e.g., untightening) of which this society is capable by joining into national social movements such as peace, civil rights, and now that of the students. By coordinated effort, scores of Congressmen can be influenced, the outcomes of elections affected, Washington (or the Pentagon) confronted, etc. All this does not yield an open, participatory society, but it does fuel more reforms and radicalization than most strictly local efforts (as distinct from local projects which are part of a national movement).

Furthermore, I hold, though this cannot be elaborated here, that from a psychological viewpoint, participation will have a restless, Sisyphean quality unless it is tied to causes beyond personal gratification. Without helping to liberate others, without helping to create the societal conditions for personal liberation—without macro-participation—there cannot be authentic micro-participation.

The main opportunities to broaden the participation of all citizens in domestic policies—and, to the degree that the national Establishment does not respond to this pressure, the radicalization of those not yet radicalized—lie in national social movements, usually combining a broad critical perspective with mobilization around a specific issue. To anchor this point further, I must digress briefly to indicate my views of the national power structure and of how it may be transformed. The American reality seems to me to stand somewhere between the vulgar conception of the power elite, which sees the control of society as monopolized by one well-coordinated group, and the conception of democratic pluralism, which sees the country taking its direction as the result of interaction among a large variety of autonomous "interest groups." There is, I think, a plurality of national actors, but they are far from being equal in power. In other words, there is a highly slanted pluralism, with the country's course being determined to a large extent, but not exclusively, by a not well coordinated group of powerful actors (e.g., the National Association of Manufacturers, the Armed Services), with a significant role being played—especially on the domestic front—by secondary groups (e.g., AFL-CIO) and, occasionally, by the least powerful groups, such as the farm workers.

To view the same structure dynamically, there is an option other than the four now most frequently discussed: disintegration or anarchy, revolutionary change, token ameliorations ("reforms"), or open authoritarianism following a right-wing backlash. The fifth alternative consists of significant and accumulative changes that result in a gradual although not necessarily slow transformation to a fundamentally different society.

The extent to which this option is realizable depends directly on whether or not change in the national power balance is possible. The more the least powerful groups become politically aware and mobilized for political action on the national level (as is gradually happening with the blacks), and the more they find partners in "secondary" groups which have some power but also have, or can find, an interest in societal transformation (e.g., students, middle-class ethnic minorities), the greater the chance that a fundamental transformation will take place. In short, national movements are an essential propellant for social change. And only after such transformation is accomplished can I foresee the conditions under which decentralization would lead not to greater oligarchization but rather to the local transformation of ecological units in the direction of broadened participation.

I deliberately focus here on power, mobilization for political action and national coordination—issues which to some members of the New Left seem rather old-fashioned as compared to "deeper" existential matters. The mere fact that these issues have been raised before does not automatically make them obsolete. And while I can see the appeal of the short cuts offered by the Theatre of the Absurd, the student communes, and even the social islands of the hippies, the integrated and spontaneous way of life cannot, as I see it, be sustained unless the national structures are first transformed. Moreover, whatever progress can be made locally, unless it is very microscopic (limited to a few pads or barns), depends on the moral and intellectual sustenance as well as the political protection of a national movement.

There seems to be one exception to this sociological iron law: participation in "private governments" of corporate units as distinct from ecological-residential ones. Universities, churches, hospitals and some places of work can be made more participatory without first transforming the national structures. Again, I am much more confident about the sociological observation than about the reasons. Perhaps this capacity to evolve autonomously in smaller units without first unlocking larger structures is due to the fact that forces of control and sanctioning, that is, the police, are more closely tied to ecological units and elites than to private governments. These governments seem reluctant to resort to such forces because a measure of corporate autonomy serves their interests, and they are afraid —as university faculties so obviously are—that once the government is regularly invited to deal with their rebels, it will stay to deal with them. The result is well illustrated by the relative reluctance of churches, universities and other private governments to call in the police, as compared with the cities of Boston, Detroit, Los Angeles, Oakland and Newark, and by the difficult time Congress has in finding ways to legislate about conduct in the action-space of these private units.

In short, on the domestic front (as distinct from military and foreign policy), little will be achieved by most forms of decentralization, because the system is already rather decentralized, and the local-ecological units are chiefly controlled by oligarchies which are tighter than the national domestic system. The greatest, although far from great, opportunities for mobilizing power toward transformation are on the national level, including unlocking the system for broader local participation. Participation in "private governments" is an exception so far, but it is not clear how long it will remain so; they, too, may become tied into municipal and state sanctioning systems to be controlled like local-ecological units.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Theatre of Interpretations

ERIC BENTLEY
Mr. Bentley's most recent book is What Is Theatre? And Other Reviews 1944-1967 (Atheneum). He has been a contributor to The Nation since 1943.

> There are no facts, there are only interpretations. —Nietzsche

Clearly the outstanding fact about "the theatre of fact" is that it is vehemently suspected of propagating non-fact, even lies. Rolf Hochhuth is, of course, the cause célèbre. Both his plays were based on factual propositions which most people utterly reject: in the one case that Pius XII acquiesced in attempted genocide, in the other that Churchill brought about the death of Gen. Wladyslaw Sikorski. A recent, still unproduced play by Conor Cruise O'Brien deals with an alleged crime that stands midway between these other alleged crimes of Pius and Churchill: O'Brien believes that Dag Hammarskjöld and Andrew Cordier, while they did not bring about the murder of Patrice Lumumba, were worse than acquiescent in it, since they could and should have prevented it but (according to Murderous Angels) deliberately and purposefully refrained from doing so.

Our most natural expectation of a documentary theatre is either that it translate the history books into stage terms or, dealing with very recent times, that it remind us of what we know we lived through. Actually, the playwrights, if dealing with earlier history, are revisionist and rebel historians of what the profession could only regard as an extreme sort. If dealing with recent years, they remind us of nothing, but charge that we never knew the truth and regarded Pius, Churchill, Hammarskjöld and Cordier as men who not only did not stand for murder but couldn't conceivably stand for it: not being that kind of person. The gist, then, is (a) that the history books are wrong and (b) that the men whom we idealists have most admired were not themselves idealists but at best ruthless realists, matching Hitler's crimes with their own (Churchill), at worst megalomaniacs (Hammarskjöld), schemers (Cordier) or organization men (Pius). Implicitly the plays call on us (a) to see history in terms quite other than those taught in the schools and (b) to repudiate the idols of the Establishment: the unusually holy Pope, the gallant spokesman for anti-Nazi heroism, the religious poet who raised high the banner of the United Nations. And why not? That was exactly where the action was in the 1960s, and the force of any type of historical drama resides in its topicality: it must quiver with the life, not of the era depicted but of the period of the performance.

The Deputy was successful. Which is not to say it was universally acceptable. This type of play will be unacceptable to those who are its target, but it can be held unsuccessful only if it misses the target, that is to say, if it can be shown to be mendacious or otherwise unsound. Marginal errors or dubieties will not wreck it. Central ones are another matter, and here Soldiers was in trouble. Hochhuth was unable to make even his best disposed readers and spectators share his belief that Churchill was guilty as charged. That Hochhuth tried to make the crime less incredible by arguing that it was tragically defensible only compounded his problem. For, with this, Soldiers just became confusing and confused. It is, indeed, one of those out-and-out failures which no ingenuity can redeem: for every device or idea to which the author has recourse only reveals itself as ingenuity—in the one lost cause. Seldom has so much intelligence produced such a stupid result. My only emotion upon seeing Soldiers was distress at the thought that the author of The Deputy could come to this. I suppose the case is instructive. The two plays are very obviously of the same authorship. The Deputy has some of the shortcomings of Soldiers, especially a Schillerian type of dialogue unrelieved, as in Schiller himself, by humor, but lacking Schiller's sheen and poetry. Soldiers has none of The Deputy's merits. Hochhuth's talent is for shared outrage. The material of The Deputy offered him a foothold, the material of Soldiers did not.

O'Brien's Murderous Angels stands midway between the two Hochhuth plays in yet another respect: its main accusation is more firmly grounded than that of Soldiers but less firmly so than that of The Deputy. I speak here, not for historians but for spectators. When we see The Deputy, whatever we may be unsure of, we are sure that Pius XII did stand idly by when he could at least have attempted to do something. When O'Brien urges the complicity of Hammarskjöld and Cordier we receive his presentation as an opinion, a sort of prosecutor's brief, and, however much we may be taken with its wit and thrust, which are considerable, we remain willing to listen to other reconstructions of the evidence.

The New Yorker has raised the question: what legal recourse have the villains of such plays? It seems that libel actions have been threatened in some cases. Faced with such threats, Lincoln Center changed the names of some characters in the Oppenheimer play (though not all of these were villains). And Cordier's name appears in Murderous Angels only in a single use of the nickname Andy. People can hardly be pleased to find themselves badly thought of by a playwright, but it would be a gross infringement of freedom of speech to prevent playwrights from thinking badly of people. Yet replacing one name with another is a transparent trick and I am surprised that most of the aggrieved have settled for it. Probably many in the future will not—a pilot involved in the crash that killed Sikorski is already suing Hochhuth in London. What seems to be needed is a loosening of the libel laws as they apply to theatre. What the journalist can say in an editorial or article —possibly even what Drew Pearson can say in a column—the playwright too must be permitted to say.

I am assuming that the best corrective for untruth on stage will not be litigation but criticism: that of the dramatic critic and that of playgoers in general. If what a playwright says is truly scandalous, the proper retort is in the scandal itself, as it is talked about and as it finds its way into print. By all means, let the admirers of Pius XII present their case. And if some argue that when mud is slung some of it always sticks, one has to reply that this consideration cannot justify a ban on mudslinging. That argument is not a universal truth, anyway. Much mud was slung at Joan of Arc (by churchmen, as it happens), but none of it has stuck.

The documentary play is a little trickier than it looks. That a play is documentary at all means that it surprises and probably appalls its audience with material of which it can and indeed must be said: "Yes, and this actually happened." Hence it was nothing less than cheating when a fictitious episode was inserted into an otherwise "factual" Pittsburgh Playhouse presentation of HUAC proceedings. People left the theatre thinking certain things had really happened which hadn't. That is how the theatre becomes an *un*educational institution.

In this country, the producers of In the Matter of J. Robert Oppenheimer stressed that the dialogue was spiced with fiction. For their aim was to forestall libel suits. In Europe, everyone had thought that "it was all true." And indeed one would have had to do a good deal of research to learn that Heinar Kipphardt, its author, gave a twist of his own to almost everything. Peter Weiss's Investigation kept pretty close to the printed records but was criticized for a certain kind of editing (the word "Jew," I believe, kept being replaced).

Would it be a solution to some of these problems if the dramatist did not add any words at all of his own? That he adopted such a course is stressed by Donald Freed in his play The United States vs. Julius and Ethel Rosenberg, produced this past season at the Cleveland Playhouse. "Every word you will hear or see on this stage is a documented quotation," he tells his audience. They could well ask what difference it makes, since the principle of selectivity leaves Freed with so many options still open. He has a picture in mind, and he picks the quotations that support it. Theatre of fact in a world where the facts are so many and so various leaves elbow room for some very large elbows. And selection is not all; there is also the little matter of ordering the material, both as to juxtaposition (montage) and cross reference. Cross reference is one form of repetition. There are other forms, the simplest of which—immediate simple repetition—can have a remarkable effect. Freed repeats anything that takes his fancy. "Un bel dì." The Battle Hymn of the Republic. Strong stuff that, repeated at crucial points of the evening. Freed has noticed that Joe McCarthy used to say, "I have here in my hand a list of . . ." giving various nouns and statistics at various times, so in the play he has McCarthy repeat the phrase half a dozen times without interruption. Now a single beat of a drum is one thing; repeat it a single time a little is added; repeat it a few times, however, and the phenomenon is quite different: repeat it many times and all hell has broken loose. This is the principle involved in repetition of words too; and can easily nullify the principle implied in "every word you will hear or see on this stage is a documented quotation."

What is the moral? That we can do without documentary drama altogether? That Mr. Freed should have presented his material with less manipulation? Or with more—introducing *un*documented material? Well, to begin with, it is a matter of indifference whether material is "documented" if one does not know the value of the documents concerned. Anything is documented that comes from a book, even a bad book. Next, the main question is not whether a speech is documented (in any sense) but whether the audience is on firm ground because it knows what it is getting. The fiction in The Deputy is acceptable because it is not taken for nonfiction: to get Hochhuth's message we don't have to believe that there was a Father Fontana who confronted the Pope. It follows that there is no special virtue in the plea that all such fictions have been eliminated, especially when we begin to realize how much artifice there can be in cutting, rearrangement, repetition, etc. But, in turn, a work in which every word is a quotation could be valid on other grounds, namely, the grounds on which we must judge all documentary drama, such as honesty and intelligibility. In the case of Freed, I have in effect argued that there is dishonesty (no doubt unconscious) in what is evidently claimed in the way of authenticity. Freed is also unintelligible in the sense that he does not really tell the story but takes for granted that we know it, or even that, having our hearts in the right place, we can guess it: so-and-so must be innocent, or so-and-so must be guilty, these things follow from correct ideology. All of which is a cop-out because this way the playwright evades his obligation to tell the story and create the participants. Instead, we see marionettes dangling on the string of our present discontents.

To tell the story and create the participants: am I right in assuming that these are things the playwright has to do? Peter Weiss has suggested, on the contrary, that it is permissible for the documentary playwright to "quote" characters rather than have to create them. He himself, for example, presenting the Lyndon Johnson Cabinet in his Vietnam Discourse, does not ask the actors to do clever, lifelike impersonations, let alone caricatures à la MacBird, but merely "cites" these people. Well, maybe. I have not seen Vietnam Discourse, but I hear from admirers of Peter Weiss that it is his least theatrical effort so far.

O'Brien is also in trouble—or at least has problems—in this department, as I have rather special reason to know. Herbert Berghof wanted me to direct Murderous Angels with himself as Hammarskjöld. I asked O'Brien, could it be more a play, especially in certain parts? Could Hammarskjöld be given scenes in which O'Brien's tragicomic sense of him would be more fully realized on stage? For it seemed that, while the author's view of Hammarskjöld was clearly stated, little was done to enable Berghof to walk on and be such a person. O'Brien in effect asked me to accept his stage figures as Weissian "citations." And I, for my part, would have been glad to attempt a sort of political spectacle, influenced by the Living Newspaper and Piscator, in which character is subordinated to documentation. News clips. The UN on TV, etc. I could even have done a little boasting about my use of "multimedia." But even had the rights remained available (and soon afterwards they were sold to the National Theatre in London), Berghof really did not wish to play a citation, he wished to play a man. Was he wrong?

In my book, The Theatre of Commitment (1967), I myself argued the case for certain political and polemical simplifications. These included a two-dimensional form of character—political caricature, if you will, but not necessarily comic—in which the playwright forgoes fuller characterization in order to channel outrage through an expressive stage figure. An example of such a figure is Hochhuth's Pius XII. It does not provide a rounded picture of the actual man. It does dramatize—or, if you prefer, theatricalize—what Hochhuth believes to be Pius' role in World War II. And I would have no complaint against Kipphardt's Oppenheimer or Freed's Rosenberg pair or O'Brien's Hammarskjöld if as much could be said of them. But, in all three instances, the theatregoer can only feel frustrated. The material exudes drama, and it should be remarked that none of the three plays could have trouble holding an audience (in this genre you can hold your audience without being much of a playwright). Yet in each play we long for scenes that never take place. Shouldn't Oppenheimer be confronted by Admiral Strauss? Hammarskjöld by Lumumba? If not, surely there should be some confrontation which brings action and character into dramatic focus.

Of course, our authors have alibis. These are documentary plays, and such confrontations could not be documented. Even so, when told what the Rosenbergs did not do (commit espionage), couldn't we, this being drama, be shown what they did do? The point applies equally to the Oppenheimer play. Oppenheimer is also shown as "not a spy." But what is he? What was he actually up to in Los Alamos and earlier? Here the author will cite another alibi. His play is based on the "trial" records, and so cannot show Oppenheimer before 1954. The Rosenberg play cannot show what their "record" doesn't indicate: namely, the life they did lead, the kind of people they actually were. But such alibis only raise the question whether the decision to be documentary in this way was a shrewd one. O'Brien, to do him credit, leans

THE RELEASE

When I walk through streets (in southern Europe mostly), narrow, crooked streets that look tired, worn like old women in black shawls;
when things inanimate, things built, things there for human touch and presences make me feel that they have suffered,
that even walls, roofs, trees bear a pain which needs to be relieved:
the feeling that deep sorrow resides in everything I look at makes me more alive.

Melancholy, sad,
but not unhappy.

What substance burns without a flame?
What human being gains in depth who has not wept in dreams?
What moment moves us more than when we realize another's sorrow as our own?
Ennobling pain must have its proper soil.

Wide, straight, new the streets I walk through now.
Somehow I must get at what they hide, must let their noise go by me like the planes too fast to spot, must listen, listen until I hear the silent sound of stones I live in
as a heavy sigh.

Only in the midst of pure suffering will I release my cry!

ARTHUR GREGOR

MOTHS AT THE WINDOW

Our aunt's teeth become a skeleton's.
Moths are at the window, jewels of horror and memory. Furniture is falling.
My relatives argue above the death bed.
They are like a child with long hair who holds a candle and smiles.
Hidden behind dust-brown wings,
you read it in her weary eyes.
It is Aunt Mary they snuff out.
Her grin surfaces with the bone.

WILLIAM HUNT

WORLDS OF DIFFERENT SIZES

I like to help small things survive:
red slugs drying on sidewalk deserts, birds against cats, cats against dogs, dogs against cars.

I like to help big things keep going:
old trees, three-story houses, mountains ore-men want to dig away.

And the invisible, the invisible, how it struggles for its life in big blind bones, in a small heart.

SANDRA McPHERSON

MUSIC IN MICHIGAN

The blind hear music from the darkened lakeside, voices from autos and they visualize the thin limbs of the water and of the swim suits.
In Vietnam her left arm burst from the shoulder, dark as burnt candlewick, it moved on the ground.
"I am too old now to understand why this occurred," she said. Too late, the moon drawn upon a string sets. Too late to see the young dance in Michigan.
The blind men rock in time to the shore waters.
Their fingertips grow out toward the water.
An animal's breath passes within their reach.
The moon was the memory of windows to which the children of the poor say prayers.
Whispering into its wings the owl simplifies the search for the lost arms of the living.

WILLIAM HUNT

MOUNT KEARSARGE

Great blue mountain! Ghost!
I look at you from the porch of the farmhouse where I watched you all summer as a boy. Steep sides, narrow flat patch on top—
you are clear to me like the memory of one day.
Blue. Blue.
The top of the mountain floats in haze.
I will not rock on this porch
when I am old. I turn my back on you, Kearsarge, I close
my eyes, and you rise inside me, blue ghost.

DONALD HALL

on no such alibis but argues in his preface for certain freedoms à la Hochhuth. (His whole play is a Deputy with a Protestant "Pope"—an interesting point, considering that he is of Catholic background, Hochhuth of Protestant background.) But Murderous Angels could be a better play—would be "more of a play"—if the author were freer, if he would let go, if he would let his Hammarskjöld come into being. In the plays of Kipphardt and Freed, certainly, one feels the absence, not only of full characterizations but also of any effective two-dimensional protagonists. The final paradox of their theatre of fact is that their protagonists are inflated with liberal legend and sentimentality.

Black Theatre in America

BLACK DRAMA: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre. By Loften Mitchell. Hawthorn Books. 248 pp. $5.95.

NEGRO PLAYWRIGHTS IN THE AMERICAN THEATRE 1925-1959. By Doris E. Abramson. Columbia University Press. 335 pp. $12.50. Paper $2.95.

NEW BLACK PLAYWRIGHTS. Edited and with an introduction by William Couch, Jr. Louisiana State University Press. 258 pp. $6.95.

ISAIAH SHEFFER

Mr. Sheffer teaches theatre arts at Columbia University. He produced and directed the DMZ Political Cabaret, and is drama critic for radio station WBAI in New York City.

These three books can serve as an excellent set of introductory readings on the subject of black theatre in America. Loften Mitchell's Black Drama: The Story of the American Negro in the Theatre should be read first. In an anecdotal and argumentative style it traces the history of black theatre in this country from the West Indian slave, Mungo, who appears as a clown in a 1769 comedy, The Padlock, to the blackface minstrel shows of the pre-Civil War era, the Harlem theatre movements of the 1920s, and the struggles and problems of the fifties and sixties on and off Broadway. It tells as much about actors, producers and audiences as it does about playwrights, which is why it is useful as a frame for the other two volumes.

Doris E. Abramson's book, though it repeats some of the history told by Loften Mitchell, is a more precise and scholarly examination of twenty plays written by Negro dramatists between 1925 and 1959 and produced on the New York professional stage. Despite its rather stiff, dissertation-style prose it is an absorbing study. The detailed discussion of each of these plays provides us with an otherwise unavailable acquaintance with such dramatists as Wallace Thurman, Theodore Ward and Alice Childress, as well as a deeper understanding of the work of such better-known Negro playwrights as Langston Hughes, Richard Wright and Lorraine Hansberry. Running through Miss Abramson's textual analyses are two themes: the growing dramaturgical skill and sophistication of black playwrights during the last four decades, and the ways in which these writers have chosen to concentrate on specifically Negro subjects and problems.

There is no lack of skill or sophistication in the plays collected by William Couch, Jr., in the anthology New Black Playwrights. This volume shows that there is no longer any need for critics writing in the white press to "make allowances," as they used to do a few years ago, for the sincere but crudely written Negro problem play. The best of these playwrights, Douglas Turner Ward (Happy Ending; Day of Absence) or Ed Bullins (Goin'a Buffalo) are accomplished craftsmen as well as talented theatre artists. This anthology makes it clear that there are black writers prominent in the ranks of those who are creating the theatre of today.

And what are these black dramatists writing about? With the possible exception of Adrienne Kennedy's poetic fragment, A Rat's Mass, every play in the Couch anthology deals in one way or another with the problems of the Negro in white America. Douglas Turner Ward's plays are brilliant comic fantasies about the Negro as servant. Bullins' Goin'a Buffalo is a harsh, powerful description of the lives of Los Angeles musicians, prostitutes and junkies. Lonne Elder's Ceremonies in Dark Old Men, an Off-Broadway hit this season produced by the Negro Ensemble Company, though not as good a play, I think, as the still unproduced Goin'a Buffalo, is a drama about a Harlem family. And the last play in the collection, William Wellington Mackey's Family Meeting, takes up the question of the Negro who has succeeded in making it into the middle class. Another current Off-Broadway success, not in this anthology, Charles Gordone's No Place

What is James A. Michener reading?

One of the books James Michener reads is our dictionary. The Random House College Dictionary. It has more definitions of words than any other college dictionary. More of today's new words, too. Maybe that's why Mr. Michener uses it. The Random House College Dictionary. $6.95. ($7.95 thumb indexed.)

If you want to read James Michener, his newest book is Presidential Lottery. It's an urgent book all about our electoral system. It tells why the system is inadequate and irrational for our time, and why, under certain circumstances, it could be a catastrophe.

The Random House Dictionary of the English Language/College Edition.

One of the books writers read.

To Be Somebody, is a philosophical soap opera involving a black café owner, the Mafia, a light-skinned Negro actor and assorted black and white café people.

Perhaps it's inevitable that for the black playwright there can be only one real theme: what it means to be black in America. Playwrights, after all, must write about what they truly know and what they feel is important. But one might ponder a statement from Richard Wright's White Man, Listen!, written in 1957, which Miss Abramson quotes in her book:

> If the expression of the American Negro should take a sharp turn towards strictly racial themes, then you will know by that token that we are suffering our old and ancient agonies at the hands of our white American neighbors. If, however, our expression broadens, assumes the common themes and burdens of literary expression which are the heritage of all men, then by that token you will know that a humane attitude prevails in America towards us.

Just in case we were in doubt, the black playwrights of today are letting us know that no such humane attitude yet prevails. The ancient agonies are still being suffered, and black theatre must still have as its first priority, if not its exclusive preoccupation, the reflection and expression of those agonies. What is unfortunate is that the rich talents of this generation of black playwrights are not yet free to approach a broader range of subjects, to assume those common themes and burdens which are the heritage of all of us. Telling it like it is is an important and inescapable task for black playwrights, but I would hope that the most talented of them can eventually do this, and more.

Not that telling it like it is has been simple or easy. All three of these books speak of the extraordinary and paradoxical difficulty encountered by the black dramatist in search of an audience. One aspect of this difficulty is described by Mr. Couch in the introduction to his anthology:

> The conclusion seems inescapable: plays about Negroes, especially plays that deal candidly with the harsher realities of the Negro's existence in America, are not attractive to the general theatre audience, and the bulk of the theatregoing audience is white.

Miss Abramson carries the diagnosis one step further:

> In order to make their plays acceptable to that [predominantly white] audience, the playwrights discover that they frequently have to distort the very truths they want to tell about Negro existence. It would seem, on the other hand, that they could "tell it like it is" to a Harlem audience. But there they are in the unenviable position of trying to present insights about Negro reality that may be rejected by those Negroes who wish either to be assimilated into white middle-class culture or to deny that culture totally. Simply stated, the Negro playwright's dilemma is that neither white nor black audiences can be counted on to support plays that attack or even question commonly accepted American mores.

The black playwright must grapple not only with the question of who his audience is but also with the problem of just how it might be possible to reach any one of his potential audiences in an effective way. The many varied answers range all the way from Ossie Davis' Purlie Victorious, a commercially unsuccessful attempt to present deep racial truths in the form of a Broadway entertainment, to plays like James Baldwin's Blues for Mr. Charlie and LeRoi Jones's Dutchman which demand that white viewers confront their own guilt, or to a work like Bullins' Goin'a Buffalo which seems intended in its story, its milieu, and above all in its language, to exclude white audiences altogether and to speak intensely only to an audience of hip black insiders.

But if the serious black dramatist finds it hard to know and reach his audience, so does his serious white counterpart. If black playwrights sense the increasing impossibility and irrelevance of the commercial theatre, so do white playwrights. If black writers experiment with new theatrical forms because they are desperately uncertain whether theatre as we know it is of any use at all in these unhealthy times, that desperation and that uncertainty are shared by all creative theatre people, black or white. What Miss Abramson describes as the Negro playwright's dilemma applies to playwrights of any color. The central problem faced by the black playwright is the same problem that must be faced by all theatre artists: entrapment in the rigidity and emptiness of what Peter Brook has so aptly labeled the Deadly Theatre, and the need to grope one's way toward a rediscovery of the essential theatrical experience.

(Advertisement)

Are You A Slow Reader?

A noted publisher in Chicago reports there is a simple technique of rapid reading which should enable you to increase your reading speed and yet retain much more. Most people do not realize how much they could increase their pleasure, success and income by reading faster and more accurately.

According to this publisher, many people, regardless of their present reading skill, can use this simple technique to improve their reading ability to a remarkable degree. Whether reading stories, books, technical matter, it becomes possible to read sentences at a glance and entire pages in seconds with this method.

To acquaint the readers of this publication with the easy-to-follow rules for developing rapid reading skill, the company has printed full details of its interesting self-training method in a new booklet, "How to Read Faster and Retain More," mailed free to anyone who requests it. No obligation. Simply enclose a dime to cover postage and handling. Send your name, address, and zip code to: Reading, 835 Diversey, Dept. 533-518, Chicago, Ill. 60614.

Order & Freedom

THE THIRD THEATRE. By Robert Brustein. Alfred A. Knopf. 294 pp. $6.95.

PUBLIC DOMAIN: Essays on the Theatre. By Richard Schechner. The Bobbs-Merrill Company. 244 pp. $6.95.

JULIUS NOVICK
Mr. Novick's Beyond Broadway: The Quest for Permanent Theatres (Hill & Wang) was based on a series of articles which appeared originally in The Nation.

Our theatre has begun to reflect our times, for better or for worse, in a startlingly vivid fashion. Partly this is because nowadays "our times" seem to provide so much more to reflect than they used to; whatever may be said about living in the late 1960s, it certainly is not dull. (Is it Brecht who somewhere invokes the mercy of God on those condemned to live in "interesting times"?)

What is making our times so interesting can be described as a tremendous shift in the balance between the conflicting claims of freedom and order. Every society—every individual—is fundamentally characterized by the way it—he—arbitrates these claims. Freud tells us that civilization is only purchased at the price of tremendous frustrations; today, increasing numbers of us are serving notice that we no longer consider certain frustrations necessary or desirable for the maintenance of civilization, and that we are no longer willing to bear them. Whatever backlashes, repressions and counterattacks may appear here and there, the shift is still, for the moment at least, most decisively and spectacularly in the direction of freedom.

An analogous shift has been taking place in the theatre. First the rules of old-fashioned dramatic construction were overthrown, then those of logic, progression, cause and effect; now the domination of the author in the theatrical collaboration, the demand that the actor impersonate a character rather than simply present himself, the barrier that separates the actor from the audience, and the taboos governing the presentation of sex in the theatre—all are being rejected by proponents of the "new theatre" as unnecessary, and therefore intolerable, restraints. These changes are both exciting, and dangerous; they are "liberating," but what is it that is being "liberated"? In the theatre too, these are "interesting times."

Since this process of "liberation" is still in mid-career, and nobody knows where and how it will end, we obviously cannot expect a complete account of it yet. These two new collections of articles, mostly about the theatre, by Robert Brustein and Richard Schechner, attempt to assess this portentous but ambiguous new development. Since both Brustein and Schechner are knowledgeable, intelligent, and deeply and personally involved with the theatre, and since in spite of certain striking parallels they reach opposite conclusions, the two books complement each other nicely.

Mr. Brustein does not by any means confine himself to the "new theatre," though much of what he has to say on other matters helps to provide a context for it. The Third Theatre, he writes in a brief preface, is offered > . . . as a collection of pieces written between 1957 and 1968—pieces that deal not only with theatre but also with literature, culture, and the movies—which I hope have sufficient relevance to be worth preserving in book form. The only unity I can find in the collection, aside from a unity of style, proceeds from my obvious reluctance to discuss works of art without some reflection on the civilization that gave them birth.

This "obvious reluctance" gives rise to the distinguishing feature of his work. Brustein can discuss dramaturgy or describe performances well enough, but it is the deep intensity of his concern with the relationship between the work of art and the world outside it, that makes his criticism so valuable.

Brustein has his deficiencies as a critic. His hatred of the commercial theatre (where, after all, good things do turn up every once in a while, if only by accident) seems to me excessive, if not obsessive; and this hatred appears to be a function of an unlikable (though not unjustifiable) contempt for the American people in general. His dislike of Broadway is also connected, I think, to a lack of appreciation for what is fanciful or frivolous. Brustein has wit, but I wonder about his sense of humor; he never seems to unbend. "How can one love the theatre," he asks, "unless it functions as the instrument of some higher purpose?" Millions can, and do, but Brustein does not understand them, and does not want to; he prefers to regard them as his enemies. He is the Savonarola of dramatic criticism.

Fortunately, he writes cogently even about what he doesn't like. And being Savonarola has some positive aspects. Mr. Brustein never loses sight of the theatre's "higher purpose"; he writes out of what George Bernard Shaw called "moral passion." But this quality in Brustein has such a keen cutting edge that it never loses itself in mere pieties, and he manages (sometimes narrowly) to keep himself this side of annoying self-righteousness.

What is this "higher purpose" to which Brustein is so devoted? He does not formally define it, but he does say that the "greatest power" of the stage, which in our time it has lost, is "the power to alter

ERIC BENTLEY

The following Eric Bentley albums are currently available:

BENTLEY ON BRECHT
music by Weill, Eisler, Wolpe, Dessau
Folkways (FH 5434)

BRECHT BEFORE THE UNAMERICAN COMMITTEE
a recording of the actual encounter of Brecht with the notorious Parnell Thomas Folkways (FD 5531)

SONGS OF HANNS EISLER
28 songs, mostly by Brecht, sung by Eric Bentley
Folkways (FH 5433)

THE EXCEPTION AND THE RULE
the original Off Broadway cast album of the whole play, music by Wolpe
Folkways (FH 5435)

A MAN'S A MAN
the original Off Broadway cast album with John Heffernan as Galy Gay Spoken Arts (SA 870)

THE ELEPHANT CALF
cast of the National Company with Logan Ramsey as Polly. Album also includes DEAR OLD DEMOCRACY by Eric Bentley and Arnold Black, Bentley as vocalist Asch (FL 9831)

BENTLEY ON BIERMANN.
Wolf Biermann's songs sung by Eric Bentley
Broadside (BRS 432)

Each album postage free from Pioneer Record Sales, 701 7th Avenue, New York City 10036 ($5.79 each); A MAN'S A MAN available from Spoken Arts, 59 Locust Ave., New Rochelle, N.Y.; all at record stores.

destinies, to affect man in a direct and meaningful way." Not a new idea, but not a bad ideal to take to the theatre with you. In other essays, he elaborates: "A serious play, in interpreting the lives of its characters, interprets the lives of the auditors, providing images that intensify awareness." Awareness of what? Brustein gives us a hint when he says, apropos of America, Hurrah!, that "the truest poetic function of the theatre" is "to invent metaphors which can poignantly suggest a nation's nightmares and afflictions."

The title of his book comes from an essay in which Brustein echoes the demand of John Millington Synge for a theatre that will combine "reality" and "joy." If "nightmares and afflictions" are our "reality," whence "joy"? This is a paradox, but it is a noble one (Brustein discusses it in an essay on Greek tragedy entitled "The Memory of Heroism")—and anyway the theatre is the home of paradox.

In this book, Brustein wastes little time on what he calls "the superficiality of Broadway show business," but he says that "the whey-faced solemnity of our serious theatre is a problem that needs some airing," and he provides this "airing" in his articles on Edward Albee (three), Arthur Miller (one), and the Repertory Theatre of Lincoln Center (five). Commercial productions have no reality, and conventional serious plays have no joy; but Brustein finds both qualities combined in the English repertory companies, to which he devotes several articles, and in the Berliner Ensemble. And—for a while—in an emerging "third theatre" at home:

> [an] underground expression now being developed in the cabarets, workshops, and studios—where all assumptions are questioned, all shibboleths rejected, all dogma destroyed. A theatre, in short, where reality and joy are once more being combined and drama is once again becoming superb, gay, and wild.

In his enthusiasm, I think Brustein overvalues Viet Rock, MacBird and America, Hurrah!, but he soon becomes convinced that the "third theatre" has gone terribly wrong. He bitterly attacks Tom O'Horgan's production of Futz, Richard Schechner's Dionysus in 69, and the returned Living Theatre (though he had been a staunch admirer of it in the past, and had helped arrange for its return). Brustein concludes that the "new theatre" > may spell as great a danger to dramatic art as the old theatre: it already embodies similar defects. Its anti-intellectualism, its sensationalism, its sexual obsessiveness, its massacre of language, its noisy attention-getting mechanisms, its indifference to artistry, craft, and skill, its violence, and, above all, its mindless tributes to Love and Togetherness (now in the form of "group gropes" and "love zaps") are not adversary demands upon the American character but rather the very qualities that have continually degraded us, the very qualities that have kept us laggard and Philistine in the theatre throughout the past three decades.

Like many of us, Brustein has been discovering, in these last two painful years, that democratic and humanistic values can be threatened by the Left as well as the Right, the young as well as the old. But though events have revealed the radical Brustein to be something of a conservative, his position has remained essentially constant: he is merely now applying to the avant-garde the same vigorous standards he has always applied to other segments of the theatre. The vigor and lucidity of his mind and style remain undiminished, and the value of his criticism is, if anything, increased.

Richard Schechner writes from inside the "new theatre." He is the producer and director of Dionysus in 69; he was for several years editor of TDR (formerly the Tulane Drama Review, now The Drama Review), which propagates the new dramatic theories and techniques; he proclaimed his solidarity with the Living Theatre by stripping in his seat at the Living's first performance in New York after its return from exile. Yet he does not write like a wild man; he writes, for the most part, like a professor. (He is, in fact, professor of Drama and Cinema at New York University. Brustein, of course, is Dean of the Yale School of Drama.)

Brustein's book consists mostly of reviews, short pieces that take their starting point from one or more specific productions. There are no reviews in Public Domain, Schechner's book. Its twelve essays (reprinted from TDR and other publications) include a group of notes on the influence and implications of Stanislavski, a consideration of the malaise of the resident professional theatres (a question also touched on by Brustein), critical articles on The Bacchae and Waiting for Godot, a piece on Megan Terry (a playwright who evolves her plays in collaboration with the actors of the Open Theatre), a discussion of "Pornography and the New Expression," a description of some happenings Schechner put on, and five earnest and scholarly considerations of the fundamentals of the theatre. Some of it is pretty tough going. But Schechner makes it clear, as no one else has, that there is more to the boundary-breaking new theatre than self-indulgence, exhibitionism and arrogance.

Both Schechner and Brustein are full of loathing for the manifold corruptions of American life: both see the theatre as a counterforce against these corruptions. But Brustein has lately set his face against what he considers the excesses of current radicalism. Schechner, on the other hand, says, "I don't leave the revolution to others but stake a modest claim in it—a claim for the theatre, for myself."

Analogously, whereas Brustein attacks the new theatre for depriving the playwright of his proper primacy, Schechner denies the basic assumption that the theatre is primarily an institution for putting on plays: "Theatre is an art of permeation and exchange. Its boundaries are ill-defined and far-extended. It includes demonstrations, political rallies, religious festivals, celebrations of daily life."

In the final essay in Public Domain, Schechner writes:

> It is becoming increasingly clear that our Western avant-garde is, in world perspective, nothing other than a return to the most traditional theatre. In fact, the Western theatre—from Aeschylus to Ionesco—is not the major theatrical tradition but a very important offshoot—a specialized development of certain aspects of world theatre. We have emphasized story and character at the expense of dance, spectacle, ritual, and communal celebration. . . . We have also come to value the written text as an artwork in its own right . . . but in most cultures the text does not exist except as part of the performance. . . . The difference between art as we know it in the West and theatre as it has traditionally shown itself world-wide is that Western art is individualized while traditional theatre is communal. In its communal forms, theatre is both socially constructive and personally "transcendent" or ecstatic.

Schechner preaches—in greater detail, with more qualifications, side lights and insights than I have space to convey—a return to this nonliterary, communal, socially constructive yet ecstatic theatre. He is too wise not to be afraid of the danger of "ecstatic fascism"—oddly enough, both he and Brustein invoke the image of Hitler's Nuremberg rallies—but he is too committed to turn back in revulsion, as Brustein has done. History will vindicate whom it pleases. For the present, as the chorus says in Sophocles' Antigone, "There's much/Of substance in the arguments on both sides."

Notice to Subscribers

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

VOICES OF OUR TIMES

an unprecedented selection of spoken records now available to Nation readers.

42. DON JUAN IN HELL (Shaw)
First Drama Quartet — Charles Laughton, Agnes Moorehead, Charles Boyer, Sir Cedric Hardwicke —2 LP's $11.90

228. OLD GLORY
Benito Cereno—Robert Lowell—Original Cast 2 LP's 9.95

252. TEVYA & HIS DAUGHTERS (After Aleichem)
"Fiddler on the Roof" is based on this. 4.98

278. ALEICHEM
An Evening of Stories read in English by Howard Da Silva 4.98

305. JOHN BEECHER
"To Live & Die in Dixie" other poems, read by the author. 5.95

308. BENTLEY ON BRECHT
Songs & Poems 5.95

326. BLACK PIONEERS IN AMERICAN HISTORY, Vol. 1
Nat Love, Charlotte Forten, Frederick Douglass, Susan King Taylor 4.98

399. JUSTICE WM. O. DOUGLAS Interview 4.95

403. W. E. B. DUBOIS
Moses Asch interviews the founder of NAACP 5.95

407. ABBA EBAN.
U.N. Speeches on Middle East Crisis 3 LP's. 17.85

421. LAWRENCE FERLINGHETTI
Poems 4.98

433. SIR JOHN GIELGUD
Ages of Man. Readings from Shakespeare. 5.95

435. ALLEN GINSBERG
"Howl" and other poems, read by the author. 4.98

444. GREAT AMERICAN SPEECHES
Patrick Henry to Wiliam Jennings Bryan. Spoken by Melvyn Douglas, Vincent Price, Ed Begley, Carl Sandburg—2 LP's 11.90

452. TYRONE GUTHRIE
Directing ■ Play 5.95

465. ERNEST HEMINGWAY
Reads Own Works (poems, Nobel acceptance speech) 5.95

479. LANGSTON HUGHES
Best of Simple. 5.95

589. NEGRO POETS
Anthology. 20th Century Poets read their works. 5.95

618. IN THE CELLAR
Ferlinghetti & Rexroth read with jazz in San Francisco 4.98

15. BERTRAND RUSSELL
Speaking on Life, Love, War, etc, 5.95

641. RUSSIAN READING
Moscow Theatre (in Russian) 4.98

646. A LINCOLN ALBUM
Carl Sandburg reads from his famous biography — 2 LP's 11.90

754. YEVTUSHENKO & VOZNESENSKY
Poems read in Russian by the authors (bi-lingual text enclosed) 4.98

834. BEYOND THE FRINGE
Peter Cook, Dudley Moore, Jonathan Miller, Alan Bennett 5.98

840. PINS & NEEDLES
Barbra Streisand & Original Cast 5.95

16. BERNARD SHAW
Some of his BBC Broadcasts 4.98

7. F. D. R. SPEAKS
A Panorama of the 30's & 40's, forwarded by Eleanor Roosevelt, edited and booklet by Henry Steel Commager—6 LP's & Booklet. 7.95

101. THE BESTIARY OF FLANDERS & SWANN
Satirical animal songs 5.98

295. STAN FREBERG'S UNITED STATES OF AMERICA
An Irreverent History Lesson 5.98

661. TOM LEHRER — "That Was the Year That Was"
(Smut, Pollution, Vatican Rag) 4.98

876. PETER USTINOV "Grand Prix of Gibraltar"
A spoof on sports car racing 5.95

57. BEHIND THE LINES IN VIETNAM
Harrison Salisbury, Asst. Ed. New York Times 4.98

61. BERTOLT BRECHT
Before the Committee on Un-American Activities 5.95

8. I CAN HEAR IT NOW
(Pre-War Broadcasts)
Vol. 1 (1919-1932) Wilson, Hoover, Ted Husing, Tunney, etc. 5.95
Vol. 2 (1933-1945) Will Rogers, La Guardia, Wilkie, etc. 5.95
Vol. 3 (1945-1949) Elmer Davis, Nuremburg Trial, Lillienthal, Nehru 5.95
3-Record Set 11.90

11. REV. DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING
In Search of Freedom 4.98

12. SOUND OF DISSENT
Protest Movements of the 60's, Voices of Eartha Kitt, Dr. Ralph Abernathy, George Wallace, Senator Eugene McCarthy, Martin Luther King, Stokely Carmichael, Al Capp, Hubert Humphrey, James Farmer, Senator Robert Kennedy and others. 4.98

116. UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES COMMITTEE
Excerpts from the San Francisco Hearings, May, 1960. 4.98

121. WAR OF THE WORLDS
Orson Welles' Famous Radio Broadcast of 1939. 4.98

412. T. S. ELIOT
Reads Own Works 5.98

537. ROBERT LOWELL
Reads Own Works 5.98

36. LENNY BRUCE
Interviews of Our Time (satire) 4.98

94. ART BUCHWALD
Sex and The College Boy 4.98

34. INVESTIGATOR
CBC Spoof on Joe McCarthy 5.95

78. HUMAN RIGHTS
Eleanor Roosevelt speaks 5.95

17. MAO TSE-TUNG
Quotations from the Chairman, read by 4.98

10. SPANISH CIVIL WAR SONGS
2 Vols., available singly Each 5.95

VOICES OF OUR TIMES (The Nation)
333 Avenue of the Americas
New York, N. Y. 10014
N869

Please send the records whose numbers I have circled below.

42	228	252	278	305	308	326	399	403
407	421	433	435	444	452	465	479	589
618	15	641	646	754	834	840	16	7
101	295	661	876	57	61	8	11	12
116	121	412	537	36	94	34	78	17
10

I enclose $..... plus 25c postage and handling.

Name .....

Address .....

City ..... State .....

Zip Code .....

Closet Openings

PROMETHEUS BOUND. By Robert Lowell. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 67 pp. $5.95.

THE DUKE OF PALERMO AND OTHER PLAYS. By Edmund Wilson. Farrar, Straus & Giroux. 250 pp. $6.95.

THERE'S A LITTLE AMBIGUITY OVER THERE AMONG THE BLUEBELLS AND OTHER THEATER POEMS. By Ruth Krauss. Something Else Press. $3.95.

ALBERT BERMEL

Mr. Bermel, playwright and translator, teaches in Columbia University's School of the Arts. His forthcoming book on modern theatre will be published by Knopf.

The striving in today's playhouses to reach the spectator where he thinks and feels and has his shaky inmost being comes out of a suspicion on the part of theatre people that they have lost touch with their public, that their art has grown impersonal. You can see it, that self-doubt, pouring out of the eyes of a young actress as she tries to shame the hell out of strangers and yet enlist them. Ritual, involvement, the religious origins of theatre, the touting of love-thine-everybody—all that quackery is, in its desperate way, an apology. Most of the time a performance does not amount to the shared experience that the cast (and audience) would like it to be. And so old men in row A get kissed on the nose, a society type has her mink fingered and solemnly fields questions about her sex life, while a guy who stands up to go home is asked what he is doing about the war, school integration, and the perfidies of Nixon.

Now and then one hears that a few actors are getting together in a living room to "explore" a script. I recommend such an occasion to interloping theatre lovers. It makes a change from the musty stuff that passes for theatre these days. Even when the script is of doubtful quality this sort of evening, I promise, will prove more rewarding than Broadway, Off- and Off-Off-Broadway, the upstairs show places in culture centers, and their lavish experimental basements. It will also make the old squabbles over whether the theatre is predominantly social or aesthetic, literary or dramatic, look fruitless. Private theatre is due for a revival. If the revival does come about, and if it kills off what we call professional theatre, so much the better.

Staged readings (frequently puffed as "concert readings") are a modern form of closet theatre. They usually arise from the playwright's practice of introducing a new work to his friends, that is, his enemies. Sometimes they are elaborately set up, with costumes, great washes of lighting, and a bulky audience in attendance. But they do most for the play, it seems to me, when they are modestly conceived and the actors take on multiple roles, and when the script itself is of a kind that has to be listened to, not bathed in. They may even surprise their sponsors by grabbing an audience more tenaciously than a slap-up production would do. By luck, three prime candidates for a new closet theatre have recently appeared. Can this portend a revival, a trend, an avalanche?

Robert Lowell's Prometheus Bound, "derived from Aeschylus," is colored, as we would expect, by a sumptuous and stately lyricism. But it also incorporates moments of violent rhetoric. The staging at Yale two years ago did not let the rhetoric speak for itself. The eloquence of Kenneth Haigh and Irene Worth could not find its way past the distractions of a domineering set and several samples of pulpy and otherwise obstructive acting. A staged reading might have served the text more respectfully and dramatically by letting it be taken in.

Mr. Lowell observes in an author's note that Prometheus is the most undramatic of Greek tragedies: "One man, a sort of demi-god at that, chained to a rock, orated to, and orating at a sequence of embodied apparitions." He does himself and Aeschylus an injustice. The "embodied apparitions" of Ocean and his daughters, Io, Hermes and the rest, are tempters. They will not succeed in bringing the Titan to a reconciliation with his tormentor, Zeus; he is resolved to be defiant, to find himself in defiance. But they do tempt the audience. The play is about the plight of a passionate thinker who, as the poet beautifully says, "is fighting necessity, what is." The tempters, representing this necessity, play on the susceptibilities of the spectators; they tempt them to see that defiance is folly, that Prometheus is not a creature to be sympathized with, that his defiance earns him his punishment.

Lowell has cut some material from Aeschylus' play, such as the story of the daughters of Danaus (dealt with at length in The Suppliants) and the suggestion that Chiron, when he is dying, may take Prometheus' place on the rock. He has revised the minor characters by satirizing them in places so that they become easy to laugh at but hard to be tempted by.

As compensation, he adds the seduction by Zeus of Io in her father's meadow, a sluggish, ugly, bovine coupling; and he cleverly embellishes Io's adventures and the foreseeing of her death. He also puts in some angry lines about fire as the coming order, the last destroyer. Best of all, he alights, as no earlier translator does, on the play's peak of despair and the reason for Io's importance: that her fate (while pregnant, she must keep fleeing across the face of the earth from a cloud of gadflies) is preferable to the fate of Prometheus in his chosen immobility; a voice in the chorus says to him, "We would rather be stung by Io's flies than by your thoughts."

An honest reading, having nothing at stake but the play itself, would almost inevitably distribute its weight more accurately than Jonathan Miller's staging did at Yale, where it became heavy centered and virtually died after Io's exit. In the text Lowell lets the action quicken and grow organically into the final temptation by Hermes, which is its most suspenseful scene.

Of Edmund Wilson's new plays a theatre pro might knowingly say that they wouldn't "work" or "go." It is true that Mr. Wilson is not a playwright who steers by any fashion. But he has a mind, and the mind has nice edges and these shine through his dialogue. Osbert's Career makes me think yearningly of what Evelyn Waugh might have pulled off for the theatre. It has porcelain people (who really break like the ones in The Wizard of Oz), glass houses, farcical dips and bends that are all—but all—funny, and a victimized, drastically unpitiable hero who is an American cousin to Paul Pennyfeather and Tony Last.

The Duke of Palermo is a "lamentable tragedy"—the word lamentable gives the game away—which spoofs academic criticism. It incorporates a fake-Jacobean revenge tragedy dressed up in alliterative flounces and little else, and it rejuvenates such lusty Elizabethanisms as mazzard, dizzard, cates, orts, crackhalters, and trugging-houses. Homer Winslow, the principal figure, has ideas and impulses rather than emotions. Recalling his dead wife, he doesn't so much grieve for her as quote Webster to himself, omitting the last word of Ferdinand's famous line when the phone summons him.

It may be that only a gathering of scholars will appreciate the light but systematic caning that Mr. Wilson administers here, but they will all, naturally, believe it intended for their colleagues. The Duke of Palermo is the very latest teaching aid, and ought to be concert-read by graduate students as the culminating class of every course in criticism.

As the title of the theatre poems by Ruth Krauss implies, they could get cutesy, kidsy and sudsy—a lot of bluebells to pay for that little ration of ambiguity. Yet a Harpo-like insolence informs most of these pieces and sometimes turns downright diabolical. Miss Krauss is part carefree surrealist, part sober vaudevillienne, part city pantheist. She specializes in one- and two-liners, even in her longer poems. "If Only" or "This Breast," every line of which starts with the same words. Her good images are very good and the feeble images do not cancel them out.

Included in the book are some ideas for staging the first sentence of There's a Little Ambiguity ("ONE: What a poet wants is a lake in the middle of his sentence [A lake appears]"). Elsewhere (in Michael Benedikt's Theatre Experiment, published by Anchor Books) there are five different staged versions of "A Beautiful Day": "GIRL: What a beautiful day! (THE SUN falls down onto the stage)." These versions tend to be reductive—an orange balloon for the sun, a slide of Lake Tahoe projected sideways for the lake—or else to compromise the probabilities and improbabilities in Miss Krauss's cunning words. The headiness is all. A straight reading of the stage directions by an actor would put the enactment where it belongs, in the spectator's imagination.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

The "in" show at this year's Holland Festival was clearly Reconstruction, a "morality" in the form (more or less) of an opera, authored by a committee made up of librettists Hugo Claus and Harry Mulisch, composers Louis Andriessen, Reinhart de Leeuw, Misha Mengelberg, Peter Schat and Jan van Vlijmen. By comparison with the staid and dressy audiences that filled Amsterdam's elegant Stadsschouwburg for an appropriately elegant production of Mozart's Così fan tutte, the crowd in the utilitarian arena of the Theater Carré was conspicuously well balanced on both sides of the generation gap, and its response indicated that there was something to please everybody in Reconstruction.

The most prominent plot elements were the rise and decline of a group of ludicrously overdrawn American capitalists, mixed in with the legends of Don Juan (with particular reference to Mozart's setting thereof) and Che Guevara. An immense statue of the latter was built during the course of the performance and eventually came to represent the Stone Guest that is Don Juan's (read Imperialism's) nemesis; the occasionally suspenseful mechanics of statue-assembly provided one level of diversion from the sometimes murky goings-on elsewhere. (I should qualify this last remark by observing that my command of the Dutch language is spotty at best; at any rate the anti-American tone of the whole was anything but subtle, at times tiresomely childish.) Subsidiary characters included the god Quetzalcoatl, Desiderius Erasmus (standing in for Leporello!), Tarzan, Martin Bormann, Cuba (in the person of a girl who appeared in three different costumes, the second one designed by Nature), and the inevitable CIA agent.

Similarly eclectic was the musical setting, which encompassed complex if conventional multi-orchestra textures, Mozartian pastiche, some rather monotonously flashy tape music (for Quetzalcoatl), a nursery-rhyme alphabet song based on the "Ho, Ho, Ho Chi Minh" rhythm, and a couple of bouncy Pop songs, all of it remarkably well coordinated in performance by the five composer-conductors (as far as I could tell from a cursory examination of the score, they did not rely on chance to do their work for them). In fact, the most impressive aspect of Reconstruction was the smoothness with which the whole enormously elaborate machinery worked: staging, multiple orchestras and choruses, electronic apparatus, and lighting. It was all as well organized as a Ringling Brothers Circus, and made its appeal, I fear, on much the same level despite its greater pretensions—which, in turn, undermined the occasional flashes of wit and detracted from the sense of timing and proportion necessary in a successful ad hoc popular entertainment, as well as an enduring work of musical theatre.

The aforementioned production of Mozart's Così, by the Holland Festival Opera, was certainly sufficient reminder of what refinements of timing and proportion have been reached in musical theatre. To a listener whose experience of this opera on stage has been limited to the old Metropolitan Opera House, the 1,000-seat Stadsschouwburg was a rare treat, obviating the gross overplaying on stage and the inflated, distorted orchestral balances that too frequently disfigure Mozart operas in New York. A good Mozart performance in virtually any European theatre is bound to be a revelation in these respects: the Holland Così also offered exceptionally stylish playing by the Netherlands Chamber Orchestra under Alexander Gibson, satisfactory decor (in the now standard post-Rolf Gérard latticework style) by Harry Wich, and well-conceived direction by Vlado Habunek, whose particular success was his exploitation of the brisk, slightly angular charm of Julia Hamari (Dorabella) to offset the obviously intractable placidity of Margherita Rinaldi (Fiordiligi). Like nearly all opera directors dealing with comedy in a language foreign to the audience, Habunek succumbed to the temptation of a few "sock-it-to-'em" visual gags, but in general he worked with rather than against the music.

The same could not be said for John Copley's staging of Gluck's Orfeo ed Euridice (the Vienna version, edited by Charles Mackerras) at Covent Garden, where the incessant articulations of visual motion played havoc with the extreme regularity of Gluck's musical progression. (If Orfeo must be staged choreographically, I should like to see the problem put in Balanchine's hands, for his sense of musical form would avoid this kind of excess.) Fortunately, one could close one's eyes and listen to the musical performance under Georg Solti, who not only never let the piece go slack but never pressed forward too hard—a considerable achievement, which would not perhaps have been expected from the Solti of ten or fifteen years ago. (A recording of Orfeo was made by Decca-London during the weeks of Covent Garden performances, although with a slightly more stellar cast.)

Also at Covent Garden I heard a competent performance of Verdi's Macbeth, marred by the really distressing performance of Elena Suliotis who will also be singing the role of Lady Macbeth in New York this fall. Although only in her mid-20s, Miss Suliotis sounds like a singer past her prime, unable to deal securely with technical problems of more than the slightest difficulty. If the opera managers and recording entrepreneurs who have been exploiting her undoubted natural gifts (a strong, wide-ranging voice and a marked, if undirected, dramatic temperament) want Miss Suliotis to continue drawing audiences for the normal span of a career, they would do well to pool their funds and send her on a sabbatical to some good teacher, for even the vastly uncritical opera public has some limits of tolerance, and there are few examples in history of voices surviving this kind of mistreatment.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

In the first half of the 19th century British and American painters endeavored to make landscapes as expressive as the participatory backgrounds of James Fenimore Cooper and Charles Dickens. The effort was linked to the deterioration of history painting (figure paintings with religious, classical or historical subjects) which dried up before an audience uninstructed in its iconography. Landscape painting, it was hoped, would bring the big modern audience into touch with the traditional verities, inasmuch as everybody recognized landscapes. The problem was to use scenery morally. In England J. W. M. Turner and John Martin are the central artists, and in America it is Thomas Cole. Cole's student, Frederick E. Church, was the subject of an exhibition at the Smithsonian Institution three years ago, but now Cole himself can be seen in detail at the Whitney Museum (until September 1).

Cole, born in England in 1801, came to America at the age of 17 and lived here until his death in 1848, with two long visits to Europe (not just to England) in 1829-33 and 1841-42. In the 1820s he painted much in the Catskills and inserted into native scenery such subjects as "Scene from 'The Last of the Mohicans,'" "Gelyna" (redcoat pathos), and "Daniel Boone and his Cabin at Great Osage Lake." In the '30s he painted European sites, at Tivoli and elsewhere, as well as his allegorical series, "The Course of Empire" and "The Voyage of Life," both of them four-step moral landscapes. In the forties he did scenes of the Roman Campagna, as well as continuing with American subjects, in some of which his customary grandeur was softened to a Biedermeier charm, as in "The Pic-Nic" and "Home in the Woods."

One of Cole's first attempts at eloquent landscape is "The Expulsion from the Garden of Eden," a multi-layered panorama. It contains a view back into the lost Garden, blurred by mountain radiance; beams of symbolic light shoot like ray guns from a source hidden within Eden's rocky gate; and a volcano flashes pinkly on the post-Lapserian horizon. Each of the three light-sources becomes a moral zone in the picture: nostalgic, punitive and ominous. When the picture was shown in 1828 its derivation from John Martin was noted. Cole, like Martin, wanted to reach a large public and to do so by means of the moralizing landscape; one effect on painting of working for a popular audience has not been much discussed but is worth stressing.

Instead of textural variation and organic reminiscences as in traditional oil paint, Cole's facture has an inert solidity which turns impasto into metallic scabs. The dry hard paint looks as if zinc were the medium. This property comes, I think, from the influence of engraving techniques, in which Cole was trained in England and with which he supported himself at first in America. Something similar can be observed of Martin who was apprenticed as a glass painter and never mastered the flow and sensuousness of oil paint. Everything in his Miltonic panoramas is set down in tight contours and opaque colors. His craft training was reinforced by the fact that his paintings were intended for reproduction as mezzotints (as were many of Turner's drawings), and it was the prints that Cole knew. John Ruskin went out of his way in the first book of Modern Painters to deplore Martin's inability to paint water properly. Ruskin's criticism is that Martin freezes the water, turning it into a bizarre geology by his rigid touch, thus getting natural textures mixed.

The existence of the print market, which grew to prodigious size in the 19th century, turned painters like Martin and Cole away from soft, sensuous handling toward a hard, animated surface. Since the paintings of moralized landscape existed as the sources of engravings, or parallel to the ubiquitous print market, such a mineralization of paint, which is what it looks like, is not out of place. In fact, paint used with a mineral density, though uncouth at first sight, supports in Cole a marvelous array of local colors and moody atmospheric effects.

Cole was, as his alternation between old and new world suggests, in a good position to compare the landscapes of both. He loved the mountains, water and forests of America and apropos of the latter wrote: "one season when the American forest surpasses all the world in gorgeousness—that is the autumnal." The notion that fall is the painter's season is an 18th-century picturesque one, but after all Cole was right and he goes on to describe the colors with an intensity that belongs only to his century. The colors "run from the liveliest green to deepest purple—from the most golden yellow to the intensest crimson" (my italics). This relish of souped-up color was typical of the period and had the public advantage of being competitive in attracting attention in group shows (the only kind there were then).

Cole's art combined classical and anti-classical ideas. When he wrote in his notes (published in The American Art Journal, Spring, 1969) that "true imitation selects from the world around us the characteristic, the sublime and the beautiful," he is being as torpidly traditional as Cézanne was when he recommended the reduction of nature to cone, cylinder and sphere. Both notions are clichés of classicism. On the other hand, Cole's immigration to America brought him to a place that was both pre-European and of the future. His was a fully experienced, not an exotic, primitivism. This is what he said about America as wilderness: "the most distinctive, and perhaps the most impressive, characteristic of American scenery is its wildness. It is the most distinctive, because in civilized Europe, the primitive features of scenery have long since been destroyed or modified."

Howard S. Merritt, who arranged the exhibition, quotes in his catalogue a fascinating passage from Alexis de Tocqueville's Democracy in America: "It's this idea of destruction, this conception of near and inevitable change which gives in our opinion so original a character and so touching a beauty to the solitudes of America. One sees them with melancholy pleasure. One hastens to admire them." Mr. Merritt does not quote Cole's own words but the artist agreed with Tocqueville. "American associations are not so much of the past as of the present and future. . . . Yet I cannot but express my sorrow that the beauty of such landscapes is quickly passing away—the ravages of the axe are daily increasing."

The elegiac sentiment, which in earlier moralizing landscapes was triggered by the classical or medieval past, is inverted. Even as he celebrated American wildness, fears of its impending loss turned Cole into a painter of anticipatory nostalgia.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 8-25-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $6
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

Crossword Puzzle No. 1309

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 How some linesmen are charged an added levy, as a duty we probably never see. (11,3)
9 Falls like a grape. (7)
10 8, only more so! (7)
11 Sits in an awkward position with 10, singularly. (6)
12 Perhaps work the head of 27. (8)
14 Double. (7)
15 How the military might take steps to create a frontier? (5)
17 Fabric that is perhaps wound. (5)
19 Marked ownership. (7)
21 The awkward sort, read with an accompanying rumble, perhaps. (8)
23 Would it take two 16, over and over, if in flight? (6)
25 One from Rio—at least his heart is filled with it! (7)
26 and 21 down You couldn't call this cliché a poor example, though as a class not actively engaged. (3,4,4)
27 Perhaps the credo of a nudist might be useful for those who have dirty linen to hide. (7,7)

DOWN

1 Getting ready for delivery, or finishing? (7,2)
2 Mercury might make one such as the engineer might use. (7)
3 Obviously leaves the southwest sector, possibly with some passing remarks. (9)
4 Incline to being other than 21 down. (4)
5 Separate. (10)
6 With more spirit, one might bet! (5)
7 In the form of something with a rosy association for children, if thereabouts. (7)
8 Invites, like the biggest men on the board. (4)
13 Hurried and sat down to dinner, as many young couples do. (6,4)
15 A bad place for horse-trading, reputedly. (9)
16 Typified by B to C, about 15-18 inches long. (4,5)
18 Reputedly it takes two to get something formerly used with a crossbow. (7)
20 Lesson, by the sound of it. (7)
21 See 26 across
22 Deviation from the normal pastime. (5)
24 Some people chase things to do it. (4)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1308

ACROSS: 1 Stock exchange; 10 Connive; 11 Shelled; 12 Mannerism; 13 Inapt; 14 Lichen; 16 Invoking; 19 Dinghies; 20 Reveal; 22 Havoc; 23 Trump card; 25 Forbear; 26 Escorts; 27 Class reunions. DOWN: 2 Tenon; 3 Chinese checkers; 4 Eyelid; 5 Casement; 6 Amerigo Vespucci; 7 Galvanize; 8 Scumbled; 9 Adit; 15 Canaveral; 17 Gold dust; 18 Letterer; 21 Bureau; 22 Huff; 24 Apron.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE — requires protein containing lysine. Make contraceptives free everywhere. Grand Central Sta. 4069, New York City.

"CAUTION: WAR MAY BE HAZARDOUS TO YOUR HEALTH" bumperstrip, 2/$1.00; 6/$2.50. Wry Idea, Rye, N.Y. 10580.

EDUCATIONAL

SUMMERHILL CAMP AND SCHOOL. Freedom with responsibility learning because it's exciting, not compulsory. Summer program: reading, math, nature, swimming, riding, camping, art, music, drama, group discussions. OPEN COMMUNITY SCHOOL, Box 5N, Claverack, N.Y. 12513.

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

PUBLICATIONS

THE BUST BOOK. One of the most important books published this year. $1.00 postpaid. Century Book Shop, 434 East High, Lexington, Kentucky 40508.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

The Free World?

An amazing aspect of the myth of the "Free World" is that this myth has persisted so long. Clothed in the rhetoric of anti-communism, the U.S. State Department has kept the world safe for exploitation—or at least tried to—from Greece to Vietnam.

But indignation is not enough. Those opposed to U.S. foreign policy must arm themselves with information.

THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS, by David Horowitz, provides that information. It is more than a critique of American foreign policy in the cold war. It is a history.

Horowitz explodes the American myth of preserving freedom and containing communism by answering crucial questions. How did the cold war begin? What has been the U.S. role around the world: in Greece, Korea, Cuba, Vietnam? What is the reality of the "Communist menace"? What has been the impact of "the bomb" on the cold war?

If you've been looking for a factual account of U.S. foreign policy since the Second World War, you will want THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS. Subscribe now to The NATION, and we will send you this valuable history free.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me free THE FREE WORLD COLOSSUS by David Horowitz.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign.)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

(N 8-25)

ISOLATIONISM REVISITED

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 1, 1969 35 cents

S-7OR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
AUG 3 0 1969
LIBRARY

Mayor Daley Solvent But Worried

DON ROSE and DAVID S. CANTER

The Hoover Institution COLD-WAR SCHOLARSHIP

PETER S. STERN

THEODORE ROSZAK on TECHNOCRACY

LETTERS

design for living

Dover, N. J.

DEAR SIRS: Dr. Albert Kaplan (letter, The Nation, July 14) wonders: "If the New Left is not to copy the Russian model, or the Chinese—what blueprint or design do they have?" Dr. Kaplan goes on to ask, "If none, is it at all rational to proceed toward the destruction of a structure without any notion as to what is to replace it?"

Perhaps the New Left will follow the example of the American Revolution and the radicals who guided the colonies in their destruction of the English oppression, without a unified design to guide them. On July 1, 1776, John Dickinson of Pennsylvania delivered his last plea to the Continental Congress, imploring against a declaration of independence. He said in part:

> I affirm that prudent men do not abandon objects which are certain to go in pursuit of those which offer only uncertainty. Now, it is an established fact that America can be well and happily governed by the English laws, under the same king and the same Parliament. Two hundred years of happiness furnish the proof of it; and we find it also in the present prosperity, which is the result of these venerable laws and of this ancient union. It is not as independent, but as subjects; not as republic, but as monarchy, that we have arrived at this degree of power and of greatness. What then is the object of these chimeras, hatched in the days of discord and war? Shall the transports of fury have more power over us than the experience of ages? Shall we destroy, in a moment of anger, the work cemented and tested by time?

Do Dr. Kaplan's words sound like an updated version of Dickinson's? Were such sentiments ever so badly conceived or so ill-timed?

Leonard S. Amada

but they're not green

Crestwood, Ky.

DEAR SIR:: Congratulations on your Panthers report ["Out To Get the Panthers" by L. F. Palmer, Jr., July 28]. Can we put some of them on the next flight to the moon—and some Minutemen on Mars? Norris Merchant

our man in Havana

Idaho Falls, Ida.

DEAR SIRS: I enjoyed reading "Out To Get the Panthers," and would like to comment on one segment of Mr. Palmer's article.

In reference to Eldridge Cleaver, Minister of Information of the Black Panther Party and presently listed as a fugitive from justice by California law-enforcement officials, Mr. Palmer says of Cleaver: "He is reported to be living in Cuba." This may be so, but available evidence suggests that he has not abandoned his activities in the United States, even in the face of a warrant against him. At least his abilities as an author continue to be presented. In the July 4 issue of the Los Angeles Free Press, there appears a feature article by Cleaver entitled "Revolution No Game," which is advertised on the front page as "A Message from Eldridge in Exile." This issue, which may be obtained by sending 25c in coin to the Los Angeles Free Press, 7813 Beverly Blvd., Los Angeles 90036, indicates that Mr. Cleaver is, at least in terms of literature, still very much active regardless of where he may be residing at present.

Michael McCrery

EDITORIALS

Haynsworth

The appointment of Clement F. Haynsworth, Jr., to the Supreme Court has the Nixon political imprint: it is a further step in the direction of building and consolidating a solid political base in the South. It combines prophylaxis against Wallace in 1972 with appeal to Southern elements that have no love for demagogues like Wallace of Alabama or Maddox of Georgia. Haynsworth, well heeled and well born, comes from an "Old South" state. With important connections both in the way of family and business, he belongs to a stratum of Southern society which has been important to the Republicans ever since James F. Byrnes defected to Eisenhower. (Judge Haynsworth followed suit, together with Sen. Strom Thurmond, in 1964.)

Haynsworth's home town is Greenville, S.C., a textile center. Before his appointment to the Court of Appeals by Eisenhower, he had financial holdings and a law practice in textiles, insurance, banking, radio-TV stations, railroads, hotels and other industries. On his appointment to the Court of Appeals he resigned eight directorships. He comes from a long line of lawyers. Obviously he is no minor figure, and that he has not been nationally prominent only shows how big the country is, and how much wealth and status is handed down regionally from generation to generation.

Judge Haynsworth is not, in the present perspective, the worst appointment that Mr. Nixon could have made. From Southerners who know him well and are reasonably objective we have obtained a picture that we have every reason to believe is accurate. No genius of the law, these sources say, no Brandeis and no Cardoza surely, but a hard-working lawyer, without pomposity, of consistent judicial temperament. He has biases but he is aware of them—no small virtue in a judge—and so he has perhaps retained the capacity to grow and change. He is a genuine conservative amid the host of reactionaries masquerading as conservatives, and his twelve years on the Court of Appeals for the Fourth Circuit (for the past five years its presiding judge) have given him important appellate experience.

But for all that denunciation is hardly called for, the appointment is no cause for rejoicing. It may be going too far to say—as Joseph L. Rauh, vice chairman of Americans for Democratic Action, has said—that the appointment is "like throwing a log on the fires of racial tension." Nevertheless, for Negroes, and therefore for all of us, the selection of Haynsworth, among so many more acceptable candidates, can prove to have unfortunate consequences.

The Judge appears to recognize this. Asked about some of the sharp objections that have been raised, he protested: "They're condemning opinions written when none of us were writing as we are now." Asked if he has changed, he replied, "Haven't we all?" Yes, we have—or hope that we have. But when it comes to fundamental human rights, there is sound reason to question the values of a man who only in recent years has acquired a feeling for the civil rights of Negroes, in particular, even though that man carries the burden of the heritage and environment of the South.

This leads to a conclusion on which diverse elements should be able to agree. Hearings on the appointment have been set for September 9 before the Senate Judiciary Committee which, with Senator Eastland in the chair, is weighted on the conservative side. The appointment should be scrutinized with the utmost care, both in committee and on the floor of the Senate. In committee, those opposing the appointment should be given the fullest opportunity to state their case. There is plenty to argue about. Judge Haynsworth's record on civil rights is not good, and the same may be said about his record in labor cases. The Fourth Circuit has the reputation among unions and labor lawyers, and within the NLRB, of being conservative to reactionary. If this belief is unfounded, the facts should dissipate it; if the record supports it, the country should be apprised.

What should not be permitted is any attempt to rush through the appointment in the fashion in which Chief Justice Burger was confirmed, as if there was nothing that could be said against the nominee, or as if Presidential wisdom were infallible in such momentous choices. The precedent, that is, should not be the pell-mell confirmation of Burger but the thorough scrutiny which Abe Fortas received when he was nominated for Chief Justice. The result in the latter instance turned out to be salutary. Let Judge Haynsworth run the gantlet in his turn.

The Madness

Reluctantly and tardily, the British have finally intervened in Northern Ireland. One may be sure that Chichester-Clark was no more eager to request intervention than Messrs. Wilson and Callaghan were to approve it. He was simply at the end of his rope; if he called up the special militia, he knew it would only stiffen Catholic resistance. But by seeking British assistance he has in effect confessed that the government he heads is bankrupt. It is frozen into positions of such rigidity that it cannot act to relieve existing tensions.

Chichester-Clark's sharp rejection not merely of the notion of a coalition government but of the suggestion that he might try to bring a few Catholics into the government is a measure of the madness that prevails at Stormont. By this time it should also be clear that there can be no return to the status quo ante; too much has happened.

For one thing, the British have intervened. How long must they stay? How will they manage to extricate themselves from what has been called "the Vietnamese swamp" that is Northern Ireland? The larger the British intervention, the more the Stormont government will suffer in loss of prestige and legitimacy. And the longer the intervention lasts, the greater the likelihood that the British

IN THIS ISSUE

September 1, 1969

EDITORIALS

162

ARTICLES

166 Isolationism Revisited — Thomas G. Paterson

169 Mayor Daley: Solvent But Worried — Don Rose and David S. Canter

173 Kenya's Asian Outcasts — Stanley Meisler

176 The Hoover Institution: Cold-War Scholarship — Peter S. Stern

BOOKS & THE ARTS

181 Technocracy: Despotism of Beneficent Expertise — Theodore Roszak

182 The Lode (poem) — Sister Madeline DeFrees

188 The Stupid Machine — Jonathan Baumbach

190 Records — David Hamilton

190 Six Candles for a Cake (poem) — Stanley Kiesel

Publisher JAMES J. STORROW JR. — Associate Publisher GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor CAREY McWILLIAMS — Associate Editor PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor ROBERT HATCH — Literary Editor BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

NATION Volume 209 No. 6

will be forced to take direct control. No doubt the British can preserve outward order, but no real improvement can be expected until the existing government is replaced by one that represents all the people of the six counties and is responsive to their needs. It can no longer be a government of, by, and for Protestants.

Yet despite the ashes and rubble of Belfast and Derry, the Unionist leadership arrogantly asserts its determination to govern as it has governed for the last fifty years. Along with Paisley, it continues to blame the unrest and violence on "sinister" forces conspiring to overthrow the government.

There is a terrible lesson in the Ulster madness. Critical political issues can be averted for a long time, but in the end they must be faced. Partition is such an issue. It encourages Protestant intransigence. It stimulates ancestral fears. It divides Catholics and Protestants. It precludes reconciliation. As long as it exists, every Catholic action will be interpreted as a threat to "the state"—meaning the rump one-party government of Northern Ireland. As long as it exists, Protestants will try to put and keep Catholics down by way of preserving their monopoly of political power. Even if a few Catholics could be induced to join the government, their every action would be viewed as subversive. And as long as partition lasts, Catholics will quite naturally—and not in any conspiratorial sense—seek to reunite the North and South of Ireland.

A young Catholic woman is quoted in one of the recent news stories from Belfast as saying: "As long as there are Protestants and Catholics, there will always be trouble." Not so. As long as partition exists there will be trouble. It is the fusion of the religious issue with the question of power and privilege that prolongs the madness.

Donahue's Choice

The TV station owners are said to be in a state of terror akin to that of Vietnamese landowners when land reform is mentioned. Their agony began last February, when the suddenly embattled FCC stripped the Boston Traveler of its WHDR-TV, the first summary action of this kind in the history of the industry. But worse was to come.

RKO General Corporation, a subsidiary of the heavyweight conglomerate, General Tire & Rubber, owns five TV stations, one of which is KHJ-TV in Los Angeles. KHJ was challenged for its license renewal by a local consortium established for the purpose, Fidelity Television, Inc. An FCC examiner, Thomas H. Donahue, was appointed to look into the defects and virtues of the rival claimants. The 111-page report which he has just issued has intensified the fears of many broadcasters who have been accustomed to having their licenses renewed semi-automatically every three years.

In Mr. Donahue's view, KHJ "miserably failed to serve the public interest." An unaffiliated station, it made no effort to compete with the network outlets in the news and documentary field. Its offerings consisted almost entirely of old movies, with which, Mr. Donahue concludes, it was beguiling "the young, the congenitally gullible, and those not very bright." Yet it prospered, with a profit of around 20 per cent on total revenues.

In an audience survey that KHJ itself sponsored in 1964, it was judged by 19 per cent of those polled to lead in "movie entertainment," but only 1 per cent gave it credit for anything else. Mr. Donahue found substantial community sentiment against the emphasis on crime and violence in KHJ's programs. A survey dating back to 1962 found that in a single week KHJ supplied the viewers with 181 murders, 98 attempted murders, and miscellaneous killings and kidnappings. When a viewers' organization, a church group and a member of Congress protested about KHJ's bloodletting, it told them where they could get off.

However, Mr. Donahue is unable to summon up much enthusiasm for Fidelity Television either. Its management has little experience in the field, and its objective is to move the station into wealthy, expanding and reactionary Orange County, the seat of the vacation White House. The president of Fidelity Television is William G. Simon, formerly the special agent in charge of the Los Angeles division of the FBI. Apparently on the principle that no one could do worse than RKO General, Mr. Donahue recommended giving Fidelity the license.

In what Christopher Lydon of The New York Times calls "a flight of creative prose unusual in FCC documents," Mr. Donahue summarized his decision (which must still be ratified by the Commission) as follows: "Moving to the stable for analogy, the choice . . . might be likened to selecting between a race horse with acceptable blood lines, good conformation, demonstrated ability to achieve speed, and an unbreakable habit of jumping off the track and galloping to the feedbag, against the chance to acquire, sight unseen, a Chincoteague pony." This reference will send aficionados of broadcasting to the atlas, and will convince many that the Pastore bill, criticized editorially in The Nation of August 25, should indeed be voted down.

Washington Icons

Political scientists and psychiatrists should study the phenomenon in American politics of the political icon—the sacred image above the power of Congress, the public, the press and successive Presidents. As only God can make a tree, only God can unmake an icon and, as we know from other reliable sources, He moves in mysterious ways His wonders to perform. We cannot, therefore, expect any early disappearance of the highest-ranking American icon—J. Edgar Hoover. Millions of citizens regard Mr. Hoover as our bulwark against communism and crime in general. If he were removed, they would run into the streets, screaming and rending their garments; consequently every President, on taking office, soothes them by announcing that he would not think of allowing this great American to leave office.

A rare exception to the rule of the untouchable icon occurred recently when J. Edgar refused, through a subordinate, to appear before the House Crime Committee. Rep. Claude Pepper (D., Fla.), chairman of the committee, found the icon's refusal "exceedingly regrettable." This may sound mild; but in reference to one of Hoover's stature these are fighting words and Mr. Pepper, who was once on good terms with Henry Wallace and perhaps ate a sandwich with Paul Robeson, may live to regret them.

Another powerful icon, though not in Hoover's class, is the nation's long-time draft director, Lt. Gen. Lewis B. Hershey. Since General Hershey does not pack the wallop of the great Hoover, he is rather frequently sniped at. The outgoing chairman of the National Selective Service Appeal Board, Judge Henry J. Gwiazda, has accused him of riding roughshod over that supposedly independent panel, and Dr. Kenneth W. Clement, a Cleveland surgeon who is also leaving the board, thinks General Hershey is old enough to have been retired "two or three times." General Hershey has also been attacked by Rep. Edward I. Koch (D., N.Y.) who has been calling attention to the General's directive of October 1967 which, in effect, threatens any objector to the Vietnamese War (who is liable for military service) with immediate induction. This directive has been ruled illegal by the U.S. Court of Appeals, but Mr. Koch complains that General Hershey has not notified the State Selective Service Boards of the court's decision. Of course Mr. Koch's intentions are good, as always, and he has the law on his side, but he does not seem to realize that an icon is above the law. The same lack of faith may be attributed to Sen. Walter F. Mondale (D., Minn.) and Rep. Frank Thompson (D., N.J.). It should be clear to all these sacrilegious gentlemen that the only way to tumble General Hershey from his pedestal is to abolish selective service, which does indeed seem possible. But since the FBI will remain as long as the earth circles the sun, Mr. Hoover will still draw the genuflections of the politically devout.

Stalling on SALT

The Nixon Administration would have us believe that the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) have been delayed by the Russians. When he was a candidate, Mr. Nixon held out the promise that, if elected, he would substitute negotiation for confrontation. Now those speaking on his behalf complain that SALT is on dead center because Soviet Ambassador Anatoly F. Dobrynin has delayed his return to Washington. But this is more likely an effect than a cause. The negotiations have been delayed six months, or longer, because the belligerent members of the Nixon entourage—in particular the twin hawks, Secretary of Defense Laird and John S. Foster, his research and development chief—feel that the United States is gaining ground in preparation for the negotiations, while the Soviets are losing it. And Mr. Nixon, who knows how to extract every possible advantage from an adversary situation, evidently agrees with those of his advisers who counsel delay.

The American side has been thoroughly forehanded in its preparations for the bargaining with the Russians over strategic weapons. Mr. Nixon stopped off in Romania on his globe-circling trip and pronounced his reception there the most memorable of the whole circuit. Secretary of State Rogers has been giving advice to both the Russians and the Chinese Reds, in the guise of promoting global peace: his recommendations are nicely calculated to increase the ill feeling between the quondam allies. Secretary Laird, defending General Eisenhower's military-industrial complex before the Veterans of Foreign Wars, has renamed it the "military-industrial-labor complex" (why leave out the scientists?) in order to assure the Soviets that the United States is united in its pursuit of the almighty dollar via armaments. He has also linked the triumph of Apollo with American military might.

For his part, Foster has been warning a House Foreign Affairs subcommittee headed by superhawk Rep. Clement J. Zablocki (D., Wis.) that suspension of tests of the independently targeted nuclear warheads (MIRV) "would not be prudent without the attendant assurance to the U. S. that the Soviet ABM would not increase." Since according to such intelligence estimates as the public has been allowed to learn about, the current state of the Soviet nuclear defense is not in the same class as the Safeguard system projected by Mr. Nixon and his advisers, these plans and recommendations seem to be nothing less than a prescription for an American first-strike capability.

On these terms, the proposed talks can hardly qualify as negotiations. If ever evidence is needed for the futility of the hoary nonsense of negotiating from positions of strength, this situation supplies it. Once achieved, the position of strength turns out to be a convincing reason for not negotiating at all. Why negotiate, the hard-liners ask—let them sweat. And let the arms race move into another upward spiral.

Hard-liners are always willing to gamble in this fashion, but there are factors which they may be overlooking in their estimate of the odds. The readings out of the USSR bode no good. There is internal trouble there—economically, politically and socially. Witness the mounting evidence of unrest among writers, artists and intellectuals; for every case that surfaces, how many remain concealed? There is trouble along the border with China, and there is trouble with Moscow's restive partners in the Warsaw military alliance. There is trouble in Czechoslovakia. Militarily the country is under the Soviet heel, but the occupation has turned out to be an even bigger mistake, from the standpoint of Moscow's relations with its allies and the more or less libertarian Communist parties of the West, than the Soviet rulers expected it to be.

This, then, is a dangerous time to be baiting the bear. He is in a bad mood, and not likely to prove tractable when he is prodded. Time and again in the past the "realists," who crank their hunches and presuppositions into computers and get answers to suit their temperaments, have led nations into disaster. The difference today is that the potential disasters are on a scale so formidable that one would think prudence would prevail. Instead, the same old lunacies are in operation.

ISOLATIONISM REVISITED

THOMAS G. PATERSON

Mr. Paterson is assistant professor of history at the University of Connecticut. He is now completing for publication next year three books on American foreign political and economic relations since the beginning of the cold war.

In his June speech at the Air Force Academy, President Nixon branded critics of his military and foreign policies "new isolationists," and suggested that they were turning their backs on the world. A few weeks before leaving office, Secretary of State Dean Rusk had similarly warned Americans away from a return to "isolationism." The Johnson administration had occasionally labeled as "isolationist" those foreign policy dissidents who asked for limited American commitments abroad and a retrenchment from empire. It is a label meant to discredit. It conjures up the specter of the 1930s, when the United States allegedly shirked international responsibility and thus unleashed mad dictators and Japanese imperialists. The label further summons the memory of America's rise to world eminence after World War II, throwing off its isolationism and assuming its rightful first rank in world affairs. Today, then, "isolationism" is a pejorative term connoting weakness, appeasement, surrender, mindless idealism and a retreat from the obligations of international leadership.

Scholars have also dealt critically with the noninterventionists of the 1930s, in part because most historians and political scientists today endorse internationalism and what they might call nonimperialist intervention. Historians have complained that the isolationists ignored the threat of totalitarianism, helped bring on World War II, left the United States militarily unprepared, even courted fascism, and in general nurtured a wrongheadedness which restrained America from influencing international events. Prof. Selig Adler has written that the "Congressional isolationists, so anxious to keep out of war, actually helped invite a foreign catastrophe of such immense proportions that no nation could have escaped its consequences." The eminent diplomatic historian Dexter Perkins has concluded that "time has placed their arguments in perspective, revealing that they were largely unsound."

But the isolationist movement was notably diverse. Nazis, Communists, pacifists, defeatists like Charles Lindbergh, "fortress America" types like Herbert Hoover, anti-Semites like Father Charles E. Coughlin, liberal reformers, thoughtful intellectuals—all adhered to it at one time or another. Because the isolationist America First Committee housed some unprogressive businessmen and because many isolationists, especially late in the 1930s, were opposed to the New Deal, isolationism has often been linked to conservatism, or at the extreme, with self-serving American proponents of German totalitarianism.

Historians have thus accurately found isolationists whom we cannot admire. It is also true that the isolationist Ludlow Amendment, which would have required a public referendum on all war decisions, was ill-advised. The isolationists sometimes imagined war plots and conspiracies. The isolationist or "revisionist" histories of World War I written by men like Charles Beard and Charles Tansill have been less than scholarly and too polemical. Above all else, the isolationists were wrong in the 1930s to believe that the United States could avoid any involvement in the developing crises in Europe through the Neutrality Acts, which prohibited America from punishing the aggressor. Their formula for American foreign policy did not fit the diplomacy of the depression thirties.

What scholars and politicians alike have obscured, however, is the long-term and constructive isolationist criticism of many facets of American foreign policy. Even in their failure the isolationists left an intelligent critique from which we can profit today. Those isolationists who were domestic liberal reformers especially deserve attention, for their assessment of foreign policy was the best articulated, the least rigid, and the most meaningful for the 1960s and the 1970s. Conservative isolationists did not dominate isolationism, and Prof. Manfred Jonas, in his excellent study of isolationism, has suggested that the historical treatment of the subject has been somewhat unbalanced and inaccurate: "To regard isolationism as pure obstructionism . . . is unfruitful and misleading." Such men as Sen. Gerald P. Nye, Norman Thomas, Charles Beard, John Bassett Moore and Sen. William Borah "did not approach American foreign policy from a purely negative and obstructionist viewpoint." Isolationism "was the considered response to foreign and domestic developments of a large, responsible, and respectable segment of the American people."

Indeed, unlike today, the term "isolationist" was not a label of reproach, and was respectably worn by many leading Americans, including perhaps even President Franklin D. Roosevelt for a time. Isolationism did not mean isolation. Most isolationists desired foreign trade, continued immigration and cultural exchange, and diplomatic intercourse with other nations. Senator Borah, for example, favored international action to promote disarmament and in 1933 led the fight for American recognition of the Soviet Union. Nor was isolationism the phenomenon of one region, one political party, one ethnic group, or one socioeconomic rank. It was national, and had three basic strains of thought which attempted to answer the question, isolation from what?

The first strain was a profound abhorrence of war, a fear of war and militarism. Isolationists disliked not only the bloodshed of war and the utter waste of total mobilization but also the detrimental effects of war on domestic reform and civil liberties. The second ingredient of isolationism was nonintervention—that the United States should avoid interference in the affairs of other nations, should be selective in its foreign involvement, and disengage from empire. The third strain was unilateralism or independence. That is, the United States should preserve its freedom of choice in foreign relations by avoiding binding and restrictive alliances or commitments.

With these three core ideas, the isolationists dissected, studied and influenced American foreign policy in the 1930s. Their assessment showed them to be aware of some of the realities of world power politics and capable of compromise. We must credit many of them, too, with changing their minds in the last few years before American entry into World War II. Most important, the three ideas of freedom of action, nonintervention and abhorrence of war have a potent relevance for our views of American foreign relations today. Thus we should take another look at isolationism in the 1930s.

The isolationists were intense in their fear of war. The National Farmers Union in 1936 argued that "war is an utter negation of civilization. It is a relic of barbarism, regimenting mankind in organized murder, starvation, disease, and destruction. It is incompatible with every moral and Christian teaching." Writing in 1937, Congressman Louis Ludlow declared that the "science of slaughter has advanced with vast strides during the last twenty years. . . . The art of killing people en masse and maiming and wrecking human bodies has been perfected until it is impossible to imagine the next large-scale war being anything less than a vast carnival of death. . . ."

Many isolationists believed that the United States had been drawn unnecessarily into World War I, that civil liberties had been blatantly curtailed at home, and that in general the war was not the noble crusade President Woodrow Wilson said it was. Oswald Garrison Villard summed up the isolationist memory of World War I when he wrote in 1935 that "you cannot advance the welfare of the world by wholesale slaughter."

Every nation needs its internal critics—especially those countries which have had a long record of war and foreign interventions. The isolationists of the 1930s accepted measured appropriations for national defense, but they tried to twinge the American conscience to the horrors of war and the futility of military escalation. At times their thinking was wishful, and their ideas inapplicable to the trend of international affairs. But as Norman A. Zucker, biographer of George Norris, put it: "If, like Isaiah, he longed for a civilization in which nation no longer warred against nation . . . he held a vision worth dreaming." And Prof. Arthur Ekrich, Jr., recently observed: "As some of the isolationists of the 1930s warned, the pursuit of power may seduce and corrupt even the most liberal and idealistic of statesmen and nations."

Isolationists with a commitment to reform were part of a tradition of opposition to intervention and war in favor of attention to domestic priorities. The anti-imperialists of the 1890s and the opponents of war in 1917-18 preceded them. The moderate Socialist leader Norman Thomas asked the question which troubled some Americans after World War I: "If we go into the [second] war, what will happen to the things we prize? What will happen to decency and tolerance, to morality and culture, to democracy and civil liberty . . .?" Thomas agreed with Charles Beard and several Congressmen who suggested that America put its own house in order, to stand as an example to the world of social progress. Only a viable social democracy could combat the evils of fascism. Senator Nye called for "correcting our own ills . . . saving our own democracy rather than soliciting the trouble to come from any move to police and doctor the world."

Liberal isolationists emphasized the social problems created by the depression, and envisioned the death of the New Deal and a denial of civil liberties. William Henry Chamberlin argued that war would bring "universal regimentation, hysterical intolerance, and physical and intellectual goose-stepping." The most pessimistic of all, perhaps, was Stuart Chase, who saw "the liquidation of political democracy, of Congress, the Supreme Court, private enterprise, the banks, free press and free speech; the persecution of German-Americans and Irish-Americans, witch hunts, forced labor, fixed prices, rationing, astronomical debts, and the rest." Although Chase's forecast was obviously exaggerated, it is clear in 20th-century American history that war and intervention help to undermine domestic reform movements and create an atmosphere for the abridgment of civil liberties.

The isolationists could remember World War I very well. As Prof. William Shannon recently wrote: "No other American President ever left office with as poor a civil-liberties record as Woodrow Wilson." Norman Thomas remarked in 1938 that "the last war almost cost America what liberty she had." Then, too, the isolationists were experiencing the Un-American Activities Committee of Martin Dies, who condemned people for their ideas rather than for their actions. Nye, opposing conformity of thought, reminded Americans that there was a distinction between "unity" and "disloyalty."

The record of World War II demonstrated that the isolationist alarm was well founded. The removal of Japanese-American citizens to concentration camps in the deserts and swamps of America marred an otherwise fair Roosevelt record. The injustice, however, is too obvious and damaging for us to dismiss this episode as an aberration. And we should remember that World War II was followed by a Red scare initiated by the Truman administration's loyalty program and carried forth by Joseph McCarthy. Today the eternal J. Edgar Hoover runs the FBI, the CIA functions as an almost independent and uncontrolled agency, the draft is used as a punishment, Thomas Dewey talks about abolishing the Fifth Amendment, the Attorney General supports wire tapping, war protesters are indicted for conspiracy, 41 per cent of the budget goes to the military and the cry is for law and order at any cost. It behooves us to read more closely what the isolationists said about the impact of war upon domestic America.

Believing in nonintervention, many isolationists catalogued the long history of American armed and subtle intervention in Latin America. In 1930, the United States had troops in Nicaragua and Haiti, and held protectorates over the Dominican Republic, Cuba and Panama. The anti-imperialist isolationists questioned official Washington's assertion that the United States was backing "democracy" in Latin America. At least twelve of the twenty Latin American nations were ruled in 1938 by dictators supported by Washington. "It would seem," concluded Beard, "that the rhetoric of democratic solidarity in this hemisphere does not get very far below the surface of things." Nye condemned the intervention of the Marines in Nicaragua in 1927 and their presence there until 1933 "to crucify a people . . . merely because Americans have gone there with dollars to invest and we have made it our policy to give whatever protection is possible to those dollars." Others complained that the Good Neighbor Policy was window dressing.

Isolationists also opposed unlimited arms sales abroad. Prof. John Wiltz, who has studied the isolationist Congressional investigating committee headed by Nye, noted that the committee "proved . . . that most munitions sales to Latin America, China, and the Near East depended upon bribery. . . . It established that munitions firms sometimes played one belligerent off against another. . . . The Committee exhibited documents which shocked many Americans into the realization that there was a difference between selling instruments of human destruction and selling sewing machines and automobiles." With the encouragement of isolationists, Roosevelt banned all arms shipments to Bolivia and Paraguay in the Chaco war. The isolationists may also have stimulated the partial American retrenchment from Latin America under Roosevelt. The questions of arms sales to Latin America and of armed intervention there are relevant today, and have been seriously studied by Sen. J. William Fulbright, among others.

In pointing out that the United States itself often acted like an imperialist, the isolationists also inspected quite closely the foreign relations of one of America's "natural allies," Great Britain. Believing that all nations act in self-interest, that no nation has a monopoly on virtue and morality, the isolationists asked Americans to stop applying an international double standard: one set of rules for themselves and the British and another for other nations. Robert Hutchins, the young chancellor of the University of Chicago, looked at the reality: "Mr. Roosevelt tells us we are to save the democracies. The democracies are presumably England, China, Greece, and possibly Turkey. Turkey is a dictatorship. Greece is a dictatorship. China is a dictatorship." He went on: "And what do we do about countries which were victims of aggression before 1939? . . . What do we do about Hong Kong, the Malay States, the Dutch East Indies, French Indo-China, Africa, and above all, India?" Isolationists compared Italy's subjugation of Ethiopia to Britain's role in India.

In short, the isolationists condemned all imperialist nations, but unfortunately they often refused to make the choice of the lesser of two evils, as all men must, and thus did not focus their criticism entirely on the most brutal: Germany. What is important and lasting for us, even in this failure, is their cutting through the camouflage, rhetoric and clichés to define international relations in terms of power and self-interest. Today many Americans too have begun to ask for more precise use of words like "peace," "security," "democracy," "aggression."

The rhetoric of the American business community has preached that American businessmen have always served the national interest. Isolationists examined instances of business diplomacy in Latin America and protested the sale of arms to Japan and Germany in the 1930s. Such munitions businessmen were called "merchants of death," participating in "rotten commercialism" with an "inhumane, immoral, and un-Christian" behavior. This view was derived in part from the reform zeal of isolationists who wanted to abolish child labor, improve factory safety conditions, pass anti-trust legislation, curtail monopolies and the misuse of America's natural resources, and lift the living standards of the disadvantaged. They logically asked: If we are fighting big business at home, why help to extend its power overseas? Those parts of the Neutrality Acts which curtailed loans and arms shipments to belligerents, then, reflected parts of the reform movement of the 1930s. The Nye committee revealed much questionable activity on the part of American companies in international cartels, but did not prove the claim of some isolationists that American business drew the United States into World War I.

Senate investigations during World War II indicated that the isolationists had indeed been partially correct in their suspicions that some businesses were compromising the national interest for profit in the 1930s. The American business press was overwhelmingly anti-Fascist. But as Prof. Gabriel Kolko has demonstrated, twenty-six of the top 100 American corporations of 1937 were involved in significant cartel and contractual agreements with Nazi Germany. And fifty-six American companies were connected with the backbone of Hitler's war machine, the I. G. Farben Company. Standard Oil helped Germany develop both synthetic rubber and 100-octane aviation fuel. Bendix Aviation, controlled by General Motors, as late as 1940 provided a German company (Robert Bosch) with complete data on aircraft and diesel engine starters in return for royalties. As an official of the Dow Chemical Company boldly remarked in the 1930s: "We do not inquire into the uses of the products. We are interested in selling them." This attitude was made clear too by the businessmen who continued to ship scrap metal and oil to Italy, even though the President asked for a voluntary embargo in 1935. In fact, in the last three months of 1935, American oil shipments to Mussolini's Italy tripled. The isolationists were important watchdogs over American business. We have few watchdogs today, and have moved into the era of conglomerates, with some companies dependent upon military orders and contributing through lobbies to the world's arms race.

Some critics of the isolationists have incorrectly interpreted isolationism to mean friendliness toward fascism, or at least a condoning of fascism. The isolationist camp did attract Fascists, but they did not constitute the movement. Indeed, numerous liberal isolationists were early and vociferous in their denunciation of Hitlerism and the persecution of the Jews. Oswald Garrison Villard, for example, in 1933 and 1935 urged Western Europe to boycott Hitler's Germany and Mussolini's Italy, and in 1936 appealed to the League of Nations to act against Hitler. Villard became despondent, as did many isolationists, when the other European nations themselves would do nothing to contain the dictators. "The overwhelming majority of all isolationists," Jonas has written, "had no desire to see the Axis Powers gain their ends."

The Spanish Civil War was particularly agonizing for liberal isolationists, and the response of many of them suggests their flexibility and their opposition to fascism. How can one be committed to both peace and liberty? Many isolationists chose liberty, and encouraged the Roosevelt administration to aid the anti-Franco Loyalists. But to their dismay and surprise, the President and Secretary of State Cordell Hull performed like strict isolationists by imposing an arms embargo on Spain. Furthermore, Roosevelt followed the lead of the European nonintervention committee, which proved unworkable in the face of German, Italian and Russian intervention.

If some isolationists demonstrated that they would accept selective intervention, as in the Spanish Civil War, others later showed themselves capable of changing their minds over the question of aiding Britain against the rising Germany. Many liberals quit the isolationist ranks in 1939-41, leaving conservatives there, and thus contributing to the notion that conservatism and isolationism were linked. It should be stated, too, that the isolationists cannot be blamed for the coming of World War II. Germany did not depend upon American isolationism in making its plans. Britain and France let Germany nibble for a number of years, conceding to Fascist demands. Not until April of 1939 did France and Britain guarantee the independence of Poland. The League of Nations was moribund in the 1930s, its members unwilling to take decisive action. The Soviet Union was excluded from membership until 1934 and then ousted in 1939. Germany was admitted to the League in 1926 and departed in 1934. Both Japan and Italy withdrew in the mid-thirties. Britain was more interested in balance of power than collective security. As Robert A. Divine has suggested, European appeasers co-authored the American Neutrality Acts, because some Americans concluded that we had better steer clear of the chaos in Europe.

Scholars and politicians have distorted isolationism and confused a useful heritage. We cannot accept the notion of Fortress America; we reject strict unilateralism and the idea of a foreign policy conspiracy. But there is much value in the isolationist argument for freedom of action and limited commitments in foreign relations. This does not mean a rejection of international cooperation and the United Nations. It means simply independence and freedom of choice. Our alliance arrangements may drag us clumsily into wars. As someone has put it, we have constructed Pearl Harbors throughout the world. We cling to obsolete agreements like NATO which tie us to collapsing military alliances and impede East-West relations. We should give more attention, too, to the isolationist call for nonintervention and self-determination.

The isolationist critique is relevant to the senseless war in Vietnam which, among other detriments, has crippled a domestic reform movement. As America moves to the political right, the isolationist warning of war's effect on civil liberties is imposing. We might recall, too, that the isolationists worried about the growing and somewhat independent role of the President in foreign affairs. Today Congressmen are questioning the evolution of Presidential commitments in Vietnam without a declaration of war. The "National Commitments Resolution," introduced by Senators Fulbright and Gore, and recently passed by a 70-to-16 vote, expressed the Senate's desire for participation in national security questions.

In this day of global diplomacy and world-wide military skirmishes, we might reflect upon the isolationist critique of the 1930s and its significance to our problems. Surely many Americans share with the isolationists the fear (in the words of Prof. Warren Cohen) "that social democracy may die in the United States if it has to be fostered abroad by force rather than by precept."

Mayor Daley: Solvent But Worried

DON ROSE and DAVID S. CANTER

The Messrs. Rose and Canter are co-publishers of Hyde Park-Kenwood Voices, a monthly newspaper in Chicago. They have long been active as publicists in Cook County political movements.

Chicago

A year after the Democratic national disaster of 1968, Richard J. Daley can best be likened to a man who once had $10 million and lost $1 million in a crap game. Irritated, annoyed—perhaps even worried—but highly solvent.

Losses in national prestige, in local public relations, in White House clout and several minor electoral defeats have combined to erode the Mayor's overall power and standing, but when the name of the game is "win," it is still Daley über alles. A year ago, the national pundits were writing his political obituary. They were premature.

To be sure, Daley has had a President amputated. In failing to carry Illinois for Humphrey last fall, a portion —but not all—of the blame rests on the Mayor's rotund shoulders. Now he no longer can call the White House direct to "fix" items such as a Justice Department civil rights investigation of Chicago's public school system.

In 1965, when Francis Keppel, then Commissioner of Education, cut off funds to Chicago schools, a few whispered words from Daley to LBJ restored them instantly.

Now the Nixon Administration—only a decade too late—is moving to integrate Chicago faculties. (It has not been determined whether this useless gesture stems from a desire to add heat to troubled waters, or whether the GOP really thinks this is a serious priority on the black agenda.) There should be a reasonable amount of amity between Daley and the Nixon-Agnew team, for at heart Daley is a Nixon Republican. His racial views, his relationship to big business and to real estate interests here place him in the less-than-moderate Republican bag. Ironically, while he was once among the most conservative of big-city mayors, he looks relatively liberal (Daley supports the grape boycott) because the new mayors are all to his right.

His essential conservatism was demonstrated this past spring. At issue was the state income tax proposed by Gov. Richard Ogilvie, who defeated Daley's hand-picked candidate last November. (The loss was ambiguous for Daley, and many believe it to be part of a deal. Ogilvie was formerly president of the Cook County board of commissioners, controlling thousands of patronage jobs right in the heart of Daley's bailiwick, and a far greater irritant at that proximity than as governor. Had Ogilvie been defeated for the state post, he would still have had another two years to build his strength in Daley's back yard.)

Ogilvie, in a courageous action, proposed to the Republican-controlled legislature the state's first income tax of a flat 4 per cent on individuals and corporations. The parity of individual and corporate taxes, naturally, outraged liberals in and out of the party.

At the same time, Daley was confronted by several Ogilvie bills publicly aimed at decimating the Cook County Democratic machine. One bill would completely restructure the board of election commissioners in the county, removing the control used by Daley against independents and Republicans. Control of the board is probably worth more than 50,000 votes in a county election.

Another Ogilvie proposal would abolish a significant amount of patronage in the metropolitan area; a third bill (less likely to pass) would make Chicago elections nonpartisan, a severe slap worth perhaps 75,000 to 100,000 votes in the city. Faced with these, Daley was in deep political trouble.

And Ogilvie, faced with serious defections from his own party on the income tax, was in deep fiscal trouble. The state, although rich, has far too much money tied up in earmarked funds, while some basic programs, such as schools, starve. The obvious deal was struck. Ogilvie dropped the anti-machine legislation in exchange for Daley's support of his tax program.

But the downstate, quasi-Populist Democrats rebelled. Though no liberals, they couldn't buy the tax parity. Led by the raunchy Paul Powell, secretary of state and the most powerful Illinois Democrat outside of Cook County—a politician tarred with major charges of scandal and corruption—they forced Daley to back down. Clyde Choate, representative from downstate Anna was floor leader in the successful move to tax personal income at 2.5 per cent and corporations at 4 per cent. Daley swallowed it. But it is significant that the original Ogilvie plan was acceptable to him.

Another attack of Nixon Republicanism came some months ago, when militant groups from Chicago's four black-and-white Model Cities communities protested the lack of genuine citizen representation in the city's $38 million program. They asked Washington to hold back the funds. HUD Secretary George Romney made a great display of visiting the communities and listening to their grievances, then ordered some token modifications in electing community representatives to the boards. As a high Model Cities aide here told us: "We tried to change things here, make it more democratic and better planned. But there are mostly politicians in HUD who simply aren't going to give up that $38 million." Washington made it crystal clear that the Model Cities program would in no way be controlled by the communities—it would be run by the city government. Daley and Nixon agree wholeheartedly on this principle.

Even though Daley will deliver no election votes to Nixon or Ogilvie, a symbiotic relationship will continue to exist because it is still within Daley's power to deliver state legislators and Congressmen, by the dozens, to the governor or the President. He already has delivered the majority of his Congressional delegation to Nixon on the surtax extension as part of a package that included assurance of control of the Model Cities funds.

Daley, who was first elected as the "neighborhoods" candidate running against the downtown newspapers and businessmen, has become essentially the businessmen's Mayor. In June, he confounded his closest supporters by permitting the electric company, Commonwealth Edison, the city's biggest air polluter, to continue legally spewing noxious waste for another year. The city's pollution-control ordinance required industry to shift to low sulfur content coal last July to reduce the destructive sulfur dioxide in the air. "Commongreed" Edison, as radical critic Clark Kissinger calls it, found the shift would be inconvenient and expensive. Daley rammed a code change through the City Council extending the deadline, caring little for the year's toll on the lungs of citizens.

What is the price for this kind of civic degeneracy? No one knows for sure except Daley and Thomas Ayers, head of the electric company—who is also one of the "liberal" industrialists in the city's aristocracy. Many suspect the bargain hinged on killing off the idea of an Urban Coalition for Chicago. Ayers and other "progressive" business leaders involved in equal employment and housing programs have been pushing it, while Daley has long been privately opposed.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

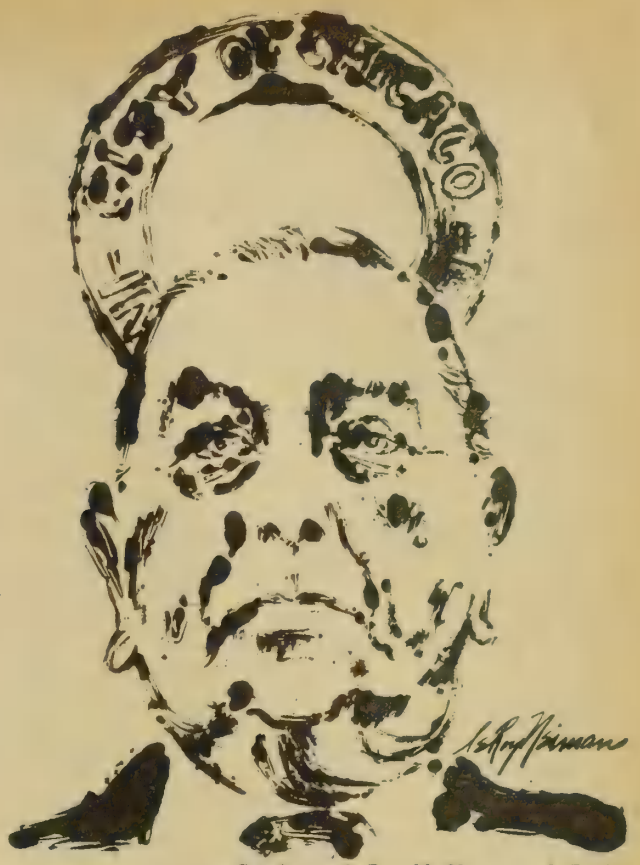
One can also expect to see a cooling of business criticism of Daley's anti-youth-gang efforts. They have drawn much fire because of the Gestapo-like tactics of the police department's Gang Intelligence Unit, which openly harasses youth groups. Its chief, Capt. Edward Buckney, admitted to intentionally stirring up trouble among them in the hope that they will do themselves out of business.



The most severe criticism came when GIU officers harassed several top businessmen and the respected lily-white Better Government Association because the business and civic leaders planned a meeting with youth organization leaders. [See "Out To Get the Panthers" by L. F. Palmer, Jr., The Nation, July 28.]

Daley, the police department and the State's attorney declared a massive "war on gangs" this past spring, ironically, at a point when youth killings and violence were statistically lower than last year. The newspapers ate it up, buying phony statistics on gang-connected violence that were only recently exposed by the Chicago Journalism Review, a monthly run by newsmen to watchdog their editors, publishers and broadcast executives.

The media here are singularly shy of hitting Daley directly. For instance, last spring the authors of this article exposed the only major scandal of the top level of Daley's administration. But it took the city's newspapers until late July to begin documenting the charges. Only an announced investigation by the Illinois attorney general and a national business magazine article brought it into the downtown press.

At issue was the city's prefabricated home program for the poor, unveiled by Daley at the Democratic convention last year. The plan, which looked superb on paper, turned into a total debacle involving administration foul-ups, misuse of $1 million in state funds, nepotism, favoritism and conflicts of interest. Many subcontracts went to the brother-in-law of the Mayor's press secretary and top adviser, Earl Bush. James Downs, Daley's top real estate adviser and head of the Chicago Dwellings Association, which bought the prefabs from National Homes Corp., turned out to be a director of National Homes and a stockholder. Pressures were put on the home builders to hire specific, favored contractors, publicity agents, guards, and so forth. The program is headed by Charles Swibel, chairman of the Chicago Housing Authority, a business associate of a high official of U.S. Gypsum Co., which will play a key role in the manufacturing of prefabs in Chicago.

Though he has largely escaped censure for his henchmen's misdeeds, Daley's political future remains a hot topic of speculation. Now midway through his unprecedented fourth term, there is a better than even chance that he will seek a fifth in 1971. Six months ago it was thought that Daley would not run again. That thinking has reversed somewhat, largely because of his conduct toward the city's top businessmen.

Courtesy of Donald Myrus and Burton Joseph, Publishers of Law and Disorder

"He is not acting like a lame duck. He continues to talk of the future and lay out big plans. It is clearly not the talk of a man about to retire," said one liberal-leaning industrialist. But the final decision will depend on Daley's own timetable. It may be decided, finally, by his wife, whose desire to have him retire in 1967 almost held sway.

Daley watchers have a favorite game called, "If not Dick, who?" Until a recent illness, the leading candidate to replace Daley was George Dunne, a committeeman of the near North Side's 42nd Ward and president of the Cook County board since the elevation of Ogilvie to the governorship. Dunne is a tough-minded, extremely loyal party man—brighter than most, but ruthless. His ward organization was powerful enough to elect Raymond Fried, a severely ailing candidate who never made a public appearance, as alderman in a special election in February. Displaying typical Daley-like sharpness, he recently selected, as one of his district's two candidates for the state constitutional convention, a competent, ambitious woman lawyer known for her independent leanings, Dawn Clark Netsch.

The Dunne maneuver co-opted many usually liberal anti-machine blue bloods. But most important, it will cripple the hopes for independent challenges for state representative next year and alderman in 1971. At the same time Dunne can go to the party-oriented liberals wearing a merit badge, though illness may have knocked him out of the race.

The next most talked about candidate is Daniel Rosten-kowski, Congressman from the heavily Polish Northwest Side's 8th District. "Rusty" is leader of the Illinois Democrats' Congressional contingent and bearer of the Daley word to Capitol Hill. He has run up a creditable voting record by most standards—following the traditional liberal-labor line—and has stayed publicly clear of the cancerous racial controversies that polarized city-wide opinion on Rep. Roman Pucinski of the Northwest city-suburban 11th District. Rostenkowski's ability to avoid such controversies is another plus quality. His ethnic appeal is foremost in a city where Polish power is on the ascendancy. If the hard-nosed decision makers decide that the Irish must yield to a Pole, it will be to Rusty, even though he is displaying no eagerness for Daley's job.

But it is more likely that the decision makers will decide to retain their Hibernian habits. If Daley relinquishes his job to another Irishman, it will be to one of two younger men. One is Edward V. Hanrahan, State's attorney and hard-line cop-thinking prosecutor, in charge of Daley's "war" on youth gangs. Formerly the U.S. attorney here, Hanrahan has a mixed record on criminal prosecutions of the Mob. Though he once drew Justice Department criticism for bungling a major case, several smaller victories and a tough, aggressive approach to law enforcement and political campaigning have won him the affection of law-and-order segments of both parties. His campaign was marked by support from most Chicago newspapers, though his past performance had earned him the bitter disdain of most reporters. He may be the strongest candidate, outside of Daley himself, that the Democrats can produce.

A dark horse is Daniel J. Shannon, 36, an accountant whom Daley named this year to head the Chicago Park District board. The handsome Shannon won the applause of conservationists with his set of principles on use of parks; then he permitted them to degenerate into empty rhetoric with a deal turning over major chunks of park land for the construction of schools. The use of valuable park space for other purposes is a new campaign in the Mayor's ongoing fight against nature, a Daley war not nearly as well publicized as the one against gangs. A few years ago he sponsored a move to pave parts of Chicago's big lakefront parks for superhighways and exhibition halls. (The effort is not yet dead.) This led to massive protests and demonstrations of tree lovers holding onto trunks while power saws buzzed away just above their heads. The ensuing ruckus temporarily halted the drive to asphalt the greenery. But because those who love trees also love education, Daley was able to put them in a new bind this year by suggesting that schools move into the park land. Even some independent aldermen bought his line. It has been suggested by some wags that Daley views creeping greenery as a Republican plot and is really trying to pave Chicago in order to save Chicago.

The main issue, however, is the matter of real estate, which is too valuable, the Daleycrats think, to be wasted on parks or people. Here, as in most major cities, land use is the key to most wealth and power; it stimulates, corrupts and destroys. Real estate manipulation built Chicago's vast slums just as it built its superhighways to suburbia—which helped make it easier to flee the city and ghettoize more of it in a still unending cycle. Real estate interests will continue to "renew" the city in a spokelike pattern stemming from the Loop, the central business district, thrusting westward and southward to hook up with other "renewed" neighborhoods.

The plan is simple. The goals are: (1) run out the black, the brown, the poor; (2) keep the lakefront luxurious and bring back—if possible—the suburbanites, while lining the pockets of developers, contractors, architects and road builders. Majestically overseeing the process, brokering in power among the aristocratic businessmen, the old-line unions, the developers and hustlers, is King Richard. His empire remains solid still. He lost two out of six special aldermanic races this year, but the machine delivered the other four, especially in strong numbers in the inland Polish and Irish areas.

Daley does stand to lose more wards in the 1971 aldermanic elections. Of the city's fifty wards five are now in the hands of independent liberals, seven are Republican, and one is held by a regular organization official, Seymour Simon, who votes against Daley with increasing regularity.

The state constitutional convention, to be held in September and November, where delegates will be chosen by state Senate districts comprising two to five wards, is the proving ground for next year's state legislative and 1971 aldermanic elections. Strong anti-machine campaigns are being waged by black leader Al Raby on the South Side, former co-chairman with Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr., of the Chicago Freedom Movement, and on the North Side by Bernard Weisberg, general counsel of the state American Civil Liberties Union, and Elmer Gertz, prominent Chicago attorney well known to Nation readers.

These two campaigns may deliver two more lakefront wards to the liberals. At least two additional wards, one middle-class black and one integrated, are vulnerable to change as well—and one or more of the city's four white-run, poor black wards could rebel on the race issue. The convention delegate races, even in areas where independent victories are not expected, will continue to build strong organizations for 1975.

As to the oft-considered prospect of a liberal challenge for mayor in 1971, it is more wish than reality. Adlai E. Stevenson III, now state treasurer, is the gossip candidate. He has often tweaked the Daley nose politically. He cannot succeed himself when his term expires next year and there will be no higher posts available at that time. A mayoral race would dovetail beautifully, but those closest to Stevenson—even those who want him to run—insist that he does not wish to challenge Daley in a primary.

That is a realistic political view as regards Stevenson. He would not stand a ghost of a chance even if Daley didn't run. At best, he might carry twenty to twenty-two out of the fifty wards, but his total margin in any five could be wiped out by one good machine ward. Against Daley, he could not carry fifteen wards. What a Stevenson candidacy could do is hypo the aldermanic challenges, which are held at the same time as the mayoral primary. That would be a major service, indeed, but clearly would not help the Stevenson career.

By 1975, when the municipal elections come up again, the independents might garner as many as fifteen city council seats. That's when the mayor's office might be ready for reform as well. Warren Bacon, outspoken black member of the school board, is the dream candidate of black and white independents. Until then, there will be only small chippings at the colossus.

Finally, Daley's prestige will again be affected this fall as the "conspiracy" trial of eight convention demonstration leaders begins here on September 24 and demonstrations develop around it on October 11. This case, perhaps the most important political trial since that of the Haymarket riot of last century, is largely of Daley's making, although it was formally brought by the Johnson administration under the 1968 anti-riot law.

The law, patently unconstitutional but untested, is to be a key repressive tool against the black, anti-war and student movements. A Daley appointee, U.S. Attorney Thomas Foran, probably will prosecute. As the evidence unveils, Daley's convention performance of a year ago will—in the public mind, if not in the courts—either be vindicated or exposed for the crypto-Fascist action it was. Nixon, too, will be affected, for public opinion will tie him to it even though neither the law nor the case is of his doing.

Nixon, significantly, never criticized Daley's handling of the convention, even when it was politically expedient for him to do so. It is to the Daley-Nixon interests to see the prosecution succeed as the trial can have as great a long-term effect on the nation as it may on the future of Richard J. Daley.

One is ultimately reminded of Clark Kissinger's acute observation that perhaps we might elect a reform mayor some day; we might even elect a reform city council. Then what would we have? Detroit.

KENYA'S ASIAN OUTCASTS

STANLEY MEISLER
Mr. Meisler, Africa correspondent for the Los Angeles Times, was formerly deputy director of the Office of Evaluation and Research in the Peace Corps.

Nairobi

Walk down the frenzied, color-splashed side streets of Nairobi where most people do their shopping. This is Africa, but for block after block, the signs on the dukas, as the shops are called, evoke India and Pakistan: Ganijee Glass Mart, Indian Emporium, Patel & Co., Shah & Sons, Ghela Manek, Hindustan Boot Co., Bombay Sweet Mart. Most of the shops of downtown Nairobi are in the hands of Indians and Pakistanis. Wearing Benares saris and Punjabi pants and Sikh turbans, these shopkeepers and their families, with their jet black hair, enormous black eyes and pale brown skin, living in a land run by African blacks, are the most visible evidence of the gravest minority problem in East Africa today.

There are 350,000 Asians, as the Indians and Pakistanis are called here, among East Africa's 29 million people. About half of them live in Kenya, a quarter in Tanzania, a quarter in Uganda. They are the shopkeepers, clerks, artisans and foremen of East Africa, resented and often despised by the Africans who feel cut off from the economies of their own countries. The Asians fill just those jobs and places that Africans believe they now have enough experience and training to take.

Although they are called Asians, many either were born in East Africa or have spent most of their lives there. They consider East Africa home. Yet few have taken African citizenship, even when it was offered to them with little red tape by the African governments at independence. Made up of tight communities that never mixed much with Africans, the Asians believed that British citizenship, granted to them by the British colonial government, would be more valuable in the long run. Britain, however, has succumbed to its racial hysteria and refused entry to all but a few of the East African Asians, despite their so-called British passports. Though many are skilled, sophisticated and Westernized, the Asians now find that few countries welcome them. Even India and Pakistan, overpopulated and impoverished, do not really want them, nor do they want to go there.

Despite the recent panic and publicity over the problem, the East African governments have so far done little more than apply a bit of legal pressure to move Asians out of some shops, sales jobs and clerk positions. But the moves have frightened the Asians, causing a number of skilled and professional people to emigrate and many shop owners to stop ordering goods from abroad. The resulting depression and confusion have persuaded government officials, particularly in Kenya, to ease the pressure somewhat. The long-term goal, however, is clear: the African governments want their Asian populations reduced considerably.

Asians have lived on the coast of East Africa for hundreds of years, though not in large numbers. By 1866, 6,000 were here. They monopolized the shops and financed Arab ivory and slaving caravans into the interior.

The main influx, however, came at the turn of the 20th century. The British brought in 32,000 Indian laborers to build the railway from Mombasa on the coast to Lake Victoria in Uganda. After the job was finished, 7,000 remained in East Africa. Other Asians, encouraged by the British, followed the railway inland and set up shops at the stations along the line. The British also used Indians as troops to put down tribal uprisings and as clerks in the government service. Until white settlers from Britain and South Africa arrived in Kenya in substantial numbers, East Africa was ruled by the British almost as a province of India. In fact, all trade was in rupees. Indian emigration to East Africa continued over the years until independence. From 1959 through 1962, for example, the net influx was more than 5,000.

The Asian took a middle position in the stratified society that developed in the 20th century. He was inferior to the white settler but better situated than the African. Like the latter, he could not own land in the white highlands of central Kenya, but until the years just before independence he always had more representation than the African on the legislative council. His economic power was second only to that of the white man. The white man had the farmlands, the big trading firms and political power; the Asian had the small shops and some larger stores; the African had nothing.

Now there is a new order; the governments and political power of East Africa belong to the Africans. However, the shops, factories and banks, East Africa's wholesaling, distributing and importing, its whole private economy, still belong almost entirely to Asians and whites. On Kenyatta Avenue, Nairobi's main street, thirty-one businesses and shops are run by Asians, thirteen by Europeans and only one by an African. No independent country, let alone a new, sensitive country, would tolerate an alien monopoly over its economy for long. In a developing country, the monopoly is even more intolerable because it closes off one of the means of developing initiative and incentive in the people.

The problem could be solved with little uprooting of the Asians if East Africa had dynamic industrial economies developing fast enough to pull in great numbers of Africans. The Asians could hold onto the jobs and shops they had, while all new jobs and shops were reserved for Africans. But the economies are too sluggish for that. The average African has a chance for a job or a shop only if the government pushes aside an Asian to make room for him.

The troubles of the Asians are heightened by the resentment that most Africans feel toward Asian shopkeepers—the dukawallahs who own small family shops. Africans look on them as exploiters who have cheated African customers for years. The plight of a shopkeeper who must give up his work of a lifetime draws little or no sympathy from African officials. In fact, even well-educated, important officials sometimes grow incensed almost to the point of rage when they talk about the dukawallah. The clannishness of the Asian does nothing to dispel the image of exploitation.

Since Kenya has the most Asians, other African countries usually follow its lead in dealing with Asians. So far, Kenya has tried two ways of loosening the Asian hold on its economy—work permits and trading licenses. These have reduced Kenya's Asian population by at least 10,000.

As the first device, the Kenya National Assembly passed an act that forbade noncitizens to work in Kenya without special permits. The government then ordered all noncitizen clerks and sales help to apply for the permits. They were the first targets because they held the jobs that Africans wanted immediately. Many Asian clerks and sales help were refused permits, and this triggered a well-publicized Asian exodus in early 1968.

Hundreds of Asians rushed to Nairobi airport every week to fill charter planes to Britain. Not all were clerks and sales help; many other Asians, the future suddenly etched for them, decided it was time to leave. The exodus was intensified by Asian fears that Britain would soon close its doors to them, and in a few months the fears were justified. Britain decided to limit the immigration of Commonwealth residents, even those with British passports, to 1,500 a year. That stopped the panic exodus, but Asians have been steadily leaving since then. Some qualify under the new British regulations, some return to India and Pakistan, others head for countries like Canada that need their skills.

The second push was the Trade Licensing Act, which the Kenya Government passed in late 1967, but did not use until early this year. It licensed all traders and required noncitizens to have special permission to trade in any area of Kenya except central Nairobi, central Mombasa and four smaller towns, these being designated "general business areas." The act also authorized the government to publish a list of goods that could be sold throughout the country only by citizens.

Earlier this year, the government ordered 750 Asian shopkeepers to shut down. This was a small percentage of the 9,000 dukawallahs in Kenya, but the action panicked the businessmen. They were particularly shocked because a number of those refused licenses were dukawallahs in the "general business areas," and a handful were citizens.

Mwai Kibaki, the Minister of Commerce and Industry, was pressed to explain why the government had refused licenses to some traders in the general business areas. He replied that the government had decided to reserve certain shops on the major streets of the big towns for Africans, because Africans have too difficult a time getting these shops on their own. But, he went on, Asians who received notices to stop business should not interpret this "as denial of permission to trade in the general business areas. They only apply to specific premises." In short, the law allows Asians to trade in the general business areas, but does not guarantee them the right to keep their present shops.

There was even more confusion about the citizens who had been refused trading licenses. Officials hinted privately that this had been a mistake by some minor bureaucrats, and the government did change its decision in some of these cases. But it never made a public announcement acknowledging error. Moreover, the Ministry of Information, in a statement denying discrimination against Asian citizens, said the government had the right to redress imbalances and fulfill its obligations to African citizens "who suffered gross inequalities in the past."

The government drive against dukawallahs touched off different reactions from Asian businessmen. One old man, refused a license, stood in his River Road grocery and said, in Hindi: "I was pleased with the notice. Now I can retire and go back to India." He had lived in Kenya for thirty-five years and had owned the grocery for thirty-four, but he was not a citizen.

His grandson stood by. He had been studying in Britain but had come home when he learned that the shop would close. "We did not expect this at all," he said angrily in English. "This is a general business area."

On another street, the owner of a corner store was bitter. He served lunches and tea in his shop and sold small items like cigarettes and candy. With resentful precision, he listed the items he could no longer carry because he was not a Kenya citizen: "cigarettes, matches, sweets, biscuits, nails. . . ." The list droned on. His business had dropped 50 per cent since January 1. Despite this, he did not intend to sell his shop. He thought he could rebuild a good business by switching to goods that noncitizens had the right to sell.

The Kenya Government has grown testy over criticism of its policies toward Asians. For one thing, officials are angry that the world refuses to look on these Asians as foreigners monopolizing the economy of someone else's country. In addition, Africans believe that the Asians, hoping to persuade the British Government to increase the immigration quota, have tried to drum up sympathy for their plight.

In a recent speech, President Kenyatta said: "These people were given two years to decide their future, and they should not blame us." Kenyatta was referring to a two-year period after independence in 1963 when all Asians could apply for citizenship without undergoing a naturalization process. About 14,000 Asians became citizens then, but the applications of 3,000 to 4,000 others are still pending. Another 4,000 Asians have applied since.

"Let them not cry," Kenyatta went on, "for we gave them enough time to decide their future. I do not have any sympathy for these people. They go and say that the Kenya Government threw them out, but they did this themselves. They are now trying to raise cries everywhere that they are not being treated fairly. Let them go to Britain, India or the Arabian countries, or wherever they choose to belong."

The Asians sometimes get a similar cold shoulder from their fellows who did become citizens. "As one who has been exhorting Asians for four successive years to identify themselves completely with the country in which they have lived and prospered for so long," says Asian journalist Narain Singh, "I can work up no sympathy for them."

It is not sure, however, that the Asian plight would be eased today if almost all Asians had sought citizenship. "I don't think it mattered," says a young Asian lawyer who is a citizen. "The fact that so few Asians took out citizenship has made the government seem magnanimous. It has made it easy for the government. It can say all citizens, regardless of race, are entitled to jobs and shops and still get rid of most of the Asians. If all Asians were citizens, I think the laws would say jobs and shops must go not to Kenya citizens but to Kenya citizens of African origin."

The government's program of Africanizing the jobs of the Asians may run into trouble in at least one area. In business, the Kenya Government may find it easier to push Asians out than to move Africans in. Most Africans in Kenya have little education and less credit. Officials of the Ministry of Commerce and Industry say that small African businessmen often keep books badly, overestimate profits, and overspend. They usually dip into shop funds to give money to the many poor relatives who hang around a successful African. With little experience, they make elementary mistakes, stocking the wrong goods at the wrong time. Many fail to concentrate on their business, and many refuse to put any profits back into it. Unless the government mounts a huge training program, there is a danger that the departing Asian shopkeeper will be replaced by a bankrupt African shopkeeper.

The Kenya trade licensing system may also cause trouble because it permits officials to choose one African over another after the Asian has left. This could create a class of fat-cat African businessmen—the few Africans with capital and experience and political pull getting most of the shops. They might be resented as much by the African masses as are the Asian businessmen today. Poor people never seem to like shopkeepers. A group of ten economists at the University College of Nairobi recently warned the government that "licensing should not be used to confer monopoly powers and benefits on a select group of citizen traders and businessmen. . . . If experience in other countries is any guide, the system . . . is likely to provide new opportunities and strong temptations for a wide variety of corrupt practices."

The future for the Asian in Kenya and the rest of East Africa is shadowed. Of course, there are hopeful signs. As the percentage of Asians decreases, the hatred of them may lessen as well. As long as the laws talk in terms of citizenship instead of race, Asian citizens may expect relative freedom to operate in East Africa. The Asian population has skills that are needed by the large business corporations that have come to East Africa from Europe and America; as long as business wants these craftsmen and foremen, influential corporations will put pressure on the Kenya Government to slow down Africanization.

But these hopeful signs wilt in the heat of anti-Asian hatred. In many ways, it has reached a pitch akin to the anti-Ibo feeling in Northern Nigeria in the years before the Ibo massacres of 1966. The Africans want a large number of Asians to leave. Bowing to this popular mood and sharing in it, the political leaders will probably try to cut down the number of Asians as far as they can without crippling the economy. There will be terrible personal grief and calamity in all this, but the privileged position of the Asian will have to disintegrate under the force of race and nationalism.

THE HOOVER INSTITUTION

COLD-WAR SCHOLARSHIP

PETER S. STERN
Mr. Stern teaches in the History Department of Stanford University.

In early July, the Nixon Administration named Roger A. Freeman, senior staff member of Stanford University's Hoover Institution on War, Revolution and Peace, to the post of White House economic adviser. Mr. Freeman is the fourth Hoover staffer to join the new Administration, the others being Richard V. Allen, aide to Henry A. Kissinger, and Dennis J. Doolin and Yuan-Li Wu, Deputy Assistant Secretaries of Defense.

These moves, following on Ronald Reagan's appointment of Hoover's director, W. Glenn Campbell, to the University of California Board of Regents, has suggested to many that the institution has close ties with the right wing of the Republican Party. Its critics have called it "a haven for Goldwater men" (The Wall Street Journal, June 2, 1967), "a cold-war college think tank" (Washington Monthly, June 1969) and "one of the world's main centers of counterinsurgency research" (at a radical Stanford student meeting this spring), while its defenders have praised its objective contributions and its unique historical collections.

The Hoover has not always been a source of government appointees, nor so prominently associated with the right wing of the GOP. Herbert Hoover founded it in 1919, when he gave President Ray Lyman Wilbur of Stanford $50,000 "for an historical collection on the Great War." The collection grew rapidly as young historians combed Europe for books, documents and newspapers from the war period. A grant from the Rockefeller Foundation in 1927 supported research projects on Russia and Germany and led to the institution's first publications. After World War II the scope of the collection expanded into Africa, Asia, Latin America and the Middle East, and became of unmatched value for study of the 20th century.

By 1950, the institution was a respected research center. Its financial problems were severe, however, for the next ten years, until the present director undertook a drive for funds that raised its budget from less than $400,000 a year to nearly $2 million. The institution has published more than 100 books since 1960, as compared with fifty-four during its first forty years. New acquisitions are up nearly 300 per cent from the 1959 level.

This remarkable growth has coincided with mounting criticism that the institution is a disseminator of cold-war propaganda rather than of scholarly research. A reviewer for the Times Literary Supplement (April 27, 1967) wrote: "It seems a pity that, at a time when the cold war is abating elsewhere, the publications of the Hoover Institution should be apparently inspired by so keen an ambition to keep it going." Members of the April 3rd Movement, a coalition which obtained the support of more than 1,500 persons in the university community for its occupation of a Stanford laboratory this spring, twice proposed that the institution be taken over. Faculty members have objected to the biased views and unscholarly work of some of the institution staff.

Mr. Hoover's own statements about the purpose of the institution are ambiguous. When he dedicated the 285-ft. tower in 1941, the former President said: "The purpose of this institution is to promote peace. Its records stand as a challenge to those who promote war. They should attract those who search for peace." But eighteen years later, he wrote: "The purpose of this instituion must be, by its research and publications, to demonstrate the evils of the doctrines of Karl Marx . . . thus to protect the American way of life from such ideologies, their conspiracies, and to reaffirm the validity of the American way of life. The overall mission of this institution is . . . to recall the voice of experience against making war. . . ." While the same concern for peace is present in both these statements, Hoover's 1959 words define a new goal: the exposure of Marxist evils.

During its first forty years, the Hoover was relatively noncontroversial. Its directors—E. H. Adams, Ralph H. Lutz, Harold H. Fisher and C. Easton Rothwell—came from academic backgrounds. They built up the holdings, issued document collections and infrequent monographs. According to a 1946 resolution of the Stanford trustees, the university's president was to name the institution's chairman and other officers. It was considered an academic department; its director reported through the dean of the graduate division. Financial support came from special foundation grants, private gifts and a contribution from the university which amounted to $125,000 per year in 1956-59. The professional staff, in contrast to the two dozen researchers employed at present, was quite small. Collection curators did research and teaching. As Harold H. Fisher, the director from 1944 to 1952, put it: "We never thought of this as being primarily a publishing enterprise. It had begun as a kind of personal collection."

The greatest changes in the Hoover since 1959 seem to be of size and scope: more researchers, more publications, more services to users. In fact, there is a marked difference in another aspect of activity—the public utterances of its staff members. Far from being a charter sponsor of the cold war, the institution's spokesmen sought an understanding of the international crisis. During the first year of the Korean War, Harold Fisher stated that the world was big enough to hold both communism and democracy. He called for a militant defense of democratic principles, to prove false the Communist theory of democratic collapse. In "A Foreign Policy for Free Men" (The Pacific Spectator, Spring, 1952), he struck at the danger of "allowing fear to direct our policies to the neglect of principle."

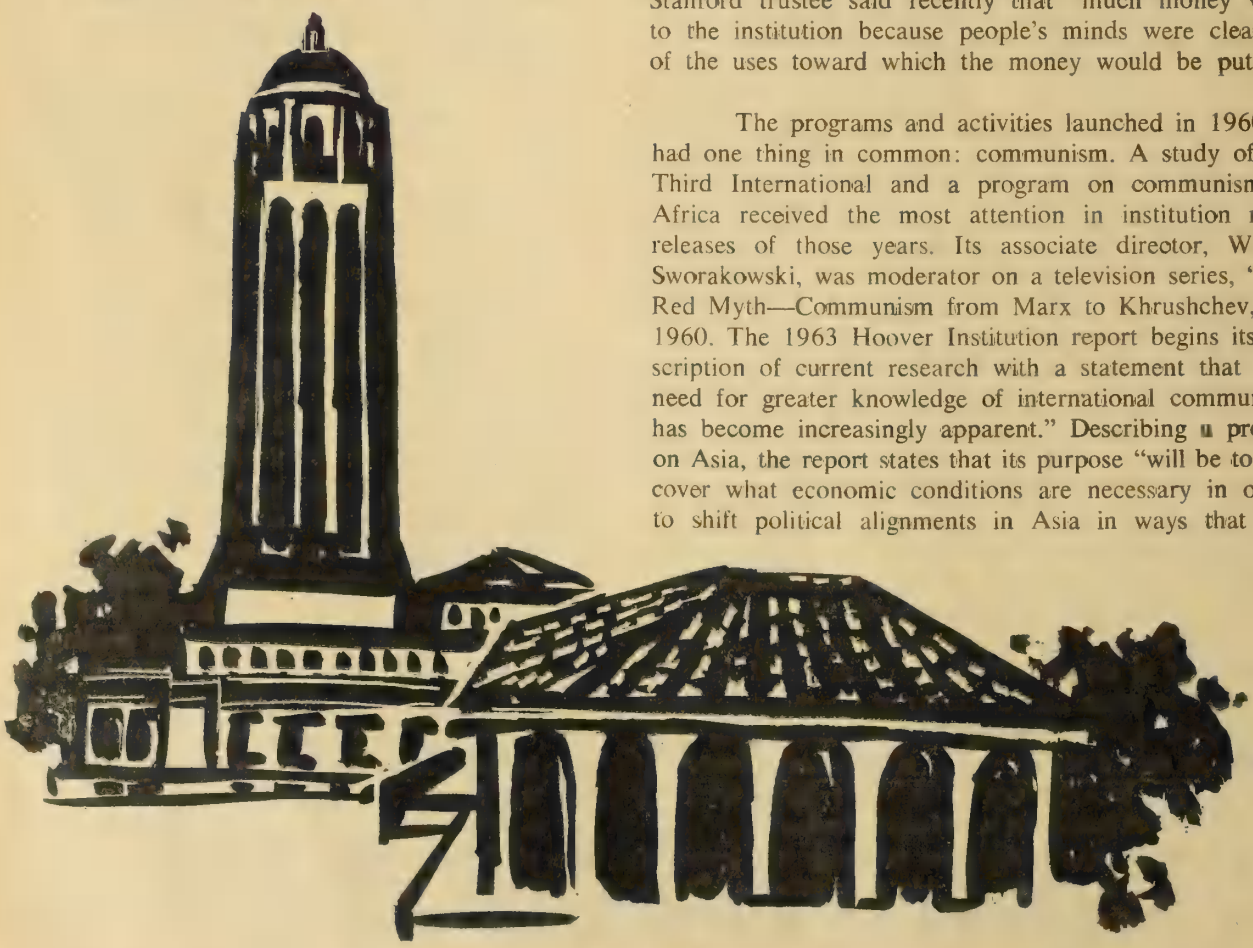
At a 1954 alumni conference, Fisher said: "It is disturbing to observe a tendency to assume that all we need to preserve peace and freedom is deadlier bombs, and more of them. . . . And yet it is surely true that politically it is much wiser to talk a New Look defense policy that gets bigger bangs for fewer bucks than to talk about . . . liberalized tariff and trade policies and educational exchange programs that cost bucks and produce no bangs." The speeches of Fisher and Rothwell, his successor as director from 1952 to 1959, strove to maintain a climate of opinion in the United States which would be both favorable to peace and conscious of the threat to peace represented by the Soviet Union. Furthermore, both sought to defend the principles of American democracy during the McCarthy era. Such views have not been heard from the institution in the past decade.

Although a major endowment campaign was launched in 1956, financial support was thin during the late 1950s. Despite the creation of a special trustees' committee and the expansion of the advisory board from eight to twenty-three members, donations dropped from more than $215,000 in 1956-57 to $128,408 in 1958-59. The research and publications budget nearly vanished. A ranking executive of the institution went so far as to recommend that the collections be merged with the Stanford library.

Hoover himself was outraged, and when Rothwell resigned in 1959, to become president of Mills College, he prevailed upon Stanford's president, J. E. Wallace Sterling, to approve a restructuring of the relationship between the institution and the university. The Hoover Committee of the Trustees accepted the new arrangement on May 20, 1959.

What is apparent from these proceedings is that Mr. Hoover had forced the hands of the university. According to one Stanford trustee, a growing rift had developed between Mr. Hoover and the university. The trustees were "trying to bring about a rapprochement between those forces which were growing further and further apart. Dr. Sterling had supported the resolution, and if he could accept it, then we would accept it."

Unmindful of the investigation being pursued by an informal faculty search committee, Mr. Hoover chose Dr. W. Glenn Campbell, director of research for the American Enterprise Association, upon the recommendation of former New Dealer Raymond Moley, and got his man off to a good start by launching a fund-raising drive. He circulated a brochure containing his statement of purpose, and the money began to roll in. Hoover also attempted to suppress a book which had been written at the institution and was in proofs at the Stanford University Press, because it did not adequately prove the evils of communism. To the credit of all concerned, his objection was passed over and the book appeared at the end of 1959; but resentment engendered by this incident still lingers.



Early the next year, members of the faculty obtained copies of Hoover's "evils of Karl Marx" statement and circulated them on campus. The resulting uproar involved students, faculty and staff for several months. Campbell added to the controversy by saying to a student reporter, who had been "prepared" for his interview by members of the Stanford community: "There are evils in Marxism, and I hope we expose them." Campbell was speaking for himself and the statement was natural enough from a conservative Republican, but it was taken out of context to signify institutional policy. A heated exchange between the faculty and the trustees was finally resolved when President Sterling, speaking in academic council on April 1, 1960, stated that "no research that is bona fide and worthy of the name can be undertaken with predetermined conclusions." As to the institution's policies, "These are and will be controlled by the trustees . . . on recommendation of the president of the University." The director's recommendations "will be placed under presidential review. . . . I assure you that this review will include intensive scrutiny. . . ."

Under these inauspicious beginnings, Campbell began to shape a program and build a staff for his institution. Since, despite what one might infer from the above paragraph, he has had virtually a free hand in staff selection and institutional policy, any evaluation of the institution's record must begin with him. Campbell holds his doctorate from Harvard, where he taught economics for five years before going to the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. He went to the American Enterprise Association (now the American Enterprise Institute for Public Policy Research) in 1954. This organization was created in 1943 to analyze legislative bills. Its reports favor free enterprise and criticize big government. In 1956, the AEA created the Institute for Social Science Research, a study group which Campbell helped to direct. In 1962, the parent group was instrumental in establishing the Center for Strategic Studies at Georgetown, "to study the elements and purposes of strategy in free and totalitarian societies." The leanings of the AEA and its spin-off groups are markedly Republican; William Baroody, an executive in all three groups, was Barry Goldwater's principal brain truster in 1964.

The new director brought several of his colleagues from the AEA to the institution's advisory board, expanding it from twenty-seven to fifty-six members by 1962. Regardless of one's attitude toward Campbell's politics, his fund-raising acumen is outstanding. His new board included representatives from all sectors of the American economy and represented fifteen states and the District of Columbia. Operating from this broad base, Campbell brought in $758,154 of expendable funds in 1967-68, more than 500 per cent of the 1958-59 totals. Of the twenty-five largest contributors in 1967-68, fourteen originated in present or past membership on the advisory board.

Campbell denies that any special interest in anti-communism brought in the funds. He asserts that people gave because of Mr. Hoover's reputation and because of the dynamic role that he planned for the institution. Perhaps so. As I shall show in a moment, the scholarly level of the publications produced since 1960 has been high; but corporation executives do not read scholarly works in history and political science. They are more likely to be influenced by public statements, articles in U.S. News & World Report and the National Review. Since 1960, Hoover staff members have used such statements and articles to criticize the Soviet Union, the Chinese economy, the welfare state, aid to Yugoslavia, trade with the Eastern bloc, federal aid to education, the old Left, the New Left and the United Nations. Campbell supports the public utterances of his staff, and one is led to conlude that the primary function of some of them is to attract financial support by making anti-Communist, pro-free-enterprise speeches. A spokesman for one donor, the Allen-Bradley Company, told a Wall Street Journal reporter in 1967: "One of our basic policies is to support anti-Communist and conservative institutions." Seeking to explain Campbell's success, a Stanford trustee said recently that "much money went to the institution because people's minds were clear as of the uses toward which the money would be put."

The programs and activities launched in 1960-61 had one thing in common: communism. A study of the Third International and a program on communism in Africa received the most attention in institution news releases of those years. Its associate director, Witold Sworakowski, was moderator on a television series, "The Red Myth—Communism from Marx to Khrushchev," in 1960. The 1963 Hoover Institution report begins its description of current research with a statement that "the need for greater knowledge of international communism has become increasingly apparent." Describing a project on Asia, the report states that its purpose "will be to discover what economic conditions are necessary in order to shift political alignments in Asia in ways that will benefit the interests of the free world." Hoover personnel defend the shift of programs toward communism by saying that the institution's resources are strong in that area. True, but the institution's own descriptive literature hints at the didactic purposes of such investigation.

The first of the "New Course" volumes appeared in 1963: the ponderous 1,000-page National Security, proceedings of a conference held that January at the Center for Strategic Studies. Reviewers for Ordnance, the National Review and Military Review liked it, as did The Washington Post reviewer, Robert A. Kilmarx, who found the book outstanding because it would encourage the public to support defense expenditures. In his introduction, Arleigh Burke, retired admiral and board member of Freedoms Foundation, asserted America's responsibility to defend every corner of the world "from the efforts of the Communists to destroy all freedom." His recommended strategy was "to take the initiative toward the elimination of the Communists from positions of power, thus causing the erosion of the Communist system. . . ."

Along with new programs, Campbell went about selecting a strong staff, many of them coming from groups with which Campbell has been associated. On the senior staff he established Roger A. Freeman, who had written for the AEA and had been vice president of the Institute for Social Science Research, and Richard V. Allen, who joined the institution in 1966 from the Center for Strategic Studies. Other staff members from the "business-conservative" establishment include James R. Hobson, information officer, who met Campbell during the Goldwater campaign; Alan H. Belmont, a friend of the Baroody family, who is Campbell's executive assistant, and Brien Benson, publications director, the son of Campbell's former colleague George Benson at the Institute for Social Science Research. Another tie with conservatism is through the Intercollegiate Studies Institute, where Allen, Karl Brandt and Stefan Possony of Hoover sit on the advisory board with Gerhart Niemeyer, Allen's professor from Notre Dame, and William R. Kintner of the Foreign Policy Research Institute. Two of Stanford's conservative publications, Arena and Western Politica, were published with considerable aid from Hoover staff members.

All of this proves nothing more than the old adage that "like attracts like." At a university whose faculty is predominately liberal, an institution which has many conservatives might provide a balancing factor. It all depends on how the ideas are presented. Furthermore, appointments have gone to moderates and liberals, like Theodore Draper, Peter Duignan, director of African Studies, and Dennis J. Doolin, a Stanford Ph.D. in political science. The collection curators and the library personnel, who handle 90 per cent of the contact with scholars using Hoover material, are technically competent and politically noncontroversial.

The conservative slant of so many staff members has led critics to discredit the publications and the sponsored research of the Hoover. While some of the senior staff is open to the charge that their work is unscholarly and polemical, most of the major publications bearing the Hoover imprint stand up quite well under professional scrutiny. Hoover's books fall into three categories: major monographs, shorter studies and bibliographies. The second and third groups have, with rare exceptions, been lavishly praised for making available to the scholarly community much needed research tools. Thirty-two of Hoover's major publications from 1962 to 1967 were reviewed in the major professional journals; six were considered excellent, thirteen good, seven fair, and only five were severely attacked. Of these five, three were considered deficient on polemical or ideological grounds.

These favorable results are to be expected, since many of Hoover's books are published by reputable university presses. Further, the research and publications subcommittee has rejected manuscripts submitted by the institution's own staff members, and by leading conservatives from the outside, because of unscholarly approach; so it cannot be charged that Hoover's publications furnish an outlet for a one-sided view of history.

But if the institution's publications meet the test of scholarship, can the publications of its senior staff do as well? The Hoover can be criticized for leaning to the right, but unless such a stance obscures the scholarly pursuit of truth, the criticism does not have much merit. One has to measure the scholarly output of the staff, against its outside activity, to see how the members' time has been spent since they came to the Hoover.

Possony is frequently singled out as an ardent cold warrior who has written much since 1961, when he came to the Hoover, but little of scholarly value. He had previously written several serious volumes on strategy. Many persons assume from his title, director of the International Political Studies Program, that he enjoys great influence. It should be pointed out that this "program" consists of Possony, his secretary and one research associate. Furthermore, Possony does not sit on the research and publications subcommittee. While he has a work on strategy under way—Campbell has said that "he'd better finish it soon"—most of Possony's activity since 1961 has been in propagating the cold war. His writings include two political brochures; a contribution to the above mentioned National Security; a paper on "the nuclear trigger," which advocates sharing nuclear weapons with NATO countries; two brief papers on the Comintern which reviewers find polemical and contradictory; a volume of selections from Lenin's writings; a biography of that leader; a racist, elitist tract entitled The Geography of Intellect; and an essay published in Germany on war guilt.

Possony's only real "book" since 1961 is the above mentioned Lenin: The Compulsive Revolutionary (Chicago, 1964). It is an astonishing book. The American Historical Review (October 1964) states that conjectural or trivial comments dominate the post-1914 sections. "The author displays boundless curiosity," the reviewer wrote, "but amid the quest down every trail through the thickets of hearsay, Lenin disappears from view among the underbrush." The reviewer for Soviet Studies (July 1966) states: "This book is a systematic summary of all the conspiratorial theories advanced by the various losers of the Russian revolution. . . . These theories are supported by evidence which, at least in the form in which he presents it, is inconclusive."

Possony has been doing other things than writing about Lenin. His public appearances, speeches, articles for Orbis, the American Security Council and U.S. News & World Report, at the rate of more than six a year, have pounded home the message he delivered when he arrived at Stanford in December 1961: the United States must build new weapons, test more bombs and share the wealth with NATO. Among his other favorite themes is that the Republic of South Africa's policies are "designed to operate to the mutual benefit of all groups." (Commonwealth Club speech, November 1966.) It can legitimately be argued that Possony has spent his time since 1961 in polemical discussion of public policy issues rather than in the objective, scholarly pursuit of truth. It would be better for the university and for the Hoover Institution if he either resumed his scholarly career on a full-time basis or associated himself with a real right-wing think tank. In a free society his ideas should find an outlet, but they ring false when issuing from an institution pursuing the scholarly study of threats to peace.

Richard V. Allen also has a reputation as a professional anti-Communist. He came on the staff in 1966 to edit the Yearbook on International Communist Affairs, but, like Possony, has spent considerable time on the lecture circuit. He advocates an unyielding, vigilant stance toward the Communist bloc, which he sees as a perennial threat to the United States. The nature of this threat rendered premature any consular exchange with the Soviet Union, Allen told the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in 1967. Before coming to the Hoover, Allen worked for the Center for Strategic Studies, for which he co-authored East-West Trade, a brief study which concludes that such trade is good for the Communists and bad for the West. He wrote Peace or Peaceful Coexistence for the American Bar Association. It is an analysis of Soviet statements which asserts that the Communist goal is "the final destruction of the free world and its way of life." Allen also shared in the writing of Democracy and Communism: Theory and Practice, a high-school textbook which not unexpectedly concludes that democracy is good, while communism is evil. When his doctorate is finally approved and published in this country, Allen may then be able to establish a scholarly reputation. Until then, he will continue to be better known as an anti-Communist than as a scholar.

Other staff members have done better. Lewis H. Gann, an expert on Africa, has published several works on Rhodesia which have been well received by his African history colleagues. Burden of Empire, a Hoover study which Gann co-authored with Peter Duignan, has received excellent professional reviews, despite its unorthodox defense of imperialist contributions to Africa. Milorad Drachkovitch, an expert on European socialism, has been outspoken in defense of his adopted country's Vietnamese policy and in criticism of the New Left; but as editor of six volumes on the Communist International and the Soviet Union, he has made available to scholars a wealth of valuable material. Roger A. Freeman, a conservative's conservative, has been the only free-market economist active on the Stanford campus since 1962. While his prolific outpouring of articles and speeches on reduction of government intervention in the economy, tax credits for college tuition, cutback of federal domestic spending, and opposition to the progressive feature of the income tax has made him a liberal target, Freeman does keep the "market place of ideas" concept alive by teaching frequent colloquia, and by presenting his arguments in good faith and with trenchant wit.

So it cannot be said that success has spoiled the Hoover Institution. While the direction of its research programs in the early sixties merits criticism, its outstanding publications and current research program—more than 100 projects are currently pending—are praiseworthy. The conservative stance of many on the staff is undeniable, but only a few of them can be charged with producing unscholarly work. In the past few years, most have become more restrained in public utterances. The organization of a conference this coming autumn on "Peaceful Change in Modern Society," supervised by E. Berkely Tompkins, the most recent addition to the senior staff, will give the institution a chance to turn back to the pursuit of peace.

This collection of more than 900,000 volumes, 26,000 newspapers, 150,000 government publications, and 1,600 archival deposits has been open to all users, regardless of political inclination. Annual research fellowships put this material at the disposition of visiting scholars of liberal or conservative bent. The consortium project, a resource-sharing venture which will merge the collections of some dozen Western libraries, was initiated by the Hoover to enlarge access to its facilities.

With Campbell as director, the Hoover will continue to have good relations with the Nixon Administration. It is believed that his influence in the Republican Party was in no small way responsible for the appointment of David Packard, a Stanford trustee, and G. Warren Nutter, who has ties with the Center for Strategic Studies, to their Pentagon posts, as well as for the appointments of Freeman, Allen, Doolin and Wu.

At a moment when the administration, the students and the faculty of Stanford University are reappraising the goals and operational methods of higher education, all parties should re-evaluate the Hoover's standing in the community. Dr. Campbell, and his new associate director, Prof. Richard F. Staar, have indicated a willingness to effect a rapprochement. Since the institution has obtained the sound financial backing, both in annual giving and in endowment, that Campbell sought when he arrived here in 1960, it can continue to expand all aspects of its operation while returning to a less committed ideological position.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Technocracy: Despotism of Beneficent Expertise

THEODORE ROSZAK

Mr. Roszak's book, The Making of a Counter Culture: Reflections on the Technocratic Society and Its Youthful Opposition (based on a series of articles that appeared in The Nation*) will be released by Doubleday in September.*

Our society advances toward technocracy along many paths. The authors assembled here for review help us count the ways. Some—bravura technicians like Buckminster Fuller—crusade flamboyantly toward the regime of scientific expertise, flying banners in behalf of an outré social engineering whose goal is nothing short of "world planning." Others, like the members of the Pittsburgh Values Project, smooth the way more subtly by laboring to convert our capacities for evaluation and taste into a new behavioral technics accessible only to the academic specialist. Some, like the industrialist Simon Ramo, seek to clear the obstacles of traditional politics from our line of advance by entrusting our social problems to the objective competence of the systems analysts. Others, like Michael Reagan investigating the nearly total dependence of science on federal patronage, speed us along our way by celebrating the virtues of the alliance, while assuring us that any vices accruing can be easily adjusted by vigilant administration within the corridors of power. Even those like Victor Ferkiss who view the journey with a critical eye, contribute to our progress toward technocracy by conceding far more to the technician's world-view than their humanistic instincts should permit. The result is frail resistance in the face of a massive historical movement whose seriousness we underestimate at the peril of our human dignity.

No doubt there is room to disagree about the extent to which a technocratic totalitarianism has been developing in our society. I believe we have gone too far in this direction and that the technocracy, despite the stubborn survival in our midst of sundry flat-earthers and dilettante occultists (as well as a growing population of hip young swamis), looks more like the wave of the future for all industrialized nations, regardless of official ideology, than anything else now in sight. In any event, a lively concern for that prospect is the best touchstone for evaluating the burgeoning literature on technology and society. Is the writer aware of the technocratic possibility? Does he welcome or resist it? Is he aware of the force technocratic tendencies exert upon our politics and our total culture, of the costs and losses to which they can lead? Such are the questions I find myself persistently asking whenever I come upon still another diagnosis of our high industrial agonies.

Technocracy, Jean Meynaud says in his important anatomy of the beast, stems from "the pressure of technology on the political system." It is the demand "that politics be reduced to technics." The seed from which technocratic politics sprouts first blossoms in the field of industrial invention and organization, the obvious province of technical intelligence. But the high yield which man's engineering talents achieve there, bolstered by the technician's claim to scientific rationality, eventually encourages the same habits of mind to embrace social life as a whole. As Meynaud puts it:

> Founded on the advances of scientific thought . . . modern technique becomes, in its broadest sense, all those methods which allow man to make best use of existing resources to satisfy his material needs and common ideals. . . . Technique is not confined to a limited sector of society: it is society looked at from a certain perspective.

The perspective, that is, of technician and scientific intellectual.

Regarded in this light, as a product of both the scientific and industrial revolutions, technocracy assumes a formidable cultural momentum. Its legitimacy reaches deep into all that modern Western man has come to consider good, true and beautiful: affluence, empirical knowledge, and prodigious material power over his environment. As a social form, it is the irresistibly logical consequence of what science tells us reality is and of what technicians tell us can rationally be done to manipulate that reality.

The essays in Lynn White's Machina Ex Deo provide a keen examination of the larger cultural context out of which our science and technology evolve. His book—which includes the superb essay, "The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crisis"—is a model of concerned and elegantly literate scholarship for the general reader. One could not ask for a more sensitive approach to the now submerged religious origins of industrialism: "the sources of our faith in science today and . . . the wellsprings of motivation that lead man to pursue science."

White is far more sanguine about the prospects of a "new humanism" arising among the engineers than I can be. As a medievalist, he tends to see scientists and technicians as still the free spirits and rugged individuals they were before they tasted power and the corruptions

TECHNOCRACY. By Jean Meynaud. Translated from the French by Paul Barnes. The Free Press. 315 pp. $9.95.

MACHINA EX DEO: Essays in the Dynamism of Western Culture. By Lynn White, Jr. The M.I.T. Press. 186 pp. $5.95.

EARTH HOUSE HOLD. By Gary Snyder. New Directions. 143 pp. $5. Paper $1.95.

OPERATING MANUAL FOR SPACESHIP EARTH. By R. Buckminster Fuller. Southern Illinois University Press. 143 pp. $4.25.

CURE FOR CHAOS: Fresh Solutions to Social Problems Through the Systems Approach. By Simon Ramo. David McKay Co. 116 pp. $3.95.

RUN, COMPUTER, RUN: The Mythology of Educational Innovation. By Anthony G. Oettinger, with Sema Marks. Harvard University Press. 322 pp. $5.95.

SCIENCE AND THE FEDERAL PATRON. By Michael D. Reagan. Oxford University Press. 352 pp. $7.50.

VALUES AND THE FUTURE: The Impact of Technological Change on American Values. (An Anthology from the Pittsburgh Values Project.) Edited by Kurt Baier and Nicholas Rescher. The Free Press. 527 pp. $14.95.

TECHNOLOGICAL MAN: The Myth and the Reality. By Victor Ferkiss. George Braziller. 336 pp. $7.95.

THE REVOLUTION OF HOPE: Towards a Humanized Technology. By Erich Fromm. Harper & Row. 162 pp. $5.95.

attending. The transition from "little science" to "big science" (to use Derek de Solla Price's terms) has taken a greater toll of the pristine ideals of scientist and engineer than White may realize. How much of the Christianity of the catacombs survived into the age of Innocent III? Perhaps as much of Galileo and Edison survive in the age of Edward Teller and C. P. Snow. Still, White is correct in identifying technology as "a prime spiritual achievement," an expression of mankind's tireless search for "a new order of plenty, of mobility, of personal freedom." It is only by drawing upon such vital desires that the technocrats could achieve the great moral and psychic power they hold over our allegiance. Technocracy, far from being only an opportunistic and cynical plot (and the worst social evils never are), is a proud, noetic citadel solidly based on all that scientific inquiry has accomplished after the dark millennia during which man was supposedly sunk in superstition, mythological guesswork and helpless bewilderment. The policies that emanate from the citadel are born of pure reason and generous intention; its custodians are those who qualify as disinterested experts in all aspects of life—or, at one highly important remove, those who control the services of such experts.

One senses how domineering the regime of experts has become when one recognizes the lengths to which contemporary radicalism must go in seeking to outflank its values and metaphysical assumptions. An eloquent example of such an effort is Gary Snyder's Earth House Hold which seeks to recall the ecological intelligence to be found in poetic and primitive life styles. For Snyder, who learned his social theory from Zen masters and redwood trees, our salvation depends upon recapturing the spirit of "the ancient shamanistic-yogic-socioeconomic view" in which there abide "the most archaic values on earth: . . . the fertility of the soil, the magic of animals, the power-vision in solitude, the terrifying initiation and rebirth, the love and ecstasy of the dance, the common work of the tribe."

The audience for Snyder's rhapsodic appeal is small, largely the young and the dropped out who cling on and make do, chanting mantras at the social margins; "the tribe" as Snyder calls them, referring to those like the sod brethren of the Berkeley People's Park whose delicate experiment in Arcadian communitarianism the Governor and University of California have determined to trounce out of existence. Unhappily, visionaries like Snyder are regarded as the heretics-in-residence of our pluralistic technocracy, and their words make light weight in the scales of power. Not that society is closed to visionary declarations. Visionary technology—of the World's Fair, science-fiction variety—easily wins spellbound regard; for the millions, it monopolizes the whole meaning of imaginative daring. They will starve their poor to finance Project Apollo; they will sacrifice their peace of mind to have supersonic airliners split the skies above their cities with the sound of progress; they wait with bated breath to have their gene pools programmed for the guaranteed production of talented and beautiful progeny. Those who speak the language of numbers and technologisms never lack for reverent if bewildered public attention, and the bolder the scientific impresarios become, the greater the awe and acquiescence. One hundred million Americans may attend church every Sunday, bringing with them superstitions and prejudices as old as the Stone Age. But when they exclaim rhetorically,

THE LODE
(for Ed Lahey)

I've watched you turn your face away a hundred times, withdrawing to the far side of the pit my eyes alone can follow.
Wanting to be with you I mine my own dark metal, as ignorant of terms as any woman.

In your troubled glass where copper glints back sunburn from your hair, gold is a lie to keep the race alive.
You will not meet me there. You drink alone.
Huge bones block your door. Eyes of stone, unclear, draw you underground. I cannot handle power or machines.

I want to lift the miner's mask that scares me less than terrors showing through.
You will not let me. I back off wounded as your childhood town with its Irish never-ending wake.

Years ago beside the dull Pacific
I dug my first expensive mine with no more capital than a bright child could borrow from aluminum sun, shafts of rain.
Days roll over me and still it wears somebody else's sign.

Tunnels stretch from my crumbling coast inland, far from any home. I must have met you there. Young enough to be the son I look for in the dark:
some image of a god as real as loss. Close as steel in my side.

I've walked behind you through a gaping town, nothing but nerve to hold me on the edge; felt your anger shake the few remaining houses and recognized this six-foot rage for love.

Machines more dangerous for being uninspected grind towards catastrophe, their gears held together by a common safety pin.
God is a one-eyed gambler.
Over his shoulder I watch the great lift lower out of light and sit here staring at these shiftless woman's hands.

SISTER MADELINE DeFREES

"Will wonders never cease!" it is the works of the engineers and not the works of God they have in mind.

Buckminster Fuller surely ranks as dean of the Promethean technicians. Certainly few exert greater personal magnetism among the "think big" younger generation of architects and engineers. Among Fuller's great schemes: his project to house the human race in prefabricated, helicopter-transported geodesic domes (Fuller's most famous and most overpraised invention) and the birth-certificate-universal-credit-card designed to operate anywhere on earth by means of a frequency tuned to the holder's genetic code. Now, in Fuller's latest book, the earth is stripped of its metaphorical motherhood and becomes instead a spaceship in need of nothing so much as properly trained "world planners" in its cockpit. The technocratic world-view could not ask for a more serviceable central image—though it will certainly require a less idiosyncratic "operating manual" than Fuller has to offer.

Some of Fuller's notions—like his "synergetic mathematics"—may have vaguely mystical implications. But he is careful always to protect the respectability of his bizarre brainstorming by disguising it as a form of omni-competent, global engineering. Like Marshall McLuhan, he is a great bamboozler: a combination of Buck Rogers and Horatio Alger. His intellectual repertory rarely includes a reference to artist, philosopher, poet or prophet. This, along with his anti-academic autodidacticism, makes him decidedly the technocrat Old Style. Yet he manages to lay ham-handedly on the line most of the tacit assumptions of the technocratic mentality: that it was only when man became a machine maker that he "began for the first time to really employ his intellect in the most important way"; that invention and efficient organization, embracing as they do the whole meaning of Reason and Progress, necessarily improve with increase; and that for every human problem there is a technical solution—sometimes a dazzlingly simple one. Thus: "You may . . . ask me how we are going to resolve the ever-acceleratingly dangerous impasse of world-opposed politicians and ideological dogmas. I answer, it will be resolved by the computer . . . all politicians can and will yield enthusiastically to the computer's safe flight-controlling capabilities in bringing all of humanity in for a happy landing."

To be sure, "General Systems Theory," the form of technical expertise Fuller recommends for the better piloting of "spaceship Earth," is intended to be ambitiously broad-gauged: the very antithesis of the myopic specialization which is Fuller's bête noire. The prospectus sounds intriguing, but the social realities behind GST are bound to be unappealing to those who have sentimental attachments to participative and communitarian politics. This form of elitist brains-trusting—an outgrowth of wartime operations research—is apt to be the essential component of the technocracy's machine à gouverner.

Those who desire a brief, ebullient account of the systems technique may consult Simon Ramo's Cure for Chaos. Ramo, vice chairman of Thompson-Ramo-Wooldridge, father of the ICBM, and, as the book jacket tells us, "frequently consulted by government leaders," is, like Fuller, a self-made technician-entrepreneur. The beneficiary and booster of military-industrial boondoggling, his vision of life is colored accordingly. The archetypal social problem for Ramo is patterned upon the gadgeteering perplexities of the ballistic missile system, where everything, including the megadeaths, yields to simple numbers. Ramo readily admits that, in matters involving "the human component," the "systems team" must include "techno-political-econo-socio-experts." Yet systems engineering discriminates not at all between problems of air traffic control and education, the arms race and urban renewal. The problem-solving procedures are identical. One assembles the certified experts and trusts them to convert the project at hand into "specific well-described and often measurable performance requirements." The skill of experts, Ramo tells us, lies in "putting quantitative measures on everything—very often cost and time measures."

Thus, in quantification the systems engineer has found what the alchemists of old sought in vain: the universal solvent. It is little wonder that the fiercely mathematical passion of such expertise finds no trouble in sliding from discussions of thermonuclear weaponry to hospital design in successive paragraphs, or in conceiving of education as something whose value is calibrated in lifetime income differentials and whose substance can be captured at "electronicized desks," where vigilant computers pace their attentive students through true-or-false and fill-in-the-blank testing.

After Ramo's and Fuller's intoxicated high touting of the systems approach and computerized instruction, Anthony Oettinger's Run, Computer, Run is sobering reading. Oettinger wisely works from the assumption that the Himalayan dilemmas of American education are through and through political and philosophical. This means that "systems analysts trained to think unthinkable, apocalyptic thoughts in the style of Herman Kahn, or to calculate the performance/weight tradeoffs for missiles, are ill-prepared to deal with more than the form of the educational system."

> The present tools of formal systems analysis work best on well-defined, simple, concrete models involving quantifiable concepts, measurable data, and, above all, thoroughly understood theoretical structures which adequately reflect reality.

Since almost nothing about education, beyond perhaps the plumbing of school buildings, yields such convenient simples, Oettinger spends little time on the latest instructional gimmickry and systems techniques. Rather, he devotes himself to debunking the many "highly visible quickie" solutions currently on the scene that offer only "the illusion of progress." One by one, Oettinger undermines the widespread assumptions that teaching machines save money, save time, save manpower, and "individualize" instruction. It is a commendable display of candor from one who, as director of Project Tact ("Technological Aids to Creative Thought": Harvard based, Defense Department financed), would seem to have every interest in extolling the myths here marked out for destruction. Oettinger's enormously intelligent book is a commendable product

PHAEDRA INC.
27 Washington Square North
New York, N. Y. 10011

The Strindberg Reader	$7.95
soft cover	5.95
William Saroyan
The New Plays	$4.95
Animals and Statues I Have Interviewed-Phil Santora	$3.95
Upton Sinclair
The Flivver King	$4.95
Naked Author
by Pietro di Donato	$7.95
Bird Alone	$2.95
by Sean O'Faolain/soft cover
The Book of Answers
by Duke of Bedford	$5.95
An Extreme Friendship
by Henri Troyat	$4.95
The Whole World Is Outside
by Manuel Komroff	$5.95
Writing In America
by Erskine Caldwell	$4.95
soft cover	1.95
Lolita
by Vladimir Nabokov
in Russian	$7.95
soft cover	5.95
Nabokov's Quartet
by Vladimir Nabokov	$3.95
Woman In The Dunes	$2.95
by Teshigahara/soft cover
The Waltz Invention	$4.95
by Vladimir Nabokov -a play-
The Eye by Vladimir Nabokov
short novel	$4.50
Padre Pio -biography-	$4.95
Short Drive Sweet Chariot
by William Saroyan	$4.95

of Harvard's Program on Technology and Society. Indeed, the program would seem to have its future course well surveyed if it were to extend Oettinger's critique to the relations between technology and society generally.

Clearly the job needs doing. It is wholly disheartening to review the evidence Oettinger presents of our society's scientistic gullibility and gadget mania—in this case from the U.S. Office of Education down to the smallest local school board—and of the cynical flummoxing perpetrated by industry and eager-beaver systems analysts. In education as in all other areas of our life, we are indeed patsies for what Oettinger calls "the seductive power of absurdity in full formalized attire." And, sad to say, as sharp a critic as Oettinger himself can have his blind spots in this respect. Even he grants that systems analysis, for all its limitations in the field of education, is properly at home in the Defense Department. Quoting Charles Hitch (now President of the University of California, via RAND), Oettinger agrees that it "is easier to program and to analyze [military strategy] quantitatively than many areas of civilian government. For example, it is certainly easier than the foreign affairs area."

That is a fatal, but revealing admission. For after what fashion has Defense Department policy become more adaptable to systems analysis? By subordinating to its oppressively quantitative and value-neuter demands every aspect of life that gets in the way (including "the foreign affairs area"). In brief, systems analysis has "worked" for our society's infinitely expansive conception of military necessity precisely as it purports to "work" for our educational problems: by flattening every non-quantitative consideration beneath a steam roller of dehumanized logicality.

It is the great claim of the systems approach that it embraces all facets of every problem. It purports to blanket the whole with coordinated competence, leaving nothing to intuition or amateurish improvisation: meaning, it leaves nothing to the layman. This claim to comprehensiveness, however, is fundamentally false. Systems methodology by its very essence stops short of taking into critical consideration the whole of society, economy, environment, or the human condition. Such wholes are what Ramo calls "too big a system." He warns us:

> Surround the problem too broadly, try too hard to be absolutely complete, and you will not only get nowhere in the solution of the problem, but you will be doing a terribly poor job of systems engineering.

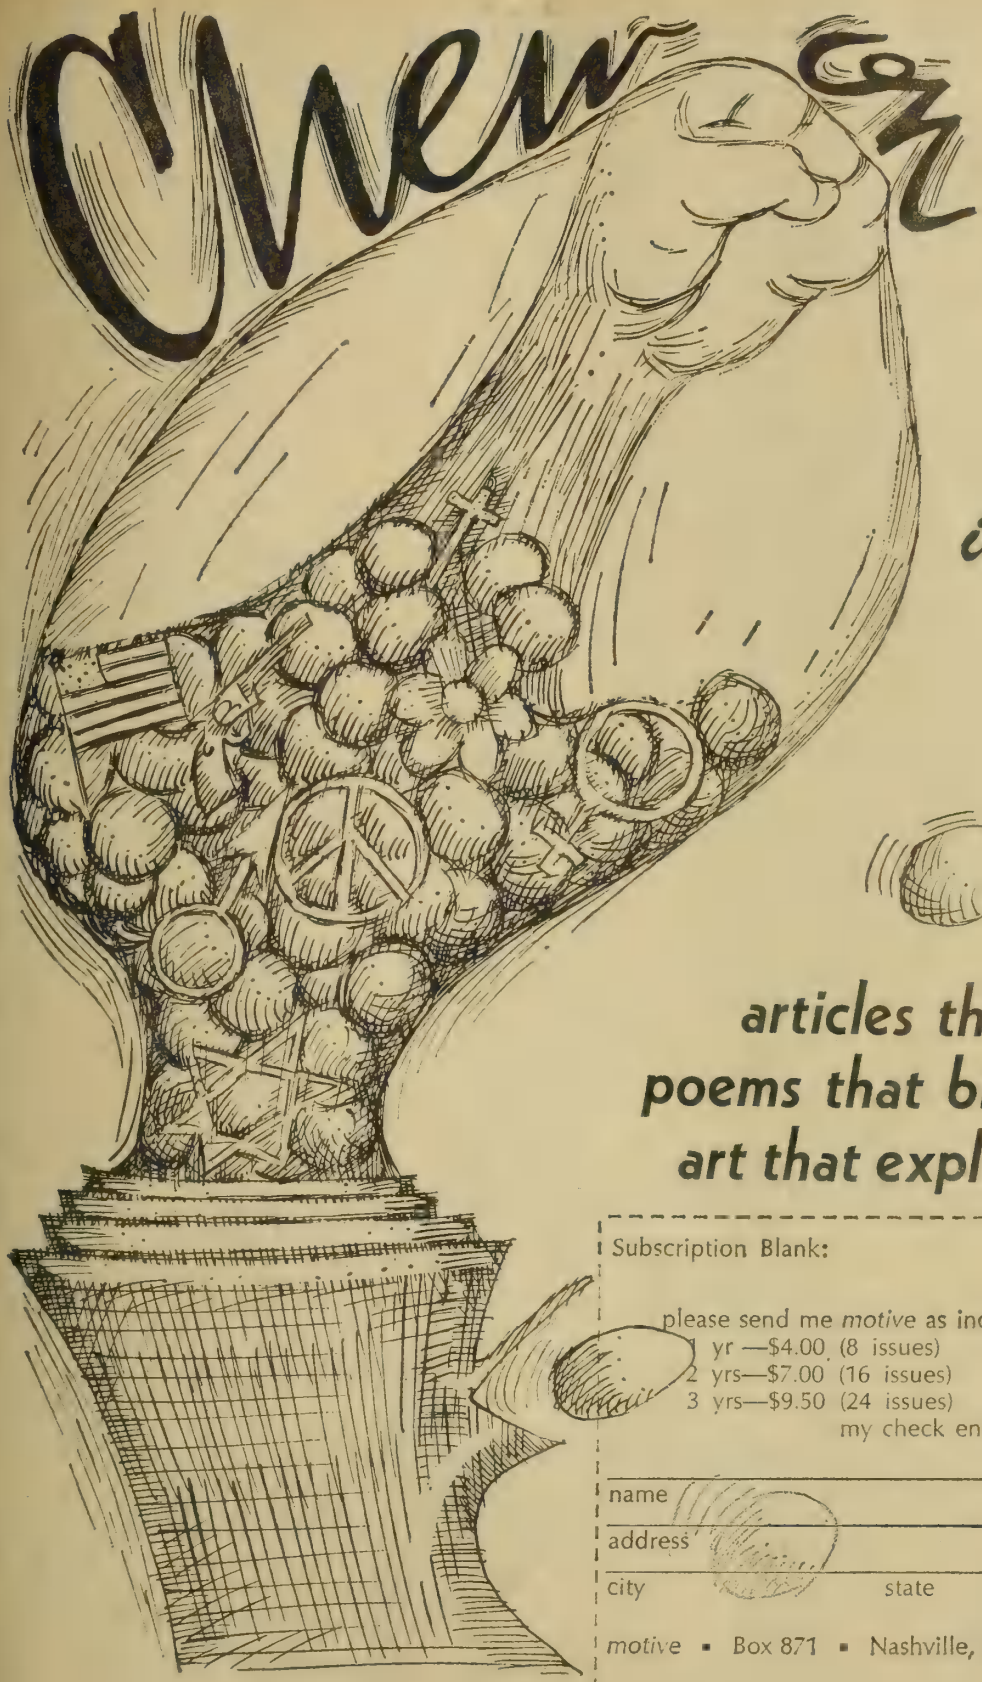
In what sense are such systems "too big"? Why, too big to be handled in the specialist's value-neuter framework. To think on such a scale is to aspire beyond amoral measurements and partial adjustments toward philosophical comprehension and social criticism, and doubtless toward many embarrassing questions about the likes of Simon Ramo, his fortune and influence in contemporary America.

It is revealing of the technocratic temperament that Ramo should finish his treatise by projecting the "golden age" that will ensue "once most people are wedded to creative logic and objectivity to get solutions to society's problems." Logic and objectivity: translated (with a deal of legerdemain) from mathematics and physics into the professional study of society, are science's gift to the apologetics of technocracy. One does not moralize about microbes and quasars; ergo logic dictates that the objective mind does not moralize about Thompson-Ramo-Wooldridge, thermonuclear deterrence, or the uses of the multiversity. Where the "human factor" is concerned, the systems team may, as Ramo puts it, have to "tap preferences, judge needs, present possibilities, and evaluate alternatives." But it is the experts who will do the tapping, judging, presenting and evaluating: the "chaos" is theirs to cure. And the experts work neither for free nor in a vacuum. As Jean Meynaud makes clear:

> For technocracy to cease being essentially conservative, technicians themselves would have to become inspired with the will to change. . . . But it is not rare for the technician to consider that the social system (one which manifests itself with continuity) is necessary to the realization of his designs. After all, the supporters of Saint-Simon were not lacking in human generosity, but they finally gave the best of themselves to the big industrial undertakings and commercial banks.

For his own France, Meynaud is able to trace the roots of this conservatism to the family and educational background of the highly cliquish Gaullist polytechnicians. Though they are more diffuse in social origin, the regents of the American New Atlantis display the same combination of "technical boldness and social conservatism." What passes for objectivity among those who staff our military-industrial think tanks is an understandable reticence respecting the world-view and social system that justifies and rewards expertise. Nothing could be more quantifiable than the gold in Ramo's "golden age": it measures out in dollars and cents, status and prestige.

This same practiced evasion of all philosophically challenging questions characterizes Michael Reagan's examination of science under the patronage of the government, a study that never once confronts the overarching issue: the political form that must inevitably follow from the progressive assimilation of expertise by forces commanding the bulk of society's cash and privilege. Indeed, Reagan would press the process of assimilation further still. He calls for the funding of a National Foundation for the Social Sciences (on the order of the National Science Foundation) as the best way for social scientists to make "their developmental needs known to government through a regularized, internal, differentiated organizational position" and for them "to be in on the choice of problems and of strategies for dealing with them."



What news it would be to Plato and Marx, to Veblen and C. Wright Mills to learn that students of man and society must make their "needs known to government" and must wait upon official moneys and favor to choose their problems and strategies. But clearly this is a rather different breed of student, one who approaches the Prince with the same power-political promise that has served as sweet bait on the atomic scientist's hook.

Reagan's conception of political science is contained entirely within the corridors of power, where everything that is, is—with minor adjustments—right. Inevitably, then, we reach the cheerful conclusion that the scientists, the multiversities and the government enjoy a "fruitful relationship" bearing "all the earmarks of permanence"; and if there are any problems, they can be rectified by some reshuffling of agencies and funding prior-

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 9-1-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014
☐ One Year, $9
☐ Two Years, $16
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed
(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)
Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

Chew on Critical issues and ideologies with motive

a national campus magazine of opinion articles that crunch!

poems that bite!
art that explodes!

Subscription Blank:

please send me motive as indicated below:
1 yr —$4.00 (8 issues)
2 yrs—$7.00 (16 issues)
3 yrs—$9.50 (24 issues)
my check enclosed ☐ bill me ☐

name _____

address _____

city _____ state _____ zip _____

motive ▪ Box 871 ▪ Nashville, Tenn. ▪ 37202

ities. Reagan's first priority would go to "social objectives which are defined as most urgent politically." He does recognize, though without alarm, that this process of "definition" is often carried out by "vested interests in government agencies and outside groups." The remedy for this vice, however, is another echelon of supervisory expertise . . . a Technology Assessment Board perhaps . . . or an amalgamation of the Office of Science and Technology with the President's Science Advisory Committee . . . or why not an expansion of JCST . . . or of COSPUP . . . or of OSRD . . . etc., etc.? Reagan's study is a fine reference guide to the C. P. Snow world of the science bureaucracy. But with respect to all the great questions of justice and democracy and intellectual conscience—the issues that drove Norbert Wiener out of the "science factories," that sent Einstein heartsick to his grave, and that have stirred student rebellions across the land—Reagan is totally "objective." His suggestions for reform are eminently practical. He goes no further than to play committeemanship with the expert-administrators.

It would be wrong, however, to suggest that the technocratic mentality at its best lacks concern for values. On the contrary, the professional study of values is, along with technological prognostication ("futuribles," as the French call it), a hot and highly sophisticated specialty. A volume like Values and the Future serves as a twin introduction, authoritative if ponderous, to both the new science of ethics and the "futures industry."

The anthology grows out of a high-powered conference held at the University of Pittsburgh during 1965-66 under grants from IBM and the Carnegie Corporation. The result is academically suave, but hardly encouraging. With the exception of a few of the less pretentious essays such as those by John Kenneth Galbraith and Kenneth Boulding, the anthology deals in the learned superficialities which are the hallmark of technocratic culture: the systematic circumvention of emotional engagement and personal commitment. The essays are filled with baroque methodologies, much statistical virtuosity and esoteric computer games; and these last, as described, achieve levels of absurdity rivaling Ionesco. (Thus, in one of the games, the conferees, in the pursuit of computable statistics, take it upon themselves to "simulate" teen-agers, housewives, cultural elite and "persons in lowest income decile" as of the year 2000. "And that is science, my friend," said Dr. Spalanzani.)

Professionally, it is all quite elegant. But what is it, at last, that technical expertise does with values when it gets hold of them? It treats them like alien organisms under a microscope. It surveys them by way of foolish questionnaires no serious person would agree to complete. (Imagine Tolstoy or St. Paul being asked to give their "relative preferences" and "numerical evaluations" regarding "personality control drugs" and "household robots.") It quantifies them, by way of "weightings" and "scalings" that are the mathematical analogue of a Rube Goldberg contraption. And finally, it predicts their future course, by way of facile computerized techniques—in this case, their course under the impact of technological forces that are taken to be as inexorable as the will of God.

Not very remarkably, the "findings" that come of such procedures are always upbeat. "The most striking feature of the questionnaire responses is their clear optimism," Nicholas Rescher reports on one of his surveys. But who were the respondents? Fifty-eight experts from IBM, RAND, NSF, and the IBM-financed Harvard Program on Technology and Society. (Are there no laws against such intellectual incest?) Again, to quote Meynaud, "the future is influenced by the picture which men themselves draw of it. . . . One of the trends of 'futurism' is a tendency to exalt the virtues of a technical civilization and the merits of technicians. . . ."

In the introduction to Values and the Future, Alvin Toffler declares that "we need systematic surveys of the value systems held by important American subcultures, by different professions, age groups and socioeconomic groupings." It is surely a call for a million years of "extensive—and expensive—empirical research." But, Toffler feels, only this will give the specialists what they need as they set about "drawing up their reports in forms that can be taken into account in cost-benefit appraisals." Ideally, he anticipates a new profession of "Value-Impact Forecasters" who will be "armed with scientific tools" and "located at the hot center of decision-making" as "part of every corporation, research laboratory, government agency and foundation whose output includes technological innovation."

Surely it is the perfection of technocracy when values become statistical grist for the research mill. Once such a great project is launched, shall we not then be assured that all the goods and evils of policy and decision have been taken competently into account—with logic and objectivity—by the court wizards? And what will there be left for the layman to worry his amateurish head about?

How does one drive it home to such academic cold fish that their project, serviceable as it is for purposes of technocratic consolidation, is misconceived ab initio? As Socrates knew 2,500 years ago, to enter the agora simply to survey the so-called values of a befuddled public is the betrayal of philosophy. The values of men are not to be measured or predicted but to be honestly debated, affirmed and deeply lived, so that we may educate one another by mutual example. It is this that we owe one another as fellow citizens. But I doubt that this distinction between the academic and the irreducibly existential would prove persuasive. Expertise, being committed to that self-congratulatory form of alienation called "objectivity," makes no allowance for the person. It discounts the experiential deeps and attends to the behavioral surface. What chance would there have been to convince Dr. Kinsey that he had it all wrong? That love is not to be measured but to be fallen into, made, enjoyed and suffered? "But," the scientific mind insists, "there is also matter here (and where is there not?) in need of professional research. For only by professional research do we come to know anything."

And that is the box in which the technocrats have us trapped: their conviction and ours that only the scientific mind—objective, logical, quantitative—has access to reliable knowledge. What other remedy can there be, then, for the ills of mankind in a scientific culture but still more science, still more technology? Was it not scientist and technician who constructed our industrial cornucopia in the first place? Who else can understand its mysteries and maintain its flowing abundance? And maintaining industrial abundance is what everybody's politics is about in our time—Left, Right and Center. It is precisely this epistemological monopoly that legitimizes the shameless self-selection and internal circulation of technical elites within our military-paramilitary-financial - industrial-multiversity-think-tank-foundation - Presidential-advisory complex.

Here is the point that I believe Victor Ferkiss overlooks when he writes off the possibilities of technocratic totalitarianism. Granted, he is correct in concluding that the American version of the technological society really overlays and serves old-fashioned, bourgeois profiteering. (Technocracy has no difficulty absorbing any social system, provided the system is committed to an expanding economy.) Granted too, he is correct in concluding that the effort to create a totally efficient technocracy—a Huxleian Brave New World—is more apt to produce a "clumsy monster" constantly on the brink of chaos. But he is wrong in deciding that these facts make "the notion of a scientific elite a myth," rather than a growing reality. For what does the citizen in a scientized culture have by way of knowledge or value to hold and Unitarian Universalists are 150 times more active than anybody else according to a study of what types get into Who's Who in America.

Religion is where the action is!

Appealing to these dynamos—some Christian, some atheist and all feisty—is the job of the denominational magazine, UUA NOW.
We have to present a fresh point of view or perish.

—Holmes Welch warns the churches to take a look at the Orient and the religious decline that set in after a Buddhist monk got the idea of going "relevant."

—Henry Steele Commager finds near-fatal flaws in the sacred U.S. Constitution.

—William Wingfield discloses Richard Nixon as the second choice of California kingmakers back in 1946.

We speak for the denomination that was the first to handsomely fund the Blacks in their own autonomous organization. The first to purge from its investment portfolio holdings in major war supplying industries. The first to bring the question of tax exemption for church property out into the open and give the controversy room to grow in. The first to become active in Vietnam resistance and offer sanctuary to conscientious objectors.

We're not only where the Action is we Start it!

its pictures catch the moment its stories probe the meaning

Subscribe NOW

UUA NOW 25 Beacon Street, Boston, Massachusetts 02108

Gentlemen: Please enter my subscription to UUA NOW for

1 Year $7.50☐ 2 Years $14.00☐ 3 Years $20.00☐

Check for $_____ enclosed. Bill me ☐

Name _____

Address _____

City _____ State & Province _____ Zip _____

against those who are the experts or those who own the experts? Values, as we now learn, are becoming the province of ethical technicians equipped with inscrutable methodologies and expensive computers. Knowledge—the product of logic and objective research—is similarly the property of the experts. True, we may still resist the experts and their employers. But by appeal to what does our resistance lay claim to the sanction of reason, sanity or progress? What is there the citizen can claim to know that an expert somewhere cannot prove he knows better?

I believe that Ferkiss underestimates this mystique of expertise because he himself has fallen beneath its spell. Even he, an admirably humanistic critic, believes that the thrust of science and technique "by giving man almost infinite power to change his world and to change himself" has carried us to the threshold of nothing less than an "evolutionary breakthrough," to which all culture must adapt if we are to produce the mature "technological man." Once concede that this is the proper relationship of science-technology to culture (the former disposes, the latter scurries to adjust) and our political life is delivered into the hands of the technical experts and their patrons. All complies to their world-view and there are no alternative realities. No doubt the technicians will proceed to build us a "clumsy monster" of a social system, a push-button bedlam with music by Muzak; but they will also convince the citizenry—by logic and objectivity—that it is the only rational system. Jean Meynaud's analysis is sharper than that of Ferkiss, and much gloomier.

> We might wonder whether the determination to obtain maximal efficiency, combined with greater prosperity in larger sectors of society, is not likely to throw into gear a movement which will lead to progressive monopoly of power by "competence." Supposing that such an evolution occurs, the final end of the scientific society might perhaps be democratic, but its functioning would no longer be so. In the extreme case, a scientific technocracy . . . would replace traditional political machinery, conserving the essential nature of the established order.

One must face the fact that such a despotism of beneficent expertise, guaranteeing both the bread of cybernated affluence and the circuses of moon shots, would, at this point, be far from unwelcome to most of the Americans it was willing to integrate. Perhaps only a handful of wild and woolly dropouts and stubborn black nationalists would be inclined to resist its invitation to the fat and dependent life. Certainly Meynaud's proposed safeguard—an unspecified strengthening of elected authorities and their institutions wholly within the going industrial system—looks like a very weak reed. This is because it ignores the psychic and metaphysical depths to which the technocracy reaches in achieving acquiescence and in this way undercutting democratic institutions.

Erich Fromm does greater justice to this dimension of the problem in his Revolution of Hope, an inspirational tract that provides a sensitive, if primer-simple assessment of our technological dehumanization. With a shrewd eye for the pathological, he tells us that > the main problem . . . is not whether . . . a computer-man can be constructed; it is rather why the idea is becoming so popular in a historical period when nothing seems to be more important than to transform the existing man into a more rational, harmonious, and peace-loving being. One cannot help being suspicious that often the attraction of the computer-man idea is the expression of a flight from life and from humane experience into the mechanical and purely cerebral.

The major weakness of Fromm's treatise lies in the author's eagerness to dish up a rather thin potpourri of specific reforms (though there are several good ideas here) and to launch a new political movement. I doubt that the changes Fromm desires should, or will have the conventional organizational characteristics he suggests: a national committee of notables ("The Voice of American Conscience") reared on a base of local subcommittees. The "psychospiritual renewal" he calls for must perforce be more subtle and spontaneous, and surely less concerned than Fromm is with avoiding "the breakdown of the industrial machine." It will have to get at the millions as insidiously as it has apparently gotten at Fromm himself, whose latest writings begin to reveal a pronounced compromise with his former secularized, Socialist humanism, and a growing disposition to take seriously religious forms of community and personal transcendence.

Fromm does not, to be sure, move far enough in this direction to match the sensuous, primitivist mysticisms of Gary Snyder: "the timeless path of love and wisdom, in affectionate company with the sky, wind, clouds, trees, water, animals and grasses." And his hesitancy is understandable, since to cut so deep seeking the roots of the technocracy means hazarding one's intellectual respectability. But I think it has come to that desperate a pass. Caliban, having acquired the higher mathematics and devised him a clever machinery, hastens to counterfeit his master's magic. We may then need more than a touch of Blake's brave perversity

> To cast off Bacon, Locke & Newton > from Albion's covering,
> To take off his filthy garments & clothe > him with Imagination.

The Stupid Machine

THE LOVE MACHINE. By Jacqueline Susann. Simon & Schuster. 511 pp. $6.95.

JONATHAN BAUMBACH

Mr. Baumbach is the director of creative writing at Brooklyn College. He is the author of two novels, A Man To Conjure With (Random House) and What Comes Next (Harper & Row), and a critical study, The Landscape of Nightmare (New York University Press).

> Perhaps man's only chance of survival is to become a machine.
>
> —The Love Machine

It is no secret that education in America has a vested interest in stupidity. Our institutions are in business to perpetuate the culture. What one learns in school are strategies of socialization: how to compete, how to fit in, how to give teacher what he wants. Anyone who has taught writing in college has seen the results. Our students write the dead prose of official culture, voiceless, abstract, euphemistic, a language capable of only the most generalized distinctions. Which brings us to The Love Machine, currently the best-selling fiction in America.

"This was the kind of love novelists wrote about. It did exist. Her past 'romances' paled in comparison." This is the kind of interior monologue Jacqueline Susann writes. Her prose defines the way her characters experience the world. In almost every creative writing course I've taught, there have been three or four girls who write like Miss Susann —that is write about beautiful non-people leading women's magazine fantasy lives. "Who are these people?" I ask them, and they shrug as if to say, "who is anyone? We grew up in Brooklyn, what do we know about anything?"

The muse of The Love Machine is the culture itself. Despite her pretense to sophistication, Miss Susann is, in effect, a primitive. Though she makes a few breathy passes at psychologizing, her narrative is unencumbered by psychology. Her characters go where she moves them, talk for the most part to convey information, experience the world the same way their author does, are interchangeably mindless. It is as if Madame Bovary, stars in her eyes, survived to tell her own story. A novel of manners without nuance, The Love Machine shares a common plastic reality with television commercials, Rex Reed, Guess Who's Coming to Dinner?, Billy Graham, Cosmopolitan and Playboy, Richard Nixon, The Dating Game, political rhetoric, other popular novels, our schools. As a document of corruption, the novel is essentially—rather touchingly—innocent.

The three heroines seem, for all their protestations of love, less capable of real feeling than their loveless love object, the Love Machine himself, an opportunistic television executive named Robin Stone. Robin's tragic hang-up is to experience sex and love as wholly separate—a rather common circumstance in our culture. Miss Susann's women tend to confuse sex and love—that is, identify love with physical gratification. There's no indication in the novel that Miss Susann doesn't take her heroines at their word. "Her love for Robin refused to find a level. It soared on and on to a peak of feverish infinity." "She wanted Robin so bad she physically ached." When my students write like that I indicate that the language defies belief. "But that's exactly the way it felt," the student will argue, upset at my failure to understand. What happens, of course, is that the prose precedes the experience, fakes it, exists ultimately in lieu of it. Sentimentality is the language of numbness.

"She really loved Gregory but she wasn't in love with him." In Faulkner's As I Lay Dying, Addie Bundren says: "I knew that the word [love] was like the others just a shape to fill a lack: that when the right time came you wouldn't need a word for that." Miss Susann uses the word relentlessly. " 'For the first time in my stinking life I'm really in love.' " " 'I know he loves me but I'm just part of his empire.' " " 'The whole world loves Lucy, Ed Sullivan and Bob Hope. Tell me, newsgirl, whom do you love on television?' "

Reading The Love Machine is a numbingly mindless experience. Its effect is narcotic. Miss Susann asks her readers not to think, not to feel, and, before all, not to see—nothing is asked and all is given. In a sense, the book is a collaboration—a shared inhuman cultural fantasy between author and readers, a reinforcement of culture-induced fantasies. Where real literature disturbs, books like The Love Machine comfort. It is not only child's play to read but offers gratifyingly easy solutions. After two weeks of psychoanalysis one character discovers that "he had personality problems, but he was not a fag!" The subliminal message of the novel is stay as stupid as you are. Stupidity is a way of avoiding pain by ignoring options, a form of inhumanity comparable to Robin's incapacity to feel. "Come to think of it," Robin tells Maggie in the voice of wisdom, "I don't think I've ever met a happy adjusted genius."

We are a schizophrenic culture. Our advertisements promote instant gratification, while our institutions—schools, churches, government—tell us to be thrifty, hard working and chaste. So we are programmed by media to live for the moment and programmed by institutions to feel guilty as hell about pleasure. An artifact of the culture, The Love Machine has it both ways. The main thrust of the novel is hedonistic—characters hop in and out of bed with one another in various combinations—but the novel opts finally for the middle-class puritan verities. "But there's more to life than living this business every second, and making excuses for sexual deviation because we're artists. I want a husband, not a bright young director who smokes pot and makes it with a boy occasionally for kicks."

On the face of it, The Love Machine deplores the amoral world it describes. Robin reforms at the end to become his own man, to write his book, to realize self over career; finally, cured of chron-

FIFTH ANNUAL
SOCIALIST SCHOLARS CONFERENCE
September 5, 6, 7
HOFSTRA UNIVERSITY
Hempstead, Long Island

Panels on: Marcuse, Redefining American Literature; Marx and American Society; Teaching Black Studies; Women and Socialism; The Student Response to the American Century; American Ethnicity; Radical Political Culture Magazines; Recent European Theory; The Role of the Intellectual in the Socialist Party; Radical Responses to Established Social Science.

Participants: Stanley Aronowitz; Ronald Aronson; Norman Birnbaum; Paul Breines; Bruce Brown; Paul Buhle; John Cammett; Marlene Dixon; George Fischer; Mike Folsom; James Gilbert; Herb Gintis; David Goldway; Calvin Hicks; C. L. R. James; Ann Lane; Louis Lomax; Kate Millett; Martin Nicolaus; James O'Brien; Jonah Raskin; Morris U. Schappes; Ralph Schoenman; Trent Schroyer; Irwin Silber; Sondra Silverman; Ted Solotaroff; Susan Sontag; Naomi Weisstein; Sol Yurick.

Registration: begins 9 A.M., Friday, September 5th at Student Center, Hofstra University. Fee . . $10.00; Students . . $5.00

Directions: Hofstra is located near Hempstead, Long Island (about 45 minutes from NYC), which can be reached via LIRR from Brooklyn or Manhattan Penn Station, or by auto via Long Island Expressway or Southern State Parkway.

For Pre-Registration and Information on other SSC Programs, write to:

SOCIALIST SCHOLARS CONFERENCE
P.O. BOX 933
New Brunswick, New Jersey 08903

Your Contribution will make possible the continuation and expansion of the work of the SSC.

to inhumanity, to marry the woman he loves. Integrity and love triumph over hedonism and ambition. The Love Machine subscribes to cultural convention so successfully because it believes in it. There is no discernible vision in the novel outside popular culture's vision of itself, no higher intelligence, no other context. As one can see from the quotations, the novel is written in the very language of its world—a language wholly incapable of accounting for human experience, a language geared to genocide. If we had better schools we might have more literate and human best sellers, but then we would be another country.

RECORDS

DAVID HAMILTON

SESSIONS: Symphony No. 3. Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. Igor Buketoff, cond. RCA Red Seal LSC-3095. $5.98 (coupled with Lees: Concerto for String Quartet and Orchestra).

JOHNSTON: String Quartet No. 2. Composers Quartet. Nonesuch H-71224. $2.98 (coupled with Cage/Hiller: HPSCHD).

WUORINEN: Time's Encomium (electronic). Nonesuch H-71225. $2.98.

In a season that has seen an unusual number of valuable recordings of contemporary music, these three works, not part of any "series," are all exceptionally welcome.

Regrettably, the record industry's sudden access of interest in "new" music (the adjective generally being understood only in its most trivial sense) has brought little benefit to the work of such men as Roger Sessions, who are being overlooked as assiduously as ever, if from the opposite direction. In the last two decades, Sessions has been extremely prolific—five symphonies, a major opera (still to be performed in this country, it has been announced and postponed by the Boston Opera), a piano concerto, and other substantial pieces—but very little of this work has had broad public circulation. That the public preference—or, at least, attention—has passed from low-density music in traditional forms to still lower-density work employing novel sonorities and trivial modes of continuity has altered neither the character nor the value of Sessions' music; it remains radical in its insistence on highly concentrated thought and intricately interwoven textures.

The Third Symphony, a Boston commission of 1957, has a particularly impressive degree of rhythmic impetus, supporting an intensive developmental variation of the material's phrase structures by extension and elision—an ostensibly "traditional" procedure, but pursued so assiduously and convincingly that it imparts a unique long-breathed flexibility to the musical movement. Closely related is the textural activity, highly contrapuntal, with overlapping materials constantly offering themselves to the attention. Unfortunately, this last aspect is rather slighted in the recorded performance, very much a top-line affair and frequently inaccurate in detail: fortunately, the conductor has a reasonable grasp of the overall line, and manages to maintain the rhythmic impetus with some success. (That American orchestral music is nowadays recorded almost exclusively in Europe may not bother the record companies, but orchestra managers and players should be wondering about where this trend leads next: what will happen to all that nice recording income when even Beethoven costs too much to record in this country?)

Ben Johnston's Second String Quartet is one of those rare "experimental" works that should be able to survive being an experiment, for it is completely thought out in musical terms. The subject matter of the experiment is the use of microtonal scales and intervals—not the usual quarter- or sixth-tones but the intervals resulting from the use of "just" intonation (that is, acoustically pure intervals, rather than the tempered ones of the standard twelve-note chromatic scale). Each movement employs these materials in a different way, but in every case the microtonal element is integral to the musical structure, not simply a coloristic device. It is, of course, an ear-stretching piece, but also an extremely expressive one, poised skillfully on a distant edge of our conventional aural experience. The performance of the Composers Quartet displays a musicianship nothing short of fabulous.

Charles Wuorinen's new electronic piece is in fact a première on records, for it was commissioned especially for this purpose; it is by far the most sophisticated work to result from the Nonesuch Records commissioning program, and takes cognizance of two fundamental facts: that it will be listened to in the home and that a record has two sides. The first of these is reflected in the sound material, which avoids the cosmic-cataclysmic strains so beloved of beginners in the medium (not that these aren't useful in their place—but their place is the concert hall), and the second in the work's two-part structure. The articulation of structure, in time and space, is obviously the main concern, and none of the sound material is unusual or obtrusive for its own sake; although when listening on headphones I found the rapid "ping-pong" switching of sounds from one channel to the other —a kind of spatial rhythmicizing—to be disturbing, this problem didn't arise on speakers (doubtless the phenomenon has some psycho-acoustical explanation). The use of space, not merely left-middle-right contrasts but also distance effects achieved through reverberation, is resourceful and also appropriate to the medium: such articulations can be very chancy in the concert hall. A thoughtful piece, and a worth-while contribution to the electronic repertory.

SIX CANDLES FOR A CAKE

1.
Marriage does not confer
An honorary degree on anyone;
All our powers of mimicry
Cannot truly impersonate
The flow, the lifetime
Residency in another's body.

2.
During our youth
When our profile
Falls out of its nest,
Life does not ask us:
"Are you saved?"
But simply saves us.

3.
Who, he asked,
Could trim his hair, his nails,
His desire,
Better than himself?
His needs had always Marched in single file
Behind him.

4.
Hoisted up on a mast
Was his agonised grin;
The priest
Saluted it
With his baton.

5.
(O what a Picket line
Our qualms Produce)

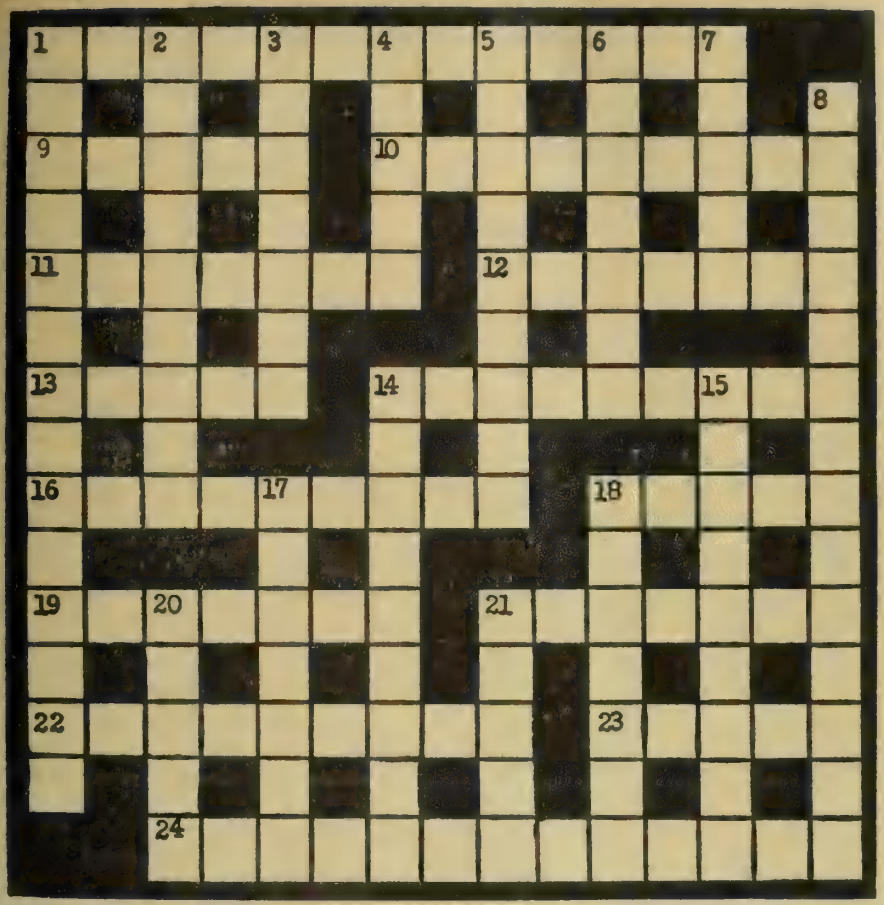
6.
The moon comes out of the sky
Bearing a tray.

The moon is middle-aged
And has a snout like a pig.



The moon doesn't care for the sun.
The moon doesn't care for the night.

The moon cares for nothing.
The moon takes pills.

STANLEY KIESEL

Crossword Puzzle No. 1310

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 See 8 down
9 Brief news reports from the "Times"? (5)
10 You might find a heavenly body in one, as the composer implies. (9)
11 These who either keep or make book might be concerned with them. (7)
12 Loud the iron-bosomed sea after this, according to Rossetti. (7)
13 A boot might be put into a difficult position. (5)
14 One engaged might be so. (6,3)
16 One doesn't give such fruit as a token of esteem. (9)
18 A tape recorder might be to or for, according to the sound. (5)
19 Redcoat, but not British. (7)
21 One might the t in ten, or TNT. (7)
22 Back-up necessary in ruling that which is objectionable. (9)
23 Lift one might hope for at work. (5)
24 Dish commonly associated with brass ornamentation, if service-minded. (9,4)

DOWN

1 See the relic Sir Robert Dudley's area left in ruins! (14)
2 For the musician who drinks, it certainly has no connotation of being hot and dry. (9)
3 How to make ineffective the act of sifting cinders? (7)
4 In the light of our ancestors' experience, they might have been frequently turned up. (5)
5 Ted Lewis expected this to be happy. (9)
6 One way to teach a couple of points about money? (7)
7 It could be good for graft. (5)
8 and 1 across Things that show what might be in the picture with those who tend an also-ran, and those who clean up? (It's for grasping people!) (7,7,6,7)
14 Employ violent methods, first to last as a spaceman. (6-3)
15 In one sense you might be pleased by it. (9)
17 The westerner Jim didn't exactly make things cross! (7)
18 Getting gradually lean? (7)
20 The halting steps of people in some families? (5)
21 Certainly don't knock what's in the next old movie you see! (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1309

ACROSS: 1 Withholding tax; 9 Niagara; 10 Demands; 11 Insist; 12 Overalls; 14 Twofold; 15 March; 17 Pique; 19 Branded; 21 Roadster; 23 Stairs; 25 Carioca; 26 and 21 down The Idle Rich; 27 Clothes hampers. DOWN: 1 Winding up; 2 Transit; 3 Headstone; 4 Lean; 5 Individual; 6 Gamer; 7 Annular; 8 Asks; 13 Double date; 15 Midstream; 16 Half-steps; 18 Quarrel; 20 Dwindle; 22 Sport; 24 Etch.

PERSONALS

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

EDUCATIONAL

SUMMERHILL CAMP AND SCHOOL. Freedom with responsibility learning because it's exciting, not compulsory. Summer program: reading, math, nature, swimming, riding, camping, art, music, drama, group discussions. OPEN COMMUNITY SCHOOL, Box 5N, Claverack, N.Y. 12513.

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 80 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PUBLICATIONS

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 300 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 1 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

FREE OFFER:

A while back we advertised the book you wanted as a free gift with your new subscription to The NATION. You meant to subscribe then BUT you left the magazine at a friend's house, or perhaps you clipped the ad and were just too busy—or too involved with political events—to follow up.

Here's a second chance. If you subscribe now, you will receive FREE any one of the following books. Pick one:

- ☐ GRUENING OF ALASKA, by Sherwood Ross
- ☐ THE DESTRUCTION OF CALIFORNIA, by NATION contributor Raymond F. Dasmann
- ☐ UNLESS PEACE COMES, by Nigel Calder
- ☐ PAX AMERICANA, by Ronald Steel
- ☐ THE SOUTH AS IT IS, by John Dennett
- ☐ AIR WAR: VIETNAM, by Frank Harvey
- ☐ BETWEEN THE LINES, by NATION contributor Dan Wakefield
- ☐ AMERICA'S VIETNAM POLICY: The Strategy of Deception by Richard S. Herman and Richard B. Du Boff
- ☐ HOW AMERICA VOTES IN PRESIDENTIAL ELECTIONS, by NATION contributor Louis H. Bean

Send this coupon to:

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). Enclosed is $10. I've checked the book I want.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 9-1

The good fight is now in THE NATION —Why not join now?

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 8, 1969 35 cents

S-7CR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
SEP 1 1969
LIBRARY

SPECIAL ISSUE

THE LABOR MOVEMENT TODAY

'Which Side Are You On?'

ARTICLES BY

Joel Seldin
B. J. Widick
Ronald Radosh
J. David Greenstone
William B. Gould
Russell W. Gibbons
Melvyn Dubofsky
Frank J. Donner

LETTERS

Mars and butter

Baltimore, Md.

DEAR SIRS: In answer to the question on the back cover of The Nation [Aug. 11], "What do they think of the moon landing?," permit me to suggest what I hope they are thinking.

The President of the United States should commit the nation to eliminating poverty within the coming decade from the bounds of this country! President Kennedy's commitment to put a man on the moon by the end of this decade shows what determination of that kind can accomplish. His method was to allot billions of dollars to the mathematical analysis that has been worked out from Pythagoras and Euclid, down through Descartes and Newton to Einstein.

An analogous application of money to the mathematics of social insurance can give us a reduction in poverty as thrilling as the landing of the Eagle. Prof. Wilbur J. Cohen, while still Secretary of Health, Education and Welfare, stated in an address, "Social Goals for 1967," at Brandeis University, Jan. 9: "We can and we must use the nation's growing wealth to eliminate poverty." His proposed methods were expansion and strengthening of social security, federal financing and national standards for public assistance payments, and conversion of state welfare agencies into Departments of Social Service or Departments of Individual Family Services. "We should be able," he said, "to reduce the number living in poverty year-by-year and to eliminate it altogether."

Moreover, Secretary Cohen did not make his suggested program dependent on slowing down the space program or ending the Vietnamese War. If we carry through such a program for the elimination of poverty with the same singleness of purpose that we used to reach the moon, we may then with a clear conscience go on to further goals, such as reaching Mars, or whatever else appeals to us.

Benjamin Szold Levin

Bogside

Pallaskenry, Co. Limerick

DEAR SIRS: On Saturday afternoon, Aug. 16, I spent a few hours in Bogside. I didn't go there alone. My wife said if I were going to get killed she was going to be killed too. And if we were both going to be killed our 7-year-old son and 5-year-old daughter might just as well be killed too. So we all went. With two friends.

What I saw and heard there made my blood boil. It made me a little sick to my stomach too. I have a feeling it's about time a few people like Prime Minister Harold Wilson and Cardinal Conway sat down and had a talk with Bernadette Devlin and some of the young and old people who helped defend Bogside. About what really happened there; about what may happen there again. I have a feeling that if Mr. Wilson had flown in his helicopter to Derry instead of to Cornwall he would have ended up taking off his coat and helping break up a few of those paving stones himself. And that if Cardinal Conway, who has been puzzled as to what the police were up to, had gone and found out, he too would have done the same thing.

Cardinal Conway and Bishop Philbin (thank God for him) are both obviously shocked almost beyond speech at what was attempted at Ardoyne and elsewhere in Belfast, but in spite of its world-wide coverage Bogside still seems to be something of a mystery. It's just that "women and children first" has never before in the philosophy of Anglo-Saxons meant gassing them, or burning them out of

(Continued on page 230)

EDITORIALS

Holy Wars

Part of the nightmare of history is the "holy war," only now it is not so much a past nightmare as a current reality. The 1965 massacre by Moslems of some hundreds of thousands of Indonesian Communists, real or tarred with a convenient brush, is an especially gruesome instance. In this case Moslem animosity against "atheistic communism" may have played a significant part, but in modern religious conflicts political motivations are paramount. Religion is a sovereign catalyst to incite the populace for nationalistic or class purposes. The current disturbances in Northern Ireland and Israel make this perfectly clear.

The sacred mosque of Al Aksa is damaged by fire, and once again the call for a jihad against Israel resounds through the Moslem world, although with varying degrees of intensity. Obviously the act of arson was an outrage to be condemned by civilized men of all religious faiths or of none. But the accusation that the Israelis had anything to do with it is fantastic. They have their hands full in Jerusalem as it is. To believe anything of the sort, one would have to assume that the Israeli civil and military officials have gone out of their minds. But the incredibility of the charge really doesn't matter. If the police had caught the culprit with the torch in his hand and a score of Moslems had witnessed the arrest, Nasser would still have seized on the outrage for his purposes.

The political opportunism is brought out by Mohammed Hassanein Heykal, Nasser's semi-official spokesman, in a column entitled "Why Did Nixon Retreat?" which was quoted in The New York Times of August 23. The column charges that while Nixon had promised a more "even-handed" policy in the Middle East, he failed to deliver because power in Washington resides not alone in the White House but is shared by "visible and invisible" forces, such as the military-industrial complex, the Central Intelligence Agency, the Federal Bureau of Investigation, the State Department, the press, movies and television—all of which are dominated, of course, by Jews and Zionists. To correct this situation—to halt Mr. Nixon's retreat—the Arabs should take action to dispel "the illusions being fostered about progress toward a political settlement in the Middle East." Nasser's attempt to launch a jihad based on the Al Aksa incident is, then, directed as much against the United States as against Israel. The purpose is to advertise, in the noisiest possible manner, what the Arabs might do unless Nixon pays more attention to them. It went over big in Egypt, Jordan, Saudi Arabia and other Arab countries, but the non-Arab Moslem nations remained cool. Turkey and Iran merely deplored the loss to Islam of the mosque, or that portion of it which was destroyed.

The situation in Northern Ireland, apparently so far removed, shows considerable parallelism. In the August 24 Washington Post, Robert L. Mott reports that, with the exception of birth control, he has not heard a Catholic or a Protestant discuss the merits of either religion during weeks of civil strife. Other observers concur. Religion, Mott concludes, is "merely a convenient excuse to perpetuate a feud that, by now, owes more to political and economic exploitation and to social discrimination than to differing interpretations of the Scriptures." Protestant bigots like the Rev. Ian Paisley rant about "Papists" (Paisley has called in one of his American counterparts, the Rev. Carl McIntyre of New Jersey, to aid him in arousing the Protestant mobs), but all this fanaticism is political, with religion as a convenient cover.

It works. As the Bogside Catholics see it, they are being attacked because they are Catholics: We're Catholics, aren't we, Mister? And those over there are Protestants, isn't that true? It doesn't do much good, as the young leftists of People's Democracy have found out, to tell the unemployed Catholic youngster that he is being exploited because is poor and lacks power, and for similar mundane reasons. As plainly as the common people of the 15th century could see that the world was flat, he sees that he is victimized because he is a Catholic. It is what the social scientists call a "situational delusion." It could hardly be more disastrous if it were real.

Carpetbagger Draft Boards

Can a man be classified and inducted by a draft board whose members do not live in the area of the board's jurisdiction? According to two federal judges in Northern California, the answer is no. In a recent pair of little noticed decisions that could have a major impact on the Selective Service System, U.S. District Court Judges Robert F. Peckham and Alfonso Zirpoli acquitted, in separate cases, two draft resisters who contended that their draft boards were not lawfully constituted.

Selective Service regulations provide that "the members of local boards . . . shall, if at all practicable, be residents of the area in which the local board has jurisdiction." The purpose of the regulation is to implement Congress' intent that draft boards be composed of "little groups of neighbors." Since the only qualifications necessary for draft board members is that they be civilian U.S. citizens between the ages of 30 and 75, there is no "practicable" reason why they cannot be chosen from the district where they induct—or so Judges Peckham and Zirpoli ruled.

While the California decisions are not binding on other federal judges, they set a precedent that could open the Selective Service System to wholesale legal attack. Lawyers talk of the possibility of writs of habeas corpus for imprisoned draft resisters and even active-duty GIs whose draft board memberships violated Selective Service regulations. Now draft refusers from certain board areas may have a potent legal arrow to add to their quiver.

Selective Service officials in California are clearly worried. They will not say how many draft boards might be affected by the recent rulings, though one official admits it is a "substantial number." Ghetto boards in particular are notorious for being made up of outsiders. Since board members' addresses are not made public, it is difficult for outsiders to pinpoint the "carpetbaggers." But in the

IN THIS ISSUE

NOV 5
HC
JAN 6
JAN 29
MAY 9

September 8, 1969

EDITORIALS

194

ARTICLES

The Labor Movement Today:

200 Prospects and Problems — Joel Seldin
203 Black Workers in White Unions — William B. Gould
206 Minority Power Through Unions — B. J. Widick
208 Labor and Foreign Policy — Ronald Radosh
212 Labor and Politics — J. David Greenstone
215 SDS in the Mills — Russell W. Gibbons
217 Harry Golden
218 The Radical Goad — Melvyn Dubofsky

BOOKS & THE ARTS

222 The Labor Movement: Between Two Worlds — Frank J. Donner
226 Splendid Story — Russell W. Gibbons
228 Poverty War Games — George Brager
229 Records — David Hamilton

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 209 No. 7

last few weeks, nearly fifty California lawyers have obtained court orders allowing them to determine whether their young clients' draft boards are "lawfully constituted."

There are long-term pitfalls, of course, in this kind of assault on the draft. The Selective Service System can revise its regulations, or start packing draft boards with neighborhood residents. Moreover, a man whose classification or induction is ruled invalid because of a board's illegal membership can always be reclassified and reinducted by a new and lawfully constituted board. But the short-run prospects are cheering. PETER BARNES

Demoralization in Vietnam

Whatever the outcome of the Green Berets episode, it reflects serious disagreements among the case-hardened operators, American and South Vietnamese, who are still pressing for victory in Vietnam. It has long been an open secret that the Special Forces are the military arm of the CIA. What is still subject to speculation is who blew the whistle on the Green Berets, celebrated in the John Wayne movie and a hit record, and in newspaper and broadcast stories designed to instill low-IQ patriotism. Despite all this adulation, the Green Berets' commanding officer in Vietnam and seven of his subordinates were incontinently thrown into the Long Binh stockade, from which they were rescued by a pair of civilian lawyers hastily flown from the States, who tried the case in press conferences.

And all for what? Allegedly, the persons arrested had summarily done away with a South Vietnamese civilian suspected of having been a double agent. One would suppose that dozens, even hundreds, of obscure South Vietnamese civilians have been killed in this fashion, perhaps after torture, without anyone's being called to account. The sudden upsurge of the right to a fair trial in the Vietnamese blood bath indicates increasing strains between and among the parties to the Vietnamese-American grand alliance.

It is most unlikely that any of the Green Berets will be court-martialed or, if they are tried, that they will be convicted. Indeed, why should they be punished for doing what they were hired to do—except on the Nuremberg principle of individual responsibility which, as far as the United States is concerned, is outdated. Certainly, however, such strange goings-on cannot but impair morale, in the sense of blind obedience to orders, all the way down the line.

Even aside from the Green Berets mystery, the U.S. soldiers in Vietnam, especially the drafted men, must be wondering why they are kept on the firing line. Many of them are aware that numerous South Vietnamese officials are covering themselves by private deals with the Vietcong, who may have to be reckoned with in many parts of the country when the war finally ends.

American soldiers have rarely mutinied; the only conspicuous case that comes to mind is the occurrence in Italy in World War II when the troops, ordered to attack a difficult German position, protested, "We ain't mad at nobody." The incident in the Songchang Valley, reported by the Associated Press on August 25, had no direct connection with the ideology of the war; it seems rather to have been a case of combat fatigue and general disaffection. It is nonetheless barometric when the lieutenant in charge of a company is forced to report to the battalion commander that his men refuse to attack. There had been earlier complaints that the operation—the announced purpose of which was to reach the wreckage of a helicopter with eight dead occupants—was senseless. On August 24 the men would not move. The battalion commander sent a major and a battle-hardened sergeant to the scene. The sergeant seems to have done all the talking. Admitting to the AP men later that he had lied, he told the men that other units had sustained worse casualties and were still fighting. He called attention to the penalty for disobeying a direct order in combat—death. The men still refused. Finally, according to the story, the sergeant advanced by himself and the men followed him in a loose formation. What they were good for in future combat situations the account does not say, but if such incidents should multiply, a combination of resistance at home and in the field could serve to shorten the war.

Youth Labor Movement

Like their American counterparts, the West German labor unions largely follow the establishment line, disregarding the tensions of the times while trying to protect the status quo. But the DBG (Deutscher Gewerkschaftsbund—United Labor unions of Germany) are being challenged by the young workers within their organization.

Waldemar Reuter, member of the executive council of the DBG, was hissed and booed recently when he spoke before delegates to the DGB Youth Conference. He admonished his listeners that a labor union is "not a political party nor a substitute for one and definitely not a playground for those who feel politically alienated or are revolutionary hotheads." A few years ago, the hostile behavior of the audience would have been unthinkable; then Germany's working youth had not entered the political arena. But today, the youth organization within the DGB has been gripped by the same unrest and unease which is typical of the students at universities and high schools. Founded nineteen years ago, its membership totals 588,338 and makes it therefore the largest youth organization in that country. However, it is totally without voice and influence on its parent organization; when decisions are made at DGB conventions, youth delegates have no voting rights. Petitions for action within the youth labor market, for changes in apprenticeship regulations and vocational education, for democracy within the unions themselves, have been ignored by the DGB establishment. It is therefore not surprising that establishment functionaries are being booed, while DGB leaders leaning to the left are being applauded. Werner Vitt, member of the executive committee of IG-Chemistry, who talks about the solving of political problems as a task to be taken up by labor unions, finds enthusiastic reception among the young.

At a conference of the young unionists last November, the following resolutions were agreed upon: (1) recognition of the DDR (German Democratic Republic) and the Oder-Neisse Line; (2) contacts with the labor unions of the DDR and Communist labor unions of Western Europe; (3) ideological and financial support of the Easter March Campaign for Democracy and Disarmament; (4) discussions with the "progressive students" and preparation for "common actions to democratize society"; (5) formation of a DGB committee to call a general strike in case of wrongful application of the Enabling Laws.

As is to be expected, conservative German newspapers are dismissing these resolutions as Communist-inspired and directed by Ulbricht's propagandists. However, DDR reports dismiss the youth labor movement of West Germany as far too bourgeois and establishment-oriented, as not class-oriented enough, and not at all in line with the peace policies pursued by the DDR.

Basically, the ideas of the working youth are radical-democratic; youth wants to see democracy realized within the unions as well as without. The young worker does not want to be led any longer by senior functionaries, who are not interested in the problems of the young, but rather to spend money and energy for parties feting retiring and retired union members. He has learned that requests for change and understanding fall on deaf ears, and it is quite understandable that the membership of the young declines within the unions, while more and more young workers and apprentices join left-wing groups. The DGB establishment should not be surprised if the young union member of today becomes the revolutionary of tomorrow.

H. MULADORE

Real Trouble for the Pentagon

The Nation may be forgiven for taking a certain amount of satisfaction, not unmixed with amusement, at the vast amplification the media are giving to themes which our editors and contributors began raising a decade ago and have been hammering at ever since. Bigness surely has its advantages, but in journalism it sometimes seems as if discernment is in inverse proportion to size.

And not only in journalism: the Pentagon's present troubles stem largely from the fact that instead of shrinking a bit after the Korean War, it grew ever fatter, in budgets, in grades and in power, despite intermittent efforts to curb it through the Secretary of Defense. The Vietnamese War, and many peripheral occurrences, have exposed the faults, some of them verging on absurdity, of a bureaucratic monstrosity which, like the prehistoric reptiles, didn't know how to stop growing in the rear when a limit had been reached in the front. The Department of Defense is not solely to blame. In the most irresponsible abnegation of power in recent American history, the Congress issued a series of blank checks to the services, on the assumption, it would seem, that if Mendel Rivers, Richard B. Russell and John Stennis approved any expenditure, however extravagant, it must be necessary for the national security.

Now the time of reckoning has come, and there is not the slightest danger that the Congressional pendulum will swing too far in the other direction. If the defense budget were cut in half and the remaining half were expended intelligently and efficiently, the country would be safer than it is now—safer not only from foreign attack but from reckless adventures easier to get into than out of.

Although not recently, the Pentagon has been in this kind of difficulty before, and it has a standard operating procedure for continuing to ride the gravy train. Intelligence purporting to show the rise of the Soviet and Red Chinese menace is declassified and presented by the highest brass before the captive audiences of the veterans' organizations—captive because of their loss of ability to think except in hallowed stereotypes. Then the Pentagon makes some cuts, nicely calculated to appease its Congressional critics but no more than that. If the critics are still not satisfied and demand further cuts, the Pentagon's screams are loud enough to convince naive citizens that the Reds are about to overrun the country.

But that is where the difficulty arises in the Pentagon's present agony, which is actually not nearly as acute as the military press officers would have us believe. The average citizen is not overly concerned with military budgets; he figures that if it's necessary for our security he will dig down. Expenditures for welfare are what enrage him.

Prof. Seymour Melman, Sen. William Proxmire, even such a superlative logician as Senator Fulbright, are unable to convince him that things are really bad within the services. It takes the services themselves to do that, and they have done it. On the part of many citizens—probably by now a majority—there is a kind of gut feeling that the American military heads do not know their business. The series of ludicrous misjudgments in the Vietnamese War are a factor. Then there are such individual incidents as the sinking at dockside of a new submarine being fitted with its interior installations, the disaster which resulted in the loss of the destroyer Frank E. Evans and seventy-five of our sailors, the Pueblo affair, and so on. With the finest and most expensive communications systems in the world, communications in the services keep breaking down, not for technical reasons but because the service bureaucracies are not as smart as the computers and satellites. And, politically, isn't it true that the Pentagon is both the victim and the beneficiary of an obsolete "model" of the strategic world situation which it carries about in its collective mind?

Whether this distrust of the military goes all the way down to the casual newspaper reader and TV viewer is doubtful at this stage. It is enough, however, if it has infiltrated the ranks of middle management and the professions, and those academic circles and "think" organizations which are indispensable for even a show of efficiency. When the media becomes critical, one can be sure that the loss of confidence has gone deep. It is doubtful, then, that the Pentagon can deflect the tide of criticism being directed at it by simply cutting a few billions from its grossly inflated budget.

Prophecies Galore

The Nixon Administration hopes to extend its run of good luck by predicting more of the same. An unnamed spokesman assures reporters that prospects are splendid for a quiet year on the campuses. Other officials let it be known that further large-scale urban rioting is unlikely. But the fact that we had a relatively cool summer does not justify a forecast of cool summers to come. Nor is prophecy a substitute for leadership.

This Administration came to power after four summers of rioting had left Negro communities discouraged and, for the moment, exhausted. And not everyone agrees with the anonymous spokesman who looks forward to a quiet year on campus. Sol M. Linowitz, chairman of a special committee on campus tensions of the American Council on Education, has said that it is foolhardy to think that campus unrest has spent its course.

Not all prophecies are self-fulfilling, and at some date in the near future the luck of the Nixon Administration may run out. In the meantime we may expect a steady diet of pleasant forecasts.

The Woes of Con Edison

The troubles of Con Edison are also the troubles of New York City and its northern suburbs, and will not be easily cured. The crisis in electric power supply that has developed in the New York metropolitan area should be a warning to the nation: it can happen elsewhere.

The New York loads are growing ever more enormous, at the rate of about 8 per cent a year. Con Edison alone must be prepared to meet a peak load of 7,350 megawatts, a megawatt being 1 million watts, or 1,000 kilowatts. To meet this requirement Con Edison has a nominal capacity of slightly over 8,100 megawatts, which does not sound too bad, but the excess consists of power purchased from neighboring companies. Except for a small guaranteed block of 250 megawatts, these companies are not obliged to supply the power if in need themselves. Moreover, purchased power costs about twice as much as power derived from Con Edison's own generators, and hence is a burden on the consumers.

Another disturbing fact is that 12 per cent of Con Edison's eggs are in a single basket—the 1,000-megawatt turbine generator at Ravenswood in Queens. This machine was out of service for months after burning out its bearings in the great blackout of 1965, and recently suffered an internal short circuit. This time it was repaired in a little more than two weeks—very good time for a machine of this size—but it remains a crucial element in the system.

The company's day-by-day generating capacity is admittedly inadequate, a condition for which it is not solely responsible. The board chairman of Con Edison is now Charles R. Luce, an enlightened executive recruited from the public power sector. Mr. Luce is only stating a fact when he says that there are "objections on some level to just about every plant we hope to build." In the past, however, these objections have often been aggravated by the company itself. The 2,000-megawatt Cornwall pumped storage project was supposed to be on line in 1967, but in the face of opposition by conservationists anxious about the future of the Hudson River gorge, it cannot be ready until 1977—if it is ever built at all. If Con Edison had initially offered to put the power plant underground, it might have satisfied the conservationists, who are not in the strong position of those opposing the spoliation of Mineral King Valley by the Walt Disney interests.

Con Edison was allowed to go its own way with only lax supervision by the New York State Public Service Commission. While the officers of a utility may benefit temporarily by otiose regulation, in the long run public hostility builds up until the utility is in danger of being blamed for every adverse condition, as well as those for which it is indeed responsible. The blind opposition of the electric utilities to federal regulation is another blunder of this type: before long they may have to go to Washington for help in getting generating plants and interties established where they are urgently needed.

Above all, the power companies, and other semi-monopolistic industries, should abandon their secretiveness, eschew self-serving propaganda, and try to establish a rapport with the public based on long-range planning, with options and alternatives. Community officials and groups should be given a chance to contribute ideas and make suggestions. The companies probably won't do it, but if they did they might find themselves almost popular.

Eliot Pratt

The contingent—never overly large—of men who throughout their lives have served the public interest faithfully and well has lost a distinguished member. Eliot Pratt, who died at the age of 65 at his home in New Milford, Conn., was a fine servant of the public who preferred to function as a private citizen. A grandson of Charles Pratt, founder of Pratt Institute of Brooklyn, he was a man of wealth who generously supported the liberal causes in which he believed. He also personally served these causes.

At one time or another he had been a director of the American Civil Liberties Union, the League for Industrial Democracy, the National Sharecroppers Fund, Goddard College and the National Migrant Children's Fund. The rural poor—sharecroppers, tenant farmers, migratory workers—were a special concern; after graduating from Harvard he had attended the Cornell Agricultural School and for a time worked as a rural sociologist with the National Farmers Union. In 1960 he founded Current magazine, "for the concerned citizen," which reprints material from all sources "on the frontiers of social problems of today"—a valuable application of the digest format to the field of social criticism.

Eliot Pratt was a quiet, thoughtful, kindly man who endured a long illness with rare fortitude. He was never self-seeking or self-assertive. One might say of him, as Malcolm Muggeridge recently said of Leonard Woolf, that "the passion for goodness was not in him but the practice was." He was an extraordinarily good man.

THE LABOR MOVEMENT TODAY

A NOTE ON THIS ISSUE

Labor Day provides the occasion but not the reason for this special issue on the American Labor Movement. We decided to take a critical look at the labor movement this year for essentially the same reason that prompted a similar survey in 1955 ("American Labor Today: Prospect and Retrospect," The Nation, December 10, 1955). Then as now labor was closing one chapter and starting another. The first postwar decade was then coming to an end. It was the year of the merger of the AFL and the CIO about which we were not too sanguine ("Unity for What?" The Nation, February 19, 1955). By then, fighting the cold war had become an established way of life and the domestic witch hunt had not yet abated. The close working relationship between labor and government during the New Deal and Fair Deal administrations no longer prevailed; labor was definitely on the defensive. The decade drawing to a close had witnessed the adoption of the Taft-Hartley Act which if not "the slave labor act" some labor orators described, was hardly friendly in intention or effect. Right to work laws had been adopted in a number of states and "anti-labor" movements flourished here and there.

These and similar developments had played a part in bringing about the merger of the two branches of the labor movement. In addition, it was clear even then that accelerating social and economic change in the years ahead would have important implications for the labor movement. By recognizing, accepting, and even relying on unions, management had regained the inititiative in collective bargaining which, to some extent, it had lost. A period of active collaboration had begun. "When labor is organizing," we said then, "the initiative belongs to it; when the drives to organize abate, management recaptures the initiative." All in all it seemed a good time, in December 1955, to take a look at the labor movement.

This year seems an equally appropriate time. Again we are nearing the end of a decade of extraordinarily rapid movement and change. The merger of the AFL-CIO, about which we had misgivings from the start, has not proved to be an unqualified success. A new grouping—the Alliance for Labor Action—has emerged. Significant organizing drives, involving nurses, teachers, hospital workers, government employees, para-professionals, farm workers and airline employees, are again under way. The cold war has entered a new phase. The domestic witch hunt, which noticeably abated after 1960, is being reorganized, redirected and refinanced. Richard M. Nixon is in the White House following a campaign which found the labor movement estranged from some of its staunchest allies of former years. A new militancy has emerged among Negroes and Mexican-Americans, and the campuses have been swept by unrest. Disillusionment with "welfare liberalism" is widespread. The rhetoric of the Great Society is heard no more. Poverty, we now realize, will not be eliminated by merely allocating a small percentage of GNP to the poor, as many had once believed. The disastrous war in Vietnam, which by and large the labor movement had supported, drags on and on. But for the first time since 1945, the military-industrial-labor complex is high on the agenda of critical issues. So as we near the end of still another decade, it seemed a good time to devote a special issue to the labor movement.

This issue, then, is about the labor movement, not about the problems and achievements of specific unions. In a sense it is more concerned with the leadership—with the public position—of the labor movement than with the rank and file. By and large it follows the same format as the 1955 edition and is concerned with essentially the same issues. As then we have selected only certain matters for attention but there can be no gainsaying the importance of those selected. No doubt the labor movement will survive—even prosper—if it continues to adhere to present policies and perspectives. But it is not likely to regain the momentum and reacquire the degree of public support which once made it an important agency of social change unless it meets the challenge implicit in the issues set forth.

The discussion opens with Joel Seldin's statement of the changing social setting in which the labor movement functions today. B. J. Widick and William B. Gould consider different aspects of an old issue which has acquired a new urgency and significance. Mr. Widick stresses the importance of unions as a power base for blacks. Mr. Gould takes a look at what might be called "structural discrimination" against blacks in the labor movement. Ronald Radosh writes on labor and foreign policy; J. David Greenstone labor and politics; Russell W. Gibbons the relation between student activism and the labor movement. Frank J. Donner examines "the new unionism" and the state of affairs that prevails now that the labor movement finds itself caught between two worlds, one dying if not dead, the other struggling but still powerless to be born. Harry Golden's vignette of a recent incident in Charlotte reminds us that muscle and maximum public inconvenience will never substitute for the older union tactic of solidarity and broad public support.

Our 1955 labor issue was subtitled "Prospect and Retrospect" for the obvious reason that the first implies at least a measure of the second. Even readers as well informed as ours—and young readers in particular—need to be reminded of the slice of history Melvyn Dubofsky presents. For it bears not only on questions raised by the new militants of all types but on issues of perennial concern. It raises once again matters involving the relationship between the radical experience and tradition, and the labor movement and what it says about the radical's dilemma in an industrial society is relevant and timely. It suggests, too, why the leadership of the labor movement is preoccupied with preserving the gains labor has achieved rather than pursuing the professed goals through which it won public support.

THE EDITORS

Prospects and Problems

JOEL SELDIN

Mr. Seldin was a member of the editorial staff of the New York Herald Tribune from 1947 to 1965. His specialized reportorial assignments included labor unions and health-insurance programs.

Not too many years ago a new militance emerged in organized labor that was able to attract the allegiance of many Americans who were not, and were not likely to become, union members. The new industrial unions that were created in that great wave of enthusiasm and activity desperately needed public support. Their challenge to the national conscience was summed up in a song entitled Which Side Are You On?

The message was clearly that the new brand of unionism served broader interests than just the higher pay or better working conditions it could bring to those it organized. Just how broadly those interests could be conceived depended, in large measure, on which union leader was describing them. As a result, they were never very clearly spelled out. The advantage was that descriptions of union objectives could be tailored to the group being appealed to, from the most conservative to the most radical, and the resulting support was broad. So was the disagreement among union leaders and union members about what they were after, and for three decades at least the American labor movement has existed in this ambiguous fashion, with first the militants and later the older conservatives in control.

Those were the decades when the nation's understanding of its problems was distressingly unsophisticated, and such uncertainties could be allowed to exist. If we were concerned about poverty at all, we were reasonably sure that it resulted from the unconscionable greed of a few powerful men. Defeating them was all that was needed, and the basic national goodness and soundness would prevail, with no need to worry about intricate structural faults in the social and economic order.

The same or similar villains could be and were blamed for wars, civil rights withheld, and discrimination against minorities. Issues like the urban and rural population-pollution syndrome, or the quality of life under a military-industrial-marketing complex, were left to the attention of esoteric scholars in ivory towers whose notions had little meaning for practical men and everyday life. In ways that went largely unspecified, democracy, bolstered by the vaguely defined unionism, spiced up for some with a little refined socialism, could be counted on "to take care of all that." Dissenters like anarchists, Wobblies or Communists, were quickly disposed of.

Today, with new politics, a shrinking world, and modern communications media, we feel that we know better. Not only poverty, civil rights and the rights of minorities but wars that nobody professes to want, nuclear weapons, population and pollution explosions, world famine, urban and rural blight, alienation from the democratic process, individual identity and national morality are part of the list of common concerns. We feel that we understand better, not only the existence but also the complexity of these problems, and we are increasingly aware that failure to solve them threatens global, national and individual survival.

More and more the public demands that all institutions contribute at least to some progress toward solutions of these problems. Although there exists only the vaguest notion of what has to be done, and an underlying suspicion of pat answers, we do want clarity about who can reliably be expected to help. As this mood grows, more and more former supporters are turning the tables on organized labor and asking it the question that the unions first raised: "Which side are you on?"

Do the unions still serve national as well as their own interests? Are they even really serving the interests of their members, or only those of their leaders? Must unionists exclude others from opportunity, thus perpetuating poverty, in order to protect themselves; does this mean that unions will always be pitted against minorities in a competition for jobs and economic security? Are so many unionists so dependent on war industries for their jobs that they can never be an active force for peace? Does the same jobs-above-all attitude make the unions unreliable partners in fighting pollution, famine and urban and rural deterioration? Must there always be so broad and flagrant a connection between labor and organized crime?

Even broader questions are being raised. Are the unions so much a part of the Establishment—in industrial relations, domestic politics, and even foreign policy—that they must be counted among the opponents of the old ideals of equalitarianism and humanism? Have they become a regressive, rather than a progressive, element in the dialectic of change? What will be the role of labor in a society in transition, and where is continued support of existing unions, and possibly even of unionism, likely to lead as the society evolves?

If there are no ready answers, there is at least some evidence worth considering. The leadership of the AFL-CIO and its largest affiliates appear, for the most part, to have opted for what they consider "practical" and the critics deride as "business" unionism. Although these same leaders insist vehemently that they have not lost their old fervor for the larger social causes, the federation has been consistently lagging or absent on issues involving poverty, minority rights and peace, and has certainly done little to sensitize its membership in these areas. More pay for less work is still the touchstone of union policy, without too much concern for anything else. Gone are the crusade that labor once led.

Union leaders, with the seeming endorsement of their members, apparently prefer to regard themselves as the opposite numbers of the business and industrial leaders with whom they bargain for contracts. They like to model themselves after the style of these management executives, although in many cases they do it poorly. If they address themselves to the broad issues of the day, as they occasionally do, it is in much the same way that the corporation managers approach such problems.

The primary interest (after themselves) is that of the organization. Its long-range stability is paramount, even to growth. Its requirements justify anything and everything, from political maneuvering and legislative lobbying to crimes up to and including murder. There is implicit faith that this approach also serves the best interests of those the leaders are supposed to be serving, be they employed, jobless or retired members, unorganized workers, consumers or the public in general. The handful of exceptions, in membership or leadership, are pointed to with pride when the old militant image needs reviving, but they serve only to highlight how far removed they are from the general rule.

In what used to be the enemy camp, business and industry appear to be quite comfortable with this stance of union leaders. Except for some isolated instances around the margins of the economy—grape growers, hospital directors and a handful of old "free enterprisers"—the employers accept the current, limited definition of unionism. They are even heard to say that unions (properly controlled by law) are an inevitable part of modern labor-management relations. In most cases bargaining has become more a game than the bitter warfare of earlier years. What is more, it is a game in which both sides know and stick to the rules, including the ritual things that have to be said for public consumption.

Both are appalled by anyone who violates these rules. Analyses of current labor-management relations are disturbingly like descriptions of price-setting among seeming competitors. The process is mainly designed to keep the public from finding out how well the "opponents" really get along with each other. As in the setting of "administered prices," there are on occasion real wars in which individuals and organizations can get badly hurt, but never to the extent of upsetting the "system." Although it may not be conclusive evidence that this cozy relationship exists, it at least gives one pause to note that in the present Congress there are no major bills pending that would limit or roll back the existing powers of the unions.

At the other extreme are the student activists, the black and other minority militants and the New Left. Whatever their differences among themselves, these groups hold in common that solving the problems which concern them will require basic institutional changes. Although they even disagree about which institutions need changing and how, they agree that the unions will be of little help in making such changes.

The only remaining guardians of the old dreams about what could be accomplished through union organization are among the older generation of liberals and progressives—mostly intellectuals. Occasionally they still crop up in public or quasi-public office, but mostly they are upper-middle-class professionals or academics. For them, the most distressing element in the generation gap is the young people's attitude toward the unions, and they resist it. Similarly, they resist the prevailing attitude among union leaders, union members and employers. They are not ready to admit that their earlier hopes, based on unionism, were badly misplaced. Their reluctance was graphically illustrated in their attitudes toward the conflicting demands of union teachers and indigenous Negro leaders regarding hiring, tenure and community control in ghetto schools. Although in many cases they found it hard to understand or defend the union position, neither could they quite bring themselves to condemn or oppose it. And they would never cross a picket line.

However else one may assess this group, it must be recognized that they still exercise a powerful influence on conventional wisdom. Consequently, there is considerable currency to the view that if the unions are not everything they ought to be, neither are they so far gone that they should be deserted or scrapped. Politicians, editorial writers and professors can still support or find refuge in this "balanced" view, and it is not surprising that it persists. But to understand its strength and longevity, it must also be recognized that the possibility still exists that it is the correct view. Among the evidence to be considered are some faint stirrings of new thought within labor.

The recent joining together in the Alliance for Labor Action (ALA) of the United Auto Workers, the Teamsters and the International Chemical Workers Union to seek for labor new relevance to social problems, is one example. The first two, with a combined membership of 3.6 million, are not in the AFL-CIO, but the 110,000-member ICWU is an affiliate, and is defying George Meany's threat to expel from the federation any union that joins the ALA. Earlier a caucus within the AFL-CIO set up to oppose the war in Vietnam, was another. The latter made no great inroads into the AFL-CIO's support of the war and other military programs, and the former is still too young to be judged, but both indicate that there are still some union leaders and members who feel that labor need not take an exclusively parochial view of its own interests.

On the minority-rights front, a bloc of union leaders led by A. Philip Randolph and Bayard Rustin continue to insist not only that it is possible for minorities to improve their status through unionism but that the unions offer their best hope. Again, these are experienced union leaders who feel that labor can be activated as a more dynamic force for social and economic advances. They are well aware that there have been few concrete results in such programs as opening building trades apprenticeships and employment to minority-group workers, but they apparently still find it possible to feel that this can and will be accomplished within unionism.

In the Charleston, S.C., hospital strike, Local 1199, of the Drug and Hospital Employees Union, an affiliate of the AFL-CIO, forged the first real alliance between labor and the civil rights groups. It hopes that together they can improve the conditions of underpaid Negro workers, particularly in the South, something neither has been able to do alone.

In a few isolated instances, student and minority activists have made common cause with individual unions on specific issues. At some colleges, students have included in their demands the unionization of campus service workers. In some manpower programs, particularly those developing sub-professionals for the human services, there have been efforts to unionize the new workers to improve their conditions, increase their pay, and establish their status. Activists have led these drives, and have found no better mechanism for achieving their objectives than a union.

But whether public support for unionism will again become the burning issue that it was in the thirties and forties is unclear. Compounding the uncertainty is the relative paucity in recent years of news and comment about labor's policies and actions. The news media and the journals of opinion still carry items about a particular strike, political campaign, or legislative drive involving labor, or court decisions affecting bargaining strategy or membership policy. It is some time, however, since much attention was paid to the ambiguities of basic union policy, and the public has had little opportunity to affect the formulation of such policies. The unions have gone back to the AFL's old preference for keeping such discussions and decisions private. The media have, wittingly or not, cooperated.

Whether labor can continue to keep its affairs within its own "house" is, however, questionable. New times have brought new alignments of power outside as well as within labor. In an era of burgeoning concern for the consumer, triggered by a worrisome inflation, the unions' economic ability to affect prices and purchasing power even outside their own ranks makes it unlikely that labor will be allowed to claim rights of privacy. If the government or the spokesmen for the assorted downtrodden lack the will or the power to haul labor and its policies into the public arena, there are other forces that probably will. Business and industry, hard pressed themselves on the price question, will have to do so if only to distract some attention from themselves, or to provide a scapegoat.

If prices don't do it, then politics and public policy are a reasonable second possibility. In both major parties, established power continues to crumble and upstarts are challenging. As new blocs are formed, labor will have to declare itself. When it does, questions about how and why will be asked, and some sort of answers will have to be given if the blocs are to command any support. In addition, the dependable old red, white and blue curtain that has shielded the government's foreign military commitments is being frayed, and labor's role is not likely to escape the probing.

There is another reason for exposing the unions to public view. Armies of job seekers, previously not considered employment problems, are forming. The ethnic minorities may be just the outriders of this horde. It includes millions of women no longer satisfied to accept housekeeping and motherhood as alternatives to jobs, the mushrooming youth population no longer willing to accept more years of education as an alternative to jobs, "senior citizens" unwilling or unable to live on their skimpy pensions, and even growing numbers of the disabled, the retarded, the mentally ill, the alcoholics, and those afoul of the law, for all of whom jobs are being recommended as the best answer to their problems.

However long and hard spokesmen for the status quo in the labor market may trumpet their story of unlimited job opportunity and unfilled jobs, most of these people will continue to see only closed doors in "the world of work." Accountability will be demanded sooner or later, the unions will be an obvious target, and silence on their part will not be accepted as golden.

If or when the time comes, and the unions are again at the center of public attention, there will be a great need for better information than has been available in the past. If the liberal view is to prevail, and the unions are to fill a social role that transcends the immediate and even selfish interests of their members and their leaders, everyone will have to know more about them than they have been willing to make known about themselves recently. Greater and more sophisticated attention in the mass media will help, but ultimately it will be the unions' own attitude toward public and candid disclosure of their internal affairs that will indicate most clearly which side they are on.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

Black Workers in White Unions

WILLIAM B. GOULD
Mr. Gould is on the faculty of the Law School, Wayne State University. He has published numerous articles on labor law and racial discrimination.

If there is validity in the charge that the American labor movement is dominated by backward-looking traditionalists, is to be found in the relationship between trade union leaders and the racial minorities. Most of the controversy relates to the unions' response to the Negro worker in large urban centers, where trade unionism is strong and the influx of blacks and Puerto Ricans has produced conflict. The response is an ambivalent one—on the one hand, generous support by some of the progressive unions for legislation which improves the lot of blacks, but at the same time a reluctance on the part of the union leaders to put their own house in order and thus offend the white majority.

This is not new. It arose when the two World Wars brought large Negro migrations to the urban centers. What is new is the black community's hostility to all-white construction crews at work in the ghetto in the better paying trades and the emergence in the basic industries such as auto and steel, of the young black worker who did not grow up with trade unionism and who appears unafraid to challenge authority, whether that of union or employer. Although Negro workers make up only 9 per cent of the 18 million trade union members in this country, between 1960 and 1968 the nonwhite proportion of the work force in autos rose from 9 per cent to 15 per cent, placing blacks in a majority in some Detroit UAW locals. In electrical equipment manufacturing the increase was from 4 per cent to 9 per cent, while in metal fabricating the proportion went from 5 per cent to 8.4 per cent.

Such statistics, as well as society's general impatience, seem to be lost on union leaders who apparently believe that white rank-and-file racism simply mirrors that of the country at large. On the tough issues like seniority, apprenticeship standards and hiring halls—which affect black mobility—the unions are waiting for the Supreme Court to tell them that they must move. That may be a while yet. Although Attys. Gen. Ramsey Clark and John Mitchell have filed numerous suits alleging union discrimination in violation of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 (the federal fair employment practices statute) during the past two years, the courts are clogged with a host of procedural issues. Meanwhile, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, which administers Title VII, stumbles along with no enforcement powers and little in the way of appropriations. As Chairman Brown of the commission recently lamented: "The only thing we can do if we find discrimination is to sit down with the employer or the unions and negotiate or conciliate the particular case. . . It is almost impossible for us to do the job that has to be done unless and until we get cease and desist [enforcement] powers."

A basic question raised by the application of civil rights law to job discrimination in the unions is how legislation can undo past discrimination embodied in contemporary employment practices. This is highlighted by the seniority disputes between black and white workers in industrial plants where the races have been segregated by job and department in the past. (The crafts are confronted with some of the same problems in connection with their referral seniority.) The sticking point is usually how to do away with a system which has denied the Negro worker access to better paying, more desirable and hitherto all-white jobs and, more particularly, to arrive at a fair basis upon which Negroes are to be promoted. Most often, seniority districts have been separated for black and white jobs. The "competitive status" seniority of a worker for promotion and layoff is computed at the time which he has worked in the particular job and department, rather than plant-wide or "date of entry" seniority, which starts from the date the worker is hired. Because of past segregation, this means that the black worker's seniority is only good in the department to which he has been confined.

Of course, the principal value of seniority is that it creates a relatively objective system which extricates the union from continuous disputes among workers over who gets a particular job. Arbitrary action by the employer also is less likely. And whether seniority is based on time on the job, in the department or the plant, is usually a matter for the collective bargaining process. But the black worker is hurt badly when he cannot use the seniority which he has previously accumulated in his segregated district. The white worker who has already moved into the better jobs has a leg up the ladder when it comes to future reductions in the work force or competitive bidding for promotion.

Prior to the Civil Rights Act of 1964, the courts did not wish to upset seniority arrangements negotiated by a number of industrial unions, the United Steelworkers being among the most prominent. The Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit in New Orleans refused to disturb a system where Negroes were permitted promotion rights into the formerly all-white "line of progression" if they gave up their seniority and took a pay cut. The court said: "This is a product of the past. We cannot turn back the clock." (Whitfield v. United Steelworkers.) Once the Civil Rights Act was passed, however, Negro workers found new courage to challenge this kind of procedure. The Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and the courts have been inundated with allegations of seniority discrimination. More than 300 complaints have been filed against U.S. Steel alone—most involving the United Steelworkers as co-respondents.

The tide may now be beginning to turn. Last year, a district court in Virginia said that a seniority system which had its genesis in past racial discrimination was unlawful (Quarles v. Philip Morris). "Congress did not intend to freeze an entire generation of Negro employees into discriminatory patterns that existed before the Act," said the court, in preserving seniority credits accumulated by black workers while they were held back in relatively unskilled, low-paying segregated jobs. And on July 28 of this year, the same Fifth Circuit (and the same judge) which had refused to disturb discrimination rooted in the past did just that in United Papermakers v. United States, finding the Crown Zellerbach Corp. and the Papermakers guilty of seniority discrimination. Although the Supreme Court has yet to rule, the handwriting seems to be on the wall for most of the unions participating in such practices.

However, the cases have not yet disposed of the many complaints against unions with more highly skilled jobs, like the Steelworkers. In the steel industry, the skills prerequisite to jobs previously held by whites differ substantially from those of the jobs into which Negroes had been segregated. The remedy in such cases will undoubtedly be to establish training programs for black workers who possess the necessary potential. And woven into this picture is a mine field of tests and examinations devised by employers for black employees whom they have always regarded as nonpromotable.

Much litigation between the Steelworkers and their Negro members is in part responsible for the appearance of the Ad Hoc Committee (composed of black steelworkers) at the 1968 Steelworkers Convention. This committee is pressuring for Negro representation in policy making and staff positions at the national level. Despite the fact that the Steelworkers' membership is one-fourth black, whites are in a majority in every regional district, and thus far have been unwilling to vote for Negro candidates. But the emergence of black militant organizations in the auto industry, though seemingly part of a national trend, is a little more difficult to understand. The job segregation in autos, of a de facto variety which seems to produce a number of all-black foundries, is hardly as prevalent as in steel. Walter Reuther, albeit under pressure from the Negro American Labor Council, has sponsored the election of two black international executive board members. Moreover, the UAW has recently proposed to the Ford Motor Company that newly hired "disadvantaged" workers be immunized against work force reductions through the use of "inverse" seniority.

The "inverse" seniority concept as put forward by UAW leader Ken Bannon would permit senior workers to take a layoff at their own option with generous supplemental unemployment compensation benefits (SUB) negotiated by the UAW. Thus junior black employees who are not yet eligible for SUB would have a better chance of obtaining the seniority credits required for eligibility. This proposal has been rejected by the Ford Motor Company, which viewed it as a stalking-horse for a sabbatical leave for auto workers, rather than as a proposal aimed at the hard-core unemployed. It is probably fair to say that the union's proposal would increase the cost of the SUB program considerably.

UAW officials, who have roundly attacked black militants in the auto plants, are genuinely surprised by the wildcat stoppages which have their origin in allegedly racial issues. Privately they recognize that the grievance procedure, which was created shortly after union organization thirty years ago, is not up to dealing with some of the more complex racial disputes. The arbitrator, who is the third party "neutral" adjudicating a dispute, is picked by the very parties, union and company, whom the dissidents distrust; the black worker has no say in the process.

The International Brotherhood of Teamsters has attempted to establish special machinery in conjunction with the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission to resolve disputes concerning white over-the-road drivers who refuse to share their cabs with Negroes. But not much has been accomplished—largely, say the Teamsters, due to EEOC's confusion about its future under Nixon.

An example of the Negro community's skepticism over the arbitration process, as it relates to racial discrimination, can be found in a San Francisco dispute arising out of civil rights agreements negotiated between the Hotel Employers Association of San Francisco and various civil rights organizations. The Culinary Workers Union challenged their validity on the ground that an agreement concerning employment conditions with anyone but the union offends the principle that the union is exclusive bargaining agent for all workers. In a hearing held without the presence of the civil rights groups which had been involved in the negotiations, an arbitrator held that the civil rights agreements were unlawful because of exclusive representation arguments advanced by the union. Moreover, in the arbitrator's view, the requirement that the employer keep statistics concerning the racial composition of the work force by job classification was the same as unlawful "preferential treatment." Predicated upon some very shaky legal propositions (the Equal Employment Opportunitty Commission itself requires racial statistics from employers and unions), the arbitration award created a furor in the San Francisco Negro community and raised suspicions about the good faith of labor unions concerning minority employment.

A substantial part of the problem may be that despite large Negro membership, industrial union leadership is nearly lily-white. As noted above, the UAW is ahead of most other unions in the awarding of policy-making positions to blacks. But until 1962 Reuther took the position that Negroes must warrant election on their own merits, implying support for the notion that lack of qualification was the reason for segregated leadership. In 1962, Nelson Jack Edwards was elected to the executive board as a member at large, a position especially created with the understanding that it would go to a Negro. But the position of the Steelworkers union was made clear by Vice President Molony:

> . . . the election of an officer to this union because of his color, would be a contradiction in the basic theme of the civil rights movement, that people should be judged, hired, or elected on the basis of their ability.

What is overlooked is that race consciousness is necessary to overcome past discrimination, and that since Negroes have been deliberately held back, they must now be deliberately promoted to leadership positions and placed on the "slate." (In fairness to the Steelworkers, it should be pointed out that a Negro candidate lost out this year in Baltimore, where blacks constitute from 30 to 40 per cent of the vote. Apparently the blacks did not vote in large numbers.) The redrawing of district lines into smaller territories, or the election of more than one executive board member from each particular region, would help achieve a more racially balanced representation at the top level. This would be preferable to the selection of a member at large lacking his own constituency and possessing little independence. One of the Ad Hoc Committee organizers said: "We believe that there will be an explosive situation in the United Steelworkers of America so long as [President] Abel is unable to appoint and we are unable to elect a member to the board."

Unlike their industrial counterparts, the craft unions' bête noire has always been job access for minority groups. While the Workers' Defense League has been able to prepare Negro youngsters for apprenticeship tests in New York City with a fair amount of success, thus breaking down old barriers in unions like the Sheet Metal Workers, progress has not been astounding. Only twenty minority group plumber apprentices in the entire country were recruited through the Department of Labor-sponsored Outreach programs from January 1967 through October 1968, although the numbers for such exclusionary crafts as Iron Workers, Sheet Metal Workers and Electricians are slightly more encouraging. As UAW staffer Horace Sheffield said last year about integration in the Detroit building trades: ". . . at the present pace it will be somewhere around 2168 before Negroes achieve their full equality in most of the apprenticeable trades."

Curiously, it is the Nixon Administration, pilloried by the black community for its equivocation in other areas, which seems to have put the bite on the building trades more firmly than ever before. Although a federal district judge in Ohio had ruled two years ago, in Ethridge v. Rhodes, that contractors must circumvent contractual hiring obligations to unions which do not refer Negroes, and the Office of Federal Contract Compliance had required "manning tables" of Cleveland contractors, showing the number of minority group workers on the job, the labor movement resisted this approach as "piles of nonsense and illegal." And on November 29, 1967, in a speech to the Building and Construction Trades Department, former Secretary of Labor Wirtz said that the Cleveland plan should not be extended to other cities. Said Wirtz: ". . . it isn't right as a general policy, and it won't work. Even if it drags someone who worships his prejudices into line, it demeans somebody else who has done the right thing for the right reason." This is what the unions wanted to hear, and in February 1968 Secretary Wirtz reiterated his position. C. J. Haggerty, president of the Building and Construction Trades Department, promised that he would try to get his craft locals into line on the race issue.

However, the relationship with the Department of Labor has not been nearly so warm during the past few months. On June 27 Assistant Secretary of Labor Arthur Fletcher announced the Revised Philadelphia Plan, a more vigorous attempt to bring minority-group workers into the better paying trades. According to a UPI dispatch, the Building and Construction Trades Department immediately labeled the plan "unworkable," encouraging "harassment" and contrary to previous "understandings" with the Department of Labor. Senators Dirksen and McClellan claimed that it was an unlawful quota system under the Civil Rights Act of 1964.

What Secretary Fletcher has done is devise a program which simply takes into account the fact that only .5 per cent of the membership of covered unions in Philadelphia is black, although the city has a substantial Negro population, and that this is in large part attributable to past exclusionary practices of the crafts. The Revised Philadelphia Plan requires contractors doing business with the government to accede to a "definite standard" of minority employment in seven of the better paying trades. The plan cannot be regarded as embracing an ironclad "quota," because it makes use of flexible criteria in determining the standard: (1) the current extent of minority group participation in the trade; (2) their availability for employment in the trade; (3) the need for training programs in the area, and/or the need to assure demand for those already existing; (4) the impact of the program upon the existing incumbent labor force. The success of the plan will obviously depend upon how enthusiastically it is administered. But what has upset the building trades especially is Secretary Fletcher's announcement that this concept will soon be extended to other urban centers.

One other cockpit of controversy is the Model Cities Act of 1966 which proposes to expand job opportunities and housing for residents of the urban ghettos. To date, it has only succeeded in encouraging resort to "black unions" in cities like Boston, Detroit and Cincinnati. The government's involvement here has thus far not had the smack of firmness. The Model Cities Agreement for the Boston area, which was announced in September of 1968, does not assure the Negro "trainee" that he will eventually receive a journeyman's card in the craft. After the project is completed the Negro worker is back in the cold, perhaps even further embittered because of his personal acquaintance with the job opportunities denied him. And, as Herbert Hill, labor secretary for the NAACP, stated last December: "No provision is being made for giving contracts to the Negro-owned construction companies who employ the majority of black building craftsmen who are denied membership in the construction unions."

It is possible, however, that the Revised Philadelphia Plan is just the beginning, and that the craft unions are in more trouble than they now realize. Lawsuits filed throughout the country will undoubtedly challenge the relevance, to the work that is actually performed, of their apprenticeship and journeyman examinations. And even if one accepts the protestations by the craft unions that they are now welcoming blacks into the fold, past exclusions (whether of a formal or father-son variety) make the low age requirements for entry into the trade not only arbitrary but also discriminatory. Consequently, there are a large number of Negro males who may be interested in the trade but are now excluded because they are in their middle or late 20s.

But it is not only the excluded black who is upset with the craft unions. Astronomically high construction wage increases fan the fires of inflation and make housing for both poor and middle-income people exceedingly costly. Industrial unions like the UAW are beset by rebellion among their skilled workers due to the growing gap between factory and construction wages. In seven Ohio cities, unionized factory workers are averaging $3.70 an hour, while electricians, plumbers and iron workers are earning $7.25 to $7.56 per hour.

All this may eventually lead not only to mass-produced housing employing Negro workers at factory wages —the type which HUD Secretary Romney is pushing for —but also to increased governmental supervision of the number of employees entering the craft and the length of the apprenticeship program. Indeed, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Fifth Circuit has already required the unions to revise their apprentice estimates which were completely out of line with labor market requirements: (Heat and Frost Insulators v. Vogler.) This would benefit whites as well as blacks who are denied access, since unions have kept the supply of labor low to drive up wages and to guard against unemployment. Hardly anything strikes more directly at what the craft unions cherish as their prerogative.

Today's essential lesson for both the craft and industrial unions is that without a quick move on their part to integrate the racial minorities, government will intervene in what has passed for collective bargaining. This applies to hiring halls, seniority systems and apprenticeship standards; all these institutions are bound to be badly shaken. It would seem that the unions would be better off if they did the job themselves; but only a small number of trade unionists seem interested in that kind of argument.

Minority Power Through Unions

B. J. WIDICK

Mr. Widick is the author of Labor Today: The Triumphs and Failures of Unionism in the United States (Houghton Mifflin). He teaches at Columbia and Wayne State Universities.

Pressure is building up in the ranks of the 1.5 million Negro members of trade unions, the usual manifestation being the emergence of black caucuses. In addition, independent, and as yet small, black unions are being organized in many sections of the nation. The implicit explosion confronts the trade union leadership with one of its most difficult problems, and one which it seems least equipped to handle well.

The Negro unrest has grown largely unnoticed, but recently a series of incidents has directed wider attention to it. There have been wildcat strikes, mostly abortive and self-defeating, in auto plants. A large minority of black workers petitioned for an election in the Transport Workers Union in New York. More than 4,000 of the 17,000 Negroes in a 27,000-member local have indicated a willingness to form an independent union. Quite surprisingly, the 100,000-member District 65 of the Retail, Wholesale and Department Store workers left its parent body on the ground that the national leadership is "lily-white" (it is; no Puerto Rican or Negro holds a top position).

In the middle of July, more than 300 delegates from steel union locals all over the country held a conference at Gary, Ind., to push for more black power in a union that has nearly 200,000 Negro members, none of whom holds a policy-making position. The keynote speaker was Herbert Hill, a labor secretary of the NAACP, whose efforts to break down labor's discriminatory practices, notably in the building trades unions, have made him anathema to most AFL-CIO leaders. Many unions forbid the formation of caucuses, except for brief moments before elections, but a new nation-wide black caucus calling itself the National Ad Hoc Committee of Concerned Negro UAW members has met in Detroit with Walter Reuther—whose door, unlike those of many labor leaders, is open. There are black caucuses in the Teachers union. In both Chicago and Detroit more than 35 per cent of the teachers are black and they are becoming aware of their political potential.

The new element in these controversial developments is that, for the first time in modern trade unionism, Negro activists operate from a social base of growing strength. When A. Philip Randolph was conducting his innumerable fights against the racist practices of the AFL hierarchy he represented the tiny Pullman porters union, which lacked impressive economic or political strength. But today in the steel and auto unions, for example, more than forty key local unions are largely or completely run by elected black officials. And in the growing white-collar unions of the cities, as well as in the federal system (notably the Postal Employees), the work force may soon include a majority of Negroes and members of other minorities. The AFL-CIO Laborers' Union has important black-dominated locals. In New York, the increase of Negro and Puerto Rican workers in the garment and clothing industries and the city-wide flickerings of political discontent promise trouble.

The building trades are the most critical area. Forgetting for the moment the many lawsuits that have been brought against these unions, the rise of black unions like the Independent Alliance of Skilled Crafts of Ohio, the United Community Construction Workers of Boston, the United Construction and Trades Union in Detroit, the Maryland Freedom Labor Union, to mention a few, present an issue of different proportions than do small white independent unions with no power base in society. The cry for breaking down segregated local unions loses some of its meaning in this context: the social composition of the work force, not formal policies, may soon determine the character of many local unions.

Impressive evidence of what black workers can do was the recent decision of Governor Rockefeller to hold up construction of a large office building on 125th Street in Harlem when it became evident that at least a part of the community was opposed. The future of Model Cities programs, or low-cost housing, or indeed any construction, is dubious until a much larger percentage of black workers is accepted into the building trades. The existing apprentice programs sponsored by pro-union groups like the Workers Defense League, or the efforts of the A. Philip Randolph Institute, are hopelessly inadequate.

Victor Gotbaum, executive director of District Council 37 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, a third of whose 115,000 members are either Negro or Puerto Rican, spoke the hard truth when he said: "Let's not kid ourselves. They don't like us in the black community. We have to make a determined analysis why this is so and then do something about it. Labor may be doing as much as other groups but that isn't enough. We're supposed to be a friend of the underdog."

However, there has been progress. The work of Leon Davis' Local 1199 among hospital workers, culminating in the Charleston strike, suggests the potential for unionism under sound direction, as did the Memphis garbage workers' strike, which coincided with Martin Luther King's assassination. Cesar Chavez has given the "Chicanos" of California a sense of organization heretofore largely unknown. However, some insight into the extraordinary difficulties that arise when racial problems are injected into the union movement may be gathered from the experience of those agricultural workers. Chavez himself has discussed his own suspicions of organized labor, noting how long it took him to decide on a pro-union course. The suspicion among Negroes is perhaps even greater, and when one notes how limited were the manpower and financial resources given the Chavez union for the task it faced (and still faces), it begins to seem unlikely that the AFL-CIO hierarchy will soon change its stodgy ways.

The disposition of most union leaders to discount the upsurge among Negro union members, or the creation of independent unions, as "black chauvinism," dual unionism, or "New Leftism," is self-deceptive and self-defeating. Of course, these factors are to be found in one degree or another in some of the political struggles within and around the union movement; but they are no more decisive than were the same motives when the AFL-CIO was attempting to suppress A. Philip Randolph's efforts to create the Negro American Labor Council a decade ago.

In fact, one of the main reasons for the emergence of the separatist or exclusively black caucus tendencies has been the resistance of the union executives to a growth of the NALC that would have given Negro and other minority workers an appealing sense of direction. The once effective Detroit affiliate of the NALC, called the Trade Union Leadership Council, spent almost as much time countering the attempts made to destroy it as it did in breaking down job and political discrimination against Negroes. Its leaders, Horace Sheffield and Robert Battles III, were denounced repeatedly as dual unionists and black chauvinists.

Since NALC activists were primarily staff people, they were susceptible to persistent bureaucratic pressure and were unable to give the movement a mass base of the kind that the very size and composition of the work force is now creating for black militant unionists. Today, local unions offer them such attractive opportunities that sharing the power or taking it over is an unavoidable goal. In the early days of the CIO Negroes were usually trained and pushed ahead by radical groups; they were dependent on the white structure. Now Negroes have emerged on their own and stand upon their own mass base. It makes a significant difference.

The young black "revolutionists" have been excluded from most of these developments. Their function has been to raise issues, but their activities have been largely ineffective. The National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce may become exercised about the proposals of the New Left to revolutionize both white and black workers, and these do provide a useful target for labor bureaucrats who prefer "to save the union and the country from revolution" rather than to solve the problems pointed out by the Left. Sporadic incidents make headlines, and cause irritations, but they are not the main thrust of the new movement among Negro union members. Branding as Uncle Toms all Negro unionists who are not with them 100 per cent may satisfy the needs of revolutionary rhetoric, but it will have no permanent effect.

Yet if present developments within and around the trade unions should make them more effective instruments of social protest, then perhaps progress can take the direction of organized and effective struggles and not fall prey to the anarchy of frustrated and despairing young blacks. It would be a welcome change in the current dismal American scene.

Labor and Foreign Policy

RONALD RADOSH

Mr. Radosh is author of a forthcoming book, The American Labor Movement and United States Foreign Policy (Random House), on which this article is based. He teaches history at Queensborough Community College, City University of New York.

At the end of July, George Meany vehemently denied Sen. J. William Fulbright's assertion that the AFL-CIO had received $33 million in contract payments as a "payoff" for its support of the war in Vietnam. But Meany's explanation, that money received was "used to carry out the foreign policy of the United States Government," pointed up the actual role played by American labor unions abroad.

This role is not a new one for American organized labor. The "labor statesman" has become such an accepted part of our way of life that all post-World War II administrations have received unswerving loyalty from the AFL-CIO leadership. Indeed, the virtually universal acceptance of cold-war diplomacy in American political life has been reinforced by the active support at home and abroad of the American labor movement. This support began during the periods of the First World War and the Bolshevik revolution, when the labor leadership's backing of State Department policy was for the first time actively sought by government leaders, in exchange for concessions offered the AFL.

During the first Russian Revolution, in March 1917, American labor entered the stage of world diplomacy. Conventional diplomats found themselves unsuited to deal with the Russian Socialists and they turned to labor leaders in the United States for help in executing administration policy. Woodrow Wilson promptly appointed both a labor leader and a pro-war Socialist to Elihu Root's commission to Russia, sent for the purpose of helping the new Russian Government stay in the war. AFL Vice President James Duncan, and the noted Socialist intellectual Charles Edward Russell, accompanied the mission and propagated administration policy in the name of unionism and socialism.

Woodrow Wilson came to put high value on the service that could be offered his administration by labor leaders. From Samuel Gompers' standpoint, the AFL activity meant not only new acceptance for trade unionism but direct concessions in the form of contracts with firms engaged in war production which accepted union standards of wages, hours and working conditions. When World War I broke out, Gompers and his associates rushed to support the war effort and the Allied cause.

Having obtained AFL support for the war effort, Wilson hoped to use bona fide AFL union leaders to influence the policies of highly critical British and French labor leaders, and exclusively American labor missions were sent to wartime Europe. Gompers himself traveled to Britain, France and Italy during the summer of 1918, to warn European laborers against any leaders with a pacifist, Socialist or "pro-German" bias.

Then, as now, the American labor leaders often took a position more militant than that adopted by their own government. Wilson's closest ideological allies in Europe were the moderate Socialists; British Labour Party chieftain Arthur Henderson, for example, sought to unite the Allied Left behind the Wilsonian program, believing it would undercut the strength of the old-world imperial governments. Henderson counted on Wilson to enforce a just peace, and to curb the imperial appetites of men like Lloyd George and Clemenceau.

But Gompers would not come to terms with the European social democrats, and he balked at Henderson's offer of cooperation in the rebuilding of the old Socialist International as a pro-Wilsonian organization. Gompers' presence in Europe had the effect of weakening Wilson's major supporters and strengthening the Allied Right, as he continually sought to isolate the moderate's position within the European labor movements. His policy also estranged the AFL from Allied labor. War-weary European workers wanted a quick end to the war, negotiations with "enemy" labor leaders, a democratic peace, and repudiation of their own conservative governments. They were not about to adopt business unionism domestically, and to work for an all-out military victory and a dictated peace. Gompers' insistence that they pursue such a course only reinforced their view that the AFL was a half century out of date.

While European labor was dissatisfied with the wartime role played by the AFL, the Wilson administration had the satisfaction of seeing the American labor movement act as its agent abroad. Although Gompers may have weakened the position of Allied Wilsonians, Wilson himself actually preferred to deal with the existing Allied governments, and he was not willing to risk the danger of social revolution that lay hidden beneath the surface of moderate socialism.

Working closely with the AFL leaders and the State Department was a loose group of pro-war Socialists, men who had left the American Socialist Party because of its opposition to U.S. participation in the war. These men began the now common practice of Socialists and ex-Socialists working in collaboration with the State Department or otherwise in furtherance of its programs; thus an occasional echo of social-democratic rhetoric in policy statements. The role of Norman Thomas, who on at least one occasion, worked willingly with the CIA to implement anti-Communist programs in Latin America, was foreshadowed by these earlier compatriots who identified the cause of "freedom" with that taken by the U.S. Government.

Members of the Social-Democratic League (John Spargo, William E. Walling, Charles E. Russell, J. G. Phelps Stokes, Algie M. Simons and others) had allied themselves with Gompers as well as with State. They pledged to work, as SDL member Henry L. Slobodin explained, as Socialists "under the control of the State Department, but otherwise free to use the traditional methods of Socialist propaganda." While Wilson had no liking for their ideology, he understood that Socialists had the best chance of influencing Allied Socialist groups to stay committed to a pro-war course. The "responsible" anti-revolutionary Socialist had become the ally of a conservative American administration. The use of such figures by future administrations was only a continuation of a policy instituted during the First World War.

The contemporary counterrevolutionary efforts of American organized labor were started during World War II, primarily through the mechanism of the Free Trade Union Committee. Created in 1944 to aid European unionists who were part of the anti-Nazi underground, the FTUC concentrated on isolating Communists within the partisan and resistance movements. At the war's end, under the direction of Jay Lovestone and Irving Brown, the FTUC worked to build pro-U.S. unions and to split European labor. A brief look at Irving Brown's work in France reveals the nature of early Lovestone diplomacy.

Viewing events in France as the "key to Western European labor developments," Brown vowed to split and hopefully destroy the major French labor union, the General Confederation of Labor (CGT). To achieve his goal, the AFL worked toward creation of a dual union, formation of which would leave the AFL open to severe condemnation from any good trade unionist, on traditional union grounds. Nevertheless, Brown favored working in such a way "that neither the AF of L nor the comrades in the CGT will be open to justifiable criticism."

The method favored was financial subsidy of an anti-Communist group in the Printer's union, as well as Robert Bothereau's Force Ouvrière, through extensive monetary grants by the AFL. To cover up the contributions, which they understood would compromise the AFL, the money was deposited in the account of the Jewish Labor Committee in New York. This group served as a front, and the funds were secretly transferred to the anti-Communist opposition in France. The continual grants were the mainstay of the rather impotent and minuscule opposition groups. Brown admitted that building a dual union was "not a nice way of doing business." But, he explained, European unions could not "be treated with in the same open, direct fashion as in the U.S.A."

Brown succeeded in eventually splitting the CGT. The AFL, he boasted to Jay Lovestone, George Meany and others, had "penetrated every country of Europe." Though Brown built the dual union on the basis of dissatisfaction among French workers with the Communist policy of production and speed-up, he never succeeded in building a meaningful alternative to the CGT. That union, CIO leader John Brophy candidly remarked, still had "the bulk of the organized industrial workers." Creation of the Force Ouvrière did not solve the AFL's problems. The FO took a position in favor of price cuts, at a time when wage increases were being wiped out due to inflation. In late 1948 Communist demands for wage increases began to win working-class support for the CGT, and even Brown admitted that if he were a French coal miner he would be forced to work with the Communists. Brown, however, viewed all CGT strikes as political efforts to interfere with the Marshall Plan in Western Europe. He willingly took CIA money to break the dock worker strike which interfered with the unloading of U.S. arms at the port of Marseilles.

Having failed to destroy the CGT, Irving Brown offered one final suggestion. Union leaders who had been removed from office because of their support of the Vichy occupation regime, Brown asserted, should be restored to leadership positions in the CGT; at the same time, Communists among the union leadership should be removed from office. If they were not, he proposed that the right of trade union representation and collective bargaining rights should be withdrawn from the CGT. To destroy the CGT, Brown advocated an alliance with the proto-Fascists, and wanted the CGT to be outlawed. But since it was still the main representative of French labor, Brown was in effect asking that the French working class be deprived of representation. The AFL leaders were asking for the elimination of any trade union organization which did not give unconditional support to State Department policy.

In Latin America, AFL policy worked to produce similar results. American union leaders seek explicitly to build institutions that can forestall social revolution, to create unions through which the State Department can neutralize working-class support for revolutionary movements. This function is highly appreciated by corporation leaders who work alongside the AFL-CIO in the American Institute for Free Labor Development (AIFLD). "Businessmen in Latin America have become convinced," writes Enno Hobbing in the official publication of the Standard Oil Company, "that free labor unions are essential to free enterprise." Corporations approve of the unions because the AFL-CIO leaders share the same goals as the corporate executives. Unions "do not generate the waste of wildcat strikes; they are opposed to expropriation; and they are solid bulwarks against extremism in the ranks of labor" (The Lamp, Spring 1967).

Often, the AFL-CIO leaders have helped local Latin American dictators establish the very power they later used to crush all trade unions, including their own. George Meany and his associates then propagated the myth that remaining shadow unions, controlled by the local power elites, were legitimate anti-Communist forces, and represented the worker's true interests. Direct agents of the AFL-CIO supported the pro-Batista CTC in pre-revolutionary Cuba; took part in the overthrow of the Arbenz government in Guatemala in 1954; played a significant role in the collapse of the Goulart government in 1964 in Brazil; worked to destroy the democratically elected government of Cheddi Jagan in British Guiana; and collaborated with the most conservative forces in the Dominican Republic against the moderate constitutionalist Juan Bosch.

It is no surprise that the major corporation leaders happily work alongside the AFL-CIO in AIFLD. Its purpose, in fact, is to dispel the hostility of Latin American workers toward U.S. corporations. Corporate leaders like AIFLD Chairman of the Board J. Peter Grace work through AIFLD because of general fear that social revolution would sweep away the prerogatives of U.S. investors. "Very high stakes are at issue," Grace emphasized, "because the political, military and economic interests of the United States are affected. Furthermore, the Communist campaign has broadened beyond the stage of attacking American companies alone; it is now concentrating on the very basic system of private enterprise to which the American republics are dedicated." What men like Grace favor is a type of union movement that will not challenge the hegemony of U.S. corporations in Latin America.

It is necessary to ask why American labor leaders developed such a close identification with State Department policy. Unions were formed, after all, to better the economic position of wage earners; no apparent relationship exists between this purpose and U.S. foreign policy. An answer was provided by a labor journalist in the late 1920s. Unions then, Arthur W. Calhoun wrote, emphasized productivity and labor leaders spoke about the "ways and means of increasing output." Calhoun was not enamored of this conservative approach, but saw no other alternative "but for organized labor to go along with triumphant American capitalism in its conquest of the world." Better to be a "side-partner to American business in its march toward the enslavement of the world," he sarcastically commented, "than to take poor chances in a battle with the employers." Calhoun knew that such a course would prove advantageous to the labor leaders, because American capitalism could "easily afford to hand out a continual stream of material benefits" to organized labor "so that social solidarity might be maintained in the face of an unfriendly world."

As unions grew, their leaders accepted the existing corporate political economy, in return for a minor share in the decision-making process and increasing economic rewards for their members. Their purpose was to integrate workers into the existing system, rather than to fashion a lever for changing it. Labor leaders wanted, C. Wright Mills explained, to "join with owners and managers in running the corporate enterprise system and influencing decisively the political economy as a whole." The result then was a "kind of 'procapitalist syndicalism from the top.' "

Union leaders understood that a viable movement would aid a bureaucratized government to win the cooperation of the labor force. To keep the machine functioning smoothly, the corporate leaders required the aid of a state regulated and approved labor movement. When the AFL and CIO merged in the mid-fifties, the old craft federation proved that it was ready to join with the CIO to centralize control over the American working class. Unity was obtained only after the CIO unions had joined the cold-war consensus, and had purged their own internal left-wing opposition. The AFL-CIO has since worked to keep the laborer wedded to the corporate system.

Labor's foreign policy stems from the conservative union movement fashioned by AFL-CIO leaders. Unions are meant to be junior partners of the large corporations, and their leaders seek only those gains acceptable to the system's top leaders; they see the chance for these gains disappearing if they move to challenge corporate foreign policy. Just as U.S. foreign policy itself reflects the domestic organization of the political economy, so indeed does the labor leader's foreign policy reflect the type of corporate unionism that has developed in the United States.

Some critics, like Henry W. Berger, suggest that Walter Reuther "could possibly provide a different direction for labor's international activities and also restore a portion of a badly damaged democratic labor tradition." (See "Lovestone, Meany & State: American Labor Overseas," The Nation, January 16, 1967.) It is fruitless, however, for hopeful liberals to keep on "waiting for Walter." Reuther's chance to act has already passed. His criticism has been advanced within the framework of existing assumptions, and he has consistently shied away from any basic challenge to the premises of United States foreign policy.

Reuther has shown, rather, that the old CIO leaders have themselves engaged in the battle originally fought by David Dubinsky, Matthew Woll and Jay Lovestone. Because they so completely accepted the aims of U.S. policy, CIO leaders proved as willing to accept economic aid from the Central Intelligence Agency as did the AFL chieftains. Thomas Braden, CIA director of "cultural" activities, revealed in his 1967 Saturday Evening Post article that not only had he financially supported Irving Brown but he had also given Victor Reuther of the UAW some $50,000 in $50 bills, to help the Reuther brothers build anti-Communist unions in Germany.

The Braden revelations produced an insulted UAW leadership. Walter Reuther could not deny the charge, though he described it as "incomplete and misleading." At the end of World War II, Reuther sought to explain, "the American labor movement made a great effort to assist in the rebuilding of the free labor movement in Europe." Reuther did not realize that his subsequent explanation only revealed that he was in agreement with the cold-war consensus.

Since this movement was "weak and without resources and . . . especially vulnerable to Communist subversion," Reuther judged that an "emergency situation" existed. Therefore the UAW reluctantly agreed "on one occasion to the request to transmit Government funds to supplement the inadequate funds being made available by the U.S. labor movement."

Reuther justified the receipt of "Government" (i.e., CIA) funds by his own union. In doing so, he showed that his conception of European labor's postwar needs agreed closely with that of Lovestone and the CIA. Reuther went on to explain that "these monies were merely added to the trade union funds" already being used in Europe to build "education and organizational programs." But Reuther did not discuss the nature of this work, nor mention that funds were made available to only one type of trade union —the acceptable anti-Communist variety.

Had Reuther firmly opposed CIA and administration policy, he could have chosen to make the affair public on his own, especially after becoming a CIO vice president in 1952. He could have used CIA interference with "independent" unions as a basis for waging a counteroffensive. But like George Meany, Reuther completely accepted the premises of cold-war foreign policy, holding that CIA funds were being extended for legitimate purposes. The goal of building U.S.-style corporate unions abroad was shared by both AFL and CIO.

Reuther, of course, held tactical differences with Meany on the war in Vietnam. At the December 1965 AFL-CIO convention, the draft resolution on Vietnam was modified at Reuther's request to stress labor's support of negotiations. But the resolution argued that a policy of negotiations was the policy of the Johnson administration, and the AFL-CIO proceeded to endorse "all measures the Administration might deem necessary to halt Communist aggression and secure a just and lasting peace." Under the guise of advocating peace negotiations, Reuther permitted the AFL-CIO to give the Johnson administration labor's own version of a Tonkin Gulf resolution. Reuther did claim to stand between what he called "two extreme positions," that of the "appeasers" on the one hand and the hawks on the other. It never occurred to him that insofar as he accepted the premises of the hawks, the tactic of negotiation could easily be made to appear untenable. Within the AFL-CIO, Reuther's moderate position worked to strengthen the hand of "hawk" Meany.

Reuther's more sophisticated and up-to-date anti-communism, which dissents from the old-style Meany version of a monolithic international enemy, is more in line with the attitude of recent administrations. But Reuther's problem, despite formation of the Alliance for Labor Action, is that Administration policy is still based on close liaison with the Meany camp. The AFL-CIO unions, as Senator Fulbright pointed out, receive $5 million per year funneled to them through AID, which has replaced the CIA as financier of union foreign activity. The use of government-supported AFL-CIO bodies, like AIFLD, as vehicles for counterrevolutionary endeavors explains Meany's withdrawal from the International Confederation of Free Trade Unions. The same anti-Communist European unions built up during 1945-50 by Brown and Lovestone now take the Reuther position on a modus vivendi with Eastern European nations. Meany undoubtedly prefers to coordinate anti-Communist work entirely through government-supported AFL-CIO institutes, which are securely under control of the Meany-Lovestone-Brown axis.

Since the days of the First World War, American organized labor has supported both the aims and implementation of U.S. foreign policy. Since World War II, this has meant support of the war economy, production for military "defense," and participation in cold-war politics throughout the world. Such a stance is determined by the very nature of corporate unionism. The end of corporate unionism depends, furthermore, upon a critique of corporation capitalism. Until American labor leaders move beyond limited gains that fail to challenge the hegemony of the corporations; until they present the necessity for an alternative to American workers, they cannot be depended upon to make the long overdue reassessment of United States foreign policy in an era of world revolution.

Labor and Politics

J. DAVID GREENSTONE
Mr. Greenstone, associate professor of political science at the University of Chicago, is the author of Labor in American Politics, recently published by Knopf.

During the New Deal, the American labor movement substituted, for its traditional voluntarist ideology, a working-class, although non-Socialist, political perspective. This failed to satisfy the radicals of that generation, but it made possible labor's close alliance with liberal groups repelled by the voluntarism of the AFL. By 1930, voluntarism had become so abstract a doctrine, so narrowly concerned with powerful craft-union interests, that the AFL still opposed government-sponsored unemployment insurance in the midst of the depression. Today the labor movement faces a crisis of political belief comparable to that of the 1930s. The working-class ideology developed then is now irrelevant to many of the vital interests of union members. As delegates to the Democratic Party's 1968 national convention, many union leaders had to pass judgment on a war which meant—especially for working people—death, high taxes, inflation and declining real income, and which had exacerbated racial strife and distorted national priorities. Yet most of the labor delegates cast their lot with the policies and the candidate of their patron and ally, Lyndon Johnson.

In three critical respects this situation resembled labor's predicament in the 1930s. First, the vote on the war signaled labor's estrangement from its liberal allies, just as AFL leaders and liberal New Dealers disagreed over the welfare state in the early years of the Great Depression. Second, this estrangement can be traced to inadequacies in the unions' view of national politics. Finally, the unions have an opportunity now, as they did then, to assume an important role in national politics and minimize their differences with liberals and radicals. To do so, they must correctly analyze and forcefully articulate those class interests which unite their members politically. Specifically, organized labor must substitute for a working-class interpretation of its members' interests a concern for consumer interests which its members share with other citizens. As in the 1930s, this step not only means abandoning familiar, comfortable political categories but overcoming opposition from conservatives within the labor movement and hostility from some radical groups.

Union working-class ideology has emphasized the workers' shared political interests growing out of the job situation. All workers required union representation on the job to curb the arbitrary authority of management; all needed more humane working conditions, a decent income and broader fringe benefits. Extensive political action on behalf of liberal Democratic candidates could therefore be justified to dubious members as protecting and expanding the benefits won through collective bargaining. In economic as well as political life the common enemy was the entrepreneurial class of owners and corporate executives.

Partly because the American labor movement made this commitment to political action during the friendly Roosevelt administration, it came to see government as a potentially valuable ally in the political and economic struggles against employers. And this attitude in particular united organized labor with welfare-state liberals, who considered the economic power of employers, rather than the political power of the government, as the chief danger to human liberty. In fact, they favored governmental coercion as an antidote to the private power wielded by large corporations over the lives and incomes of their industrial workers. Thus the Wagner Act, compelling employers to recognize and bargain with unions, was perhaps the most important example of New Deal reform legislation. (Many observers, of course, believe that increasing reliance on government intervention in the economy tended to induce liberal support for government intervention abroad, from the Marshall Plan to counterinsurgency in Southeast Asia—a policy enthusiastically endorsed by George Meany's AFL-CIO.)

Organized labor has remained committed to these egalitarian welfare-state principles. In Congress, the unions have been by far the strongest lobby this year for significant tax reform—in open opposition to the unadventurous Democratic leadership in the House. And union lobbyists will continue to play a comparable role on other issues, such as the effective protection of Southern black voters. Last fall the unions' campaign apparatus launched a powerful if belated counterattack against sentiment among their members for George Wallace which contributed to Humphrey's late surge. More recently, the unions' substantial organizational resources helped progressive Democrats win special elections in Tennessee and Wisconsin districts long represented by conservatives.

To be sure, the problems of the very poor and of minority groups in the United States do not entirely conform to the working-class model of employer-employee conflict, partly because many in these groups experience semi-permanent exclusion from the work force itself. In some campaigns for social justice for the poor, for example demonstrations against the welfare system, the unions have not been in the vanguard. Moreover, some unions have compiled a sorry record of opposition to the interests of the underprivileged. Not only have these unions resisted admitting minority group members into their ranks but they have opposed new methods, such as prefabricated construction, which might contribute substantially to decent housing.

But such conservative and even reactionary tendencies are simply too weak to determine the course of an economically and socially diverse union movement. On issues like income tax reform, guaranteed annual income and racial justice, the long-term thrust of labor's egalitarian ideology is reinforced by its economic and political interests. Black and Spanish-speaking workers are already well represented in many industrial and service unions, and they may become an even more important element of the blue-collar work force, where union organization has been most successful. The basic demands of these workers for union recognition involve precisely those principles on which the labor movement's own security is based. Significantly, some important AFL-CIO unions and the UAW-Teamsters' alliance have shown an increasing—if belated—interest in organizing poorly paid black or Spanish-speaking workers in Memphis, Chicago, Charleston and California's central valley.

Politically the major unions, as important elements in the Democratic Party, have recognized their increasing dependence on minority groups in the Northern cities and in the South. Indeed, unions and blacks in the South often have common enemies among the economic elite, giving rise to insurgent political activity among some union leaders despite the racism of certain Southern locals. Significantly enough, the labor-supported Mississippi delegation, finally seated at the 1968 Democratic convention, cooperated with the insurgent anti-Johnson coalition among the convention delegates. In New York City several unions with numbers of black and Puerto Rican members have deserted the Democrat Mario Procaccino for the standard of former Republican Congressman John Lindsay. In short, labor's working-class ideology has taken a position, not of ignoring injustice and inequality but of failing to understand and identify new sources of oppression and exploitation in an increasingly complex social and economic system.

This failure is at the root of the split between labor and liberal Democratic groups, which can be traced back to state and local conflicts of the last decade—long before they had begun to worry over the Vietnamese catastrophe. As a political movement, these liberals first achieved cohesion in response to the eloquent if moderate rhetoric of Adlai Stevenson. This essentially middle-class, issue-oriented, participatory approach to politics—with its growing hostility toward bureaucratic, centralized sources of political power—bothered many leaders of large union organizations. True, unions had cooperated closely with middle-class allies since the 1930s; but the liberals' new political analysis fundamentally troubled union leaders. This analysis directly challenges the key premises on which the unions had rejected voluntarism and embraced a working-class ideology. Elements of the liberals' earlier welfare-state orientation remained, in particular a principled opposition to an American capitalist system which measures progress and achievement by the quantitative standards of increased profit, efficiency and production without specific concern for the adverse consequences on others in the society. This preoccupation with sheer economic success produced the oppressive conditions which alienated industrial workers. More recently, liberal critics have begun to argue that capitalism seriously victimized not so much the workers on the job (especially if they were protected by strong unions) but anyone in society without economic power, however indirect his connection with the process of corporate industrial production.

According to the new liberal analysis, this change reflects the growing interdependence stemming from increasing urbanization and technological sophistication. As population densities increase and methods of production come to depend on more numerous skills and functions, each individual becomes increasingly dependent for his life and livelihood on an ever-growing complex of economic and social functions. Every part of society is more vulnerable to the consequences of actions and decisions taken at great distances. This interdependence magnifies the adverse consequences of a single-minded pursuit of economic success.

Vietnam, of course, provides the most tragic example. The pressures by defense contractors for increased economic production created political support for a military policy with catastrophic results for the entire society. But the tendency of industry to pollute air and water, to destroy wilderness and recreational resources, to build highways through parks and historic areas of our cities, presents comparable instances in the domestic sphere. In other cases, the burdens of corporate credit, packaging techniques and problems of consumer safety—from drugs to automobiles—have fallen heavily although not exclusively on lower- and middle-income groups. These have suffered also from the tax burden put on sales and consumers, rather than on production and the corporate elite. Finally, this concentration on efficiency, profits and economic growth has helped create a system from which the very poor are simply excluded altogether, and left to the mercies of an erratic, arbitrary and grossly inadequate welfare system.

Organized labor by no means disagrees with this liberal indictment of corporate capitalism. Indeed, union lobbyists have taken active and even prominent roles on some of the specific issues involved. But these issues—which concern the corporations' relation to their customers rather than their workers—confound the unions' conception of class conflict as the extension into politics of the economic struggle between workers and their employers over income and working conditions. Equally important, they also throw doubt on labor's cherished assumption that union organizations and government agencies are protectors of the class interests of union members.

The conjunction of public and private bureaucracies in fostering the war in Vietnam has generated extensive comment, but the military-industrial complex is in fact only the visible embodiment of the intimate cooperation between private business and government throughout American life. In some cases corporations supply goods and services to the government. In others, such as corporate farms or lumber companies, the private firm receives services from the agencies such as the Forest Service or the Extension Service. Often the agency is formally charged with regulating the industry. But in every case, patterns of cooperation emerge to foster particular economic activities, with limited regard for the wider adverse consequences. In part, this cooperation can be traced to the career activities of experts, staffing both the corporations and agencies and often moving from one to the other. As a result, the economic future of many public officials often depends on the success of the industry they are to regulate. The political climate in which these agencies operate pressures them, over the long run, to define their mission—and legitimatize their exercise of political power—in terms of protecting the health of the particular industries with which they deal.

A similar pressure promotes cooperation between private employers and many unions, producing a tacit three-way alliance. Particularly where strong unions have secured relatively high wages, generous fringe benefits and stable employment, many workers come to share an interest in the economic success of their employers. Defense workers have benefited from the growth of the Pentagon budget, despite high costs of the war. And employees of corporations which pollute the environment, manufacture unsafe products, or engage in usurious credit practices will not be directly benefited by reform legislation. To be sure, the Steelworkers union, to take one example, did support the Indiana Dunes National Park project despite the possibly adverse impact that creation of the park might have on steel production and employment, but few unions have applied strong pressure in such situations.

To some critics, this alliance of labor, business and government means the impending eclipse of American workers and their unions as a major force for social progress. But such a development is no more necessary than it was in the early 1930s when the AFL was mired in its voluntarist ideology. In fact, the shared class interests of union members have much in common with the political goals voiced in the new liberal analysis. To understand properly these interests and the social-economic situation which has produced them, the labor movement must—as it did thirty years ago—abandon some of the abstractions of its political ideology. Barring such a change, any national organization representing diverse unions and groups of workers is indeed likely to face the loss of its political importance.

The working-class attitudes of the 1930s reflected the common concerns of industrial workers who faced powerful corporations and rampant unemployment without substantial help from the government. Today, however, although workers in particular unions, industries or plants continue to have interests opposed to those of their employers, the shared interests of wage earners taken as a class have in fact steadily declined in importance. Some of this decline can be traced to the development of powerful trade unions themselves. On the one hand, the protection of workers by the unions is taken as an accepted fact. And as union-management relations have stabilized, conflict over workers' income and management's authority has become relatively routinized. Finally, the decline in hours worked per year and the resulting increase in the importance of leisure time may gradually reduce the significance of all aspects of their jobs to union members.

But the most decisive point is that the increasingly complex differentiation of skill, job and function—which has produced increased interdependence in the society at large—has steadily reduced the similarities in types of working conditions. These changes have in turn reduced the common interests which workers share in their conflict with employers. As a result, industrial unions now must cope with increased tensions between skilled and unskilled workers, and between workers in different departments and skill groups. Similar conflicts of interest have also divided individual unions from one another. Of the whole range of industrial relations issues coming before Congress, only the question of union organization as such, exemplified by the recurrent struggle over right to work laws, still unites union organizations in their Congressional lobbying. And even on this issue not all union leaders seem equally committed.

The labor movement's national political problem therefore is not just that its liberal allies have abandoned earlier welfare-state commitments which coincided so nicely with the unions' working-class ideology. Rather, the unions no longer give voice to issues uniting all of labor, or even a large diverse union like the UAW.

The interests that do unite all union members against the business community involve the adverse effects produced by preoccupation with efficiency, profit and economic growth which also disturb liberals. These issues are of particular concern to wage earners because their greater real income, increasing leisure, and (in most cases) the reduced physical demands of their work have made more psychological and physical energies available for life outside the plant. And these matters are directly affected by the quality of their social and natural environment. To be sure, union members remain tied to specific industries which may engage in practices which play havoc with the rest of society, but the crucial fact is that the workers neither own nor control—that they exercise no substantial economic authority over—the firms in which they work.

Their subordinate position means that while suffering like other citizens from the effects of preoccupation with economic growth, workers lack the resources by which the well-to-do can avoid or minimize the adverse consequences. Also, their performance as workers is measured by their ability to follow the directions of their superiors, and not by their efforts to improve efficiency, profitability and economic growth.

Union members form a major part of the class which is without economic authority, and whose interests are opposed to the growing corps of administrators and managers in private industry and their cooperative allies in public agencies. Many of these officials are personally concerned with the consequences of economic activity, and their corporations equally so with their public images. Nevertheless, corporate and personal success—the proper performance of these executives' economic roles—is measured by standards of growth, efficiency and profits, without regard to adverse effects on employees, customers or others in the society. As a group, then, the union members do share a class interest which places them in opposition to that of their superiors; not as workers in the productive process but as consumers concerned about the effect of corporate innovation on their social and natural environment.

If the labor movement is to remain a major progressive force in national politics, union leaders must now demonstrate to their members that political action will improve their lives as citizens and consumers. In the process labor leaders will have to redefine their movement's political role in ways that will be criticized by some of their conservative colleagues, as well as by radicals outside the movement.

The cautious and often suspicious attitudes of important craft unions toward minority group demands, even the open racism of some locals, are all too familiar and may have contributed to the UAW's withdrawal from the AFL-CIO. But the tacit or even open alliance of some unions with employers who supply the Pentagon or pollute the environment may in the long run prove a more serious obstacle to significant reorientation. Furthermore, some unions have become allied with government agencies, such as boards of education; these alliances of public and private power are not preoccupied with economic growth and efficiency but with maintaining existing bureaucratic routines, prerogatives and privileges, whatever the cost to school children or local community. As in the New York teachers' strike, extreme tension can develop between the unions on the one hand and minority groups and their liberal allies on the other.

Whether the labor movement can surmount these difficulties is not yet clear. What is certain, however, is that only by doing so can it build a viable political alliance with liberals and those radicals who now seek to undo the concentration of power and authority in American society. On the other hand, this tendency, expressed in terms of calls for community control, will not—indeed cannot—extend to the broader communitarian ideals of some contemporary radicals. This communitarian ideology rejects the values of self-interest, specialization, competition and personal conformity which pervade American industrial society. But most union and minority group members seek not to abolish the industrial order but to benefit more substantially from it.

Nor can the call for community control be an unqualified commitment to decentralization on geographic lines. The fight against pollution, for example, is not compatible with neighborhood sovereignty. Similarly, the demand for local autonomy by the white South and comparable demands by certain white neighborhoods in the North speak for themselves.

Rather, the appeal to community control is but one call for the fundamental restructuring of economic and political power within the industrial order, to permit wider participation. Unions can share this goal, and if they do they will have a substantial impact on consumer-class politics. Paradoxically, because they accept rather than seek to abolish industrial society, unions command financial resources unequaled by other consumer-oriented organizations. Up to now, these funds have been a major asset to the coalition which continues to support welfare-state legislation in Congress. But whether they can be thrown into the struggle for a decent society, animated by a much broader vision, remains the labor movement's challenge in the coming decade.

SDS in the Mills

RUSSELL W. GIBBONS

Mr. Gibbons, a labor editor in Pittsburgh, is a previous Nation contributor. He has also written for Commonweal and Labor Today.

Early this summer the newspaper of the local union representing the workers at the sprawling U.S. Steel Corporation complex at Fairless Hills, Pa., issued a warning about the "work-in" which Students for a Democratic Society had announced for industry.

"Their purpose is to infiltrate industry this summer, cause trouble, and disrupt operations. Their plan includes sabotage," declared the Fairless Union News. Other warnings, coming from top spokesmen of industry, labor and law enforcement, suggested a movement at least comparable to the May 1968 revolt in France, where a worker-student alliance almost toppled the government.

The Commerce and Industry Association called 250 businessmen and plant managers together to discuss ways to combat both urban and plant "guerrilla warfare." Many words were devoted to the expected on-the-job confrontations with some of the largest affiliates of the AFL-CIO, including the Machinists, Carpenters and Communication Workers. There was a special message from J. Edgar Hoover, urging union members to "be alert to the machinations of these youthful extremists." The SDS, the FBI chief added, had "left a bitter wake of arson, vandalism, bombings and destruction across the nation."

Even though most SDS activists are now returning to campus, it is premature to make any long-range assessment of the "Summer Work-In" other than the obvious: that their establishment foes overreacted. Yet one cannot ignore the organization's effort to rally American workers to an unlikely revolutionary alliance, for this was the ideological issue which caused its factional mitosis in Chicago.

In the history of the American Left there may be no parallel to such factional fratricide concerning a sector of society which could not have cared less, with the possible exception of the followers of Daniel DeLeon in their glorified isolation from the trade unions. The great debate between the classical Marxists, who argued that the worker is the vanguard of revolution, and the pragmatists, who claimed that the working class is now middle class, was about as relevant to American workers as the affluent origins of most of those passionately involved in the debating.

Despite their apparent political sophistication, there seems to exist, in those who project grandiose worker-student schemes, an extreme social and economic naiveté regarding the attitudes of the white union member. The reasons may be both generational and intellectual: the activists' privation is not economic, as was that of both the old Left and unorganized workers thirty years ago but spiritual, despairing that there can be any future apart from radical change.

"We don't think the SDS is made of the stuff of which the Commies were made a generation ago," commented one labor paper. "Those were real working-class stiffs. The SDS is only made up of arrogant, big-mouthed, so-called intellectual bumpkins. They never toil, just look for trouble."

More to the point is what a UAW union representative told The Wall Street Journal. "These students refuse to camouflage their educations," he said (as a 21-year-old college graduate, he had organized workers while concealing his student background). "They want to flaunt the fact that they are student radicals. They are trying to bring their politics to the labor movement instead of coming with open minds." Yet the Journal also reported the case of a student militant who declared himself a Communist at a lunch-hour confrontation, and despite continuing hostility, reported that none of his fellow workers had "finked" on him to management and that it was still possible for him to engage in long political discussions with many of them.

Thus are "victories" measured in the work-in. Significantly, however, there have been scattered instances of legitimate worker-student alliances, largely the results of local situations involving common goals and grievances. One of the more interesting occurred months before the work-in manual was disclosed.

Last February, while nearby San Francisco State was shut down by student militants, striking members of the Oil, Chemical & Atomic Workers at the Richmond, Calif., refinery of the Standard Oil Company worked out an informal alliance with both student and teacher strikers: as many as 400 students participated in picket lines at the refinery, and perhaps half as many workers responded by walking the lines at the college. The alliance subsequently prompted the sympathetic attention of the Central Labor Council to the "legitimate grievances" of students and faculty at San Francisco State.

And when Madison police tear-gassed the "student ghetto" in that University of Wisconsin community last spring, a sequence of events occurred which also had no relationship to the work-in. Recalling an earlier sympathy march on City Hall by university students backing their requests for a pay increase, Madison firemen refused to "cool off" graduate students who had taken to the streets for a block party without a permit. The firemen's union also backed students on their off-campus housing gripes, and two graduate student members of the City Council fought successfully for parity of fireman and police pay rates.

Again, hundreds of Columbia University activists motored to the Mahwah, N.J., Ford Motor Company plant last spring to join a largely black wildcat strike evolving from accusations of assembly-line discrimination. Other incidents have been less dramatic, but more spontaneous in origin than SDS's efforts. They have ranged from the aid of Harvard students to striking linen delivery truck drivers in Cambridge (including the seizure of a strikebreaker's truck and "liberation" of his linen on the street), to the assistance given wildcatting West Virginia miners by University of West Virginia students, in their campaign against "black lung."

The fundamental move called for in the work-in, however, involved the student's removing himself from his intellectual environment and privileged role in society to become a part of the country which is common, forgotten, alienated; working in a factory or mill which requires discipline, a strong sense of goals "and adjustment to boring, repetitive and often dangerous work" (see "SDS: Between Reform and Revolution," The Nation, June 10, 1968); living in a neighborhood of frame houses overlooking the belching steel mills, and confining his social experience to corner taverns or bowling alleys in that gray glob somewhere between slum and suburb.

Even if the student-workers who have penetrated the perimeters of plant security and union suspicion seek only a toehold for their organizing cadre, it is unlikely that they can identify with workers of their own or an older generation. Their latent contempt for the lower middle class will betray them. And according to Brendon Sexton, they will discover that union members will not "mount the barricades with the swiftness and pleasure of student rebels or black militants," for they have "learned a hard lesson after almost a century of fierce blood-letting on the picket line: that combat is the last, not the least resort."

The work-in never came off on the Detroit assembly lines, in the Pittsburgh steel mills, or in any other significant industrial location this summer because its advocates do not recognize that the American worker, "even when he waits on a table or opens a door," as Michael Harrington says, "is not servile; he does not carry himself like an inferior . . . they have been the source of rudeness, contemptuous ignorance, violence—and of a creative self-confidence among great masses of people." It was in this latter spirit that the CIO was born and the black freedom movement marched; continued contempt for this history will prove to be a poor seedbed in which to plant broad alliances—and further evidence that student radicalism removed from its own environment is a political bust.

HARRY GOLDEN

The sanitation workers in Charlotte went out on strike a little while ago.

A sanitation strike is a desperate strike. First of all, the folks these days are almost buried under the avalanche of garbage when all the sanitation men are working overtime; festering garbage cans, rotting piles of refuse do little to generate any public sympathy. Second, and always important, the majority of sanitation workers in the South are invariably colored men, at least on the maintenance level. Colored men who go on strike generate less sympathy than garbage men on strike.

It was a sanitation workers' strike which had gone through protracted and fruitless negotiations that had brought Dr. Martin Luther King to Memphis and his assassination. Lastly, people these days don't care about strikes. Everybody is working. The teachers and the firemen and the sanitation workers strike to create vast public inconvenience. They want to win their strike on muscle. When colored workers count on muscle, it is a dangerous situation.

But Charlotte's strike was quickly negotiated when Mr. Jim Pierce, the union leader, paraded down Tryon Street, arm in arm with Rev. George Leake, the colored minister, behind the picketing garbage men.

Admittedly, Charlotte is a cosmopolitan city. Its citizens can understand that garbage men want to send their children to college. It can understand the federal laws for a minimum wage. City folk hate garbage more intensely than anyone in Tennessee.

But there is another truth here. The solidarity of workingmen has been the most effective union tactic since the invention of guilds. What made the city authorities move quickly was the display of white and black solidarity.

One of the first race riots in America took place in Chicago in 1919; it was a genuine race riot where whites killed unarmed blacks and blacks killed unarmed whites. One of the men who covered this riot was Carl Sandburg, then a reporter for the Chicago Daily News. A week before the violence flashed, Sandburg's editor had assigned him to a story about the races in postwar Chicago. Once the rocks started to fly, Sandburg commented that everyone was much more interested in the war than in the cause which made it break out.

Neither the police nor the National Guard quelled the riot in Chicago. What dissipated the war was the solidarity of the union stockyard men, white and black, who paraded together to show that whites and blacks in some areas held a common interest.

A year later Sandburg published a small book which Walter Lippmann prefaced describing the situation in Chicago which bred this violence. World War I and the cruel poverty of the South which sent thousands of Negroes to the city, had provided the causes and Sandburg saw no way of reversing them. But as for the effects, he prophesied that the unions held the key to racial peace. Let us say, today it is the workingman. Once the white workingman realizes that he has a common cause with the black workingman, many tensions can be resolved, as they were in Charlotte. Our problem is that the ordinary workingman, who is made to share the brunt of integration, does not realize that realty values are dependent upon the hourly wage.

The Radical Goad

MELVYN DUBOFSKY

Mr. Dubofsky, author of We Shall Be All: A History of the I.W.W., to be published this month by Quadrangle, is Senior Lecturer in the history of American Labor, University of Warwick (England) for the 1969-70 term.

Ghosts haunted the tragicomic 1969 Chicago national convention of the Students for a Democratic Society. Inside the decrepit Coliseum, the under-30 generation of American radicals roasted one another. Outside, amid the reporters, local undercover police and FBI agents, a tiny cadre handed out leaflets proclaiming: "Tired of people throwing red books at each other? Tired of the old rhetoric? Come breathe a breath of fresh rhetoric!" And when the SDSers split into a Progressive Labor Faction (Maoists) and a National Office faction, the leaflet bearers invited those dissatisfied with both factions to move uptown to N. Halsted Street, there to meet America's true anarchists, libertarians and independent revolutionaries.

At 2422 N. Halsted, above a run-down Syrian restaurant which occupies the first floor of a two-story brick building, stands the national headquarters of the Industrial Workers of the World (IWW). Inside, the look and smell of the past are everywhere, from the vintage pre-World War I furnishings to the portraits of IWW martyrs Joe Hill and Frank Little that mutely observe their present-day Wobbly descendants. Yet it was only sixty-four years earlier that the precursors of the occupants of the hall on Halsted Street had convened in Chicago to found the IWW and to proclaim the end of capitalism in America.

Created in 1905, the same year that revolution rocked Czarist Russia, the IWW was born in a burst of optimism. It had, or so it seemed, achieved the impossible, uniting the ordinarily disputatious factions and personalities of the American Left. At the convention Eugene Debs and Daniel DeLeon, the mutually antagonistic leaders of the divided wings of American socialism, joined forces; Lucy Parsons (wife of the Haymarket martyr) and anarchist Albert Parsons shared the rostrum with Western trade union leader William D. "Big Bill" Haywood; Mother Jones of coal miners' strike fame and Father Thomas J. Hagerty, a Catholic priest defrocked for his decision to become a Marxist revolutionary, blended voices in the singing of the Marseillaise. Having united such diverse groups and individuals in one radical organization, why shouldn't the IWW be able to transform American society?

But from the moment of its birth the new organization led a perilous life. Internal dissension at times paralyzed it; secessionist movements absorbed its largest affiliates and the bulk of its members; and private employers and public officials recurrently threatened its total destruction. Less than two decades after its birth, the IWW had withdrawn into what writer Dan Wakefield characterized as "haunted halls." And there it remained, occasionally coming out, as it did during the SDS convention, to remind America that the Wobblies who were celebrated in fiction and folk song still lived.

It had been quite otherwise from 1909 to 1919. Then, U.S. Presidents and Cabinet officials, the Army and the Navy, governors, mayors, employers and ordinary citizens lived in dread of the terrible Wobblies. The unwashed, unshaved, sabotage-practicing Wobbly supplanted the bearded, bomb-carrying anarchist in the fevered public imagination. During World War I the IWW member ranked with the Hun and the Bolshevik as a clear and present danger to national security. The Wobblies helped bring on A. Mitchell Palmer's Red Scare of 1919-20, and were also its most notable victims. What, then, made the IWW so feared, and why were Wobblies considered the major threat to "law and order" in America?

Reasons for the official and the popular reaction to the IWW are not hard to find. Like today's radicals, the Wobblies cast unsought light on dark spots in an otherwise bright landscape. Wobblies despised the "power structure" (which they referred to as "The Iron Heel"), derided "bushwa" mores, lampooned middle-class religiosity, and often confronted established authority with nonviolent direct action. They also preached power and promised revolution, instigating riots and violence. And they practiced an anti-organizational, almost anarchistic brand of radicalism; while one could perhaps discover the national office's position on an issue, one could never be sure what individual Wobblies might or might not do.

Although the IWW's radicalism resembles that of today, its sources were considerably different. Wobblies must be understood as members of the first American generation to experience the full implications of life in an urban-industrial society. Theirs was a time when poverty was commonplace, and economic and social insecurity plagued the working classes. Their society bore more resemblance to the type Oscar Lewis describes in his studies of the "culture of poverty" than to the American welfare-warfare state of the 1960s. There was a persistently high rate of unemployment and underemployment for the unskilled; wages were low; there were few social, political or economic organizations to shield the working classes from the worst shocks of industrialism; and the whole society believed in the accumulation of wealth and property and in upward mobility through thrift, and attributed low economic status to personal inadequacy. It was a society that had no room for workers whose skills were obsolete because of technological innovation; no place for blacks, emancipated by law but denied the means to make their emancipation real; little respect for European immigrants, drawn to the land of promise only to dwell in urban slums and to work in dark mills. Existing within or on the fringes of America's "subcultures of poverty," these groups experienced the life Lewis characterized: ". . . family disruption, violence, brutality, cheapness of life, lack of love, and lack of education." It was to those individuals at the bottom of the social and economic ladder that the IWW appealed, and it was among them that Wobblies hoped to muster the shock troops of revolution.

The IWW's following consisted largely of individuals who had not yet made peace with industrial society. Those workers who had come from a preindustrial into an industrial society felt uprooted, torn from an old, ordered and comprehensible way of life. An early labor economist, Carleton Parker, described the West Coast IWW migrant workers as floaters, men without homes, sharing lives of brutality and degradation. The violence that started on the dreary farms from which they fled or in the dismal coal mining villages they escaped, followed them through the debasing experiences associated with migrant work and on to the debilitating life of the winter unemployed.

The IWW tailored its ideology—and its tactics—to fit the needs and status of its followers. It promised them "the only social break in the harsh search for work . . . its headquarters the only competitor of the saloon in which they are welcome." Rexford Tugwell once observed that it promised America's dispossessed "a ready-made dream of a new world, where there is a new touch with sweetness and light, and where for a while they can escape the torture of forever being indecently kicked about."

How did the IWW propose to lift its members out of poverty into a new world? Its method was neither that of the American Federation of Labor nor of the Socialists. Wobblies derided trade union welfare systems as "coffin benefits" and AFL officials as the labor lieutenants of capitalism. After all, IWW members simply could not afford the initiation fees and dues required to sustain "business unionism," and as members of the "culture of poverty" they needed self-discipline more than the counsel of professional, bureaucratic officials. Wobblies might vote Socialist, but they had little patience for the debates and intrigues of what they styled as "parliamentary slowcialists" and realized that most of the workers whom they organized were more concerned with affairs at the factory than the ballot box.

"Any movement which organizes and gives hope to the poor, and effectively promotes solidarity and a sense of identification with larger groups," writes Oscar Lewis, "destroys the psychological and social core of the culture of poverty." This is precisely what the IWW sought to do, constantly teaching its members class consciousness, organization and solidarity, stressing their power and importance.

One word—power—expressed the IWW ideology. Jack London, in his novel The Iron Heel, put better than any IWW leaflet the Wobbly concept of power. Responding to a capitalist who had just given him a lesson in Realpolitik, Ernest Everhardt, London's fictional Haywood, rejoins: "Power. It is what we of the working class preach. We know and well we know by bitter experience, that no appeal for right, for justice, for humanity, can ever touch you. . . . So we have preached power. Power will be the arbiter," Everhardt proceeds, "as it has always been the arbiter. . . . We of the labor hosts have conned that word over till our minds are all a-tingle with it. Power. It is a kingly word." Who held power ruled society, the IWW asserted.

The Wobblies' emphasis on power made sense to men who saw naked force—of employers, courts and police—used against them. An IWW pamphlet proclaimed: "It is the law of nature that the strong rule and the weak are enslaved." In the IWW's catechism, neither socialism nor legislation could aid the workers, and they would suffer until they learned to exert power directly.

The IWW's antipathy to political action made sense to its members. Migratory workers moved too often to establish legal voting residences. Millions of immigrants lacked the franchise, as did Negroes, women and child workers to whom the IWW appealed. Daily experience, moreover, verified Elizabeth Gurley Flynn's comment that the state was simply the slugging agency of the capitalists. Hence Wobblies refused to concede that stuffing pieces of paper, even Socialist ones, into a box would transform a basically repressive institution—the state—into one which was humane.

Yet the IWW had to offer its members an alternative to political action. This it saw in a combination of economic power and direct action. Believing themselves better Marxists than most American Socialists, who chose the path of reform politics, Wobblies maintained that political power was but a reflection of economic power, and that without economic organizatioin behind it labor politics was "like a house without a foundation or a dream without substance." After organizing the working classes economically, the IWW planned to exert direct action to bring its new society into existence. To the typical Wobbly, direct action included any step taken by workers at the point of production which improved wages, reduced hours, or bettered conditions. It included commonplace strikes, intermittent strikes, silent strikes, passive resistance, sabotage and the ultimate measure of direct action—the general strike—which would displace the capitalists from power and place the means of production in working-class hands.

Emphasis upon direct action in preference to electoral politics represented a profound insight by IWW leaders into the minds of the workers. Abstract doctrine meant nothing to the disinherited; specific grievances meant everything! One Wobbly expressed it this way: "Workingmen on the job don't care a whoop in hell for free love . . . they are not interested in why Bakunin was fired out of the International by Marx . . . nor do they care about the cooperative commonwealth; they want practical organization first, all else after."

So it was that the IWW waged class war from 1909 to 1919 with "obscure Bill Jones on the firing line, with stink in his clothes, rebellion in his brain, hope in his heart, determination in his eye, and direct action in his gnarled fist." In such Western cities as Spokane, Fresno and Missoula, Wobblies showed Bill Jones how authority could be challenged through direct action and passive resistance. Fighting for free speech, taking to the streets in defense of civil liberties, courting arrest, cramming the jails, and paralyzing courtrooms, the Wobblies compelled civil authorities to succumb. Migrant workers, previously powerless, learned that by standing together, refusing to be goaded into violence, and maintaining the constant pressure of direct action in the streets, they could win from public officials and Western employers objectives once thought unattainable.

In the East, the IWW instructed mass-production workers in the realities of industrial unionism, where solidarity prevailed over traditional craft distinctions. Wobbly recruits learned industrial warfare in the manner prescribed by Marxist theorists and educator John Dewey: by doing! The IWW organized, agitated, and advised immigrant industrial workers, but the immigrants themselves led the labor struggles and decided their outcome. When authorities questioned strikers about their leaders, they could indeed respond with one voice: "We are all leaders!"

Bill Haywood expressed succinctly what the IWW accomplished during its best days. "It has," he said, "developed among the lowest strata of wage slaves in America a sense of their importance and capabilities such as never before existed. Assuming control and responsibility of their own affairs, the unorganized and unfortunate have been brought together, and have conducted some of the most unique strikes, fights for free speech and battles for constitutional rights." Which was just what Oscar Lewis would write fifty years later about Castro's impact on the Cuban peasantry who were lifting themselves out of the "culture of poverty."

At its peak during World War I, however, the IWW probably had no more than 100,000 dues-paying members. Still, given the volatility of IWW membership, several millions probably passed through the organization from 1908 to 1919, and millions more were certainly influenced by its nationally publicized struggles for free speech and for improved working conditions. Nevertheless the IWW failed totally in its larger purpose. It never succeeded in transforming America's dispossessed into a revolutionary vanguard in the Marxian sense and, of course, it did not make a revolution in America. Although it survives as an organization today, it is more dead than alive.

The causes of its failure are what should concern today's equally idealistic and cocksure, though more affluent and educated, rebels. Failure came to the Wobblies precisely when they seemed to be most effective and successful. Before and during World War I the IWW established a solid organizational base among migrant harvesters, Western loggers and copper miners. Unfortunately for the IWW, those sectors of the economy proved the most vital when America entered the war in April 1917. Indeed the war, as viewed from Washington, made real the IWW's subversive potentialities. When strikes affected the lumber and copper industries, the IWW felt the full weight of the federal government. The Labor, Justice and War Departments combined to crush the Wobblies; state officials, employers and vigilantes also did their share. Troops were sent West to break strikes; Wobblies were prosecuted in mass federal trials, convicted and sent to Leavenworth prison; employers were urged, with some success, to institute reforms and wean workers away from the IWW. So successful was this wartime repression of the Wobblies that many scholars have seen in it the primary reason for their ultimate failure. Yet it seems that their internal deficiencies were equally responsible for the organization's decline.

The IWW rallied exploited workers behind crusades to abolish specific grievances but it failed to transform its followers' concrete grievances into a higher consciousness of class purpose and necessary revolution. This was so because apart from vague allusions to the general strike and to "building the new society within the shell of the old," it never explained precisely how it would achieve its new society, govern it once established, and then protect it from counterrevolutionary terror.

Even had the IWW discovered a more effective prescription for revolution, it is far from likely that its followers would have taken it. IWW members had limited revolutionary potential. Individuals locked in the "subcultures of poverty" have narrow perspectives on life and society; as Lewis has observed, the main blight of the "culture of poverty is the poverty of its culture." Hence Wobbly recruits tended to think only of the moment and not of the future, only of a better job or more food and not of a distant utopian society. This faced the IWW with an impossible dilemma. On the one hand it was committed to ultimate revolution; on the other it sought immediate improvements for its members. Like all men who truly care about humanity, the Wobblies always accepted betterment today at the expense of achieving utopia tomorrow; the leaders' desire for revolution came up against their followers' desire for palpable gains.

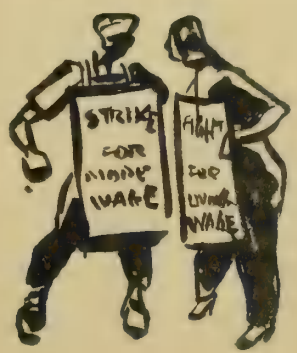
Furthermore, it was never decided precisely what kind of structure the organization should adopt. The most capable IWW leaders favored an industrial union structure under which largely independent though not entirely autonomous affiliates, organized by specific industry, would cooperate closely with one another under the supervision of an active general executive board. But many among the rank and file were captivated by the concept of the One Big Union (the mythic OBU) in which workers, regardless of skill, industry, nationality or color, would be amalgamated in a single unit. Incapable of negotiating union-management agreements owing to its protean character, the OBU would be solely the vessel of revolution. Considering the difficulties always involved in organizing the dispossessed, form and structure were of the utmost importance, and remained a problem the Wobblies never resolved.

The IWW also refused to negotiate with employers in the ordinary manner. Its demands were, in current parlance, non-negotiable, and it refused to sign labor contracts that established binding terms for a set time period, or to respect any agreements with employers. As a consequence employers refused to bargain with IWW members. If the Wobblies had had the raw economic power to win concessions without negotiations, their policies might have made some sense. But time and again they challenged powerful employers from behind union fortifications erected on sand.

Its mythology concerning rank-and-file democracy further compounded the IWW's troubles. They were most successful when led by strong individuals such as Haywood, who in 1916 centralized headquarters and ran a taut ship. Too often, however, jealous and frustrated Wobblies, lacking Haywood's ability but desiring his power, used the concept of "participatory democracy" to snipe at the IWW's leaders on behalf of an idealized rank and file. And without firm leadership the organization drifted aimlessly.

Even had the IWW combined the necessary structure, the proper tactics, and experienced capable leaders, its problems might still have proved insurmountable. There is no reason to believe that before the 1930s any of America's mass-production industries could have been organized. Not until World War II was the CIO, with immense financial resources, millions of members and federal encouragement, able to solidify its hold on the mass-production industries.



Whatever the IWW's internal dilemmas, the dynamics of American history unquestionably compounded them. In other societies, radicals contended with an established order unresponsive to lower-class discontent and impervious to change from within; the Wobblies struggled against flexible and sophisticated adversaries. The years of IWW growth coincided with the era when welfare capitalism spread and when all levels of government began to exhibit solicitude for the workingman. This process became even more pronounced during the first World War, when the federal government used its vast power to hasten the growth of welfare capitalism and conservative unionism.

Whatever success the Wobblies achieved only stimulated the reform process, for employers who were threatened by the IWW paid greater attention to labor relations, and government agencies encouraged employers to improve working conditions. Indeed, reform ultimately proved a better method than repression to weaken the IWW's appeal to workers.

Those young Americans who practice direct action, passive (or violent) resistance and civil disobedience, and who seek an authentic radical tradition, should find much to ponder in the Wobblies' background. Those who distrust Establishment politics, deride bureaucracies, favor community action and preach "participatory democracy" would also do well to remember the IWW story. Indeed, all who prefer a society based upon community rather than coercion cannot afford to ignore the tragic historical account of the IWW.

The IWW's history affirms the truth of Antonio Gramsci's comment that in advanced industrial societies revolutionaries should take as their slogan: "Pessimism of the Intelligence; Optimism of the Will." It also emphasizes the irony of the radical experience in America and the Western industrial world. As a result of their commitment both to ultimate revolution and to immediate reforms, radicals hastened the emergence of strong labor unions and assisted at the birth of the welfare state. But success produced a working class enthralled with a consumer society and eager to give up working-class consciousness for a middle-class style of life. The final tragedy for all radicals, the American Wobblies included, has been that the brighter they have tried to make life for the masses, the dimmer has grown the prospect for revolution in the advanced nations.

Yet no better epitaph could be written for the prewar American Wobbly than this one composed in 1918 by an imprisoned IWW leader: "The end in view is well worth striving for, but in the struggle itself lies the happiness of the fighter."

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Labor Movement: Between Two Worlds

THE LABOR REVOLUTION. By Gus Tyler. The Viking Press. 279 pp. $6.50.

THE POLITICAL IMPERATIVE. By Gus Tyler. The Macmillan Co. 306 pp. $7.95.

LABOR AND THE LEGAL PROCESS. By Harry H. Wellington. Yale University Press. 409 pp. $10.

FRANK J. DONNER

Mr. Donner, a frequent Nation contributor, served as assistant general counsel for the CIO and the United Steelworkers of America and as a supervising attorney for the National Labor Relations Board. He has practiced labor law for the last quarter century and is now general counsel for the United Electrical Radio and Machine Workers of America.

In an age of change, there is surely no institution in our society which has altered so basically as the trade union. And equally notable, apart from sporadic observations by academics and a handful of disillusioned labor intellectuals, the scope and meaning of the transformation of the trade union have largely been ignored. Moreover, although virtually every important institution in American life—one hardly needs to enumerate them—is being mutinously assaulted from within by its members, clients and victims, the labor union continues in its ancient ways, led by aged, plodding bureaucrats, seemingly immune from an accounting for the difference between what their organizations have become and what they are supposed to be. If there is a tiger at the gates of the labor movement, it is barely visible (in the form of growing rank and file unrest).

How has the trade union changed? This "voluntary association for the mutual aid and protection of its members" can be more particularly viewed as:

¶An instrument for the advancement not only of the immediate, day-to-day interests of its members but also of historic goals of basic change through a labor movement unified by an ideology of class struggle.

¶An agency collectively and democratically clothed with the power to represent its employee-principals in dealing with their employers.

¶A "labor organization" selected by a majority of employees in a "unit appropriate for collective bargaining" as the exclusive bargaining representative of members and nonmembers alike, and with power to bind dissenting employees in the unit.

The last named role of the trade union, a creation of the federal government through the 1935 National Labor Relations Act, is perceptibly replacing all of the other historically evolved models of trade unionism in American industrial life. A variety of circumstances—many of them broadly cultural—are undermining the entire value system of traditional unionism—voluntarism, participative democracy, autonomy and freedom from state control, labor solidarity, long-range political and social goals, and the class consciousness which is the matrix of the entire system.

We are left with a heritage of brave rhetoric, flowery union constitutions, social stereotypes and traditions which are increasingly at odds with the realities. The "one party system" and the "iron law of oligarchy"—with occasional exceptions which merely serve to screen the underlying reality—have made union office a form of permanent (and sometimes hereditary) tenure. Only a dwindling minority attend local union meetings; decision making on basic collective bargaining matters is confined to a small executive group, and union officials tend to regard as treason an occasional revival of the notion that they should be held accountable to the rank and file for their decisions at the bargaining table.

Whether we like it or not, the modern American trade union is more accurately viewed as a service or utility, operated for the benefit of clients or bargaining unit constituents, than as a voluntary association which executes decisions made by the rank and file. The analogy is strengthened by the detailed code of internal regulations promulgated in the Landrum-Griffin Act of 1959. The officers of what other "voluntary unincorporated association" in American society are thought to be so impervious to conventional membership controls that they must be treated as fiduciaries, a standard of responsibility which the law imposes to prevent abuses at the expense of a powerless or dependent constituency?

I am not suggesting that there is no longer an overlap or a measure of coincidence between the ethos and practice of traditional unionism and the new unionism, or that even when the transition is fairly complete the ambience of the old does not survive. But what urgently commands our concern is the fact that the trade union, as we have known it, is losing most of the characteristics which, under accepted social theory, distinctively qualified it for a catalytic role in democratic society.

Moreover, the transformation of the trade union has been accompanied by the corruption of its bureaucratic leadership. It is not merely that ever increasing numbers of leaders are charged and convicted of the crimes created by the Landrum-Griffin Act but that personal "respectable" corruption—by affluence—has become pervasive. And as the gap widens between the income, life style and status of the leaders and the membership, the suppression of the mechanisms for change in leadership become more direct and ruthless. In the words of one observer, "The very forces which press for higher rewards of various types for American labor leaders also support and encourage greater restrictions on democratic policies."

The institutionalization of personal rule breeds a peculiarly American form of corruption—employer-collaboration, the pay-off, the sweetheart contract. Prof. Richard Lester has written:

> Personal rule . . . encourages deals (secret understandings in advance or in place of negotiations) between management and union officials. The "deal" which is a fairly well-known phenomenon in American trade union history, is a form of corruption practically unknown to British or South American trade unionism. To the extent that collective bargaining is short-circuited by a side deal . . . the process is really corrupted into a form of collusion, which may lead to some subtle means of personal payoff to the union official involved.

The trade union has severed itself from its sources of strength at a time when its membership is being eroded by automation and related developments in the blue-collar strongholds of manufacturing, mining and railroading. And white-collar professional and technical workers whom the unions have thus far not successfully organized have themselves been subject to the inroads of automation. Even such solid sources of union growth as the civil service employees, teachers and the service trades will not, in the view of most observers, replace present or threatened membership losses or provide the dynamic for a revitalization of the movement.

The hard fact is that organized labor in this country numbers no more than it did in 1956, represents only about a quarter of the organizable work force, is failing to maintain even this modest ratio as the labor force grows, and has attracted proportionately fewer workers than in any of the advanced industrial countries.

The crisis in the labor movement is most acutely reflected in the inability of the unions to develop or recruit effective organizers. With a changing, more youthful labor force the unions desperately need committed young organizers—the kind of people who in the thirties found in the labor movement a natural outlet for their ideals. Today few such people are attracted to organizing. Many of them have demonstrated superb organizing skills in other areas: civil rights, rent strikes, campus movements. They would like to "graduate" into the labor movement but are repelled by its backwardness. Some of them do overcome their misgivings, but almost uniformly pull out after a little exposure to the bureaucracy.

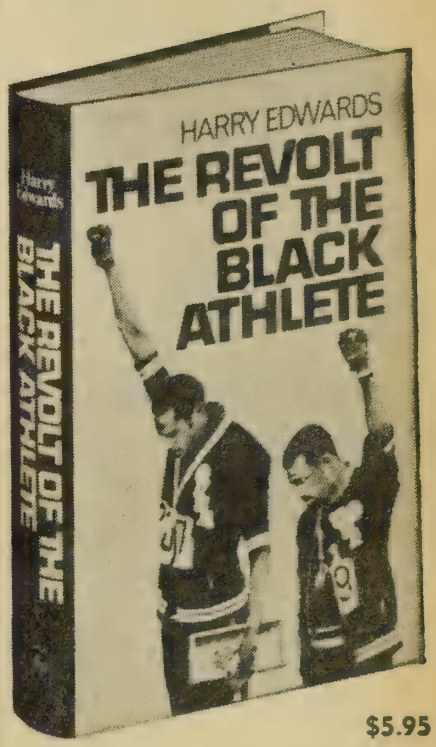
Gus Tyler, assistant president of the International Ladies' Garment Workers' Union and head of its Politics, Education and Training Department, has written two books which, in quite different ways, defend the labor establishment. The Labor Revolution pays lip service to the plight of the labor movement as I have described it but manages to find a silver lining in every cloud—no matter how dark.

The book has much the flavor of a Madison Avenue promotion to recapture a dwindling market for a product which has fallen into popular disfavor. Thus we are invited to read about labor's "deep and quiet revolution" which when matured will be "the third great labor epoch in the 20th century." The doom-sayers simply "have lost sensitive contact with current developments" with the result that "a great phenomenon in the making may go unheeded until it overwhelms both the seers and doers, the intellectuals and the trade unionists."

The trouble with these gloomy critics, says Tayler, is that they neglect the long view—"by periods instead of individual years." And where will labor's revolutionary new leaders come from? Tyler's answer is a Panglossian gem: "New leadership in a movement is part of the historic process that introduces new elements in a culture; it is endemic." (A few years ago, ILGWU smashed a staff union by firing its leaders.)

Tyler finds strong support for his optimism in the potentialities of the professional and white-collar sector. But, here as throughout the book, he ignores the facts which demonstrate that the very groups he counts on to transform the union movement have proved to be most resistant to unionism.

In a volume fertile with distortion, the author's treatment of labor's civil rights record is especially startling. To hear Mr. Tyler tell it, the labor movement has fought valiantly against discrimination. And when labor has blighted job opportunities for Negroes, it has only been because of job scarcity.



But Tyler's apologetics are shamed by the record of his own ILGWU, a union of about 450,000 needle workers, of whom some 150,000 are nonwhite. Civil rights and civil liberties organizations have repeatedly charged, in the language of CORE, that "ILGWU has for years permitted conditions to exist which keep the vast majority of black workers in the lowest-paying jobs and has denied black workers a policy-making voice in the union through restrictive constitutional provisions." NAACP officials, in commenting on a 1962 administrative finding that the union had discriminated against a Negro cutter, complained that nonwhites were not only systematically denied better job opportunities "but are also denied a voice in the effective leadership of their union. Perhaps if this second condition did not exist, the first would not have been able to develop."

Over the years, rank-and-file protest against the union's discriminatory policies has been suppressed by highly restrictive eligibility requirements for union office, enabling the incumbents to co-opt the leadership. The formation of an opposition is further stymied by a constitutional prohibition against caucuses except for a brief period prior to the conventions. No Negro has ever been elected to the general executive board of the union.

In a book which so fondly mythologizes labor's failures, we find a predictable polemic against independent political action and ideology, and yet another blueprint for a labor-based liberal coalition (no mention is made of the poor). But the sterile reality was made all too clear by the last Presidential election. (The New York City Central Labor Council has just endorsed the law-and-order mayoralty candidate, Mario Procaccino against John Lindsay with no dissent by the ILGWU.) And the self-congratulatory account of the coalition's claimed triumphs during the years of Democratic ascendancy altogether suppresses the fact that for all of labor's enormous contributions in money and manpower to the Democratic Party, its influence has been nominal.

A thesis about the origin and nature of trade unions, first suggested in The Labor Revolution, is the subject of Mr. Tyler's later book, The Political Imperative, a volume in Studies of the Modern Corporation sponsored by Co-

". . . a black athlete finds that his equals are not his white teammates, but basketballs, baseballs, and jock straps. . . ."

$5.95

JUST PUBLISHED

In 1968 Harry Edwards, virtually alone, opposed the U.S. Olympic Committee, the political establishment, and the mass media and made an international issue of the Olympic boycott movement. Edwards, responsible for the New York Athletic Club boycott and the United Black Students League for Action at San Jose State College, explains why he organized these boycotts, why black athletes in America have revolted, and why they are prepared to do so again.

THE FREE PRESS
A Division of The Macmillan Company
866 Third Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10022

lumbia's Graduate School of Business. Mr. Tyler here disputes the generally accepted notion that unions came into being out of economic necessity. He urges instead that a trade union is the product of an instinctual biological urge ("imperative," "compulsion") to form groups. The emphasis, in Tyler's language, is on an "anthropological investigation of unions: the missing link between man's relationship to the apes and his employer."

The "congregational compulsion" is ratified by the institutions of the culture as they have evolved historically. According to Tyler, when Aristotle said, "Man is, by nature, a political animal," he meant that "somewhere in man's bones is a congregational compulsion. . . . Man gathers in the polis not by accident nor design but by nature. He is re-enacting in a civilized state the primeval habit he inherited with his animal origins: the herd instinct."

The polis through which the "congregational compulsion" finds expression may be any grouping from a cocktail party to a bowling league, from a corporation to a union. The polis of the work place is the union which owes its origins to "the instinct of occupational birds to flock together."

Unions and corporations are "generically one and the same" but our perceptions of this unity are obscured by semantics. (Hence, the book's subtitle, The Corporate Character of Unions.) The modern worker is a "citizen" of the corporation which employs him. His union, which he is biologically driven to join, is "a little corporation within the larger corporation, which is, in turn, a corporation within a larger corporation, the state."

Now we know the reason for the optimism of The Labor Revolution about the organizing potential of the new labor force—the congregational compulsion as expressed through the "history of man on earth." (Just wait until the primeval urge begins to bubble in the blood.)

Mr. Tyler's book, for all of its up-to-the-minute jargon, is a belated addition to the literature of social Darwinism. Reading it is like traveling through a museum of intellectual antiquarianism with an enthusiastic guide touting its tired attractions.

We are thus being invited to inspect as fresh discoveries and without attribution: some of Herbert Spencer's faded "laws," Darwin's insistence (in the Descent of Man) on man's social habits, Walter Bagehot's "faculty of coherence" (Bagehot's Physics and Politics was subtitled Thoughts on the Application of the Principles of "Natural Selection" and "Inheritance" to Political Society), John Fiske's Meaning of Infancy (Tyler weirdly transforms Fiske's thesis promulgated in 1883 about the socializing influence of prolonged infancy into an explanation of the reasons for unions), and related theories advanced to counter Hobbesian interpretations of Darwinism and culminating in Kropotkin's Mutual Aid. Similar attempts to find biological support for social cooperation and group solidarity were also used to justify nationalism and racism.

"Pet notion" books like this which seek to challenge accepted theories can charm (even when they fail to persuade) by their speculative boldness, imagination and originality. (Velikovsky's Worlds in Collision is a good modern example.) But Tyler is derivative and preachy; and because his "anthropology" is so free-wheeling (strongly reminiscent in its oversimplification of Arthur Brisbane's Hearst editorials) and his polis so all-embracing, he proves nothing—except that American labor apologists will go to extraordinary lengths to reject the class nature of unions.

Harry H. Wellington's book—(he teaches at Yale Law School)—is as elegant and analytic as Mr. Tyler's areo verblown and wish-fulfilling. As I have suggested, the modern union is almost wholly a product of legal rules. While addressed primarily to the law student and teacher, Wellington's detailed exploration of the key legal problems raised by government support of the collective bargaining process is illuminating for the general reader as well as for unions. As he points out, issues precipitated by the new statutory powers of unions—such as the scope of rights of management, the role of the employee in the collective structure, and the relationship of labor to the political process—are not really new but revive in a more complex and sophisticated form many of the historic problems raised in the courts when workers struggled to collectivize the employment relationship.

Unique to modern collective bargaining representation by unions is the duty of fair representation. Neither the Railway Labor Act nor the Wagner Act specifically provides that the union chosen by the employees must represent all of them impartially. In the 1944 Steele case, the Supreme Court began a process of spelling out such a duty in a dispute involving discrimination against Negroes by the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Enginemen, then a lily-white union, in matters of promotion and seniority. In a landmark decision the Court struck down a discriminatory agreement and read into the Railway Labor Act a duty of fair and nondiscriminatory representation.

But, as in the case of other judicial pronouncements against racism, the Court's ruling was either ignored by

What is James A. Michener reading?

One of the books James Michener reads is our dictionary. The Random House College Dictionary. It has more definitions of words than any other college dictionary. More of today's new words, too. Maybe that's why Mr. Michener uses it. The Random House College Dictionary. $6.95. ($7.95 thumb indexed.)

If you want to read James Michener, his newest book is Presidential Lottery. It's an urgent book all about our electoral system. It tells why the system is inadequate and irrational for our time, and why, under certain circumstances, it could be a catastrophe.

The Random House Dictionary of the English Language/College Edition.

One of the books writers read.

BIG TABLE POETS

Cover: We Weep For Our Strangeness. Photo: Bill Brandt.

PAUL CARROLL
ODES
This first collection includes the well-known elegy "Father" and the 5' tall foldout "Ode to Severn Darden about Angels, the Common Cold, Nuclear Disarmament and Popcorn."
$4.95 $2.95 paper

ANTONIO PORCHIA/W. S. MERWIN
VOICES
The first English translation of the lucid, enigmatic poems of the great but little-known Argentinean. W. S. Merwin translates the poems and introduces them in a succinct note.
$3.95 $2.95 paper

THE YOUNG AMERICAN POETS
Edited by Paul Carroll
Introduction by James Dickey
This anthology—containing over 300 poems by 54 of the freshest and most exciting young poets to emerge on the American literary scene since 1960—is already in its third large printing. Full page photo and biography of each poet.
$6.95 $3.95 paper

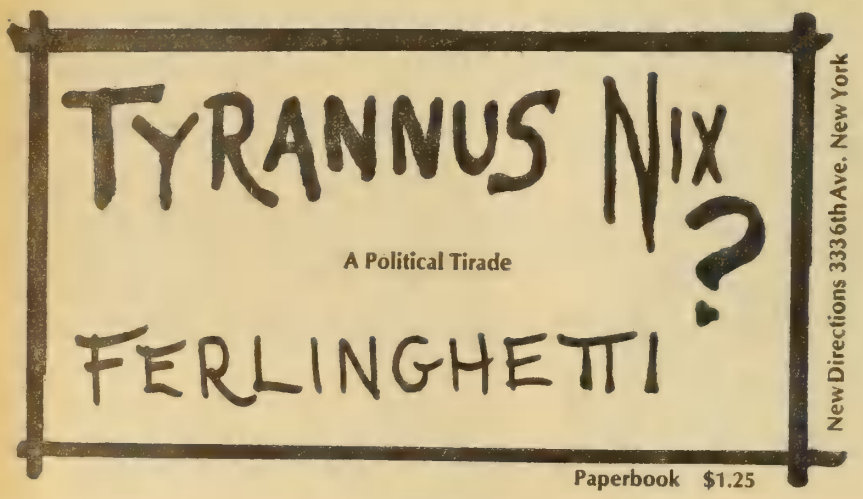
DENNIS SCHMITZ
WE WEEP FOR OUR STRANGENESS
1969 winner of the Big Table Series of Younger Poets competition. A first collection of classically tough, tender lyrics and elegies.
$3.95 $2.45 paper

SAINT GERAUD (1940-1966)
THE NAOMI POEMS, BOOK ONE: CORPSE AND BEANS
1968 winner of the Big Table Series of Younger Poets competition. This first book by the mysterious and already almost legendary young Midwest poet is in its third printing.
$4.50 $2.45 paper

PAUL CARROLL
THE POEM IN ITS SKIN
Ten essays exploring ten outstanding contemporary American poems. Full page photo of each poet accompanies the text of the poem examined by the essay. Already in its second printing.
$4.95 $3.45 paper

BIG TABLE 201 NORTH WELLS, CHICAGO 60606

unions or narrowly confined. It was not until 1964 that the NLRB finally recognized that the duty not to discriminate in negotiating or administering the collective bargaining agent could not, as a matter of law, be properly discharged by a Jim Crow union. As the author points out in commenting on the board's extraordinary reluctance to reach this decision: "The unhappy fact is that the National Labor Relations Board failed during these twenty years to perform its task properly, to display the courage required of it, to provide leadership in the fight against discrimination; and leadership, nothing less, was what the statute required. Indeed, it was not until the civil rights movement caught up with the fair representation doctrine that the Board accepted its responsibility."



The author hopes that the Labor Relations Act remedy, together with the union and employment anti-discrimination provisions of Title VII of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, will overcome industrial racism. As he notes, the statute's conciliation therapy and reliance on individual lawsuits by victims of discrimination is not a promising way to cope with the problem. But one cannot share his optimism that the Attorney General's office will use its injunction seeking powers to curb a "pattern or practice" of discrimination.

Even a statute with teeth—hardly a realistic political possibility these days—would not eliminate the impacted economic discrimination of generations of racism in industry without voluntary major compensating adjustments by employers and unions.

The problem of economic discrimination by unions against members of the bargaining unit is also implicated in the duty of fair representation. This problem is far more complex than that of racial discrimination because a standard of fair representation is impossible to formulate. The author suggests as a standard of fair representation "the expectations of the employee community," and proposes that the Labor Board develop and apply such a standard. But this proposal fails to take into account the erosion of collective expectations in the bargaining unit and the extent to which the short-term self-interest has Balkanized its solidarity.

Besides, the prospect of government review by board and courts of collective bargaining decisions, not to speak of day-to-day procedures in administering the contract, can hardly be viewed with equanimity—especially in the light of the powerful anti-union mystique of individual rights, historically perhaps the most damaging weapon in the attacks on unions and the bargaining process.

The notion of governmental review in this area makes sense only if it be assumed that the fundamental values of trade unionism are irreversibly lost—a conclusion fashionable among sociologists. Certainly one must agree with the author that federal internal regulation, as reflected in the Landrum-Griffin Act, cannot restore union democracy—in the sense of "popular sovereignty." Indeed, the effect of the statute has been to legitimate the undemocratic status quo by giving dissenters rights which are all too often empty promises.

A U.S. CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION?

Thirty-three states have approved. Only one more is needed. Is this good or bad? What is the background of previous Convention attempts?

Read
TOWN MEETING FOR AMERICA

by Wm. Bross Lloyd, Jr., Editor of Toward Freedom, a newsletter on new nations.

Postpaid: $2.50 paper, $5 cloth
C.U.R.E., 4030 Irving Park Rd., Chicago, Ill. 60641

Splendid Story

UNION MAN: The Life of a Labor Statesman. By David J. McDonald. E. P. Dutton & Co. 352 pp. $7.95.

RUSSELL W. GIBBONS

Mr. Gibbons, a previous contributor to The Nation, is a labor editor in Pittsburgh. He has also written for Commonweal and Labor Today.

American labor, according to C. Wright Mills, had climbed into bed with the Establishment soon after the end of World War II, and social and economic historians are still offering diverse postulations as to how it occurred. And while autobiographies of self-described "labor statesmen" are not likely to be the best route toward documentation, they do offer a study in personalities and motivations, providing some light along the way.

David J. McDonald was many things to many people. A man who once authorized an earlier house biography called Man of Steel could never claim to be unassuming or modest, and readers of this book will not be troubled by bashfulness. While few will recognize him as the author of the 1964 Civil Rights Act, which is one of the many revelations in this "Life of a Labor Statesman," McDonald is worthy of consideration.

As secretary to Philip Murray he was privy to much of the interplay which led to John L. Lewis staking the treasury of his Mine Workers toward the unionization of America's unorganized mass industries. For sixteen years he served as Murray's alter ego as secretary-treasurer of the United Steelworkers of America; after his death McDonald assumed the presidency for thirteen years until he was deposed in 1965. Thus he was more than an eyewitness to the dramatic surge of the CIO, the internal fratricide with the Left unions and the Communists, the rapprochement with the American Federation of Labor, and the partnership with the New Deal and the Democratic Party.

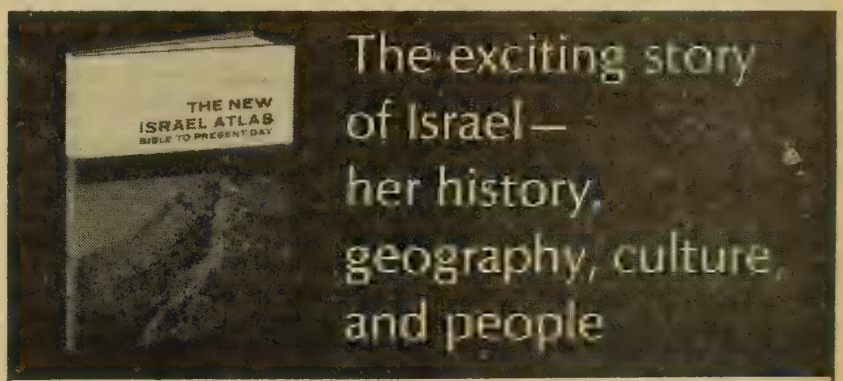
This in itself might have made a worthwhile and colorful contribution, but David McDonald tells it in such a way that one feels he is reading a trade union version of The Cardinal. Yet a wholly believable account is his turning down an opportunity to go to Hollywood as an assistant director on two occasions. Is he lamenting this decision by writing an epic for the screen?

Reconstructing his early life, McDonald allows that indeed here was a man on a rendezvous with history: "Had someone told me then," he writes of the time he watched the Harding funeral train, "that I would in a few years hence become closely involved with six United States Presidents I would no more have believed him than I would have believed that one day my picture would appear in Pittsburgh newspapers more often than any other living American."

When the entrenched craft unions in the AFL turned down his proposals to organize the unskilled in the basic industries, Lewis and his supporters went ahead with the CIO organizing campaigns. Murray, vice president of the Mine Workers, was selected to head up the Steel Workers Organizing Committee with McDonald as number-two man. Or was it the other way around? Reading Union Man, one is not quite sure.

The CIO drive in big steel, hardened by almost half a century of fear and paternalism after unionism had been crushed at Homestead, Pa., has been portrayed as one of the more dramatic of the 1930s. McDonald tells otherwise, declaring that as the SWOC was despairing "at the lowest ebb of our organizing campaign . . . an incredible stroke of good fortune came our way." In February 1937, Myron Taylor, board chairman of U.S. Steel, the giant of the industry, asked Lewis, Murray and Sidney Hillman to dine with him at his Manhattan home. Serious thought about the plight of his employees, prompted by an ocean voyage back from the Vatican, made him a humanitarian and as a consequence, "the United States Steel Corporation fell into our lap."



McDonald was pacing in a hotel room while that pact was made, but he had a piece of the action from then on. The Man of Steel drove through a police barricade in Youngstown, Ohio (telling the fuzz he was a salesman for Whiz Products—"a company I created on the spot") where he prevented a Communist-led mass march of striking Steelworkers to a "certain bloodbath." Later, when Murray fell ill, McDonald admitted to a virtual one-man organization of the industry holdouts in "Little Steel." One recalls Samuel Johnson's caution that "seldom any splendid story is wholly true."

Yet in truth he was a skilled negotiator and no one's fool at the bargaining table. "I was a tough son of a bitch," he declared after assigning barracks to families driven out of their homes by the mine owners in the 1925 strike. Despite this he became a missionary for what he called "democratic capitalism," for a time provided a forum for Moral Rearmament, and eventually skidded into something called "mutual trusteeship," which to many men in the mills was little more than high-sounding back-room bargaining. Moving in high circles, he tells of a White House dinner where a Washington society leader inquired of his position:

> "Are you kidding?" I asked. "My picture has been in the papers almost every day lately and I'm on the television news every night." She shook her head so I tried again. "Don't you know about the steel strike?" She looked blank and asked, "What steel strike?" And I said, "Jesus Christ, you are a dumb broad." She thought that was very funny, roared with laughter and repeated it to everyone around the table.

Memoirs of close associations with exalted politicians and public figures are always deadly. McDonald was no exception; he was an early boomer for John Kennedy, preferred his brother Robert to Hubert Humphrey (who reneged on his political debts, he says) was unimpressed with Adlai Stevenson, and was for Lyndon Johnson when the rest of the labor caucus at the 1960 Democratic convention sought to stop his Vice Presidential nomination. Richard Nixon is there too: they remained "warm friends" despite the political gap.

The anti-climactic termination of his own political career in the union came a few months after the 1964 Democratic triumph. Wet-eyed, he left the helm of his "beloved Steelworkers" and retired to Palm Springs, to write his story. Like many such efforts, what he tells is interesting; what he does not tell may well have been more significant. And to Dave McDonald it might not have been particularly interesting or significant that he endorsed his friend Richard Nixon in 1968.

This comprehensive new reference work, by Dr. Zev Vilnay, is based on the most authoritative, up-to-date information available. It covers Israel from Biblical times right up to the present day—from the time of Joshua's conquest... through Roman rule, the Arab-Moslem conquest, the Crusades, Turkish rule, the British Mandate, the past twenty years... including the recent 6-day war. In all, the book encompasses 3,548 years of important history. As with any atlas, the strength of this work lies in its illustrations. For example, to depict Israel's terrain alone, no less than 7 full-color three-dimensional maps are used. Throughout the book, the maps are supplemented by revealing photographs, drawings, and charts.

THE NEW ISRAEL ATLAS

Bible to Present Day

9½ x 11 inches, 112 pages, 190 illustrations, $7.95

McGraw-Hill Book Company / New York, N.Y. 10036

PHAEDRA INC.
27 Washington Square North
New York, N. Y. 10011

The Strindberg Reader soft cover	$7.95 5.95
William Saroyan The New Plays	$4.95
Animals and Statues I Have Interviewed-Phil Santora	$3.95
Upton Sinclair The Flivver King	$4.95
Naked Author by Pietro di Donato	$7.95
Bird Alone by Sean O'Faolain/soft cover	$2.95
The Book of Answers by Duke of Bedford	$5.95
An Extreme Friendship by Henri Troyat	$4.95
The Whole World Is Outside by Manuel Komroff	$5.95
Writing In America by Erskine Caldwell soft cover	$4.95 1.95
Lolita by Vladimir Nabokov in Russian soft cover	$7.95 5.95
Nabokov's Quartet by Vladimir Nabokov	$3.95
Woman In The Dunes by Teshigahara/soft cover	$2.95
The Waltz Invention by Vladimir Nabokov -a play-	$4.95
The Eye by Vladimir Nabokov short novel	$4.50
Padre Pio -biography-	$4.95
Short Drive Sweet Chariot by William Saroyan	$4.95

Just Published

How 88,648 Heavy Smokers Stopped Smoking

NEW YORK — The Anti-Tobacco Center of America has just published a booklet which explains how 88,648 heavy smokers (of whom many are physicians) have stopped smoking without straining their will power. This booklet is available free of charge to smokers. All you need to do, to obtain it, is to send your name and address to The Anti-Tobacco Center of America, Dept. A-31-N 276 Park Avenue South, New York City, 10010. This offer is open while the supply of these booklets lasts.

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 at 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

Poverty War Games

THE GREAT SOCIETY'S POOR LAW: A New Approach to Poverty. By Sar A. Levitan. The Johns Hopkins Press. 348 pp. $7.95.

GEORGE BRAGER

Mr. Brager is a professor at the Columbia University School of Social Work. He was formerly co-director of Mobilization For Youth, and edited Community Action Against Poverty with Francis Purcell.

No federal office, perhaps since the Freedmans Bureau, has been as subject to critical barrage as the Office of Economic Opportunity. Republicans and Democrats have variously characterized the poverty war as a great boondoggle and a fomenter of class struggle. The anti-poverty warriors have hardly fared better. Saul Alinsky, Chicago's professional radical, calls them "pimps of the poor," while Daniel Moynihan, Nixon's resident urbanologist, attacks from another direction, suggesting that perhaps they are idealists with a middle-class lust for the apocalypse. However contradictory the criticism, it has emanated from all sectors of American life: rich and poor, North and South, the courthouses and the universities, reactionaries and radicals, the mild and the militant, blacks and whites, and many of the groups between. The poverty program constitutes a political Rorschach.

We tend to assume that widespread criticism is evidence of the program's failure (Moynihan's Maximum Feasible Misunderstanding is a prime example of such devaluation). Certainly, the Office of Economic Opportunity is demoralized and in disarray. In "spinning off" Head Start and the Job Corps to other federal departments, and appointing a Congressman who voted against the Economic Opportunity Act as OEO director, the Nixon Administration has only accelerated, rather than begun, the devitalization of the office. But these are short-range consequences. Even Nixon accepts the continuation of a federal agency whose special interest is the poor.

The fortunes of the office are separate from the impact of its activities and ideas. What has been needed is a comprehensive evaluation of the poverty program itself. Sar A. Levitan has attempted it in The Great Society's Poor Law—and with considerable success. As Levitan readily acknowledges, the findings are not definitive. Adequate data and reliable measurements are unavailable, and even if they were, much would still remain a matter of value judgment and gut feeling. Levitan's conclusions are, as a matter of fact, only somewhat less qualified than the report of the General Accounting Office, which after fourteen months and $1.2 million, concluded with statements as equivocal as "[the Community Action Program] appears to have gained acceptance in most communities as a mechanism for focusing attention and action on the problems of the poor; and it has introduced new or expanded existing services to the poor. However, CAP has achieved these ends in lesser measure than was reasonable to expect." Aside from the significant fact that Levitan's work did not constitute a public expense, it is a more informed and independent analysis than the GAO survey. Levitan is a competent researcher, and he has subjected a number of discrete studies of OEO programs (some of them with contradictory outcomes) to critical review. Moreover, since evaluations of OEO are reflective of the evaluators, the fact that Levitan is a sympathetic, moderate and urbane man insures these qualities in his study.

Levitan is a social bookkeeper, and his approach is programmatic. Following a review of OEO's legislative history and administrative structure, the bulk of the work is devoted to a chapter-by-chapter analysis of the individual OEO programs, e.g., VISTA, Outward Bound, legal services, comprehensive health care, etc. He approves of most of them, if with qualification. On the basis of cost effectiveness criteria, the birth control program comes off the best investment. Of the program's most controversial feature, the community action agency, Levitan concludes that it "must certainly be judged an innovative agency which gave the poor their first social and political role."

A program by program evaluation has its disadvantages. A primary one is that it does not allow for a comprehensive analysis of concepts and issues which transcend single programs. So, for example, we read about OEO's need to compensate for the inadequacies of other federal programs and departments in each discussion of individual OEO programs. Head Start has been successful in providing guidelines for dealing with impoverished children, but, says Levitan, it must ultimately be assessed by the changes it induces in the American educational system. OEO attention to migrant farm workers is a necessary corrective to the indifference of the Farmers Home Administration and other bureaus in the Department of Agriculture. OEO's attempt to fight poverty with the pill "continues to be necessary because HEW has been even slower in adopting family planning programs." And so it goes. Nowhere are we treated to a discussion of issues for a federal agency whose jurisdiction overlaps the jurisdiction of others, and whose very success is dependent upon change in these other agencies.

Inevitably, OEO had to fight for position against the established agencies which it was intended to coordinate. Furthermore, its attempt to influence change in the federal bureaucracy (and in local welfare institutions) necessarily entailed making adversaries of powerful interests. And when it retreated, whether from excess caution or political wisdom, it alienated other constituencies.

The above is not needed to explain the virulent criticism directed against OEO, however. The fact that its intended beneficiaries were poor is sufficient. The Economic Opportunity Act is unabashedly class legislation, but as Levitan points out, although class legislation is very much a part of the American experience, it ordinarily benefits organized groups, not the unorganized poor. In their economic backwardness and political impotence, our impoverished citizens have traditionally provided the American public and its politicians with a ready target. Nor do the programs and professionals serving the interests of the poor escape unscathed. So, notes Levitan, in Congress' handling of the annual OEO appropriation, "the anti-poverty warriors were treated in the manner to which the poor, whom they represented, have always been accustomed. The annual handout was given grudgingly, with many strings attached, and after delaying as long as possible."

If its constituency and place within the field of institutional forces made criticism of the poverty program inevitable, the office undoubtedly contributed to its own travail. One can perhaps be sympathetic regarding its inconsistent response to pressure in implementing the "maximum feasible participation" provision of the legislation. It made a few courageous starts and some ignominious retreats. Although it is true that when principle and politics vied for ascendancy, the former gave way, it is also true that the poor did gain a foothold in the policy-making processes of many of the 1,000 community action agencies, due in large measure to OEO efforts. What OEO can be scored for, however, is the expansiveness of its rhetoric and its penchant for gimmickry. Like Westmoreland in that other war, Shriver promised quick victory.

Yet the nature of American social welfare is being changed by the poverty program. The Economic Opportunity Act contributed significantly and dramatically to the democratization of social welfare, though the task is far from finished. Its concept of participation by the poor is likely to endure, and is already written into other legislation (Community Mental Health, Model Cities). Innovative patterns and styles of service have been designed and have found acceptance: the comprehensive social service and health care centers, the extensive use of para-professionals, vigorous advocacy by social workers as they intercede on behalf of the poor with the public bureaucracies, and the testing of welfare law and regulation (OEO's legal services program initiated the Connecticut case in which the Supreme Court struck down residency laws in public welfare).

With it all, the Economic Opportunity Act has contributed little to the reduction of poverty. Levitan wryly notes that "though poverty sharply declined during the years of the Great Society, the most ardent friends of the EOA would not credit its programs with contributing much to this improvement." One must endorse his conclusion that what is required is, first, an income maintenance program, and second, a considerable expansion of the OEO type of service-oriented, self-help program. He estimates that each carries a price tag of approximately $20 billion, and argues that the nation can afford these expenditures by utilizing the additional revenue generated by normal economic growth. The knowledge and resources to eliminate poverty are at hand. But, as Levitan observes, until we muster the national will to do the job, the biblical admonition that "the poor shall never cease out of the land" will hold for our society.

RECORDS

DAVID HAMILTON

HANDEL: Alexander's Feast. Honor Sheppard, soprano; Max Worthley, tenor; Maurice Bevan, bass. Oriana Concert Choir and Orchestra. Alfred Deller, cond. Vanguard SRV-282/3-SD (two disks). $5.96.

Solomon. Elsie Morison, soprano; Lois Marshall, soprano; Alexander Young, tenor; John Cameron, baritone. Beecham Choral Society. Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. Sir Thomas Beecham, cond. Seraphim SIB-6039 (two disks). $4.98.

Theodora. Heather Harper, soprano; Maureen Forrester, Maureen Lehane, contraltos; Alexander Young, tenor; John Lawrenson, baritone. Amor Artis Chorale. English Chamber Orchestra. Johannes Somary, cond. Vanguard VCS-10050/2 (three disks). $11.94.

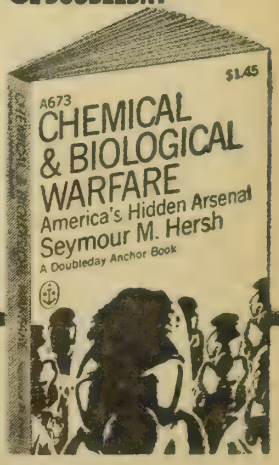
The enormous variety of Handel's English-language vocal music, as it is gradually being unfolded by recent record-

Women's work

Now ready: An important analysis of the subordinate position of women in our society and the reasons for it. In "The Political Economy of Women's Liberation," Margaret Benston links the subject with the concepts of "productive" and "non-productive" labor. Also, the editors write on the moon shot and how it tells more about the American system than the planetary system. Send for your sample copy of the September issue now.

MONTHLY REVIEW

Edited by Paul M. Sweezy and Harry Magdoff



Dept. 2 116 West 14 St. N.Y., N.Y. 10011
$7 a year students $5 (foreign add $1)

The full, documented story behind the headlines–

by "the Ralph Nader of America's chemical and biological armoury"–London Times

A Doubleday Anchor Book; at all booksellers $1.45

DOUBLEDAY

ings, should at last lay to rest the traditional image of Victorian sanctimony associated (quite wrongly) with Messiah and a few other works. In his wildly misguided way, Sir Thomas Beecham endeavored to dissociate Solomon from that tradition by abridging, reorganizing, and thoroughly reorchestrating it to emphasize the secular aspects—but in the process he managed to homogenize Handel's wide range of textures and to unbalance melodic-harmonic relationships. It is a travesty, of which one is more conscious in the wake of the recent, more authentic Simon recording (see The Nation, December 2, 1968), but the Beecham also reminds one that, on its own terms, it is superbly performed; one can but lament that the newer version did not benefit from a similar sense of timing and feeling for phrase structure.

Theodora, Handel's penultimate oratorio, is here recorded for the first time: a work that eschews the elaborate effects of Solomon, it rather exploits a wide range of formal approaches to aria and chorus composition. The level of craftsmanship is exceptionally high, the concentration of musical events greater than usual with Handel—notably in the fine chorus that ends Part II and some of Theodora's arias (it should be noted that some perfunctory material is omitted in the recording). The performance is generally capable—the soloists often very good, the chorus often cloudy in sound. A welcome detail is the natural, expeditious delivery of recitative, avoiding the usual rhetorical stateliness.

The much earlier setting of Dryden's second Cecilian Ode is filled with ambitious and successful pictorial detail (the subject of the text is the power of music, which lends itself rather well to this sort of treatment). Deller's performance (a reissue) is short on orchestral accuracy, and the chorus' accented (if clear) diction does less than justice to Dryden, but there is a good sense of phrase and line; unlike Beecham's, these faults are nothing that a listener with ordinary imagination cannot amend.

STRAUSS: Till Eulenspiegel; Don Juan; Tod und Verklärung. Vienna Philharmonic Orchestra. Wilhelm Furtwängler, cond. Seraphim 60094 (mono). $2.49.

BELLINI: Norma. Maria Callas, soprano; Ebe Stignani, mezzo-soprano; Mario Filippeschi, tenor; Nicola Rossi-Lemeni, bass. La Scala Chorus and Orchestra. Tullio Serafin, cond. Seraphim IC-6037 (three disks, mono). $7.47.

PUCCINI: Manon Lescaut. Licia Albanese, soprano; Jussi Bjoerling, tenor; Robert Merrill, baritone. Rome Opera Chorus and Orchestra. Jonel Perlea, cond. RCA Victrola VIC-6027 (two disks, mono). $5.

OPERATIC ARIAS. Ernestine Schumann-Heink, contralto. RCA Victrola VIC-1409 (mono, recorded 1906-13). $2.50.

OPERATIC ARIAS. Enrico Caruso, tenor. RCA Victrola VIC-1430 (mono, recorded 1904-06). $2.50.

These exemplify various valuable aspects of the growing bargain-price "paperback" catalogue. Seraphim's circulation of the Furtwängler repertory is especially welcome because his recordings have recently been available only as expensive imports, and before that were only perfunctorily promoted by RCA during the years of the Toscanini craze (although these particular works happen to have been quite impressively played by both conductors). Cheaper editions of prestereo complete opera sets make reasonable the purchase of a recording because of the exceptional qualities of an individual performer such as Callas, and sometimes they represent the best available version of any vintage, e.g., the Perlea Manon Lescaut. And a special word of praise to Victrola's "old vocals" reissues, which avoid the usual chestnuts that RCA used to bring back repeatedly.

LETTERS (Continued from page 194)

their homes, or trying to exterminate them like rats. Not even at Sharpsburg or in Alabama. At least not women and children first!

I have a feeling that the photograph of Bernadette Devlin with a paving stone raised in her two hands over her head is going to become one of the landmark records in mankind's attempt to be free in this century—that some day there will be a statue in Bogside showing her in exactly that position. There certainly should be one in St. Stephen's Green, Dublin, along with the memorials to those three Anglo-Irishmen—Wolfe Tone, Robert Emmet and William Butler Yeats. For if it hadn't been for Bernadette Devlin there would have been no successful defense of Bogside. And if Bogside hadn't been successfully defended the British troops wouldn't have been called in. And if the British troops hadn't been called in, there would have assuredly been another St. Bartholomew's Night in Northern Ireland. Only this time the Roman Catholics would have been massacred.

Above all, I hope some day there will be such a statue outside the House of Commons. For if the books I read as a schoolboy in New England were telling the truth, that's what the House of Commons was originally all about. You can't get any commoner than Bogside. Or Miss Devlin. In the finest sense of the word. Saturday afternoon in Bogside I kept thinking about what an older but equally hot-tempered member of that same body had once said would happen if the enemy invaded his homeland. "We will fight them on the beaches. We will fight them in the streets." His youthful fellow M.P. has translated his immortal words into flaming action. In the end I believe both the English and the Irish will be proud of Bernadette Devlin. John Philip Cohane

one man's oligarchy

Great Neck, N.Y.

DEAR SIRS: It is discouraging to see a Nation editorial ["But the Problem Remains," Aug. 11] express the increasingly discredited viewpoint that "Latin American countries are ruled by feudal oligarchies." Several contributors to The Nation, the most recent being Robert Smith in his book reviews, have effectively demolished his hoary proposition. . . .

The issue is not a narrow academic controversy but is basic to an understanding of developments in Latin America. To contend that Latin America is ruled by feudal oligarchies is to portray, almost inevitably, the middle class as the force for social change. This of course is the rock on which the Alliance for Progress was built. But if one recognizes instead that Latin America is already ruled by the middle class and that the economic interests of the commercial-industrial and landed elements have tended to coalesce, then one understands that this policy is but a chimera. The people of Latin America cannot place their hopes for a better future on a middle class which has tied its chariot to the imperial economic interests of the United States, and is so fearful of the popular aspirations that it eagerly supports military coups whenever there is the slightest threat to the status quo. Need one mention Brazil?

What Latin America requires is a popular revolution supported by and in the interests of the impoverished peasantry and the urban slum dwellers. It is understandable why the policy makers of this country tenaciously cling to the theory that a supposedly progressive middle class will be the salvation of Latin America. . . . Jack Minkoff

Crossword Puzzle No. 1311

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 April riches to uncover very, very early. (13)
10 Where some say they should have stood. Rose there, too! (2,3)
11 This appears to be a man I dislike violently! (9)
12 People who have a strong affection about a little amphibian sometimes get them for dinner. (4-5)
13 They give greater breadth in skirting what the bull sometimes does. (5)
14 There's a certain lack of inspiration in what TV wrestlers sometimes put on. (12)
19 and 8 down Notes Jackson can be on only one side, obviously! (6-6,5)
22 Feeling the wrong road goes right? (5)
24 You can consider this gem no counterfeit, but not exactly specified as such.
25 See 20 down
26 Often, nuisances are filled with a feeling of weariness. (5)
27 Things will never be the same with this! (13)

DOWN

2 Polish again? Check! (6)
3 So dry that it needs alteration to detect the presence of water. (9)
4 See 20 down
5 Savor characteristics. (5)
6 Specific in general baking ingredient which could improve the appearance. (5)
7 A sizeable plot of land atop it, dedicated to Greek poetry. (Music to "Oh Say Can You See" originally so dedicated, too.) (8)
8 See 19 across
9 These aside, without the trimming, might suggest the literal sound. (7)
15 Its winner had the highest standing at the Olympics. (4,5)
16 Law, perhaps. (9)
17 Fibers of leaves? (7)
18 The city we held in a state of riot? (3,5)
20, 4 down and 25 across Letter perfect as far as accomplishment? (6,6,3,9)
21 Implying at least one advantage in the encore. (5)
23 What an old cleaver does? (5)
24 Curtain material, which if quietly put on, would seem to be sparing. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1310

ACROSS: 9 Items; 10 Cherubini; 11 Entries; 12 Yearned; 13 Treed; 14 Spoken for; 16 Raspberry; 18 Track; 19 Hessian; 21 Explode; 22 Repugnant; 23 Raise; 24 Scrambled eggs. DOWN: 1 Leicestershire; 2 Sweetness; 3 Rescind; 4 Wicks; 5 Everybody; 6 Educate; 7 Scion; 8 and 1 across Finders keepers, losers weepers; 14 Strongarm; 15 Flavoring; 17 Bridger; 18 Tapered; 20 Septs; 21 Extol.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

SUMMERHILL CAMP AND SCHOOL. Freedom with responsibility learning because it's exciting, not compulsory. Summer program: reading, math, nature, swimming, riding, camping, art, music, drama, group discussions. OPEN COMMUNITY SCHOOL, [illegible] 5N, Claverack, N.Y. 12513.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced [illegible] low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

PUBLICATIONS

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

PERSONALS

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

PHYSICIANS
To serve one, two or more years [illegible] clinicians in established group practice in Appalachia; coal mining area; excellent non-profit facilities and services; dialogue and development with forward-looking colleagues and community groups; health organization and medical care concerns; college town; teaching affiliation available; good salary and fringe benefits; reply with curriculum vitae. [illegible] #627, c/o The Nation

SUPPORT YOUR LOCAL OSPREY—BAN DDT bumper sticker: 50c each, 3/$1.00. Send to George Allez, 300 North Hillside Terrace, Madison, Wisconsin 53705.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. [illegible] BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

ADVERTISE YOUR NEEDS IN THE NATION

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Sleeping Giant?

Who can predict the future of the American labor movement? We can't. But we can keep a watchful eye.

That's our job at The NATION — to keep an eye on what's happening in America and report back to you. We can spot trends, interpret events, disclose what others might prefer to hide.

We can't be your fortuneteller. But we can bring you the information you need to know what's really happening in these complex times.

So don't delay. Join us now and we'll add four bonus issues to your subscription.

BONUS OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 [illegible] Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you will add four bonus issues to my subscription.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N9-8

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 15, 1969 35 cents

BURLINGAME
SEP 1 3 1969
LIBRARY

S-7CR PL-19326
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

The Pendleton Brig
ANDERSONVILLE-BY-THE-SEA
ROBERT G. SHERRILL

Whitey's on the Moon Now
WILLIAM EASTLAKE

What Consumers Need
Show Biz or Hard Facts
A. Q. MOWBRAY

HENRY S. KARIEL on LIBERALISM

LETTERS

terror from without

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Generally I liked the review, "Kremlinology: Power and Terror" by David Joravsky [The Nation, July 28]. However, I question the date 1918-21 as one of the four great spasms of terror. This one was different from the others. This one was completely externally induced. During the three-year period 1918-21, thirteen countries including the United States had armies of intervention on the new Soviet soil trying to abort the coming of the first Socialist state. The peasant General Chapayev was one of the heroes of this great patriotic time.

David Seidman

and you still can't buy one

Andover, Mass.

DEAR SIRS: Willis Park Rokes's article, "The Ma Bell Rental Agency" [The Nation, June 30], at first merely annoyed me, but then disturbed me greatly, for it raised doubts in my mind about the credibility of a journal which I had come to respect.

I retired from the Bell System last year after almost forty-one years of service, for all but a few months of which I was a design engineer with the Bell Telephone Laboratories. I am not a "Ma Bell right or wrong" type by any means, although I am proud of the accomplishments of the Bell System and of my involvement in it. Mr. Rokes's Naderesque tirade is, at least in its technical references, either a work of ignorance, or its intent is to mislead the reader by deliberately eliminating significant information. He sneers at a long-lived handset—does he have any idea what it costs to make a repair visit to a subscriber? He excoriates the "snaillike pace of telephone innovation"—does he want Bell to junk 80 million telephone sets every three or four years?

The reference presumably is to the present standard ("500 type") telephone set, in the design of which I was deeply involved. Doesn't he know that this telephone set also provides increased efficiency on long subscriber lines (thus eliminating the need for special equipment for such service)? Hasn't he noted the lighter and more convenient handset? Hasn't he even observed the marked improvement in voice naturalness compared with earlier apparatus? Isn't he aware of a very meaningful reduction in needed maintenance? Regardless of whether he actually did not know, or handled the facts selectively, it makes me wonder about the rest of the article.

For most of us, the credibility of an article is colored by its accuracy when it touches on an area in which we ourselves are knowledgeable. Your publication of Mr. Rokes's article makes me wonder how many other discussions in The Nation should be viewed with suspicion. . . .

Wilson R. Neisser

Omaha, Neb.

DEAR SIRS: Mr. Neisser's letter reflects the artisan's justifiable pride in the "long-lived handset," but again, it ignores the economic principle of obsolescence. Mr. Neisser's counterparts in the computer industry, not protected by a monopoly market, are constantly introducing new generations of equipment, even though it may require junking equipment which works perfectly well. The question of cost of replacement in a highly competitive market is easily resolved when weighed against the question of survival of the firm. Unfortunately, "Ma Bell" has never had to choose between alternatives. If the buggy still works, and the horse is still healthy, why replace them with innovation?

Reflecting this calcification of company philosophy, the

(Continued on page 262)

EDITORIALS

The Real Danger

The generally accepted view of Middle East tensions is that while the situation is disquieting, the explosive elements are on a long fuse. For the present, it is held, the Soviet Union has no intention of permitting itself to be involved in a major war in that region; for one thing it has too much to worry about on its eastern frontier. The United States, likewise peaceably inclined, has no intention of jumping from the Vietnamese frying pan into a Middle East fire. Israel is annoyed rather than endangered by Arab threats and guerrilla activity; in large-scale military operations it has clear superiority over the Arab nations, singly or combined, and this margin of safety is reasonably certain to persist over the foreseeable future. Therefore, while fighting will continue sporadically, with raids and reprisals, even perhaps on a somewhat ascending scale, it is assumed that the situation will not get out of hand, at least for now.

The most menacing element in the Middle East "powder keg" (as President Nixon termed it last spring) is the Palestinian Arab presence within Israel, in numbers that have been greatly augmented by the 1967 war. A new danger has arisen in this phase of Arab-Israeli relations, particularly in the possible Israeli reaction to the incidents that are bound to occur between the occupied and the occupiers. The conversion of Jerusalem into "one city" certainly has its advantages for both Jews and Arabs, and for Christians too, but it has brought about a more perilous proximity than when Jews and Arabs were separated by walls and check points.

The fire at the Al Aksa mosque is symptomatic. There were fires at the mosque in 1949 and 1964, but since the area was then under Jordanian rule it was not feasible to blame the Israelis. The recent fire, although under the circumstances the last thing the Israelis could have desired, immediately became a pretext for Arab demonstrations, and even an attempt in high Arab governing quarters to rally the world's 600 million Moslems (of whom 100 million live in the Middle East) against Israel as the spearhead of Jewish influence.

Such appeals to unreason may turn world opinion against the Arabs but, quite understandably, also tend to make the Israeli leaders nervous. The crucial question is how they will react. It is currently believed in Israel that the Arabs inside are being manipulated from without. Perhaps, but Palestinian Arabs have feelings like other people —quite like those Jews would have if the situation were reversed. They do not require instigation or direction from without. Whether true or not, however, the Israeli fear of the internal danger—a potential fifth column—may lead to very serious consequences. Ascribing the behavior of a restive population to "outside agitators" is the most common resort of those for whom the restlessness is inconvenient, and the invariable effect is to aggravate it. One may hope the Israelis will be more humane and more intelligent.

Henry Owen, who is director of the foreign policy studies program of the Brookings Institution, has drawn an analogy between the situation in Europe preceding World War I and the present situation in the Middle East. While there are both similarities and differences, the similarities are obvious enough to make one think twice. Six million discontented South Slavs lived in provinces of Austria-Hungary that had been annexed from the Turks. They looked to Serbia much as the Palestinian Arabs look to the Arab nations today. Russia provided Serbia with somewhat the same support that the Soviet Union now furnishes to its Arab allies. When a Serbian terrorist assassinated the heir apparent to the Austrian throne, Austria made impossible demands on Serbia. Germany supported Austria, Russia supported Serbia, England was drawn in when the Germans violated Belgium's borders, and the war was on.

It need not happen again. But it might.

The New Breed

John Dewey once remarked that ours is a government not of laws but of lawyers. This is not remarkable, since —as we say—ours is a government of laws, not of men. The fact that we have a written Constitution, a doctrine of the separation of powers, and a complex state and federal structure of government has given lawyers a special prominence in the American scheme of things. All three branches of government, at both levels, are packed with them. As a further consequence, the legal profession has acquired a reputation, well deserved in many instances, of serving private clients with greater zeal and enthusiasm than it has served the public interest. But today a new breed of lawyers is emerging. They constitute, at the moment, a small minority in the profession, but it is one of increasing importance.

Individual lawyers have, of course, long served the public interest with dedication and high competence. But the new breed of lawyers is to be distinguished on two counts: they have a heightened sense of the social importance of the law in a complex society and of the social purposes to which it can be put; and they function, in many cases, as a group within the profession. Many of them, for example, are to be found in government agencies. Examples of the new breed in action are the civil rights lawyers currently in rebellion against their superiors in the Justice Department, and the hundred or more lawyers connected with Neighborhood Legal Services, an OEO project, who recently addressed a 16-page telegram to the President protesting threatened cutbacks in funds for legal aid programs.

However, the most impressive current example of lawyers serving a good cause at considerable personal sacrifice is described by Charles Howe in "Draft Resisters Multiply—So Do 'New Lawyers,'" in the San Francisco Chronicle. In 1968 alone, 2,472 young men appealed to the federal courts for exemption from military service which had been denied them by their draft boards. On March 31, 1969, 2,481 draft cases remained on the dockets awaiting trial, despite assignment of special federal judges who do nothing but hear pretrial arguments

IN THIS ISSUE

September 15, 1969

EDITORIALS

234

ARTICLES

238 Whitey's on the Moon Now — William Eastlake

239 The Pendleton Brig: Andersonville-by-the-Sea — Robert G. Sherrill

243 Black Business—Bleak Business — George Eckstein

245 What Consumers Need: Show Biz or Hard Facts — A. Q. Mowbray

248 Blood and Fire Against the Draft — Peter Rowley

250 Defining the Future — Gerald Feinberg

BOOKS & THE ARTS

253 The Persistence of Liberalism — Henry S. Kariel

254 Hung Up on Immortality — Fred Powledge

256 Report of a Repentant Symposiast — George P. Elliott

258 Mexican-American Literature — Philip Darraugh Ortego

259 The Trial of Wole Soyinka — Charles R. Larson

260 New Poetry from Europe — Henry Taylor

261 Art — Lawrence Alloway

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL [illegible]

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

NATION Volume 209 No. 8

in draft cases, and the fact that such cases take precedence over all other criminal litigation. These cases represent about 15 per cent of all criminal cases in the federal courts, and they are coming in as fast as they can be disposed of. The legal situation is in a state approaching utter confusion. As fast as loopholes are found in the draft laws and are closed by court decisions or by Congressional actions, new grounds are found for keeping young men out of the most immoral and unpopular war in American history.

This extemporaneous attack on the Selective Service System is being carried on by lawyers, many of them assigned by the courts to defend indigent draft resisters. They are described by a federal court attaché as "bright and tough and willing to put in the work it takes. They're more dedicated than the average older attorney; they take the law seriously." That they must. Working for fees rarely exceeding $500, they sometimes spend up to six months in preparing a case.

The next time someone has the impulse to condemn the members of the bar en masse, he should weigh these developments before making up his mind.

Letting Lady Bird Down

We had hoped that something fine would come out of Mrs. Lyndon Johnson's beautification program for the nation's highways. It seemed so simple, as over against the big ones—ghettos, Vietnam, disintegrating cities, defense spending and so on. Here, at last, seemed an easy test of the ability of government to accomplish an uncomplicated, worth-while objective. But hope was alloyed with skepticism. For reasons everyone senses but which are hard to define precisely, it seems almost impossible these days for the federal government (or for government, simply) to accomplish anything decent except in a few areas.

Why did Lady Bird's praiseworthy endeavor fizzle out? Gladwin Hill, one of The New York Times's finest reporters, tells the story in a long, depressing account (August 31). People do have an interest in highway beautification, or at least an effort at de-uglification, but it is too diffuse to prevail against highly organized opposition. The extent of vested interest in the nation's roadsides is unimaginable until one tries to buck it. Billboards are a prime example. The Johnson administration pressed through anti-billboard legislation which called for the federal government to share with the states, on a 75-to-25 basis, the costs of eliminating objectionable billboards by buying up sign leases.

Eventually a federal report disclosed that 839,000 billboards outside commercial areas were illegal and must come down by 1970. The prospective cost of removing these signs, and a smaller number of others deemed objectionable, included some $558 million for compensating sign owners. To date, of the 839,000 invalidated signs, 750 have been removed, and removal rights have been obtained on another 371. At this rate, it will take a thousand years—give or take a century or two—before Mrs. Johnson's yearnings for beautification are satisfied.

Billboards constitute a vested interest of no mean proportions, and vested interests know how to lobby and how to litigate. According to the Outdoor Advertising Association of America, some 250,000 property owners across the country rent space for billboards. Almost 12,000 concerns manufacture, contract and distribute signs. The owners of "standard" 25-by-12-foot structures who rent space to big advertisers number about 600. The states administer the federal laws, and the experience of one state is indicative. As Lieut. Gov. Paul Simon of Illinois puts it: "Nothing happened. We ran into the big billboard lobbyists, who were able to amend the bills so that they were meaningless."

The billboard interests feel that they have a constitutional right to advertise on the land they own or rent. That the only value of a billboard is derived from the traffic on the road—which in every case was built with public funds—seems to escape their understanding.

Two states, Vermont and Oregon, are honorable exceptions to the rule of self-interest. They seem bent on restoring their scenery to the travelers. But in general, in a country where business profit is paramount, such public-spirited efforts as Mrs. Johnson's get their day of publicity and then soon peter out.

Fan Dance

Under our two-party system (or is it three?) every administration must play politics, but under Mr. Nixon's direction politics is played in the most derogatory sense —worse, if that be possible, than when Mr. Johnson was at the controls. In part, at least, the current confusion over the "peace dividend" appears to be calculated; it was the President's way of telling would-be welfare spenders, whether of his own party or the other, that the dividend was not going to be anything like what they had hoped for, and they should be grateful for whatever they did get. From a public relations standpoint the procedure was reminiscent of the fan dance of an earlier era; now you saw, or imagined you saw, what you wanted to see and now you didn't, and it was all strictly for the peasants.

The master stroke was in designating good old Dan Moynihan to lead off with the bad news. As the Administration's leading exemplar of liberalism, Moynihan could speak more in sorrow than in jubilation. At the same time he could lace the announcement with the Irish-American wit which is part of his stock in trade. It needed a certain amount of blarney, for this was deflation on the scale of what has been happening in the stock market (but nowhere else). From the Johnson dividend of some $19 billion to be diverted to pressing peacetime needs thirty months after the Vietnamese War was over, Moynihan had to de-escalate to the general range of millions instead of billions. He did it manfully.

At the same time there was enough optimism floating about so that the welfare spenders would not feel altogether destitute. Even the GOP House leader, Gerald Ford, contradicted Moynihan. Herbert Stein of the Council of Economic Advisers felt the picture was not as black as people supposed, and Dr. Arthur Burns, the President's confidant in economic matters, talked of a cornucopia of $8 billion over the coming year—if the war ended immediately. Which, obviously, it won't.

The most obfuscating part of the whole performance was that the President himself said whatever monies were freed when peace came were already spoken for and, he implied, mostly committed. But he did not give any idea of who had asked and who was to be enriched. Keeping in mind Mr. Nixon's weakness for ABMs, MIRVs and similar expensive toys, one may suspect that the Pentagon will come out on top.

Current evidence in the same direction is the spending spree on which the Pentagon has embarked. According to The Wall Street Journal, new factory orders for military goods were at a new high, in what some analysts believe may prove to be the Pentagon's last spending fling for some time. This remains to be seen. The Pentagon wants that dividend as badly as anyone, and it has a very good prospect of getting most of what it wants, in the future as in the past.

The Evans Case

The prosecution in the trial of Fred Ahmed Evans told jurors that they had a duty "as Americans to stand up and be counted. . . . Let's wake up, America. From the acorn grows a mighty tree. A spoonful of ink in a gallon of water gives you a tainted color." This and similar appeals to racism apparently made it easy for an all-white jury to convict Evans of conspiring to murder three white policemen and a black civilian, although the prosecution admitted that it could not prove he had killed anyone. (See "Bad Day in Cleveland," The Nation, July 14.) Evans is now scheduled to die in the electric chair on September 23 unless a reprieve is granted.

However, more than racist rhetoric was employed to secure Evans' conviction. The key witness to the "conspiring" was a 17-year-old who had been charged with murder, arson and theft; all of these charges were dismissed when he was "allowed" to join the Army. Coroner's reports were handled in a questionable manner in order to hide the fact that two of the dead police officers were drunk. Reports on the type of wound were changed months later, and another coroner's inquest reached a conclusion directly opposite to that indicated by the official autopsy. A poisonous climate of opinion was created by the mass media, with reports of plots, ambush and a "massacre of police." As Evans' lawyer charged, the Cleveland media's portrayal of him as a "Black Frankenstein" made all that followed, including the death sentence, seem not only just but self-evident on the "facts" presented.

Reversing the conviction in a political trial of this sort —where the target is not only the accused but also his ideas and the movement he represents—requires massive public protest. The Evans case is one of national as well as local importance, because it is one of a number of similar prosecutions in which an attempt is being made to cripple black militancy by selecting a victim to symbolize the movement, and then using the very instrument that brought it into being—white racism—to destroy it."

Evans recognizes the intent of the prosecution, and his final words to the court will haunt the Cleveland community if it permits his execution to proceed: "This will not end by the means that have been used today against the black men who are willing, who are able, who are strong enough to stand up. The electric chair or fear of anything won't stop the black men of today."

If Evans is executed, it will be a bad day not merely for Cleveland but for the state of Ohio and the entire nation. What we do not need, at this point in time, is a black martyr, particularly one convicted in a case which carries the taint of racism from first to last. No one has been executed in the United States for nearly two years, a commendable hiatus in legal violence. Evans, a black man convicted of killing three white police officers, is today nearer that fate than any prisoner has been for two years.

Ho Chi Minh

By any reckoning, Ho Chi Minh was a great Vietnamese patriot, a man who embodied the finest qualities of the traditional culture of the Vietnamese, and a most remarkable political and military leader. Unswervingly, selflessly, with courage, consistency and a brilliant sense of tactics and strategy he served the cause of Vietnamese independence throughout the entire range of his adult life. He must rank as one of the most extraordinary world figures of this century.

Official and press reactions to his death have been contradictory, confused and naive. On the one hand, officials in Washington hopefully suggest that his death will trigger a fierce and destructive competition for leadership, but is not likely to affect the course of the war or the negotiations in Paris. Other comment, in the press, suggests that his death is likely to prolong the war and complicate the negotiations. On balance it seems likely that his death will have an adverse effect on the negotiations.

His prestige was enormous, North and South. If he approved a settlement, it would be accepted. Many elements in the South had great respect for him as a national leader and, by inference at least, might have less confidence in a settlement reached without his presence in Hanoi. Similarly the cause of unification has probably been set back by his death. He may have been, as press comment indicates, "almost a mystic," but he was also "an enormously pragmatic Communist." And it is pragmatists who are in short supply in Hanoi, Saigon and Washington.

Drew Pearson

Almost alone among newspaper columnists, Drew Pearson carried on the muckraking tradition in American journalism. His column, which went to an audience estimated at 50 million, helped fill the gap that was caused when muckraking journalism fell out of style—or, to state it another way, when the bulk of the American press decided not to engage in it, except occasionally, cautiously, and when it seemed quite safe.

As Robert Sherrill pointed out in a special issue we devoted to Pearson as a rare phenomenon in American journalism ("Thirty-Six Years on the Merry-Go-Round," The Nation, July 7), "nobody comes even close to competing with the Pearson product." Nearly everyone sensed that it was a good product of its kind and enormously useful; in fact there was only one common complaint about it—that it was often inaccurate. And so it was. But Pearson was usually on to something. It was often quite important and in the end he generally succeeded in flushing the story out into the open. Unlike Lincoln Steffens, Pearson never concluded that muckraking was a mistake or that it was outmoded or ineffectual. At the same time, he had no illusions about the power of even the best muckraking journalism to "reform the system." He knew that the struggle would never end to keep "the system" reasonably honest but that it would be more dishonest and corrupt if the effort abated.

Despite his long experience with corruption and chicanery in high places, Pearson was not a cynic nor was he an up-tight moralist. He was a link between the old muckrakers, who tended to be moralistic and superficial (Steffens was an exception), and the new muckrakers—Ralph Nader is a case in point—who have deeper and more relevant insights. Pearson's summing up in these pages will stand, we feel, as a fine statement of his intention and methods, and of his thinking, as we put it, about war, love, graft, politics, revolution and the hiding places of power.

WHITEY'S ON THE MOON NOW

WILLIAM EASTLAKE

Mr. Eastlake's latest book is The Bamboo Bed, to be published this fall by Simon & Schuster. He is the author also of the The Bronc People (Harcourt, Brace) and Castle Keep (Simon & Schuster).

Tucson

I had a Papago Indian intellectual friend over to watch the first man on the moon.

The Papago Indian intellectual brought over a Papago Indian cowboy to watch too.

"They are about to land," I said.

"You said something about beer."

"Wait."

"What for?"

"Till they get on the moon."

"Are they on the moon yet?"

"Yes."

"Can I have the beer?"

"The white man on the moon said one small step for a man and one giant step for mankind."

"That's nice," the Papago cowboy said. "Can I have the beer now?"

"What he means," my friend the Papago Indian intellectual said, "is that his people are starving. He's not interested in the white man on the moon."

I got the Papago cowboy the beer.

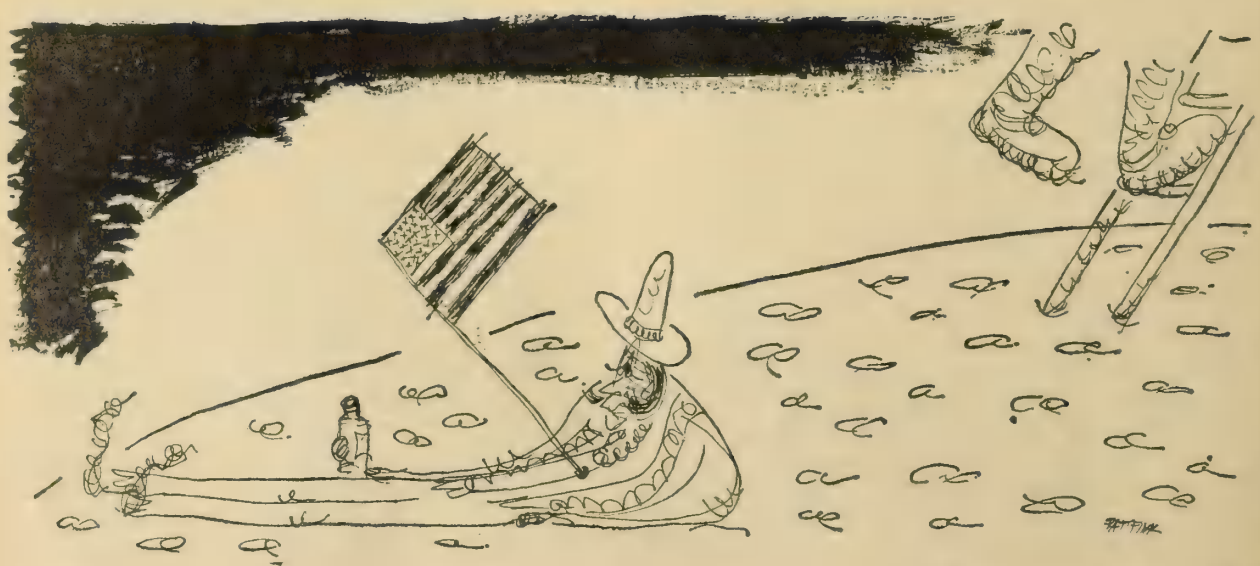
The Papago cowboy, now that he had the beer can, smiled and said, "How much did it cost to go to the moon?"

"Twenty billion."

The Papago cowboy smiled and shook his head at the white man on the moon.

"What he means," the Papago intellectual said, "is that he hopes they are happy on the moon."

"Who that?" the Indian cowboy said.



"President Nixon."

"Why?"

"He says it's the biggest thing since creation."

"Why?"

"What he means is he hopes President Nixon is very happy on the moon."

"Would you like all white people to go to the moon?"

"Yes."

"Never come back from the moon?"

"Yes."

"Would you like some more beer?"

"Yes."

When the Papago Indian cowboy got the beer he thought a while and then said, "No."

The intellectual Papago said, "He means why do you want to destroy another planet."

"Curiosity."

The cowboy Indian Papago thought about that and laughed.

"He laughs because the Papago are all cried out," his friend said.

"They will bring back moonstones," I said.

"Will they kill all the people there?" the Papago Indian cowboy said.

"No."

"Put them on reservations?"

"No. Because there are no people on the moon," I said.

"Will the white people come back?"

"Yes."

The Papago Indian cowboy got up.

"Where are you going?"

"To the moon."

"Of course you can't," the intellectual Papago said.

The Indian sat down.

"You see," the Papago intellectual said, "the Indian would very much like to get off this planet. If you will not get off his land."

"One small step for a man on earth . . .?"

"And forget the moon."

"Yes."

"What he means," the intellectual Papago said, "is he would like another beer." That is why they call my Indian friend an intellectual Papago. All over Arizona they laugh at him because he does not want to settle for Overkill Rockets at Tucson or a dam on the Grand Canyon or the London Bridge over the Havasupai or for mankind to take their first giant step on the moon.

"Why can't they take it here?" he said.

"Would you like a beer?"

"Why can't we take it here?"

Like all Indians my intellectual Indian Papago friend and the Papago Indian cowboy are mad, not mad crazy, but just plain damn mad. Not moonstruck. Just two hungry, angry Indians watching Whitey on the moon.

THE PENDLETON BRIG

ANDERSONVILLE-BY-THE-SEA

ROBERT G. SHERRILL

On March 17, a "for official eyes only" memorandum was sent from Wallace H. Robinson, Jr., quartermaster general of the Marine Corps, to the chief of staff, Gen. W. J. Van Ryzin, in which he warned that "a truly explosive situation" exists within the Camp Pendleton, Calif., prison but that "a public disclosure of existing conditions could tend to place the Commandant in an embarrassing defensive position."

He was right on both counts, but he failed to point out that the Pendleton brig—the second largest prison in the Navy apparatus—was continually erupting with riots and brutalities that only the Marine Corps' great luck had kept from reaching the press. Racial tensions in the Marine prison are intense. One riot a few months ago sent twenty men to the hospital.

Accompanying his memorandum was a secret survey of conditions at the Pendleton brig, conducted last March, in which it was officially admitted that the prison—a conglomeration of World War II temporary wood-frame buildings and tents, and prefab metal buildings once used as a prisoner-of-war camp—is no better than a concentration camp. The brig was built to handle 400 men. The normal prison population is now 800, and often there are peak loads of nearly 900.

The report is limited to the physical breakdown of the camp. It makes no mention of the cruelties imposed upon the prisoners, but accounts of these were obtained by The Nation elsewhere—from Father Alban Rosen, a priest who has done voluntary chaplain work at the base, from U.S. Senators, from men who are deserters from the Marine Corps, and from Dr. Larry McNamee, who served as brig physician for a year.

There are several accounts of prisoners being handcuffed to the steel-mesh fence surrounding the 20-acre camp—handcuffed in a spread-eagle fashion, their feet dangling inches above the ground. On one occasion the sight of a prisoner hanging like that brought about a sit-down mutiny that might have blown up into something much worse than the celebrated Presidio Army base "mutiny," but in this instance cool-headed officers broke it up.

Dr. McNamee, who left the Marine Corps in July and is now doing his residency in Cleveland, came away with many memories of his career as the first and last full-time physician at the Pendleton brig. He recalls a number of prisoners who came to him bruised over their chests and backs, who told of being beaten with taped clubs by the guards. An investigation uncovered the clubs, but nothing was done to the guards. He also remembers the prisoner whose arm had been broken and was in a cast; this young man was ordered to lie down on the ground, and then one of the guards stepped on the cast and smashed it.

On that occasion—it was a time of wholesale punishment, for the prisoners had done something the guards resented—"I saw a prisoner in a down position (with nose touching ground, legs spread-eagled and hands clasped behind back; in other words the prisoner is supported on the ground by his face, chest and toes), and one guard was standing on one foot and another guard was kicking the other foot out further. A foreman was with me and I said, 'go over and stop them—the guy's legs can't spread any further.' But the prisoner himself reacted. He jumped up and kicked at one of the guards and another guard got pushed back by the prisoner. At that point, the second guard ran at the prisoner and kicked him in the chest, knocking him to the ground. Three or four other guards grabbed him, forced his hands behind his back and his face to the ground. He couldn't possibly move. The guard who had just kicked him, now fell on top of him and began pummeling him on the back of the head, hitting him as hard as he could with his fist closed. I mean, really belting him. Before I could get there, somebody else had pulled the guard off. The prisoner was sent to the Ice Box."

The Ice Box is made up of six cages set on an open concrete slab. Prisoners held there are protected from the weather only by bars; the confidential report acknowledges that the Ice Box, which has been in use for years, "is a cruel and unusual punishment." This is incorrect; it is cruel but not unusual. In fact, there is another twist to the Ice Box punishment that the report did not notice: the cases are covered with canvas during the day when it is hot; at night, when it is cold, the canvas is removed. And the nights at Pendleton can be cold indeed.

Another of the specialty facilities is the "Bull Pen," a fenced-in area used for holding prisoners who are being processed. Sometimes as many as thirty men are held in this area and they are kept there up to eight hours. There is no toilet, no urinal or drinking fountain in the Bull Pen. If guards refuse to take them out, they must relieve themselves on the spot. Eight months before General Robinson's survey, Dr. McNamee had sent in a complaint to the base's commanding medical officer about this situation, without results.

Although the report claims that "the double chain link fence which surrounds the main compound is basically sufficient to contain prisoners," it elsewhere notes that "there were 166 escapes during the past year." Although more than 90 per cent of the prisoners are being held on no charge more serious than AWOL, the treatment meted out to them encourages attempts to escape, even at the risk of being shot.

The report continues: "The camp was described by one officer as looking like Andersonville. The following paragraphs are an attempt to graphically describe a most serious situation that could develop into a series of embarrassing circumstances to the Marine Corps if immediate steps are not taken to permit corrective action."

¶The 1942 vintage building being utilized for all newly confined prisoners undergoing indoctrination and/or awaiting classification is a fire and safety hazard. The two-story barracks building was built as a temporary structure at the beginning of World War II and very little improvement has been made since. The bottom decks are divided into cells utilizing scrap steel bars, etc., that were salvaged when Camp Elliott was closed down.

¶It was reported that if the prisoner load on the second deck was past a certain level the doors to the cells on the first deck would not open.

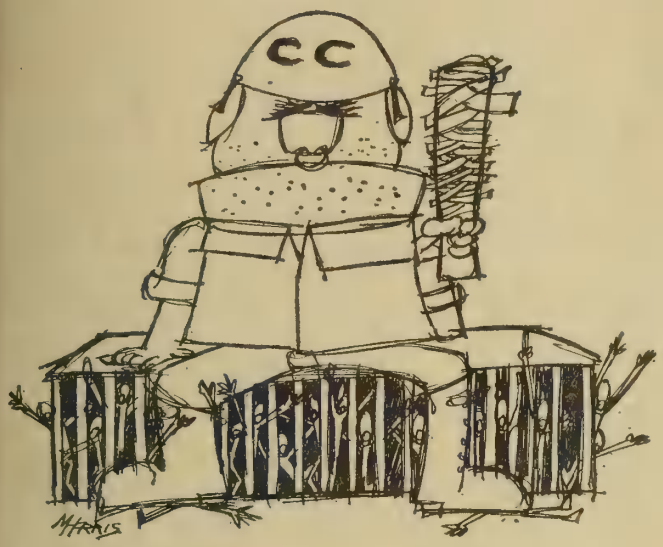
¶There is only one escape hatch on each deck, all the windows and doors being either barred or secured to prevent escape. This particular building and two others like it are notably the best structures in the complex except for a new Maximum Security building which was recently completed.

¶Even the new building is inadequate; there are 48 cells in this building and only two commodes, the heating is poor and food must be carried from the mess hall and served in the individual's cell which routinely, during the winter, results in cold, greasy food.

¶In two areas tents are being used for confinement of medium custody prisoners. Oil burner heating is provided for these areas, and the tents are extremely overcrowded, the average footage per man in these tents is about 25 square feet. The standard square footage is 72 square feet per man.

¶Supervision of these areas presents an additional safety problem. In order to exercise any degree of control over the prisoners it is necessary for the guards to mingle with the prisoners. At night this is obviously an extremely dangerous practice as recently evidenced by a guard being beaten up by some prisoners while he was making his security rounds.

The men who run the brig have put a great deal of imaginative thought into figuring out ways to punish prisoners. One Marine deserter hiding out in Pasadena, Calif., told of the room of mirrors, in which some prisoners were punished by being forced to stand naked all day, sometimes for several weeks, just looking at themselves. Another deserter, interviewed in Whittier, Calif., had been a guard in a correctional custody platoon until he couldn't take it any more. "There's an interview that all prisoners go through," he said. "I've seen twenty or thirty. You hold your sea bag that weighs between 75 pounds and 115 pounds; you hold this over your head and turn in a circle as fast as you can, screaming, 'No, Sir' and 'Yes, Sir.' Once I saw a sergeant climb up on top of two foot lockers and jump on the bag one fellow was holding over his head. The bag fell on his head and he was knocked flat to the floor. It broke his nose and knocked out his teeth."



Father Al, the Franciscan priest, who was stationed at San Luis Rey Mission near Pendleton said: "No matter how bad it is, you can believe just about anything the Marines tell you about the brig. I really don't doubt any of the stories, because of the things I've seen and heard. I've seen faces beaten in. I know about the room of mirrors."

After Dr. McNamee had been treating patients at the brig for a while, and after he had made numerous complaints to his superiors to have conditions improved, he began asking the prisoners who came to him to write down what had happened to them. Here are a few. The original spelling is retained sometimes to convey a more accurate indication of the kind of young men the Marine Corps pushes around in its prisons.

Charles L. Francis set down these troubles on March 3, 1969:

"About 17:30 I was called to the duty hut. I was haveing my gear inventoreid. L/Cpl. Johnson was explaning the rules. He told me to stand at atention on the yellow foot prints in the duty room. I was told to keep my head and eyes to the front. He told me to give him 25 4 count push ups. When he seen that I was tirering, he wanted them perfict. After he seen that I couldn't complet them he had me stand at atention then he comenced hitting me with a club in the stomach and ribs. He would stop four a few minutes and then say I was eyeballing the area and start the beating again."

The doctor found sufficient cuts, bruises, skinned areas and lumps to support the story.

McNamee made the following report on H. L. Clark (no date):

"States he told corporal he couldn't take any further harassment and then began to cry. He was then hit in the eye, thrown to the ground and kicked in the left hand and left side of the chest."

When he reported to the doctor, he had a three-inch swelling under his right eye, a swollen cheek and bruised ribs.

This one is signed by Pvt. Jimmy L. Milton on March 5, 1969:

"On 2 March 1969 Cpl. DeGross called me to the Correctional Custody office and then he beat me a few times in the chest, then he made me eat four cigaretts and then pushed me out the door.

"Then on the 3 of March 1969 Cpl. DeGross again called me to the duty CC office and then L/Cpl. Johnson and Cpl. DeGross beat me agein, L/Cpl. Johnson dug his finger nails into my forhead and beat me in the chest along with Cpl. DeGross, and this time Cpl. Anderson held his fist at the back of my head and L/Cpl. Johnson then pushed my head back as hard as he could.

"Then they made me get on the deck and then L/Cpl. Johnson kicked me in the head and some one kicked me in the side."

Statement signed by Pvt. Stephen Weddel on February 28, 1969:

"I was called in the duty CC office and L/Cpl. Johnson, Sgt. Blye and another cpl. beat me in the chest with thier fist and feet leaving marks on my chest and hurting my ribbs to the point where I can just barely breath."

Statement signed by Pvt. Howard J. Stamm, Jr., on March 4, 1969:

"On or about the 27 day of Feb. I was called into the duty CC instructors office and Cpl. DeGross beat on my chest until I fell backward out the door and he then pulled me back in and continued beating on my chest until I fell down. He choked me and told me to get up he then pushed me out."

Pvt. Charles J. Comiskey received a bloodied and broken nose in the following episode, which he described in a statement signed March 4, 1969:

"I was called into the CC instructors hut and told to stand at attention on some yellow footprints keeping my eyes straight ahead. At that time L/Cpl. Johnson started beating me with a rolled up towel in the face. He then gave me blows to the stumic and karate chops in the neck. When I put my hands up to protect myself instinkivly, he thought I was crazy or something and invited me to hit him back. When I accepted his invitation with a swing and a curse, three of the CC instructors grabed me, beat me, and tied me up continuing the act until the assistant warden came and took me to sick bay."

Statement of Pvt. Peter T. Rood, signed March 5, 1969:

"At approximately 0915 on this date I suffered a cut on the back of my head. I was in the CC instructors hut doing extra P.T. because I couldn't do correct push-ups in the yard due to my back. I had a skiing accident about 1½ months ago. I went off a jump and one ski caught on an open patch of the jump. I tumbled and landed against a tree which was very close to the side of the slope. I struck the tree directly on the small of my back.

"Since then I've had bad, sharp pains in my lower back, accompanied by severe headaches and bad dreams. When I returned from the regular P.T. this morning, my back was sore and I had sharp pains in my spine. I couldn't hold a push-up position so I was told to go into the CC instructors hut.

"Cpl. DeGross forced me to do exercises when I complained about my back. He kicked my feet out from under me and grabbing the back of my shirt pushed me forward to the deck. After several repititions I was left on the deck. Cpl. DeGross kicked me a few times in my side and grabbed my shirt collar, lifting and dropping me in a push-up type exercise. I was then righted and I began to feel dizzy. I began to fall but the corporal held me up. He then gave me a shove and I fell backwards, tripping over something and striking my head on a footlocker, I believe, and I then blacked out and came to when a corpman tried to awake me. Others were in the room but since I was new in the CC area I didn't know them. When I was laying on the deck I overheard the people in the hut discuss what story they were going to tell everyone."

Pvt. Mark S. Sutherlin, a prisoner in the maximum security unit, got into an argument with a guard in October 1968. The result of the argument was this:

"He pushed me and then ordered me to put my tray of food on the floor and eat it there. Well, I didn't feel like being his fool, so I refused agien. So he pushed me agien, nocking my tray of food all over the place, then he came at me swinging his fists, so I swung back. While we fought, he kicked me in my scrotum, it didn't hurt then, but now, and it is also all blue."

It was indeed, as the doctor noted in his memorandum, entirely blue and large and tender.

Pvt. C. W. Mowery, on February 5, 1969, told of being called into the instructors' hut and being ordered to take the prisoner's down position.

"I got down in the prisoner's down position and everyone left except the two CC's that were to make the CC instructor's rack. Then another CC instructor that was just came on duty came into the CC instructors hut and stomped me twice in the back while in the prisoners down position. There were about six CC instructors in the hut when it happened but only two wrote me up. I seen the Major Voigt and he beleives what they say I reckon. Anyway he told the Cpl. on duty to sent the assault charge against me to my C.O."

From L/Cpl. Gerald M. Bonnell, January 17, 1969:

"When I came to CC the 14 of January 1969, it wasn't until the next morning when they started beating on me, hitting me in the belly 3 or 4 times and asked me if I would do any thing if they did it again, and kicking me in the back by my left shoulder 2 or three times and almost breaking my neck by the jurk of being kicked. They said to get things straight and I got all nervous and confused and couldn't so that is when they chocked me and picked me almost up off the deck by my neck. I have been a nervous wreck since I joined the Marine Corps. I never said any thing or talked back, or disobeyed the CC instructors or threatened or took a swing at any of them, but yet they treat us like animals and I want out of CC and the Marine Corps."

To that he added a postscript: "Now since I signed this here form it will be a lot harder on me so I want out of CC as soon as possible."

Pvt. Lloyd A. Wyman, in a statement signed September 26, 1968, told of his refusing to run in physical training, as ordered, after which this happened:

"Upon my refusal to run, two of the aforementioned personnel dragged me by the arms in order to make me run. Fortunately, I was able to pull away from them, at which time I was placed in the 'Prisoners Down' position. While in this position, one of the personnel present at the time jumped, landing on his knees in the center of my back. This action was executed with considerable force and caused great pain. It should be known that I have been under treatment and medication for a back problem."

Fifty-three per cent of the prisoners Dr. McNamee tried to have taken for clinical diagnosis or hospital care never got there. Guards could not be spared to escort them but, as Dr. McNamee said, "there was always a guard available to escort prisoners to mow the general's lawn."

Also, Dr. McNamee says that only 15 per cent of the medicine he prescribed for his patients was ever taken by them. One prisoner with gonorrhea was in the brig from October 1968 to January 1969 and was never admitted to the hospital despite repeated efforts by Dr. McNamee to get him there. Dr. McNamee made eight efforts to get a private admitted to a chest clinic for studies, and never succeeded. Sometimes prisoners with temperatures of 102 degrees are forced to take part in daylong exercises.

Boredom takes almost as high a toll as sickness. In a report to the base medical officer, Dr. McNamee spelled out some of the results. "Inmates throw razor blades at one another. Numerous small lacerations have been seen on my confinees as a result of the above. Boredom apparently is the cause of this activity. Boredom also contributes to the incidence of self-inflicted cigarette burns. Two confinees place a lighted cigarette between their forearms to see who could stand the pain longer." Prisoners also catch wild mice and try to keep them as pets; several prisoners are treated each day for bites.

There aren't enough guards to do a proper job. Consequently, security is poor and drugs pass in and out with no trouble. Inmates who can't afford drugs shoot cold water, coffee, Kool-Aid and various medications dissolved in tap water. As a result, one to two cases of serum hepatitis per month are seen at the brig sick bay.

Obviously, to bring the prison facilities and treatment up to a civilized level, a number of things are needed, including money. The Marine Corps is asking for $2.5 million to build additional brig facilities, but they would not be large enough and the old jail would have to be used.

As General Robinson said in his private note to the chief of staff: "Difficulty is anticipated on this line item before Congress in view of its historic reticence to fund new brig facilities. Senator Stennis in particular has gone on record stating he did not like to build a new facility for the 'bad guys' while the 'good guys' lived in substandard barracks. . . .

"The Senatorial investigation of conditions at the Presidio could serve to assist the Marine Corps in obtaining authorization and funding of this line item at Camp Pendleton, because recognition of a need for more adequate service brigs would help us."

The best and quickest solution, of course, would be to follow the precedent set in 1957 by Gen. David Shoup when he was commandant of the First Marine Division at Pendleton. He simply freed everyone in the brig who was there for something less than a felony—which immediately cleared the prison of virtually every prisoner.

BLACK BUSINESS—BLEAK BUSINESS

GEORGE ECKSTEIN
Mr. Eckstein, a free-lance writer, is business consultant with the New York Urban Coalition.

Black business is currently one of the most talked about subjects. President Nixon promised the blacks "a piece of the action" through "black capitalism." The trouble is that there is such a wealth of agencies, government and private, concerned with the matter that most of the action gets lost in the maze. On the government side there are the Office of Minority Business Enterprise (Department of Commerce); Operation Mainstream (Small Business Administration), and the Economic Development Agency, to name only a few.

Among the private agencies, there are the Urban Coalition, national and local; Coalition Venture Corporation, and Capital Formation, Inc., both working with the Coalition in New York; Interracial Council for Business Opportunities (NAACP); the National Urban League, and some CORE units. In addition, some of the large banks, notably Chase Manhattan and First National City, have put special officers in charge of minority business loans.

There have been so many symposia and panel discussions that they begin to weary the participants, especially the few moderately successful black businessmen called upon to tell of their experiences. Among the organizers: Legal Defense Fund-NAACP, Arden House, Capital Formation, Ripon Society, and some business schools.

A steady flow of press releases has come from all these sources, but measured against the vast input of time, money, labor and good will, results so far are discouragingly small. The same few success stories: a hat manufacturer or dress house here, a small foundry, supermarket or gas station there. The more ambitious Community Development schemes seem to remain on paper. The mountain of organization and conversation is producing a mouse of actual black business. It's time to have a closer look.

Black business is not new. As a matter of fact, there was more of it in the past than exists today. There used to be sixty-eight Negro-owned banks compared to today's twenty-one. Even the number of Negro-owned businesses in Harlem has dropped by one-third. The Negro share in terms of numbers, and even more in terms of volume, of all enterprises is still insignificant.

Two principal roadblocks bar the way, if not to riches, at least to independence: lack of managerial know-how and lack of capital. Both are, of course, interrelated and mutually reinforcing. Capital is not forthcoming where experience is lacking, and know-how cannot develop if given no chance to practice. As in many other areas, a lack of entrepreneurial spirit is often blamed on a lingering "slave mentality." But this is only partly true; Negro businessmen in Atlanta and other cities of the South have been rather successful—the "hustler" in the Northern ghetto is often a shrewd and resourceful "free enterpriser." Psychologically, with their initiative boosted in the current climate of growing self-reliance, the blacks should be able to develop their enterprises much as other originally less business-minded minorities (Irish, Poles, Sicilians) did in their time. However, other minority groups had certain advantages the blacks lack: they could start out from skilled trades (construction worker into building contractor, tailor into garment manufacturer, etc.), and capital requirements in earlier days were smaller. Now the Negro businessman's access to capital is very limited: he has little savings; his family is without funds to lend; he has no credit from suppliers and little chance for commercial bank loans without collateral. His way through government or private agencies is plastered with good intentions, a multitude of forms and bureaucratic delays which frequently make any financial assistance—if it is at all forthcoming—too little and too late. Add to this the current tight money market, and the result is general frustration—a feeling of discrimination among the blacks, of disappointment among those who would like to help them.

The reason for the difficulties, of course, goes deeper—to the institutions of our corporate economy. They are naturally stacked against the small independent businessman, black or white. The fatality rate among small businesses is 70 per cent within their first three years. There is and there will always be room for the man with special skill or formula, but the "Mom & Pop" store—while its high "visibility" may confer status in the ghetto—offers its proprietors, in the age of the supermarket and the drug and variety chains, much more hard work than hard cash. The situation is somewhat better in the service industries and in small manufacturing, especially if not confined to the ghetto limits as, unfortunately, too many of the existing enterprises are. But on the whole, the independent entrepreneurship through which former minorities have worked their way into the American business mainstream, is no longer a way for the blacks to obtain "a piece of the action" in today's corporate economy.

More in line with the latter, and thus more promising, is the establishment of blacks in franchises and dealerships in such fields as gas stations, store branches and "EAT" chains. In these the parent company usually provides at least part of the capital, managerial assistance and guidance. The considerable loss of independence is compensated for by a considerably lessened risk of failure. There is no reason why a concentrated effort of private agencies, banks and franchise enterprises should not result in many more black-managed and black-owned branches.

The co-ops, exemplified by the well-publicized Quilting Bee of Alberta, Ala., present no real solution. They have a certain romantic appeal for both the old and New Left; but the climate of the economy and the spotty history of Negro solidarity make the co-op a viable alternative only in a few exceptional instances.

"And If You Don't Believe I'm Promoting Black Capitalism . . ."

Small enterprise still appeals to the essentially middle-class, largely Southern-formed mentality of the NAACP who—at their forum in May—advocated their extension out of the ghetto into the mainstream of the economy. But, as became clear in the intervention of Roy Innis of Harlem CORE at the same discussion, this does not interest the new breed of Black Power separatists. They are thinking in bigger terms: of community development corporations, such as the Bedford-Stuyvesant Corporation initiated by Robert Kennedy, or the Harlem Corporation that Roy Innis is trying to organize with the help of other politicians. The capital which they hope to obtain through political pressure from Whitey (government, banks, large corporations) would be used by them to finance various ghetto enterprises. They are not interested in enterprises active in the mainstream economy, but on the contrary expect large corporations to set up "turnkey" operations in the ghetto to be relinquished on favorable terms to ghetto ownership and management. Ironically, one of the first such enterprises actually established, and much hailed by Innis, has been the Harlem branch of a Wall Street brokerage firm which will drain ghetto dollars into U.S. corporate coffers.

But, what counts above all to these young men is the power they hope to wield from the command post of their community development corporations, first within the ghetto and ultimately outside in the political arena. Their big problem, however, will be to provide a high quality of management without which funds can be quickly dissipated. All too often, such essentially power-inspired ventures have a tendency to get mired in bureaucracy, nepotism and fraud (for example, Dave Beck's Teamsters union enterprises), and it is very doubtful whether the people from whom the capital is expected, can be scared to the point of providing it without retaining some control over its use. Nevertheless, these grander projects seem to have met with a certain amount of sympathy on the part of the Republican Establishment desirous of finding an accommodation with turbulent black separatists through the switch of ghetto economics.

There have been more modest, and more indigenous poolings of resources, such as Challenge, Inc., a Harlem investment corporation set up by Spencer Jourdain, a Harvard Business School graduate, Jim Brown of football and movie fame, and others, including several community organizations. By spreading equity ownership broadly in the community and among their employees, they hope to "build up a series of businesses in the ghetto while avoiding exploitation" (Spencer Jourdain). Whether or not the second part of this hope may be realized, such economically oriented ventures should have a fair chance of success. They undoubtedly will attract the black separatists among the growing number of black business school graduates.

The majority, though, undoubtedly will go neither into business nor ghetto corporations but will find their way to jobs with large corporations. The latter are more and more willing and at times even eager to hire black college graduates, if only for public relations or reinsurance. (Actually, what keener sign of changing times as when the corporate image is improved—not blemished—by the sight of Negroes, at least on the lower and middle rungs of management and in laboratories?) While all too often these managerial jobs are still connected with the hiring and handling of Negro personnel, it can be expected that there will be increasing access to other fields in management. The upper reaches, undoubtedly, will remain closed to blacks for a long time, but Jews even today are largely excluded from the top positions in some of our biggest industries.

Insofar as the "action" is now unquestionably in the large corporation, the young college-educated black will best find "a piece of it" there. Whether he can preserve a militant separatist attitude in the corporation is another question, but it can legitimately be raised as well about the radical advocates of economic Black Power who are perfectly willing to work with the Establishment as long as it allots them a small piece of its power.

The hard fact has to be faced: that despite the good will now existing in many places the laws of business cannot easily be bent. Money goes where there is believed to be the least risk and/or the most profit; the existing institutions tend to work in favor of the haves, not the have-nots. In this context, the role of private agency, such as the Urban Coalition, can at best be limited. Their funds are insufficient to cover little more than their expenses. Their prime function is educational, as expressed by Robert Lenzner, a young man who interrupted a promising Wall Street career for one year to work with the Urban Coalition: to make business ("the fat cats") and the public aware of the needs and possibilities of black business; to help black would-be entrepreneurs get access to and contact with possible sources of capital funds and managerial advice.

The only force that could suspend the laws of business to some extent would be the government. The existing agencies move in a slow, haphazard manner, sometimes paralleling one another or working at cross-purposes. Only a clear, dynamic policy would establish aims, priorities and proper measures such as simple rules for loan guarantees, interest subsidies, tax relief for new black businesses, government contracts directed toward black companies (which are now mostly ineligible under the rules of the Defense Department favoring the big corporations).

Instead, we squander money in half measures in a multitude of directions. For example, Secretary of Commerce Maurice Stans announced the following ("Negro Businesses Get First Grants," New York Times, July 10):

> A $200,000 grant from OEO through the SBA to the National Bankers Association, consisting of twenty-one Negro-owned banks, to establish a "credit pool" for loan guarantees and equity capital (i.e., an average of under $10,000 per bank!).
>
> A $200,000 grant from the Office of Education to Howard University to establish a National Institute for Minority Business Education. "The institute will identify successful businesses and make the information available to minority business men."
>
> A $650,000 grant from SBA and EDA to Rev. Leon Sullivan of Philadelphia to train shopping center developers in thirteen cities. Mr. Sullivan developed Progress Plaza in Philadelphia.

The prospects for black business in the immediate future remain bleak; nor can the main solution for the economic ills of the black community come from this direction. It will have to be created through the general increase of its economic level; through the opening of skilled blue- and white-collar jobs; through training and education; through income maintenance where other measures fail.

It is difficult to see how any of these aims can be accomplished through the present policy of economic retrenchment which cannot fail to hit black business the hardest.

WHAT CONSUMERS NEED

SHOW BIZ OR HARD FACTS

A. Q. MOWBRAY
Mr. Mowbray is the author of Road to Ruin and The Thumb on the Scale (both J. B. Lippincott).

The state of the U.S. market place is nowhere better illustrated than in a television commercial now going the rounds for Oxydol. The scene is a modern, cheerfully appointed home laundry. A young man is being instructed in the mysteries of detergent quality by a bright young housewife. What, he asks, is so good about Oxydol? "It's those green things," she tells him, pointing to the flecks of green bleach in the pile of detergent she has poured into his outstretched hand. "But how well does it work?" he persists, all male innocence and gawk. "Stick your head in the basket," she leers, nodding toward the washing machine, "and you'll find out."

For fumbling young man read typical consumer. For impertinent housewife read U.S. manufacturer. And for "green things" read all the advertising puffery and nonsense that manufacturers substitute for hard information when touting their wares. How well does it work? The most adroit young minds in our society are hired to devise slick phrases with which to brush off such questions. Instead of giving hard answers, detergent manufacturers give you a choice between the credibility of Eddie Albert and Arthur Godfrey.

What the consumer needs in order to make rational choices among competing products is standards for those products—standards of performance, standards of durability, standards of safety. How well does it work? How long will it last? Is it safe? The paucity of standards for consumer products is at the heart of most of the consumer questions that have found their way to Washington during the past several years. Much of our annual highway carnage has been attributed to a need for safety standards for automobile design. Truth in packaging is unattainable without either standard net contents or standard unit price statements. Truth in lending is now being achieved through standard methods of stating the cost of borrowing. Wholesale meat can be provided only through sanitation and inspection standards. And so on.

Where the public health and safety are concerned, there seems to be a growing realization that the government, and especially the federal government, can no longer rely on the spotty and often ineffectual efforts of manufacturers to build safety into their products. Recent hearings of the National Commission on Product Safety are filled with testimony on eyeglass frames that burst into flame; fragile glass in storm doors that shatters and kills small children on impact; cribs that strangle infants, toys that stab them, floor grates that burn them; and ungrounded electrical appliances that electrocute their parents. Few who have seen this testimony deny that there is vast room for improvement in this field. In this complex technological world it is unreasonable to hope that all man-made hazards can be eliminated, but it seems clear that they can be greatly reduced. It is equally clear that the federal government must, at the very minimum, serve as the stimulus to industry in a sweeping program to improve the safety of its products. The commission will be making recommendations next year on how the government should fulfill its responsibility. These recommendations are awaited with great interest by industry and consumers alike.

There is hope, then, that answers will soon be forthcoming to the question, Is it safe? But that leaves untouched the two remaining consumer questions: How well does it work? How long will it last? In the areas of performance and durability, the role of the government is not nearly so well defined, and the role of standards is not nearly so well understood by consumers.

When a manufacturer buys the materials that he uses in making his products, he refers to standards. He gives the materials supplier a standard specification spelling out the performance characteristics the material must have, and he also stipulates the standard test methods that will be used to sample and test the material to insure compliance with the standard specification. When General Motors buys material from U.S. Steel, it does not rely on assurances from the steel company that the shipment will be "new and improved" with twice the active ingredient of shabby old Brand X. GM says in very hardheaded terms that the steel must meet certain specifications as to strength, hardness, ductility, corrosion resistance, or whatever property is of interest, and it must pass certain standard tests to prove it.

The interesting and little understood aspect of this transaction is that both the standard specification and standard test method were agreed upon long before it took place. They were developed by representatives of the producer (U.S. Steel), the consumer (General Motors), and most other buyers and sellers of steel in the country, working voluntarily in a committee of an organization called the American Society for Testing Materials, a nonprofit society organized just for this purpose: to develop the standards without which commerce in the materials of manufacturing and construction would be all but impossible.

This is the modus operandi of the so-called voluntary standardization system that grew up in this country at the turn of the century. The emphasis is on voluntary because the work of developing the standards is contributed voluntarily by industry, and also because use of the standards, once developed, is wholly voluntary. There is no compulsion by government either to develop or to use the standards. The main point, however, is that such compulsion is entirely unnecessary. The commercial transaction is between two industries, each of which recognizes the need for the standard, and each of which can summon the technological expertise needed to comprehend the problem, to develop the solution, and to defend its interests in arriving at a balanced consensus. The process of developing the standard, as well as the act of buying and selling, involves a confrontation between equals, and the result is a balanced standard and a fair transaction.

When we turn to the consumer market place, we find a completely different ball game. The producer (General Motors) and the consumer (you or I) no longer deal as equals. The result is that standards for performance and durability of automobiles are all but nonexistent, and the consumer is adrift in a sea of non- and misinformation. Choices must be made on the basis of advertising claims, rumors, subliminal appeals to sexual prowess, and a vacant stare under the hood.

Compared with the orderly processes of the industrial market place, the consumer market place is a scene of anarchy. Organizations such as Consumers Union do a creditable job of attempting to provide information about products that will enable the consumer to make a rational choice. But such efforts by a private organization are necessarily limited by the support that can be generated among enlightened consumers, as well as by a lack of consumer product standards. The plea now from consumer advocates is for a nation-wide, systematic program to develop standards for consumer products. There seems little doubt that this plea will eventually be answered. The key question is, will such a program be organized by industry, by government or by a cooperative effort of the two?

Foot-dragging among manufacturers is widespread. Some still cling to the ostrich principle. The problem doesn't really exist, they maintain—manufacturers flood consumers with information about their products. This yammering for consumer standards comes from a few vocal gadflies and malcontents, and if ignored it will eventually go away. The ranks of these hard-core caveat emptor types are being thinned by the encroachment of reality, but some die hard.

Other manufacturers resort to the too-many-variables ploy. The argument goes about as follows: When a new toaster, say, is carried home by the typical housewife, it is impossible to predict how she will use it, or abuse it, and therefore it is obviously impossible for the manufacturer to give her any hard assurances about how it will perform or how long it will last. Consumers are too unpredictable, service conditions too widely changeable, for the manufacturer to devise any test to simulate actual use. One of Betty Furness' favorite lines during her last months in office was to ask manufacturers why they couldn't tell her how long her washing machine was likely to last. Upon hearing this, the manufacturers would smile patronizingly and exchange words of pity over this poor woman who obviously had no concept of the very complex nature of simulated service testing, reliability, quality control and other highly technical matters.

What Miss Furness meant, of course, and what consumers all over the country would like to be told, is how long a representative sample of that model of toaster or washing machine performed in a standard test that was fairly designed to simulate average use. Everyone understands the variable nature of consumer use, but if all competing toasters are subjected to the same standard test, certainly the results would be helpful in comparing similar products and deciding which one to acquire with one's hard-earned cash.

When U.S. Steel sells a piece of steel to General Motors, no guarantee can be given as to how well that particular product will bear up under the conditions of manufacture in a given GM process. What U.S. Steel can say, however, is that similar pieces of steel performed in a given way when subjected to tests designed to simulate that process, or designed to measure properties critical to that process. Similarly, we do not ask General Motors to tell us how long our Chevrolet will run before the brakes need to be relined, because General Motors cannot possibly know our driving habits. We would like to know how long a similar model bore up in a standard road test.

But automobile manufacturers prefer to hire glittering young ladies to simper at us from our television screens while they run silken fingers along shining fenders and croon love songs to the deep-pile interiors. This is the third source of difficulty: many manufacturers prefer to compete on the basis of show biz rather than hard facts, on the theory that a few million bucks spent on high-power persuasion yields a lot more mileage than the same money invested in product quality. If it is a competitive market place, the competition is in advertising copy and television talent. Where no measure of quality exists, there can be no competition in quality.

Some manufacturers defend the status quo by pointing out that the consumer will be fooled only once, and if he is dissatisfied he will change brands. But in the absence of information about product performance, reliability or durability, how can the disgruntled buyer know that the change will be for the better? And more to the point, why should it be necessary for him to be fooled even once? Why should he not be given comparative information about competing brands so that he can make a rational choice in the first place?

An increasing number of Congressmen are asking these questions. Some believe that this shopping-information gap must be filled by an agency of the federal government. Sen. Philip A. Hart (D., Mich.), for example, has introduced a bill that would establish a National Consumer Service Foundation "to receive, assemble, evaluate, act upon, and disseminate information helpful to consumers of the United States in performing their economic function more efficiently." One of the tasks of the foundation would be to "formulate and publish standards for specific consumer products or categories of such products which will facilitate the determination of values by consumers." Senator Hart envisions a kind of super Consumers Union, linked to a huge computer system and making its vast store of information available to the shopper at the point of sale. The consumer would merely slip a quarter in a slot and out would come all the data on all competing brands.

A large and growing number of responsible manufacturers—no doubt motivated in part at least by the "threat" of government action—are attempting to persuade industry leaders that the voluntary standardization system, which has worked so well in providing the thousands of standards by which industrial products are bought and sold, must be brought to bear on the vast unsolved problem of standards for consumer products. The arguments in favor of doing this are very persuasive.

Standards development requires an enormously complex organization, foolproof procedures, and a great variety of technical skills. All these already exist in the private sector. In the technical society mentioned earlier, for example, the American Society for Testing Materials, there are more than 100 standing committees developing and perfecting standards year in and year out for thousands of materials and products used by industry. These committees are manned by the nation's foremost technical experts—the engineers and scientists in the companies engaged in producing and buying these materials and products. For an organization such as this to take on the job of developing standards for consumer products would be but a simple expansion of scope. Further, the entire operation is supported and financed by industry—no public funds are required.

On the other hand, for the government to take on the job would require the creation of an agency to duplicate this enormous reservoir of technical skills and knowledge. Such an agency would have to include technical people with expertise on every consumer product in the market place. The prospect is staggering. Even if such an organization could be created, it would be difficult for it to maintain its expertise at the needed level. In today's fast-moving technologies, this can be done most effectively as a member of the producer organization.

Most observers of the standards scene, both in and out of government, agree that this is a job that can be done most efficiently and effectively in the private sector. The voluntary system has worked well in providing industrial standards; we should find a way for it to work equally well in providing consumer standards. There are two major differences that must be accounted for, however, before this can be possible.

The first of these is the matter of consumer representation on the standards writing team. If it is an industrial standard, the consumer is an industry, and there is no problem. In the case of the steel purchase cited earlier, the consumer is General Motors Corporation, quite a formidable voice on any team. In this situation, the producer industries and consumer industries come together on an equal footing, and the chances for a consensus reflecting both points of view are excellent.

If it is a consumer standard, however, who is to voice the wishes of the consumer? Consumers are unorganized and lack the financial resources and pool of technically competent manpower necessary to engage in standards development on a par with representatives of the manufacturing industries. It has been suggested that the government fill this need, not by sending representatives from government agencies to man the committees but by contracting with competent technical consulting firms to represent the consumer interest on committees developing consumer product standards.

The second major difference between industrial and consumer standards is the matter of incentive. Given their "druthers," manufacturers on the whole would prefer that there be no standards for consumer products. They pay fervent lip service to the virtues of competition, but they are much more comfortable without it.

The present incentive that is moving some manufacturers gingerly to examine the need for consumer standards is the "consumerist" movement, now in full cry, and its attendant cloud, no bigger than a housewife's hand, that threatens to grow into the thunderhead of government domination of our nation's system of standards development. This threat must either materialize or disappear for the tension cannot be maintained indefinitely. If it materializes, the ball game is over. If it disappears, the government must then find a way to provide a permanent, effective incentive to the private sector to develop the standards so sorely needed by our nation's consumers.

The issue is joined. No bands play, no troops march. The struggle goes on quietly in Congressional staff offices, industry board rooms, and the committees of standards writing groups. Despite the lack of noise and the almost total lack of public understanding of the question, the outcome will have incalculable economic consequences for industry and consumers. The free enterprise system faces a major trial. If it fails to measure up, we will all be the losers.

Blood and Fire Against the Draft

PETER ROWLEY
Mr. Rowley has written for the New Statesman, Economist, New Republic and Catholic Digest. He is currently at work on a novel.

Burning and mutilating draft board files has grown to the point where it is a significant new development in the history of nonviolent protest. It is also becoming a rallying point for the peace movement against the war in Vietnam. As the Paris peace talks drag on and the deaths in Vietnam continue, these attacks on draft boards increase in number and nuisance value to the Selective Service System. Since 1967 there have been eleven incidents, excluding an invasion of the Dow Chemical office in March of this year in Washington, D.C., and the burning down of the draft board in Great Neck, N.Y., cause unknown.

It all started in Big Lake, Minn., when young Barry Bondhus, member of a family morally opposed to conscription but not, ironically, to this war, deposited his and his brothers' excrement, gathered in pails, on the files of his local board. He served fourteen months in jail and was immortalized, inaccurately, as a pacifist-hero in the song, The Ballad of Barry Bondhus. On October 27, 1967, four pacifists, including Rev. Philip Berrigan, poured simulated blood on files in the Baltimore Customs House. The reaction of the majority of the opponents to the war was that the Baltimore action was too "way out" to have much impact on public opinion.

Nevertheless it led to Catonsville, Md., on May 17, 1968, where another group, including Berrigan and his brother Dan the poet, burned 600 files with napalm. The actions by now were clearly Christian-oriented, and religious convictions were a keynote of the defense at the subsequent trial. On June 2, 1968, Frank Femia and Suzi Williams attacked a Boston draft board; on September 24, 1968, fourteen men burned 4,000 1-A files in Milwaukee. There then followed Washington, D.C., and on May 25, 1969, Chicago, where fifteen people immolated 50,000 files. Up to this point the assaults on draft boards were regarded "as the Catholic bag or thing by the rest of the peace movement," says Jill Boskey, one of five women who attacked thirteen New York boards in one building on July 2.

On May 21 and May 20, respectively, an induction center in Los Angeles, Calif., and a draft board in Silver Springs, Md., were struck, and these two events combined with the one in New York were carried out largely by non-Catholics, the first evidence that the nonviolent-but-violent-to-property technique was widening in its appeal. In August there were two more file-destruction incidents, both in New York, one at a Bronx draft board and another in Jamaica, Queens. So far an estimated 400,000 to 500,000 files have been affected; at least sixty-three persons, most of them in their 20s, have been charged by federal and state governments with these "crimes," and a total of sixty-five boards out of 4,000 in America have been involved, approximately 1.6 per cent. Currently only seventeen individuals are in jail. Most of them belong to the "Milwaukee fourteen" group, which includes five priests. The original bail for the fourteen was set at $450,000—a little more than $30,000 for each defendant. Under Wisconsin law, the defendants could not be admitted to bail pending appeal so that thirteen of them are now in prison (the fourteenth is to be tried separately).

What effect, if any, have these attacks had on the nation's draft boards? Officials either contend that the burnings are ineffective or admit delays and increased costs as a result of them. Like the war in Vietnam both sides have a tendency to exaggerate. In the Chicago action it was later shown that only the surface of the files was burned. In New York at what is now known as either "Women Against Daddy Warbucks" or "Ladies Day at the Draft Board," the women claim: "We tore into four pieces each file, mixed them up on the floor and removed the 102 ledgers which list the men's names, dates of birth, and order of induction." Gen. Lewis B. Hershey, the national director of Selective Service, says the actions are a serious inconvenience.

Obviously the draft board attacks have not slowed inductions because when one board is unable to meet its quota, other boards send out more "Greetings" in their areas. The federal government is spending hundreds of thousands of additional dollars to restore the files, improve security, and prosecute the offenders.

The attackers are hoping that draftees will bring legal actions against the boards affected to prevent themselves from being conscripted "out of turn." The trouble with this approach is that the courts will entertain a case only after refusal of induction, which means, if the draftee loses the case, possibly five years in prison. Injunctions against induction have not been allowed so far under the present law.

The motivation behind the attacks is complex. First and foremost is hatred of the Vietnamese conflict. There is frustration because of the seemingly ineffectiveness of more conventional protests, such as demonstrations and "within the system" political activity. Mark Rudd, the SDS leader who led the Columbia University uprisings, says: "Anyone can take a building, but to walk in and deface draft records, well, that takes a lot of courage."

The first stage of protest, as different from the current nonreligious one, was based on religious ideals. One of the District of Columbia nine, Joe O'Rourke, says: "Catholics coming from a power-oriented and corrupt organization were well suited to attack monolithic systems." It was strong personal conviction that enabled them to face public and police hostility. The Milwaukee Journal headlined, MILWAUKEE 14 FAIL IN BID TO WIN PUBLIC SYMPATHY.

The opposition of the young to the military-industrial complex is an increasingly important factor. Two of the New York draft board attackers told me, "We don't want to be trapped into the system our parents were." There are also more personal motives. Someone connected with these incidents said: "The Marxists and Maoists in the New Left accuse us of heroics and being elitists. However, they too have their own small cadres. We're also accused of masochism and martyrdom and self-destruction. There is some slight truth to this. In any case you cannot help but have a few neurotics in a movement like this. Belligerence against the world is a slight factor too. Proving one's manhood is also a motive."

The draft board assaults are, as their New Left opponents charge, individualistic. But this is their strength, for there is proof—visible to the eye—that the action has had an effect unlike the mass demonstrations of Berkeley or Chicago, which at least in immediate terms, produce only broken heads and no change in the political system. An article in Commonweal, the Catholic weekly, calls them "a sort of theater of literal effects." They are, then, means by which young men and women can attack a tiny part of the system they oppose, a dramatic way of publicizing the peace movement, and a source of encouragement to radical leftists. Whether they increase in frequency depends on the progress of the Paris peace talks and the future of the draft.

DEFINING THE FUTURE

GERALD FEINBERG

Mr. Feinberg, professor of physics at Columbia University, is the author of The Prometheus Project: Mankind's Search for Long-Range Goals (Doubleday).

The past few years have brought an enormous upsurge of interest in the future. This is evinced by many scholarly and popular books and articles that have been published dealing with aspects of our yet hypothetical future. A further indication is the formation of various organizations, missions and other groups in different parts of the world to study the future, either as a whole, or in part. While there is a long history of concern with the subject, especially in imaginative literature, the serious attention being given today by academic intellectuals to prophecy, and the support of their activities by such power centers as government and industry, is novel, unless one considers as a precedent the royal support of fortunetellers in other ages.

There are several understandable sources for this new concern with what is to be. One is the recognition that societies have changed in many ways from those of the recent past. Since the forces which produced these changes may operate to produce still more, we are impelled to try to identify such prospective changes before they occur in order that we may better be able to deal with them.

Another source of interest in the future is the purely intellectual desire to achieve a greater understanding of more of the world. Predicting the future is particularly attractive to social scientists for this reason; through it they test their theories, which cannot generally be done by setting up controlled experiments, as natural scientists do. Furthermore, since it is generally accepted that providing explanations for known facts is not nearly as critical a test for a theory as is predicting yet unobserved phenomena, prediction of the future is a better proving ground for theories about society than is historical explanation.

A particular attitude toward the future, which is both unjustified and inopportune, has often been the result of this prophetic approach. The implicit assumption in many recent studies has been that the future, like the past, is a fixed condition which we should try to understand, rather than an undetermined state which we can try to influence. This is unjustified because what will happen at any time in the future is not yet fixed but depends on what will happen in the period between now and then. It is inopportune because more and more of what happens in the world is subject to human intervention and control, so that more than ever before we have the power to determine the future, rather than to prophesy it. Given this rapidly developing power, the result of what we have learned about the world and ourselves, we should be more concerned with choosing what future we want than with divining what providence or blind chance has in store. We should recognize that to an ever increasing extent, the future is what we make it.

It is sometimes argued that we should avoid determining the future in order to leave open as many options as possible for generations yet unborn. It is difficult to make sense of this view because our actions will influence the future whether or not we wish them to. Since the environment that men inhabit is now to a large extent man made, the lives of future men will be shaped by actions of today. Thus, if we care about the future at all, the choice is between doing what we can to make things come out in a way we think best, or allowing them to result from random actions. Unless one believes that things will work out for the best whether or not we intervene, the choice seems obvious. If man does not take care of his own future, then nothing or no one will do it for him.

Of course, it is impossible for us to determine the future completely or to predict it with complete accuracy. The lives of individuals or of small groups depend on too many special features for them to be fixed in any real detail ahead of time. However, the general features of a society, which characterize the lives of most or all of its members, can be more easily decided by actions taken in advance. Examples of these common features are the biological nature of people, the technological abilities of the society, the political system, etc. Obviously, these factors play very important roles in defining the lives of the people in a society, but do not determine their lives completely. It is such general aspects of life that I shall be referring to when I write about choosing our future.

The recognition that the future is ours to determine is especially important in view of the possibilities for drastic changes in man and his society that come from our advanced technology. One familiar aspect of this is that through technology, we have or soon will have the potential to do things that can affect our environment very substantially. For example, the energy generated by man on earth is well on the way to becoming a measurable fraction of that coming to the earth from the sun. This situation, if it develops much further, could easily have a large and probably detrimental effect on the earth's overall climate. On the other hand, the new energy sources available to us through nuclear reactions afford us the possibility of making positive changes in the environment on a grand scale, such as massive desalting of the sea water.

Probably even more important and novel than such possibilities for environmental changes are the possibilities for altering the functioning of man himself that are being opened up to us by developments in biology and psychology. These developments are likely to be more important because they affect man more directly and because man is what matters most to himself. They are more novel because our ability to influence the way our bodies and minds work—when compared to what we can do with the rest of nature—has been quite limited in the past.

Major perturbations on our society have already been produced by such developments in these areas as the introduction of effective contraceptives or of drugs that affect the mind, like LSD. These innovations are the beginning of what our increased knowledge of biology and psychology is going to make possible. We are now gaining the scientific knowledge necessary to do biological engineering, that is, the design of biological organisms, including human beings, so that certain of their functions can be better performed. Some examples of what may be possible, that have been discussed by scientists working in these fields, include advance determination of the traits of children by direct gene manipulation, electrical transmission of information to the brain without going through the senses, and even the elimination of aging and death. Unexpected developments may well be even more spectacular than these. Man may soon have the ability to make himself biologically what he wants—and the question then will become, what does he want to be?

In view of the almost universal dissatisfaction with various aspects of the human condition, we may reasonably infer that men will choose to utilize some of their new powers to modify themselves. If we do choose to use the technological fruits of scientific advance to change man, we must realize that our social institutions will have to change accordingly, since they have for the most part been developed to reflect the existing biological character of man and might not be appropriate under new circumstances. For example, the elimination of aging and death, or even a substantial increase in the active life span, would suggest changes in almost every aspect of our present-day society. These include education, marriage, seniority, retirement procedures, inheritance and all the other consequences of a limited life span. While a new society that would be appropriate to the new condition could doubtless be built, it would be very different from our own. It is probable that the changes in society that could result from the use of biological engineering would be much more radical and thoroughgoing than any in previous history.

The potentiality for such world-shaking changes in man and society through technological innovation is not confined to biological engineering. It is implicit in many other areas where there have been major technological advances. Another such area is computer technology, which has raised the possibility of creating artificial intelligence comparable to human intelligence, and also of a world without need for human work. Still another would be the establishment of radio contact with an intelligent extraterrestrial species and the possibility of detailed communication with it.

The practical realization of any one of these possibilities should involve us in a careful examination of its long-term consequences before it is put into operation. If they all occur, the need for this becomes even more critical.

If such an examination is to be done rationally, we must know how to predict the consequences of our actions, and we must know what we want to accomplish. If we are unable or unwilling to think through qualitatively the long-range effects of technological innovations singly or in combination, then even with the best of intentions we may end up producing a world which neither we nor our descendants find desirable or even livable. While this could also happen without our intervention, it would be an ultimate tragedy if we engineer it ourselves.

The ability to make long-range predictions of the consequences of our actions is not well developed at present. The intellectual problems involved here are very similar to those that have come up in the attempts mentioned earlier to predict the future. The main difference is the element of considering alternative choices for innovation, rather than guessing what unique things might happen. It would therefore seem logical to extend the scope of some future studies in this direction to see what kind of world may arise, if we can and do make specific technological innovations. Through this type of study we might get some idea, by comparing different predictions, of the variations that might occur in the actual situation. However, I believe that we will have to develop new intellectual methods for dealing with the extremely complex system that is human society in order that long-range planning may be accurate. These new methods will very likely involve the widespread use of high-speed computers. Some progress in this direction has already been made in the fields of systems analysis and related disciplines, but this is only a beginning. The detailed understanding and accurate prediction of the behavior of complex systems is a problem that occurs, and is unsolved, in almost all branches of science, and it is reasonable to expect that methods to do this will eventually be developed in some branch, and will then find general applications. Perhaps the need for long-range extrapolation of technological innovation will act as an important spur to do this quickly.

The development of methods for accurate long-range forecasting is the major intellectual problem that must be solved before we can rationally determine our future. But even if that is accomplished, we will still face the decision of what we want the future to be. We may think of our increased technological ability as a vehicle that can transport us, and the ability to do long-range forecasts as a road map that tells us where we can go, but we still must choose where it is that we want to go before setting out.

It is clear that when we are able to make fundamental changes in the way things are, we should try to figure out how we want them to be before committing ourselves to the changes. It is, however, not at all clear what mankind actually wants itself and its world to be. The answers given to this question by ancient religions and philosophies are flawed by the lack of understanding on the part of their propounders of the essential discoveries of modern science. Since these discoveries have had a major effect on our picture of the world and man's place in it, it is natural that we should reconsider our goals in the light of this knowledge. But this has generally not been done in modern times when most social thinkers have been committed to a program of amelioration of immediate troubles and to a concern for short-range problems. It is as true for revolutionist as for evolutionist and for conservative thinkers that they have paid little heed to where mankind was eventually going. Furthermore, most such thinkers have thought of the biological aspect of man as fixed and considered how man could be changed by changing society, rather than inversely. Their pronouncements are therefore not especially useful in the coming situation in which man will be biologically and psychologically malleable.

What is needed is a new consideration by mankind of what, in the broadest sense, it wants to be. The limitations imposed on us by the laws of nature are very wide and there is reason to believe that we can accomplish almost anything we wish, although these laws may require us to use methods different from any we might have imagined necessary to accomplish some particular end. However, the attainment of one particular aim automatically precludes others, that could equally well have been done but no longer can be. We must therefore choose what long-term goals mankind wishes to achieve. Such a choice of goals that we will work toward would establish general principles which could be used to guide the many short-term decisions that we will need to make in determining the nearby future. These principles could help also in establishing priorities among the many activities that compete for our attention. Without such principles, the implementation of our technological advances will be done blindly, and we will have reason to despair of the ultimate outcome. With them, we will be doing our best to create a world better than anything that has been before or that would occur without our conscious effort.

How then are we to choose our goals and who is to make the choice? The only satisfactory answer is that we all must choose together, for the future is everybody's business. There has been a long-term historical trend both in ideology and in actuality toward more democratic participation in societal decision-making processes, and as a result men will want to have a role in deciding the future. Since the aspects of the future that we are focusing on can eventually affect the whole human race, it seems reasonable to plan these aspects in terms of the human race, rather than any limited branch of it. Although there are obvious differences in the present lives of the people of the world, it is just when we are considering major changes in our way of life that these differences are least important. For example, it may not be necessary for the underdeveloped countries to reach the technological level of developed countries before their people go to the stage beyond, along with those in developed countries.

When considering choices that will affect the whole human race, it is essential that the widest possible group of people be involved in making them. The contrary notion, that such choices should be made by some elite group or groups, with special qualifications of intellect or knowledge, entails a misunderstanding of the problem. Intellectual considerations play their crucial role in the preliminary determination of what it is possible to achieve, and in the process of figuring out how to achieve the goals that have been chosen. There is no reason to require that everyone participate in these processes, but the choice of what we want is more a matter of feeling than of intellect. In matters of feeling, there are no special qualifications; each man has feelings which can contribute toward the reaching of a consensus. To rely on some elite group—because of superior knowledge or expertise—to make the choices that properly belong to all, is to commit the old philosophical error of assuming a parallel between ethical and factual statements, which actually does not exist.

We must thus develop a program through which all concerned men can participate in the determination of what the human race wishes to make of itself and of its world. It is essential, though extremely difficult, to avoid as much as possible, entangling this program with the political and social divisions that play such an important role in the contemporary world. There are many aspects of the future that are of common interest to all men, whatever their political persuasion. It would be a salutary step to determine and publicize fundamental positive areas of mutual interest that men could work for together. If this could be done, it would in itself tend to diminish the apparent importance of those matters that divide men, and in that way would contribute to insuring that the human race survives to have a future.

Obviously, to carry out such a program involves immense difficulties and will require the creation of entirely new institutions through which the mutual consultation and interaction between people can be channeled. But even more than this, it requires a recognition on the part of enough people that such an effort is needed, and their dedication to setting up means by which it can begin. Given that dedication, then means to implement it can surely be worked out.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Persistence of Liberalism

THE END OF LIBERALISM: Ideology, Policy, and the Crisis of Public Authority. By Theodore J. Lowi. W. W. Norton & Co. 322 pp. $6.95. Paper $2.50.

HENRY S. KARIEL

Mr. Kariel is professor of political science at the University of Hawaii, member of the executive committee of the Caucus for a New Political Science, and author of, among others, The Promise of Politics (Prentice-Hall) and Open Systems: Arenas for Political Action (F. E. Peacock).

It is so much an American convention to regard politics as a struggle for power over scarce material resources that an alternative conception is virtually unthinkable. Following the dominant ideology, you engage in political action so as to realize some quite definite objective, so as to get something tangible out of it. If you go into politics at all—and even voting is a partial entry—it is to reap some reward, something which, when all goes well, will serve to enrich your private life. You electioneer, cast a ballot, lobby, and even occupy public office in order to make the laws favor you, or at least to keep them from doing you harm. The rewards lie not in the process but in some calculable results. The process itself is no meaningful substitute for victory. It is but a means to an end.

Because most candidates and bills are defeated, the political process seems to consist of a succession of painful experiences which, so we have been led to believe, only the few are prepared to bear. Nothing is gained, according to the prevailing conception, by someone who merely perceives new interests, publicly displays them, and succeeds in bringing them into a precarious state of balance. Only future generations or invisible interests are gratified by such balancing acts. There would seem to be so few rewards and pleasures in the process of politicking that it is incredible anyone should aspire to engage in it at all.

So far, American political science has done little to make credible an alternative conception of politics. True, Murray Edelman, Robert J. Pranger and a few others have pointed to its expressive aspects, recognizing political participation as a form of symbolic action, treating it as the most comprehensive of the performing arts. But at the center of the discipline, politics is seen in "realistic" terms as a mode of behavior in which individuals—to the extent that they are rational—strive to maximize their power. In widely respected theory, the citizen remains the economic man who has learned from Federalist No. 10 that he is driven by private ambition and that he will find it in his self-interest to enter the political market place, there to strike what bargains he must to extract what he can.

This astringent ideology—the model of liberalism patented by Hobbes, Adam Smith, Hume and Madison—was ultimately to be qualified by the theory of pluralism. Sovereign individuals were replaced by sovereign groups: the new theory exalts a self-regulating process of interest-group competition. Theodore Lowi's The End of Liberalism makes clear in considerable detail what is entailed when this interest-group liberalism, as he aptly calls it, is taken seriously, when it becomes the public philosophy legitimizing governmental policies.

Subjecting public policies to analysis, Professor Lowi shows that while government organized on the basis of interest-group liberalism can respond to social needs by activating itself, it cannot coordinate and focus its efforts. It cannot plan. Its power, though massive and dynamic, is delegated, dispersed, diffused, and ultimately exhausted. Congress may wish to direct television broadcasters to act in specified ways; but, unable clearly to articulate its wish, it will delegate power to the FCC which, in turn, succumbs to the needs of the most established sector of the broadcasting industry. While governmental power is thus emasculated, private power is enhanced. Policy objectives being undefined at the center of government, they are "informally" interpreted at the margins of the administrative process—and erode. Institutions of popular control atrophy; old structures of privilege are maintained; and adjustment to new social pressures is retarded. A pluralistic system—one within which public policy originates at the top of private hierarchies of power—operates against the emergence of those laws which might give form and focus to common enterprises. As a result, domestic policy is characterized by drift and deadlock whereas foreign policy remains a sequence of incoherent ad hoc reactions unconvincingly rationalized by programmatic rhetoric. The problems posed by inner-city ghettos, racial conflict, income inequality and international anarchy fail to be met within the framework of interest-group liberalism.

Given this diagnosis, Lowi's remedy is so obvious as to almost suggest itself: to him it seems imperative to firm up. We must recover our respect for formal institutions, uphold clearly articulated law, and get back to explicit standards. To regain our balance, we must rehabilitate what Professor Lowi calls alternatively "democratic formalism" and "juridical democracy."

That his prescription—basically his plea for formalizing the procedures of government—should suggest a return to traditional constitutional principles is not surprising, for he furnishes himself with no theory for transcending the present state of affairs. His work assuredly demonstrates what is entailed in practice when we continue to accept the ideology of liberalism as authoritative. Yet he offers no words—no dialectic—which put the depicted results in jeopardy. Held in check by the gritty diction of political science, he hardly expands our knowledge of political possibilities or challenges the dominant understanding of the meaning of our public life. Characterizing his plea as "radical reform," he hopes for the restoration of the rule of law.

It is likely, however, that our public predicaments are more basic than Lowi's approach allows us to recognize, that we are confronted by romantic insurgents in society who insist on calling attention to emotional resources which "the rule of law" as conventionally defined scarcely accommodates. Reacting to Madisonian constitutionalism, to Robert's Rules of Order, to a plate-glass and plastic civilization, and ultimately to all rationality and discipline, they are prepared to blow the whole show. So far, the rest of us have displayed neither the will nor the wit to entertain a political formula capacious enough to include advocates of willful spontaneity as well as fanatics hysterically lashing back. Until we do, treatises such as Lowi's are at best an impassioned parade of facts followed by ingenious analysis. They cannot provide us with the vision to move beyond our current maladies toward a community within which increasingly more interests are integrated without being assimilated—that is, esteemed for what they are.

The limits of Professor Lowi's work may help make clear that the problem of the practitioners of contemporary political science is to find it within themselves to adopt perspectives—models, metaphors, languages, forms—which might impel them to perceive the unacknowledged dimensions of the romantic impulse in society. Confined by the dominant ideology, haunted by the specter of Jacobinism, political scientists continue to look for the worst and find it: the triumph of the will, social convulsion, formless power. They have yet to acknowledge potentialities dramatized by writers from Rousseau to Malraux, revealing that the worst promises the best: dedication, loyalty, courage, nerve, vitality, idealism, compassion. Of course they will discover no final formula which might tell us how much romanticism—how many eccentric interests—can safely be injected into the channels of politics. But they may reveal that our common life would be enriched were we capable of bringing outsiders into the present balance of interests, were we psychologically and economically prepared to enlarge politics by including those apolitical men whose very posture is a protest against the lack of community.

Although Lowi's perspective includes those not now engaged politically, it does so only in part. It fails to appreciate them as carriers of experiences and styles which it may profit insiders to recognize, which would make politics less conventional, at once more difficult and more pleasurable to bear—provided we can bear new forms at all. It fails to incorporate men who hunger for community, mutual respect, recognition, intimacy, sincerity and idealism. Until we find the words which might make it legitimate for men who are frustrated and frantic to share the pleasures of participation, to bring their impulses under control and gain in composure, we will remain dumbfounded victims of the situation depicted by Professor Lowi. We will experience the crisis to which the subtitle of his book refers, but will not grasp its meaning and cannot come to terms with it.

That Lowi fails to expand our political consciousness can hardly be held against him. Nor can he be blamed for his repetitive style or patronizing illustrations. He is, after all, a political scientist offering an analysis which must attract at least those who assign reading to undergraduates. For them, he has provided an innovative text—readable, engagingly opinionated, efficiently organized, likely to sell. He is sensitive to the established facts, the rules rather than the exceptions, the decisions made rather than losses suffered. In view of the commitments of his professional discipline, it would be perverse to expect him to have offered the saving metaphors by which poets establish new realities, making others aware of lives they fail to live, of a politics they might yet experience.

Hung Up on Immortality

THE KINGDOM AND THE POWER: The Story of the Men Who Influence the Institution that Influences the World. By Gay Talese. The New American Library. 555 pp. $10.

FRED POWLEDGE

Mr. Powledge used to write for The New York Times, reporting on race relations. He is the author of Black Power-White Resistance (World), and is now working on a book about cities, particularly New Haven, Conn., for Simon & Schuster.

Ordinarily, when a book comes along about some giant of the journalism industry, it is a painful and embarrassing experience. Such books are usually authorized versions, and they are generally awful: they are obvious and heavy-handed attempts to reflect with perfect fidelity the publisher's image of himself and his institution. Every ordinary executive seems bigger and wiser than life, and the publisher seems the biggest and wisest of them all; every hapless reporter who stumbles into a natural disaster is a hero; every anecdote serves to reinforce the institution's concept of itself as a place where fine and only moderately eccentric men work lovingly at low pay for the privilege of being turned on by the hum of presses. These books go into journalism school libraries and copies of them are given, along with pamphlets explaining the pension plan, to new staffers, who, fortunately, never have the time to read them.

Gay Talese's book on The New York Times breaks that rule, and it breaks it magnificently. Not only has he explained the pre-eminent institution of an industry that ordinarily resists having itself explained: he has explained it in readable, understandable, even exciting terms.

Talese, who for ten years was a staffer for the Times, and who now is a free lance, did his work without authorization but with a great amount of cooperation from individuals at the Times. (New employees are given copies of The Story of The New York Times, by the late Meyer Berger, for their authoritative version of the paper's history. It is a thorough and competent book and perhaps the best of its sort, but it is authorized.)

In his author's note, Talese says he is trying to produce "a human history of an institution in transition, a book that would tell more about the men who report the news than the news they report . . . the internal scenes and confrontations and adjustments that are part of the vitality and growth of any enduring institution."

Now that amounts to a formidable undertaking, considering the vastness, complexity, and secretiveness of the institution of journalism in general and of the Times in particular. And such an effort comes at a time when the institution is indeed in transition, when the public and the craftsmen inside the business seem to be asking more and more about the relevance and the fitness of the business and about the immunity from criticism, regulation and involvement that it has been enjoying for so long.

The Times is hung up on immortality. It is at the same time an enormous bureaucratic institution, with all the troubles of such institutions, and the best piece of daily journalism that we have. Its editors and reporters and publisher are profoundly concerned with a desire for their work to shape the nation and the world, and most of all to endure. Sometimes, quite naturally, they translate all this into their own personal desire to endure. And so, quite often, the editors and executives often forget that they all work for the same outfit. The inner conflicts and passions of these men are beautifully documented in The Kingdom and the Power. It is no less than a landmark in the field of writing about journalism.

During the last few years, Talese writes, there has been "a quiet revolution" going on within the Times, a revolution "distinguished for its tactics and intrigue." Talese then proceeds to examine and explain that revolution—but not as an exposé, for, while the struggle for power at the Times may be fierce, it is carried on by gentlemen and it rarely is naked. He explains it in terms of the humanity and the fallibility of the men who made, and are making, the revolution—and some who dropped out along the way.

There is James Reston, the repository of so much of the Times's power down at the Washington bureau, "a poor boy to whom America had indeed been a land of opportunity," and who thus developed "a gratitude, a patriotism that made him a better convert than a critic." There is Clifton Daniel, an "almost lovely" man who, as managing editor, lost a crucial battle to Reston. There is A. M. Rosenthal, the distinguished foreign correspondent who came home to shake up the metropolitan news staff, and who got shaken up a bit himself by the somewhat vicious reactions of the older staffers to his proposed reforms, but who has survived and who seems likely to keep on surviving. (This summer there were several "promotions" at the Times, and Rosenthal got Daniel's job.)

There is Harrison Salisbury (my own favorite character in all these struggles), a man seen often in the middle distance, carefully, quietly observing others' struggles, taking notes, remembering: "He had spent much of his career writing about Russian purges and plots, power politics and executive intrigue, the ups and downs of commissars, and he was a master at bureaucratic gamesmanship." And behind it all, the big, silent, red-faced Mississippian, Turner Catledge, about whom Talese writes perhaps the most, and explains the least, for Catledge is a vastly powerful but mysterious man at the Times, and it is possible that one of the reasons for his power is that less powerful men do not know how much power he has or where it comes from.

And Tom Wicker and Lester Markel, John Phillips, the early Ochses and Sulzbergers, and the later ones, and Abe Raskin, Herbert Matthews, John Oakes, Claude Sitton, Homer Bigart, Craig Claiborne, David Halberstam, Charlotte Curtis, J. Anthony Lukas and John Corry, each of them far more interesting than, say, the rise and fall of the Western edition, although Talese covers that, too.

Some readers may become nervous over Talese's technique of telling you what all these characters were thinking: The paper was "like an elephant, Catledge thought"; Reston "saw himself locked in a debate with his colleagues in New York. . . ." Perhaps it should be explained that the people with whom Talese is dealing are so involved in the immortality of their institution, and in their own immortality (for most of them, personal immortality only means leaving their personal stamp on their immortal institution), that it is perfectly reasonable to assume that these men granted the author as much time as he needed, as much access to their inner thoughts and fears as he wanted, all in the interests of immortality.

The immortality of The New York Times, and of the people who work for it, seems to be seriously in doubt right now, and that is another reason why Talese's book is so valuable. For so long, now, the newspaper has been accepted at face value by so many important people. It was, as Talese puts it, a "necessary proof of the world's existence, a barometer of its pressure, an assessor of its sanity." But in recent years the barometer seems to be leaking. People who never questioned the Times are finding it, like most other institutions, inadequate. It was one thing to read in the Times about the Southern sheriffs and to feel compassion and send money to Martin Luther King; now, the Times reader can often see the confrontations with his own eyes, on his own block, or perhaps in Grand Central Station, and what he sees is frequently at odds with what he reads the next day.

The paper has not properly reported the troubles of the cities. It certainly has not approached the comprehensive job that a single staffer, now gone, Claude Sitton, did in the South in the mid-sixties. The Times did a glorious job not long ago of reporting financial shortages in New York City's poverty program, but it did little to explain the program back when it was starting and when it was going through its crucial period of organization. It could be argued that the program might not have fallen into such despair if the Times had paid it the sort of attention all along that it routinely pays to, say, the arrival of buyers, Joe Namath, or the antics of Charlotte Curtis' little gaggle of social people.

The Times gave one side of the Columbia University uprising, but its sensitivity failed when confronted with the other. One of its finest reporters, Tony Lukas, wrote a moving article about a girl who had fled comfortable suburban life in Greenwich, Conn., for the hippie scene in Greenwich Village, and who was murdered there; Lukas won a Pulitzer Prize for it. It remained for Esquire to see the need for a story about the poor, unprivileged boy who was murdered with her and to ask Lukas to write it.

It was as if the issues of black alienation in the North, youthful distrust of the older generations, and the radicalization of young and old had somehow been too much for the Times. It did foolish things: it joined with the rest of white business in explaining the lack of black faces in the newsroom with the moan that "we can't find any qualified ones." Then, when it finally did start hiring more than a token or two, the paper became uptight when one of them acted like a white reporter. Eager to prove his value and to carve out some kind of nonracial identity in the vast newsroom, he wrote stories that were later to be classified as fantasy. He left the paper (at the Times, few people are fired), and for a long time afterward it was obvious that the next "one" would have to be superhumanly "responsible."

The Times upgraded a fine, sharp, but somewhat scroungy looking copy boy to reporter and wanted him to report on the youthful revolt, but it also sent him to Brooks Brothers on his lunch hour, with an advance on his next week's salary, to buy a suit. The Times decided, three and a half years ago, that the big story was the troubles of the cities, and a meeting of editors and reporters was convened to discuss this idea, and race relations was not mentioned in the metropolitan editor's list of priorities.

Perhaps one reason for all this is that no newspaper, not even the best that we have, could do an adequate job of reporting and interpreting such rapidly developing social change. Maybe no institution at all could summon such sensitivity; certainly the institutions of education, politics, labor and the postal service have failed to keep up. But no good newspaper man would ever admit that his craft was incapable of adapting itself to the changing society. A more likely answer is that many of those who were in positions of authority at the Times, or who were on their way up the editorial ladders, were not devoting enough of their energies to being newspaper men. They were dissipating too much of their energies on watching Harrison Salisbury to see if he were watching them: and in speculating on Tom Wicker's fate: and in cataloguing who was going in and out of E.C. Daniel's office. And, being preoccupied with these diversions, they were unable or unwilling to take on the risks and controversies involved in reporting completely and fearlessly on social movements that were becoming increasingly neither black nor white, becoming increasingly more complex and demanding than dirigible explosions and Presidential news conferences.

Talese does not attempt to resolve questions such as these, and some may consider this a fault. I do not think so. If he had entered this vast and relatively unexplored territory (explored only by the reporters, over beer, at Gough's Chop House after the deadlines, and by furious and generally uninformed writers in Ramparts and The Village Voice), the book would have lost some of its timeless, surgically clean quality.

What Talese does do, and does so well, is provide sufficient background information, and provide it in never-boring abundance so that an informed reader can, for the first time, do his own interpretive reporting on The New York Times.

Talese quotes a Times staffer who told Adolph Ochs, in 1916, on the occasion of the staffer's resignation, that "the Times was so well and solidly made that there was almost nothing an individual could do to it." The staffer was going to the Herald Tribune, which was not so solidly made.

A few years ago, Gay Talese was sitting at his desk halfway back in the huge city room, watching the deadlines go past (for he had no major assignment that day), talking with a group of other young reporters, as usual, about working on the Times.

Their conclusion was that there was very little an individual could do to the Times. They complained that whatever creativity they had was being ground out of them by the huge, impersonal system that produced a newspaper every day, and they complained about all the energy that was wasted on playing the power game, and they talked, as young reporters always do, of going to the Herald Tribune (it was alive then and still not solid) and writing a column better than Jimmy Breslin, or of free lancing. And they talked of their reluctance to leave the Times. It is difficult to leave the best of something, to turn in the fluorescent police pass and the Air Travel Card and the knowledge that big, important men will return your telephone calls.

Of that group that evening, all are now gone from the city room. One of them died, unexpectedly, after resigning to write a novel. Two went to magazines. Two are free lancing, and Gay Talese is one of those. He was able to do something to the Times, after he left it, to tell some of the truth about the men who run it, and for that the Times should be thankful.

Report of a Repentant Symposiast

GEORGE P. ELLIOTT
Mr. Elliott's most recent book is a collection of poems, From the Berkeley Hills (Harper & Row).

After a symposium, those who are simply polite look at you sympathetically and half smile; the polite for whom even a little hypocrisy is a great strain cast their unhappy glances anywhere but at you; the polite and kind murmur "very interesting, very stimulating," or even valiantly take issue with one of your points for a minute or two. There are also the impolite.

Last year after a symposium, a young caught me at the Party After and, writhing in an agony of embarrassment, blurted at me, "Why did you do it?" The true answer, I suppose, was vanity, but I was not about to say this to a stranger: I don't go in for cocktail confessions much. Besides, I'd guessed ahead of time that this was likely to be a bad evening —the topic, the occasion, the symposiasts, all had promised the tedious disaster we'd just been in; and knowingly to participate thus in public folly implies a vanity too depraved to dump on even a rude young under such circumstances. Anyhow, I'd also come to this bash out of a sort of loyalty to an editor, paying off an old debt, a fact which was none of the young's business. The decibels in the room were approaching the five-jackhammer level. "Money!" I shouted. "Money? But you can't need the money." "No, but I like it." He writhed away. My special, campy (i.e., perverted), secret satisfaction came from knowing that I'd be clearing less than $50 from this turn; at least he hadn't asked how much money and so spoiled my anti-nonjoke. After the Party After, thinking about this episode, I felt like something out of Susan Sontag; and believe me, whoever you are, I don't enjoy feeling like something out of Susan Sontag.

Once, years ago, at a regional meeting of the MLA in Seattle, I was on a good symposium. Somehow, the demon in charge of keeping symposiums lousy had been negligent: things went well for us. Everybody stayed on the subject, which is nearly unheard of; odder yet, the subject was worth staying on. It wasn't The Future of the Novel, or The Function of Drama Today, or Form and Content in Modernist Poetry. It was defined by a critical essay, the first chapter of Sheldon Sacks's then unpublished book Fiction and the Shape of Belief, which the five symposiasts and the audience of seventy had read ahead of time. The essay was intelligent, disputatious and moral, and the subject mattered to us all. We enjoyed that fine sort of intellectual intercourse in which things worth listening to get said. But, as I mentioned, the demon had fallen down on his job, in a way and to a degree I have not detected in him before or since. Nearly always, the question to be asked about a symposium is how bad?

The least bad one I have been on was rigged. A dear friend and I were invited to be on a symposium with one moderator and no other symposiasts. Seeing our chance, we unscrupulously plotted between ourselves to pay no attention to the subject or to whatever the moderator might say, but to continue in public our years-long argument, most of the terms and twists of which we knew well by then. Our collusion fooled the demon all right, though the inconsecutiveness between our argument and the moderator's comments made for some mighty rough bumps. As we were leaving the Party After, our host professor, whom we had known for several years, said, "I want you to know that was the best symposium I was ever at, and I sure have seen some bad ones in my time." Post symposiasm, omnia intellectual tristem est.

The worst one I've ever been on—or maybe the next worst, it's hard to make these delicate discriminations—took place at St. Mary's College (California) where such things had never been known before. No two of the four of us talked on the same subject (The State of Literature in America, or some such ilk, had been announced). Alfred Kazin, the symposiarch for the occasion, droned a passage from a book he was writing. I droned a passage from a book I was not writing. Evan Connell, who had never talked in public before, talked to the 500 before us, and has never done it again. Herb Gold, who is defter at the craft of symposiastry than anyone else I know, said nothing wittily for ten minutes. His joke that day was to begin, "There are three respects in which. First we see that." And all the earnest coed pencils flashed. But there was no second, no third. Pretty little foreheads puckered, pencils drooped, heads leaned and touched, they gave up. Then came questions from the floor, and the wrangle. The next day, a student on the committee which had perpetrated the occasion said to my best friend on the faculty, "Wasn't it awful?" "Absolutely disgraceful." "I can't understand how they could have done such a thing. . . . Let's have another."

Which poses the question I could not even conjecture an answer to for years: why do people arrange and throng to symposiums? To learn something? Plainly sentimental of me. Sheer masochism? Perhaps, but hopelessly vague.

I narrowed this down to one manifestation of the common American urge to be cheated, the urge which advertising exploits in a myriad of ways—50 Girls Count Them 50—and which is as good an explanation for the popularity of pornography, for the chicness of voyeurism, as I know. But this cheat-me urge, though it seems to be important all right, baffles me. I keep looking for another explanation so as not to be stuck with this utterly perverse insanity. I've come up with a pretty good one.

The lousiest symposium I ever witnessed took place at Buffalo a few years ago. David Posner was the moderator. Robert Creeley was on it. Snodgrass was standing in for Randall Jarrell, and Robert Graves for Hugo Williams. Appropriately enough, Marshall McLuhan happened to be in town at the time, for this poets' symposium had no real content but the symposiasts themselves. Posner, who was handsome, profiled to nonexistent TV cameras. Creeley mumbled Philip Roth's Portnoy.

Jane Jacobs' cities.
William H. Gass's Holocaust.
Stanley Kauffmann's Times.
Eric Salzman's music.

And now Kate Millett's Sexual Politics.

From NEW AMERICAN REVIEW #1, where Portnoy announced his complaint and Stanley Kauffmann explored his experience as drama critic for the New York Times, to NEW AMERICAN REVIEW #6, where William H. Gass previewed his extraordinary new novel, where Jane Jacobs explained why our cities stagnate, and composer-critic Eric Salzman why our music has revived, NAR subscribers have been finding that their serious reading catches up with them.

Appraising NAR #5 in the Washington Post, Geoffrey Wolff wrote: "NEW AMERICAN REVIEW, under the direction of Theodore Solotaroff, continues to thrive, continues to discover and print poems, essays, stories and fragments of novels that are among the best work of our time, much of it by heretofore unknown writers. If the NEW AMERICAN REVIEW has a single signature, it is one of complex and aggressive honesty."

NAR #7 — "the freshness of youth."

The lead piece in the new NAR is probably the most provocative essay we've yet published. It's called "Sexual Politics: Miller, Mailer, and Genet": its author is Kate Millett, a young woman who combines a mean wit with a radical feminist point of view. Subjecting two passages of erotic description by Norman Mailer and Henry Miller to line-by-line analysis, Miss Millett coolly hoists these two "liberated" males by the petards of their own prose. She goes on to argue that much more awareness of the oppressive realities of heterosexual striving and strife can be found, paradoxically enough, in the homosexual world of Jean Genet. This is an essay that will be talked about — heatedly — for a long time to come.

Other examples of "complex and aggressive honesty" in NAR #7 are:

Rosalyn Drexler's "Like . . . ," a backhanded love story from the contemporary underground; "Illumination Rounds," Michael Herr's extraordinary reportage of the surreal warfare in Vietnam; and "Don't You Wish You Were Dead," a shattering story about three disturbed boys, by L. Woiwode.

That would be more than enough for one issue of any journal. But NEW AMERICAN REVIEW is not just any journal. There are also two richly speculative essays by William H. Gass and Benjamin DeMott; timely, articulate verse by 13 poets; five short stories by new writers; and a lengthy, hard-hitting editorial on the current "New York" influence on American writing.

As the advance reviewer in Publishers' Weekly remarked: "One might expect NAR to be showing a few signs of age, but this new issue has the freshness of youth as well as an enviable technical polish."

Choose any of the first six issues as a gift.

Thousands of readers stay ahead with NAR three times a year by paying the regular bookstore and newsstand price of $1.25 per issue. You can, too. Or you can start a subscription with NAR #7—you'll save money and get your choice of any prior issue free.

You may subscribe for four issues for $4—a saving of one dollar from the bookstore price; for eight issues for $7 — a saving of three dollars; or twelve issues for just $10 —a saving of five dollars. You will be subscribing to what Howard Kaye in his New Republic review of the first six issues of NAR calls "by far the largest selling literary magazine in the country . . . a model of judicious open-mindedness . . . clearly an exciting, engaged, vastly well-edited magazine, almost an indispensable one." Where else can you read new work by the likes of Philip Roth, Jane Jacobs, Günter Grass, John Barth, Eric Bentley, as well as exciting new writers in every issue?

Some leading contributors to previous issues.

#1: William H. Gass, Victor Kolpacoff, William Mathes, Grace Paley, Theodore Roszak, Stanley Kauffmann, Richard Eberhart, Alan Dugan, Anne Sexton, David Ray.

NAR #2: John Barth, Günter Grass, Nat Hentoff, Staughton Lynd, Alan Friedman, Mary Ellman, Edward Hoagland, E. L. Doctorow, Joseph McElroy, David Farrelly, Richard Hugo.

NAR #3: Philip Roth, Donald Barthelme, Frank Kermode, Josephine Herbst, George Dennison, Paul West, Leonard Michaels, John Berryman, R. V. Cassill, Albert Goldman.

NAR #4: Robert Coover, Conor Cruise O'Brien, Eric Bentley, Alan Lelchuk, Edward Field, Russell Banks, Mordecai Richler, Richard Gilman, Alan Distler, David Henderson.

NAR #5: Pat Watters, Jay Neugeboren, Wilfred Sheed, B. H. Friedman, Arlene Heyman, Jules Siegel, Mark Strand, Ree Dragonette, Robert Bly, Frederick Busch.

#6: Robert Stone, Leslie Epstein, Ellen Willis, Edgar Z. Friedenberg, V. S. Pritchett, Emile Capouya, Jane Jacobs, Eric Salzman, Denise Levertov, Jay Wright, Anthony Hecht.

New American Review
Dept. N-7
1937 Williamsbridge Road
Bronx, New York 10461

Yes, start my subscription to NAR with #7.
I enclose my check for:

☐ 4 issues for $4.00 (a one-dollar saving)
☐ 8 issues for $7.00 (a three-dollar saving)
☐ 12 issues for $10.00 (a five-dollar saving)

Also send my FREE copy of NAR #.....

NAME

ADDRESS

CITY

STATE ZIP

earnestly. Graves sort of picked his nose, flirted egregiously with a woman in the third row, and collected his $1,000. Snodgrass was a boob: he tried to say something. Under such circumstances he actually said something! Graves, no boob he, threw his left arm across Snodgrass' shoulders and with his right hand slipped a blade between his ribs. "I can't understand all these big words you're using. Why don't we get down to poetry again?" And he lapsed into Greek. In the middle of the Party After, I found myself chatting with Mrs. Leslie Fiedler, when up rushed Snodgrass. "Wasn't it awful?" "Absolutely disgraceful," I replied. "He ought to be shot." "I've never felt like such a fool in my life." "Oh, Mr. Snodgrass," said Mrs. Fiedler and I hurriedly introduced them, "I thought you did a fine job." "Wha-at? You saw what that son of a bitch did to me?" "Oh yes, but that's nothing. There're just two reasons for a poet to get up in front of an audience, to read his poetry or to display himself, and I thought you did a fine job of displaying yourself."

Ah ha. She was right: spectacle. But I still couldn't figure what the audience was getting out of it, really. A poet on display without his poetry? I'd rather watch 50 Girls Count Them 50 any day, and so, I assumed, would anyone else in his right mind.

Then last year came that symposium after which I lied to the young about why I'd been on it, and things fell into place. The next day I talked on the phone with the editor who had arranged the whole bash. People had been telling him what a great occasion it was; so I told him, with a sort of New Year's resolution fervor in my voice, that I was never going to be on another symposium in my life. (I've only contracted for one since then, only one, the very last one.) I assured him that all the other symposiasts, except for the symposiarch (a reviewer famous for his unkind wit), shared my view of the occasion. Then the editor said something to this effect: people come to see some writers they have read and heard about perform. It's like releasing four or five dangerous animals in a pit to see what they will do to one another. They sniff, they snarl, they scuffle, they. . . . Even if they do nothing more, that is in itself interesting.

Think of the best symposium that ever was or is likely ever to be, that Platonic all-night drinking party of which Socrates was the symposiarch, of which the subject was love. Then imagine their doing it for money in front of 1,000 paying spectators avid for gore. . . .

By setting intelligent or talented people against one another under circumstances which make them appear stupid, silly, vicious and cheap, the symposium gives a crowd the leveling pleasure of being intellectually cheated and gladiatorially satisfied at the same time. Any way you look at it, the audience gets what it came for. And the beasts? Some publicity anyhow.

Mexican-American Literature

EL ESPEJO—THE MIRROR: Selected Mexican American Literature. Edited by Octavio I. Romano-V. Quinto Sol Publications. 241 pp. $4.95. Paper $2.95.

PHILIP DARRAUGH ORTEGO

Mr. Ortego is a member of the English Department at New Mexico State University where he teaches courses in Spanish and Latin American literature. He is currently working on a study of the Mexican-Americans.

El Espejo—The Mirror is a brown paperback book reflecting "brown" literary hopes and aspirations in this country. Though a few Mexican-American writers have been published in various little and national magazines, and a few like Julian Samora (La Raza) and Ernesto Galarza (Merchants of Labor) have written books, El Espejo represents the first fruits of a struggling nascent effort on the part of a nueva ola (new wave) of literary Mexican-Americans. El Espejo probes for its relevance in the Mexican-American experience, an experience which has heretofore been articulated only at the fringes of American literature.

El Espejo is a collection of painfully honest writing by Mexican-Americans who, having found their literary voice, have created their own outlet in Quinto Sol Publications for what they consider to be Mexican-American alternatives for Mexican-American problems and affairs. El Espejo is the natural issue of Quinto Sol's quarterly publication, El Grito, in which some of the selections first appeared.

Significantly, the emblem of this nueva ola is the great Aztec seal which dominates the title page of El Espejo, identifying the Quinto Sol writers with the Indian roots of their heritage rather than with the romanticized and fictitious templar tradition of the Spanish Southwest. And in the preface is the explanation for the title:

> To know themselves, to know who they are, some need nothing more than to see their own reflection. Therefore . . . The Mirror-El Espejo.
>
> May this book serve as a mirror for the many who see themselves herein.

Of course, many—especially Mexican-Americans—may see only a sad countenance reflected in El Espejo. The point of departure of the first story, Silvio Villavicencio's "El Espejo" (from which the volume derives its name), is the Biblical observation: they have eyes, yet they see not. "Look at your eyes," the protagonist commands himself. "Look at yourself in the mirror and see those dark and viscous things in yourself." Something explodes inside the man and he kills his pregnant mistress, starkly commenting that "a person is like a clock put into motion by sinister hands." For Villavicencio, one of the most articulate spokesmen of the "new wave," the human spirit, trodden and depressed, seeks identity in the violation of those who pretend to love it.

Perhaps no history of a people has been more obscure, more apocryphal, and so utterly misapprehended by the majority of Anglo-Americans than the history of Mexican-Americans, for they continue to exist in the United States as an "invisible minority." In a piece entitled "Goodbye Revolution—Hello Slum," Octavio Romano, a Berkeley-trained anthropologist, shows that Mexican-Americans are not attempting to maintain an idiosyncratic identity but rather that they are Americans with as rich a heritage as any other group of Americans. Romano deplores the fact that "in the millions of words about Mexican-Americans that issue from the pens of the social scientists, there is nothing of the breath of Zapata, even less of Juarez." He is distressed that in the "quest for the quaint" social scientists have confused Mexican-Americans with Mexicans; he insists on replacing the stereotyped concept of a "traditional" Mexican-American culture with the concept of a "historical" one.

That the problems of Mexican-Americans relate to American life, not Mexican life (just as the problems of Anglo-Americans relate to American life, not English life) is best illustrated in Rudy Espinosa's piece, "Que tal, Rocha?" which memorably details a "fragmented journey" from San Francisco's County Hospital, where he was born, to the groves of academe. Espinosa writes that along his academic journey he learned it was not material comfort he sought but the knowledge of how to live with his fellow man and with himself as a Mexican-American. This realization had its roots in an act of human kindness for his buddy Rocha, an illiterate Mexican-American from San Antonio whom he knew in the Army. The painful quest for identity is the theme of a good many of the stories in the volume. An example is the story by Carlos G. Velez, in which Ricardo Gonzalez explains to an Anglo friend that he is Chicano, not Spanish. Reacting to the rejoinder, "Oh, you mean Mexican," Ricardo "remembered feeling the pang of shame when he heard the word 'Mexican.' It seemed as if every time he had heard the word, someone had spit it out like a wad of phlegm."

Perhaps the best works of fiction in El Espejo are those by Nick Vaca and Octavio Romano. While Vaca works in what might be termed a "mixed media," Romano works within the framework of traditional narrative. Vaca's story of "The Week of the Life of Manuel Hernandez" may be architectonically more interesting, but Romano's tale of "A Rosary for Doña Marina" functions in a moral dimension we can more readily perceive and acknowledge.

"A Rosary for Doña Marina" relies on historical emblems: Romano's Doña Marina emerges as a solitary penitent, hurrying to her Friday evening rosary. The historical counterpart of Doña Marina is "la Malinche," mother of la Raza, forever darkly garbed and penitent for her betrayal. Vaca's story is structurally experimental. "The Week of the Life of Manuel Hernandez" begins on Monday, March 9, 1943, and ends on the day of his death, Sunday, March 14, 1968. Thus our view of Hernandez is spatial rather than sequential. While Romano exhibits a keen sense of the historical, Vaca demonstrates a percipient sense of the existential. In two other stories Vaca ploys the mixture of English and Spanish to good advantage in defining place and character in the Mexican-American experience. In "The Purchase," for instance, Doña Lupe utters:

> Ave María Purísima, I must make another pago hoy or else it'll be too late. Si, too late and then what would I do? Christmas is so close and if I don't hurry con los pagos I'll have nothing to give any of mis hijos. . . . Santo Niño de Atocha, if Christmas should come and catch me sin nada I would never sleep well por el resto de mi vida.

This is "binary phenomenon" at its best, that is, where the linguistic symbols of two languages are mixed in utterances using either language's syntactic structure.

But the poetry perhaps best captures the bilingual spirit of the Mexican-American experience. Here are two examples:

Mis ojos hinchados flooded with lágrimas de bronce melting on the cheek bones of my concern
razgos indígenas
the scars of history on my face and the veins of my body that aches vomito sangre
y lloro libertad
I do not ask for freedom
I am freedom

Alurista

The weight of despair.
The weightlessness of Exhilaration?
Ambiente—
Transparent como
Una jolla, opaca como
El Carbón, heavy like a feather—carga fija
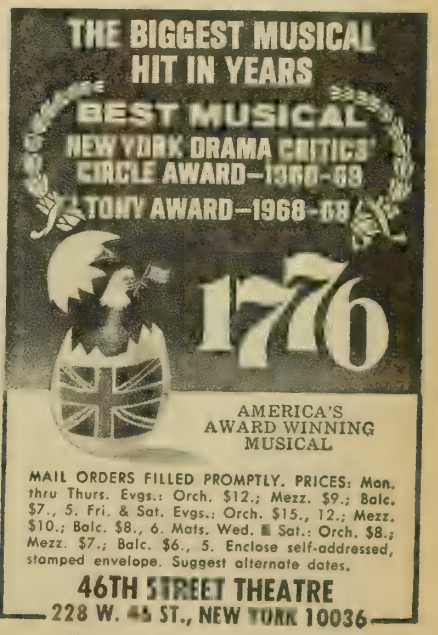
Del hombre marginal.

Jose Montoya

There is no "cultivated" urbanity in El Espejo, only the rough-hewn insistence on recognition of a people who are as individually different as other Americans. All in all, El Espejo is a promising collection of Mexican-American literature. And though Mexican-Americans have yet to produce their Ralph Ellison, Bernard Malamud, and the like, we can see in El Espejo the emerging images of such writers. The selections in the volume are like fragmentary reliefs hinting at what is still to be found in the digging.

The Trial of Wole Soyinka



CHARLES R. LARSON
Mr. Larson teaches comparative literature at Indiana University, and is general editor of Collier Books' African/American Library.

Wole Soyinka—the brilliant Nigerian playwright, poet and novelist—has been in prison for twenty-two months and for the last eighteen in solitary confinement in a small cell in the prison at Kaduna in Northern Nigeria. Ostensibly, the charges against him are that he aided the Biafran rebels at the outbreak of the current Nigerian-Biafran civil war. Soyinka himself has referred to his trip to Eastern Nigeria (Biafra) as a "peace mission." However vague the charges against Soyinka may be, the Nigerian Government has seen fit to detain the gifted writer for nearly two years without trial.

Inevitably, with the secrecy and confusion surrounding Soyinka's detention, the number of myths and rumors regarding his existence have noticeably increased. (There have been few official Nigerian statements about his condition ever since he was moved to the Kaduna prison; in a recent issue of The New York Times it was reported that Soyinka is supposedly ill.) Shortly after his imprisonment, however, prison authorities leaked out the story that Soyinka had tried to escape—that was in October 1967. More recently, in a number of letters smuggled out of his prison cell, Soyinka denied this attempted escape along with the original charges which were made against him. There have also been a repeated number of rumors of Soyinka's supposed death. Books Abroad published an obituary in its Winter, 1969 issue, and then in the following issue declared that their information was incorrect. A public announcement at a Library of Congress poetry reading also reported Soyinka's demise in the Kaduna prison.

Now word has been received that earlier this year at the University of Ghana a drama based on Soyinka's imprisonment was presented under the direction of James Gibbs, who also wrote the play. (Gibbs, an Englishman, has long been interested in Wole Soyinka's career. In 1966 he wrote a thesis on Nigerian drama at the American University in Washington, D.C. Since that time Gibbs has been teaching in Africa and carefully following the fate of Wole Soyinka.) Gibbs gave his drama the title: A Selection of Some of the Verse, Plays and Prose of Wole Soyinka as Presented by Inmates of the Federal Prison at Kaduna under the Direction of Prisoner Jaguna. The play's significance lies not in its literary or propagandistic merits (strongly pro-Soyinka) but in suggesting the great interest African students and intellectuals all over the continent are taking in Soyinka's yet to be decided fate.

Gibbs's play might more aptly be called The Spurious Trial of Wole Soyinka by the Government of Nigeria under the Direction of Jaguna. In the play, bits and pieces of Soyinka's writings are quoted out of context by Jaguna, a corrupt Nigerian official, to make it appear that Soyinka has long been guilty of treason. (Readers familiar with Soyinka's writings will recognize the name "Jaguna"; in Soyinka's tragedy, The Strong Breed, Jaguna, the staunch upholder of tradition, sacrifices his daughter's fiancé rather than permit progress to change the traditional culture.)

The trial, which is mostly a dialogue between Soyinka and Jaguna, begins with an attempt to ridicule the prisoner Soyinka for his wasted Western education. Jaguna states: "Your lack of patriotism continually astounds me. . . . You have the good fortune to go to England, and, at a time when the country is crying out for lawyers and . . . scientists, you study English." Jaguna next makes reference to Soyinka's famous drama, A Dance of the Forests, which was given official performances at the Nigerian independence celebrations in 1960, describing it as "a totally distorted impression of our nation and our national heritage." Even Soyinka's famous rejoinder to negritude ("Why should you bother about your negritude; does a tiger bother about his tigritude?") is used to mock the Nigerian playwright. Jaguna says, "there aren't any tigers in Africa. . . . Aren't our African animals good enough for you?" The play ends with a distorted summary of an article Soyinka published in Transition (the defunct Ugandan publication whose editor has recently undergone a fate similar to Soyinka's):

The Political Prisoner says that African writers have betrayed themselves and the humanitarian ideals for which Africa stood in the colonial period. The Political Prisoner says that African writers have devoted most of their energies to celebrating a largely imaginary past, propounding a myth of racial essence and describing a romanticized version of the day to day life of their societies. They have been manipulated by their political "leaders." They have blinded their eyes to vision and held their tongues from criticism. The African writers have been inactive while "the black tin gods" of independent Africa have established regimes as oppressive as those of the white racists. The regimes of Nkrumah and Banda, the Political Prisoner maintains, are as bad as the regimes of Vorster and Wallace. It is thanks to these "black tin gods," the Prisoner continues, that Africa has become, once again, the setting for genocide. At present the campaigns are on a smaller scale than European ones, but, the Prisoner suggests, this is only due to a temporary lack of scientific organization.

Gibbs has written a bitterly ironic play which reflects the insecure position of the intellectual in Africa today and the political inanities of the Nigerian-Biafran war. A leading African intellectual (who will remain unnamed) recently wrote: "One wants to scream against this numbers act, against the whole of the Nigerian Government and Britain and Russia. How irrelevant all the fucking negritude romanticism in the face of all these numbers." Gibbs's drama leaves a taste of bile. If Soyinka ever is brought to trial, this is probably the way his "trial" will be carried out.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 9-15-69
333 Sixth Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

New Poetry from Europe

HENRY TAYLOR

Mr. Taylor teaches English at the University of Utah. He has published a volume of poems, The Horse Show at Midnight (LSU Press), and translations in various anthologies. He is now completing a translation of Euripides' The Children of Herakles for Atheneum.

The Swallow Press, in cooperation with the British firm of Rapp and Whiting, has released eight volumes in a new Poetry Europe Series. (There should be nine volumes; the most recent is so numbered; but the fifth volume, Gunnar Ekelöf's Late Arrival on Earth, has been delayed.) The publishers' admirable aim is to "make available in English, often for the first time, the work of the most distinguished European poets," and to "present, in uniform editions, the best of that poetry in the best available translations."

So far, the series consists of three poets from France, and one each from Germany, Spain, Finland, Israel and the Netherlands. On the whole, the translations are quite good, though there are exceptions. One difficulty which shows up in a number of the books is that British translationese is more obvious to the American ear than American translationese might be; a Scotsman's idiomatic rendering of Dutch slang, for example, is likely to be as puzzling to us as a literal translation. This is a minor difficulty in view of the large service the series performs, but it could perhaps be straightened out by a strong-minded editor on the American end of the partnership.

The other exception is more specifically located in the fourth volume, Concerning the Angels, by Rafael Alberti, the great Spanish poet who began writing at about the same time as Lorca. Geoffrey Connell is clearly an authority on Alberti's work: his introduction to the volume is the best in the series. Unfortunately, he is no poet. He says in his introduction that he has tried to avoid the use of English poetic conventions, trying instead to find equivalents for Alberti's syllabic meters and his dependence on assonance instead of strict rhyme. In short, he has tried to give us the sound of the Spanish, to follow the ancient and impossible dictum, "Give us the original." What we have instead is material for a new Stuffed Owl:

The flower of wine, never having tasted tea, without ever having seen a boudoir grand.

Four coopers are daubing the barrels with whitewash.
The sweet white wines, weeping, too soon must leave the land.

It would have been better to place Connell's introduction ahead of someone else's translations, the procedure followed in the best volume in the series, Johannes Bobrowski's Shadow Land. The translations, by Ruth and Matthew Mead, bring into English a directness, a concern for the moods that lurk in nature, and a control of music which, even in translation, establish the late East German poet's place in the front rank. The brief but authoritative introduction has been provided by Michael Hamburger, who knows as much about recent German poetry as anyone in England.

Two other poets, David Rokeah and Remco Campert, have also been blessed with translations done in collaboration. Rokeah's Eyes in the Rock contains versions done by eleven translators, some working from the original Hebrew and some, more established poets such as Christopher Middleton and Michael Hamburger, working from versions supplied by the poet. The effect of a joint effort of this kind is to break down the barriers often imposed by a single translator's idiosyncrasies. Rokeah comes through as a poet of things, of the concrete and immediate image; in this he is similar to Bobrowski, though Bobrowski gives more room to the areas of statement demanded by the imagery. (It is odd that the volume has no introduction; it would seem that someone in this large group could have done it, and it is disappointing not to have one.)

The other collaboration, between John Scott and Graham Martin, is a selection from the work of Remco Campert, a remarkably energetic Dutch writer. Though he is only 40, he has published eleven collections of poems, five collections of stories and four novels. His poems arouse interest in the balance they strike between confessionalism (in one poem he expresses admiration for Anne Sexton) and detached irony (in other poems he acknowledges a debt to Auden). The result of the balance is that a deep anguish often comes through a series of cynical observations. The difficulty with slang which I mentioned earlier is all the more annoying because of Campert's many references to totems of the "now" generation—Bogart, Jane Fonda, even (pun intended?) Dutch Schultz. Campert's offhand style, as rendered in this volume, is often stiff to the American ear: "Come, let's drink lots of whisky/ from a glass or from the bottle,/ so long as it reaches the stomach."

Each of the other volumes has been translated by one person. As I have indicated, this involves some risks, but most of the work here is first rate. The youngest poet in the series, Pentti Saarikoski, has been ably translated from the Finnish by Anselm Hollo. Saarikoski's human involvement is total, which means that he can write unself-consciously of things which often embarrass poets in this country—the act of writing, for instance, is mentioned casually in several of these poems. But most important is the ease with which Saarikoski can write about politics. Political realities, such as the short distance from his home to Leningrad, are immediately available to him as human realities—other human realities, I should say, but American political poetry has conditioned me to expect effort and posturing which do not appear in this book.

That there are three French poets already in the series throws things off balance, I trust temporarily; for while I would not do without any of these, I look forward to work from other countries—Italy, Russia and Poland, for example. But these three poets have been well selected, for they represent a wide range of ages and approaches.

Jouve is an elder statesman, one of the most important figures in French poetry of this century. Keith Bosley's translations exhibit a delicacy of ear and a deftness which are required by Jouve's somewhat atypical use of the French language. His poetry is dense and ambiguous, occupied with the relationship between form and reality, and that between God and nothingness. Dadelsen is atypical in a different way. Where Jouve rarely relies on the proverbial lucidity of the language, Dadelsen is direct; but he has released himself from the concerns with precision which have been inherited from Valéry. Dadelsen's poems have great energy and personal power, but they are marked with a certain impatience; there is a driving urge to get it said. This is accomplished most overwhelmingly in "Easter 1957," a long confessional in which the poet's knowledge of impending death (he died of brain cancer in June 1957) acts in some miraculous way as a restraint; the control in this poem bears out Lucie-Smith's statement that writing was, for Dadelsen, "an existential act of faith."

The Ring Around the World is a selection from five of Jean L'Anselme's fifteen books, and it is one of the liveliest collections in this series. Michael Benedikt has been able to bring into English the peculiarities of each of L'Anselme's several styles and methods, and these are various, for L'Anselme is a ceaseless experimenter. He displays a wild humor in some of his experiments, such as his reproduction of newspaper clippings as "found poems," but through it all comes the sense of a genuine struggle to come to terms with a world in which poetry seems to him increasingly hard to justify.

Though there is still insufficient uniformity in the series as a whole, these eight books make a successful beginning, and will fill a definite need in this country and in England. I look forward to more, for if there are deficiencies, the worst of these is still worth having; the best are indispensable.

Poetry Europe Series*

SHADOW LAND. By Johannes Bobrowski. Translated by Ruth and Matthew Mead, with a Foreword by Michael Hamburger. 63 pp.

JONAH. By Jean-Paul de Dadelsen. Translated with an Introduction by Edward Lucie-Smith. 67 pp.

HELSINKI. By Pentti Saarikoski. Translated with an Introduction by Anselm Hollo. 48 pp.

CONCERNING THE ANGELS. By Rafael Alberti. Translated with an Introduction by Geoffrey Connell. 65 pp.

LATE ARRIVAL ON EARTH. By Gunnar Ekelöf. Translated by Robert Bly and Christina Paulston, with an Introduction by Eric Lindegren.

THE RING AROUND THE WORLD. By Jean L'Anselme. Translated with an Introduction by Michael Benedikt. 47 pp.

EYES IN THE ROCK. by David Rokeah. Translated by Bernard Lewis, Colin Falck, Michael Hamburger, Michael Bullock, et al. 78 pp.

IN THE YEAR OF THE STRIKE. By Remco Campert. Translated with an Introduction by John Scott and Graham Martin. 60 pp.

AN IDIOM OF NIGHT. By Pierre Jean Jouve. Translated by Keith Bosley. 80 pp.

*Published by The Swallow Press. $4.95 each.

ART

LAWRENCE ALLOWAY

This column is for criticism, not news, but here is some news of the 1969-70 season, in the form of pre-emptive criticism. This month the Museum of Modern Art and the Guggenheim Museum will show, respectively, Claes Oldenburg and Roy Lichtenstein in retrospective exhibitions—large ones. In February there will be a Jim Dine retrospective at the Whitney Museum and two Andy Warhol museum shows are scheduled. A retrospective is announced by the Pasadena Art Museum for May and though the Whitney has been rumored for a New York showing, no date is set. Warhol has also done a show called "Raid the Icebox" for which he went through the reserve collections of the museum of the Rhode Island School of Design and dug out 400-odd objects. (This show of a museum's underside will be seen in Houston, New Orleans and Providence between October and April 1970.)

Clearly it is to be (among other things) a Pop season. The fact that all these museums are putting on large shows by the artists called Pop is admirable: it is proof that the narrowing of the time lag between museum programs and present styles of art, to which post-World War II museum policy leads, has not abated. On the other hand, there is a question about the way museums handle the early retrospectives of artists. When an artist, though still young, has been around long enough to stand a big show, the museum gets into unnoticed problems of interpretation. If what I am writing is to serve as a piece of pre-emptive criticism, a prophecy is in order: my guess is that the catalogues of these shows will protect each artist from Pop art as a movement.

In a survey of Pop art, in either book or exhibition form, Lichtenstein, Oldenburg, Dine and Warhol would, to say the least, be prominent. In monographs and retrospectives, however, individual artists usually appear in holy isolation. The internal sequence of an artist's work has a good chance of being decently charted but his context and contacts are rarely pursued. The implication is that compared to the richness of an artist's oeuvre any movement is necessarily fragmentary and constricting. Last year's retrospective of Robert Indiana (Institute of Contemporary Art, University of Pennsylvania) is typical, with such catalogue statements as, Indiana's "concerns are broader than those of the Pop artists. . . ." As the work of a decade or so is collected together, an artist's special habits of mind and hand become clear, often for the first time, and this is properly a main subject of discussion. The stress on personal identity, however, often becomes infatuation and the public form of infatuation is promotion. The artist's life gets told as from his mother's point of view.

It is true that the early showing of a young artist in a group tends to be celebrated by overestimating the novelty of the work ("at last, a viable post-Freudian art," or "X has released art from the strait jacket of the Renaissance, or tonal values, or the flat rectangle, etc."). The later appearance of the artists who keep going are interpreted differently. Radical artists become celebrated in the highly traditional terms of a self-made, self-contained identity. It seems that the reward for youthful avant-gardism is conservative individualism: from the all new to the same thing. Ideas are for the young; after that, there's only art defined as the release of autographic largess.

The process by which avant-garde groups form (like the Earthworks artists, like the Pop artists ten years ago) goes something like this. Separated people converge on the basis of shared interests and attitudes; their common position is drafted by group exhibitions (whether there are formal manifestoes or not is unimportant). The group exists in terms of mutual understanding and feedback for a few years; this is the time when any criticism attached to it exaggerates its novelty, but has the virtue of being speculative. When the time for retrospectives and monographs comes round all this is inverted: there is a rite of passage to routine individuality for all.

A group show which aims to firm up a present diffuse activity is scheduled for the Whitney next month called, I'm sorry to say, "Human Concern/Personal Torment" (earlier title: "The Grotesque in American Art"). I hope to return to it later, but one point can legitimately be made in advance: it consists of artists who have consented to being grouped in some kind of expressionist-protest continuum. However, when the retrospectives of Richard Lindner, Lucas Samaras, Peter Saul or Ernest Trova come along, to name four of the exhibitors, you may be sure that they will be only towering individuals, not associates of movements.

My objections have nothing to do with retrospectives as such but with the custom of their organizers of turning each artist's individuality into a mummy case with a fixed likeness on it. American artists seem forced to move from topicality (for instance, the early phase of Pop art, the present phase of Earthworks, possibly the emergence of protest art forms round about now) to normalized individuality (which is Pop art's present social standing). The artist's accumulated tensions with other artists and the desire of museum writers for timeless, noncontroversial greatness in their subjects, support each other to produce insipid heroes.

The term Pop art served to identify something for which no other term was available at the time: it indicated a shared historical circumstance. I'm not writing in defense of the term because it seems to have derived from me, because this season's problem is recurrent. The Abstract Expressionists were first recognized as a group, in terms of "a new force in American art," or some such topic, and sorted out as individuals later. For all their personal irreconcilability, a historical identity unlike that of preceding or later painters, unites them. Pop art is the common point among the forthcoming retrospectives and historical questions like these arise. Will the text on Lichtenstein discuss his Arte Déco imagery in relation to other artists' interests in the period? Oldenburg's monumental plaque "Céline" had a projected sequel which was not made, "Dubuffet"; will the influence of Dubuffet on Oldenburg be discussed? Will Dine's early relation to Oldenburg be fully documented in his catalogue? These are the kinds of contextual matters which, to judge from recent catalogues, are likely to be played down or passed over.

Since museum staffs work with a fair amount of time for research and even thought, they are, of all the groups who contribute their bit to the literature of art, in a good position to contextualize their subjects. On the whole they have not done this, seeming more interested in opposing the rhetoric of the avant-garde with a rhetoric of institutionalization. I hope for fewer candidates for the art world's crowded Mount Rushmore and a stronger sense of short-term art history from this season's museum catalogues.

LETTERS (Continued from page 234)

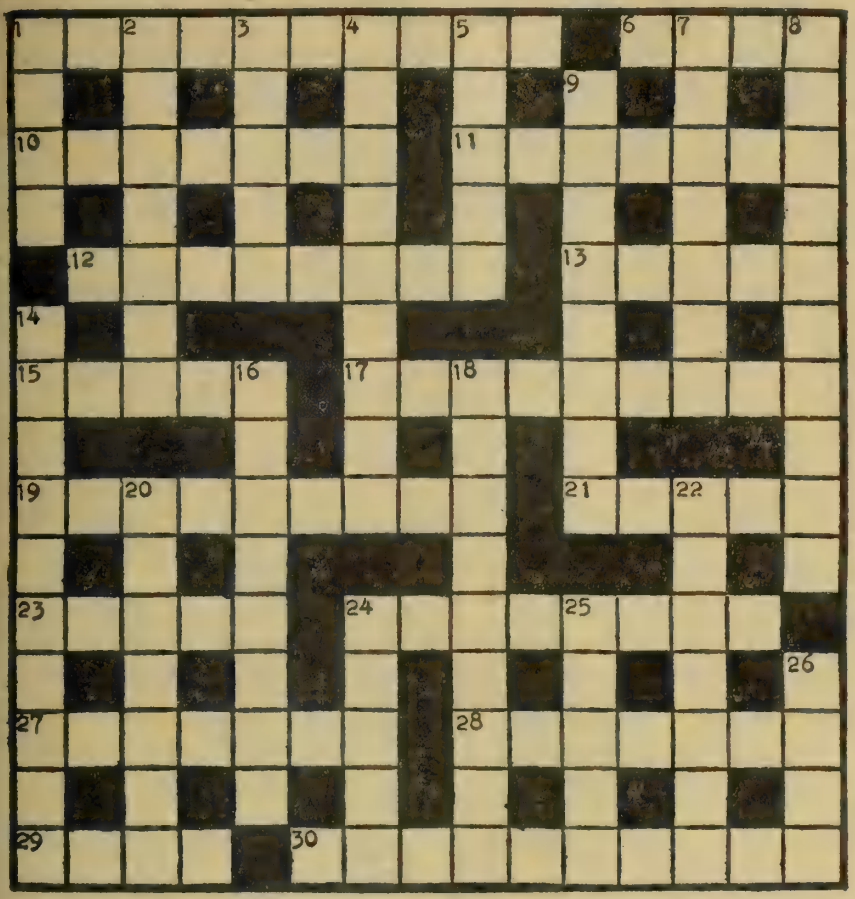
Bell System boasts that it has changed the interior of the dial telephone only three times in the past twenty-five years (see The Wall Street Journal, Oct. 15, 1965). Any company in a competitive industry would be ashamed to make that statement about its product.



AT&T at present is telling us about the marvels of new services the public will begin to receive when the now available electronic switchboards become commonplace. We are advised, however, that we must wait until the present electro-mechanical systems wear out before enjoying the electronic wonders of the 1960s. Thus "Bell doesn't expect to have electronic switching systems in all its central offices till the year 2000." (Business Week, Nov. 20, 1965.) Meanwhile, the company is busily tying up CATV systems with restrictive leases so that cable television cannot offer these same services thirty-five years earlier. (See Life, Nov. 18, 1966.)

Willis Park Rokes

P.S. There were a couple of typographical errors in my article concerning dates: AT&T indicated that Picturephone could be installed in the home merely by adding an extra line in 1956, not 1965. Also, the year the company began to face a formidable opponent, the fashion-conscious housewife, was 1962, not 1952.

Crossword Puzzle No. 1312

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 Saw nothing strange in making capital! (10)
6 Look both ways, as some birds do. (4)
10 He might have a lot to offer. (7)
11 See 28 across
12 The weapon cost might be steep! (8)
13 The one who hits a high ball isn't the type who slips in another sport. (5)
15 29 over? It's the one so marked! (2-3)
17 It might offer a writer protection to reproduce something correctly. (9)
19 Though asleep, can somehow create an old-fashioned estate, in part. (9)
21 Prohibition might come back at a sign of disapproval. (5)
23 Another version might be a sort of rime. (5)
24 One sometimes does with a log. (Exhaust the most common association.) (8)
27 Going to it certainly doesn't show one is lukewarm. (7)
28, 29, 16 down and 11 across There's no recommendation of a single revolution involved! (3,4,4,8,7)
30 Stage version of Little Red Ridinghood? (It should be easy!) (6,4)

DOWN

1 and 26 down Is it practical to put in eight hours? (8)
2 Obviously it should end in a road, in the main use. (3,4)
3 And obviously bristles have fiber. (5)
4 A bad golfer can make a "birdie," nevertheless! (9)
5 One might find the early American circle over-wise. (5)
7 Resounding? (7)
8 A puncture has no indication of loudness in final emphasis. (10)
9 It's a sign of submission to crudely strip one of the foremost things in craft. (8)
14 In addition this fits flexible people to a T. (10)
16 See 28 across
18 Such children are probably not yet classed as such. (9)
20 One might be headed for the office at his pleasure. (7)
22 A bird ran awkwardly in where some games are played. (4,3)
24 The wood sounds like a good vacation spot. (5)
25 Worries about part of the design? (5)
26 See 1 down

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1311

ACROSS: 1 Prehistorical; 10 In bed; 11 Abominate; 12 Left-overs; 13 Gores; 14 Stranglehold; 19 and 8 Twenty-dollar bills; 22 Ardor; 24 Something; 26 Ennui; 27 Dissimilitude. DOWN: 2 Rebuff; 3 Hydrostat; 5 Odors; 6 Icing; 7 Anacreon; 9 Seaside; 15 Gold medal; 16 Enactment; 17 Strands; 18 New Delhi; 20, 4 and 25 Signed, sealed and delivered; 21 Again; 23 Rives; 24 Scrim.

PUBLICATIONS

WORLD DEMOCRACY: By Bin Dir Woor. Self-Designated Symbolical World President. Unique. Entrancing. $2. Greenwich Book Publishers, 141 7th Avenue, New York City. Bin Dir Woor calls on all Communists to inwardly renounce Atheism, and to pray for worldwide human rights and Democracy, and for an after-death life with God.

KNOW CANADA BETTER!

See world affairs from a different perspective!

Read CANADIAN DIMENSION

Independent, lively, and original. Canada's leading forum for radical thought.

$4.00 for eight large issues

Write to:

CANADIAN DIMENSION
P.O. Box 1413
Winnipeg 1, Manitoba, Canada

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

PERSONALS

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Have Something To Say?

Nixon's first victim has been freedom of speech. Witch-hunt investigations and conspiracy trials, shooting into crowds of unarmed people—this is the evolution of repression that we are all witnessing. Who will be the next victim?

There is only one answer to the stifling of dissent: more dissent. And that is our job at The NATION.

The NATION intends to continue speaking out. But we need your support. Join us with a one-year subscription and strengthen the voices of those who still believe in the use of reason. Subscribe today.

BONUS OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will add four bonus issues to your subscription free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you will add four bonus issues to my subscription.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign.)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N9-15

THE GARBAGE EXPLOSION CHARLES A. SCHWEIGHAUSER

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 22, 1969 35 cents

BURLINGAME
SEP 2 1969
LIBRARY

S-TOR PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

Private Deals & Public Interest

The Politics of Tobacco

EDWARD SCHNEIER

Labor & Race

Confrontation in Pittsburgh

CHARLES C. ROBB

Nixon's Drug Bill

GEOFFREY C. STOKES

NONVIOLENCE & AGGRESSION

Ronald Sampson on 'Gandhi's Truth'

Jack Leavitt on 'Men in Groups'

LETTERS

today's cop

Seattle, Wash.

DEAR SIRS: Network TV coverage of the clash between Pittsburgh police and Negro anti-discrimination pickets on Aug. 26 must have convinced viewers that today's cop is no longer the friendly humanitarian on the street corner who provides lollipops for lost children.

I was shocked to see three heavy-set officers subdue an unarmed black woman and hold her on the ground while a fourth struck her repeatedly with a large night stick. These weren't gentle taps but bone-shattering blows which left the defenseless woman screaming helplessly.

It is unfair to generalize because many police officers are mature, dedicated public servants. However, it is the savage bestiality of most metropolitan police that is exacerbating the problem of street violence and provoking the lawlessness of otherwise placid demonstrators.

Steven M. Cooper

employment opportunity

Peekskill, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: Others may be puzzled, as I am, by the stories by Anatoly Kuznetsov that have appeared in The New York Times and Time. It would seem that he prefers the free world to the Soviet Union.

He has confessed to so many lies, how can we be sure he is now telling the truth? If Mr. Kuznetsov wants really to convince us that his heart and tongue are in the right place now, wouldn't it be appropriate for him to go to Vietnam and fight for the free world in the ranks of the Green Berets?

He might not survive the war but he would go down as a person who puts truth above everything, including whatever dollars he is being paid for his confessions.

Walter Lowenfels

name calling

Los Angeles, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: The article "Architecture in Mexico" by Nathan Silver [The Nation, Aug. 11] is an insult to your readers and to the people of Mexico. It is not only superficial and arrogant but it reveals a lack of understanding and perception, which a man with Mr. Silver's supposed background should possess. . . .

As a personal friend of Ricardo Legorreta, an acquaintance of Luis Barragán and a long-time student of the archaeology and anthropology of Mexico, I can assure you that you have done your readers a great disservice by publishing such a grossly misleading article.

I visited Legorreta several times during the design of Camino Real Hotel and can assure your readers that the design is pure Legorreta. If Mr. Silver would have taken the trouble to see recent examples of Legorreta's work (one of which, "Automex," was widely publicized in American architectural journals) he would have been aware of the Legorreta touch. The Alameda Hotel was done years ago in association with another architect and does not represent Legorreta's presently developed style. Mr. Silver's implication in the statement, "The hotel's architect of record is Ricardo Legorreta" is an insult to one of Mexico's most creative young architects.

As for Mr. Silver's obvious ignorance of Mexico's archaeological and anthropological experience, his offhand dismissal of Palenque as a sightseeing object for "grand tourism" is enough proof of this. . . . He not only is insensitive but he can't even read. He certainly did not find any of

(Continued on page 294)

EDITORIALS

The Lull

Undeniably there is a lull in the national tumult. Delegates to the National Catholic Conference for Interracial Justice were told that laymen are losing their enthusiasm for the cause; lay involvement has declined from a peak in 1968. That strange conglomerate known as "the peace movement" is politically quiescent. Interviewed in Amsterdam, a group of young Americans on vacation told a New York Times reporter that enthusiasm for political activism had abated. "Most of the people I know," one of them said, "who were political are now apolitical. You take that one year, Bobby Kennedy's death, then the Chicago debacle. . . . After Nixon's election people say, 'Ah, hell!' " Another said: "I've been marching in peace parades since 1964. What did it accomplish?" A Congressman, returning to Washington from the summer recess, told Ted Lewis of the New York Daily News: "Nobody seems to give a damn. It's as if they had lived with the big problems troubling the nation so long that they wanted to escape thinking about them any more."

Nixon, of course, has been the beneficiary of the lull which he encourages by having "official" spokesmen issue pleasant and reassuring statements from time to time. In the meantime, nothing much happens and the country drifts along. "Is the country just dozing?" asks columnist Joseph Kraft, "or has the Nixon Administration really and truly put the giant to sleep?" The tide of protest that began with the Kennedy administration in 1960 seems to have gone slack.

But popular moods, whether of calmness or outrage, sooner or later give way to their opposites. There are in fact signs of trouble ahead. At a recent conference of concerned lawyers, Arthur Kinoy cited the denial of a postponement in the Chicago "Conspiracy Eight" trial, the indictment of Bobby Seale, which has the unmistakable odor of frame-up, the refusal to cut bail in the Black Panther cases, the backing away from desegregation guidelines in Mississippi, and others. In Berkeley a full-fledged battle plan was discovered in the police department—part of a nation-wide crackdown on the Panthers. All of this spells trouble, and the more so precisely because of the lull. For that matter, Hartford, Conn., Camden, N. J., and Fort Lauderdale, Fla., have experienced disturbances which, though lacking the carnage of Watts, Detroit, Newark, Washington, and other big city actions, were exceptions to the tranquillity in the civil rights field, which some federal officials heralded a bit prematurely.

Against this background, Senator Eastland has introduced S.12, a dolled-up version of similar legislation introduced last term. The bill has been approved by the Senate Internal Security subcommittee, so it is not a mere Eastland trial balloon. As bait for Senate support, the bill purports to repeal the concentration camp provision of the McCarran Act, but actually it lays the foundation for such a development. It would amend the Smith Act to create a new crime of peacetime treason. It would set up a sweeping loyalty program for employees of "defense facilities." It would get around the Yates decision of 1967, to the effect that advocacy of overthrow of the government had to include advocacy of action, not merely of ideas. Eastland would now make it a crime to advocate overthrow "without regard to the immediate provable effect of such action." Another provision would make it a crime punishable by a $10,000 fine or ten years' imprisonment, or both, to "knowingly and willfully" give "aid and comfort to an adversary of the United States by an overt act, other than the mere expression of a personal opinion." An "adversary" is defined as "any foreign nation or armed group which is engaged in open hostilities against the United States or with . . . the Armed Forces of the United States."

Unconstitutional? Probably, but one cannot be certain. It is no longer the Warren Court that stands guard against such inroads, but the Burger Court, whose future course is unknown.

Clearly, in the face of such developments, the lull will soon be a thing of the past, and the conflicts which will succeed it may be more bitter, and more dangerous to American freedom, than anything in the recent past.

NATO's Missing Link

As W.G. Forrest emphasizes in his article on Greece (page 279 of this issue), the reason for Washington's grudging support of the ruling colonels is its belief that the Greek army is an essential link in NATO encirclement of communism. But if Saville R. Davis, staff correspondent in Athens for The Christian Science Monitor, is right, it has become a nonexistent link. In a dispatch earlier this month, Mr. Davis says flatly: "The Greek Army no longer exists as a stable, organized force-in-being."

The reason he gives, citing the most circumstantial evidence in support, is that the colonels, in a series of purges, have removed from the army—and the navy and air force—the officers who gave these forces their reality as fighting units. Ironically, in the light of U.S. gifts—issued with requests for just a touch more democracy, please—a good number of the officers banished or jailed had received much of their military training in the States. And almost without exception, the men stripped of their authority and their personal freedom have pristine records as anti-Communist fighters. According to one of them, quoted by Davis, "Their offense against the present government was that they were broadly nonpolitical, but pledged to the Western institutions of freedom that were born in their land, and they detest the enslavement of a free and proud people by the present rule of dictatorship and martial law."

The number of officers thus removed is in the hundreds, and those who still hold their jobs know that they are watched by spies placed in the lower ranks by the colonels. Under such conditions, officer morale is nonexistent: these men are, and know themselves to be, hirelings of tyrants. Officers in such a fix, deprived for

IN THIS ISSUE

NOV 25 APR

September 22, 1969

EDITORIALS

266

ARTICLES

271 Nixon's Drug Bill — Geoffrey C. Stokes

272 Labor and Race: Confrontation in Pittsburgh — Charles C. Robb

274 Private Deals & Public Interest: The Politics of Tobacco — Edward Schneier

279 Greece: A Chance for Democracy — W. G. Forrest

282 The Garbage Explosion — Charles A. Schweighauser

BOOKS & THE ARTS

285 The Apostle of Nonviolence — Ronald Sampson

286 Genetic Programming — Jack Leavitt

287 The Astronomer and the Boy — Annette Grant

288 The Human Environment — Frederick Gutheim

290 Mies and the Closing of the Bauhaus — Richard Stern

290 Unicorn French Poets — David Kleinbard

292 Poetry:

To My Mother — James Brunot

Snow in the Poem — Frances McConnel

The Orchard — Eugene Ruggles

Morning Fog — Beth Bentley

293 Theatre — Harold Clurman

294 Films — Robert Hatch

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

THE NATION Volume 209 No. 9

the most part of their more experienced seniors, and more afraid of their political bosses than of any outside threat, cannot and will not maintain the minimum necessary esprit of the rank and file. (Again according to Davis, the navy is now strictly rationed as to fuel, lest it steam out of the Aegean for ports unknown.) Anyone who calls that a link has never closely examined a pitfall.

So the United States, which has once more put interest before principle, once more discovers that its interest is a mirage, that it is acting by automatic response to knee-jerk stimuli and ignoring the evidence of its counselors (surely American intelligence in Athens knows what a newspaper man can discover). As we find ourselves saying much too often, such behavior is worse than wrong; it is stupid.

Their Excellencies

Time was when a U.S. Ambassador, particularly to a Latin American country, enjoyed a sinecure second to none in government service. He had nothing much to do, his prestige was enormous, he inhabited a palatial embassy with his retinue, and received no end of perquisites. Since he was usually wealthy to begin with, he could be numbered, in a material sense, among the happiest of men.

But no more. One U.S. Ambassador has been killed (in Guatemala) and our man in Brazil, C. Burke Elbrick, was kidnapped and released only when the Brazilian junta agreed to broadcast a rebel manifesto and exchange Mr. Elbrick for fifteen political prisoners, who were flown to Mexico in a Brazilian Air Force plane.

As kidnappings go, this was quite a civilized operation, with both the kidnappers and their victim acquitting themselves well. After rapping the Ambassador on the head with a revolver butt, the kidnappers allowed him to write notes to his wife, and engaged in political discussion with him. At a press conference on his release, the Ambassador, a career diplomat, spoke calmly and without rancor. He described his captors as "intelligent fanatics who blame the U.S. for most of Brazil's problems." The released prisoners, for their part, charged that the Brazilian military held power in "a climate of tension and anxiety, insecurity and violence, extending to all levels of society."

Indignation at the manhandling of an American diplomat is of course perfectly justified, although not altogether accurately expressed in the New York Daily News editorial describing the kidnappers as "a mob of Fidel Castro-inspired terrorists—Castro being the bearded Red rat who has tyrannized over Cuba for ten years." What is not stressed, and not understood even by some level-headed commentators, is that anti-American feeling in Latin America exists largely because the regimes in these countries, many of which we have installed or helped to install, are unpopular, do not have strong backing except in the military forces, and are prone to deflect expressions of popular unrest toward the United States as a kind of safety-valve operation. But we have only ourselves to blame for the success of this stratagem, since it is based on our ill-advised policy of supporting military juntas and reactionary regimes and arming them against restive students and other opponents.

To make matters worse, the regimes tend to be stupid as well as repressive. After Mr. Elbrick's release, the junta declared that a state or "revolutionary or subversive war" exists, and decreed the death penalty for acts of subversion or terrorism. It is time to get tough, one general said—as though the government had not been tough right along. The underground groups can get tougher too.

Against this background, the cat-and-mouse game that Mr. Nixon is playing with the Rockefeller report would be humorous if the situation were not so serious. Why can't this document be made public? One would think that right now is a most appropriate time to release it. Obviously what Mr. Nixon is afraid of is that he will not be able to implement the recommendations contained in the report, for the usual reason: no money that has not already been pre-empted—largely by the U.S. military, who have such close, friendly and expensive relations with their Latin American counterparts.

Public Interest Reconsidered

The sanitary aspects of waste disposal are referred to in the Old Testament, and waste disposal generally has been a problem in communal life from the beginning. But in the early days populations were small, the earth seemed infinite, and there were no beer cans, no-deposit bottles, or discarded washing machines. Even up to a few years ago, waste disposal could be regarded as important, certainly, but peripheral, deferrable and far from urgent. This complacency is disappearing as environmental problems assume major importance and are seen to be central rather than peripheral.

All of the easy outs have been tried and a solution is still nowhere to be found. Waste disposal troubles are continent-wide. San Francisco's Brisbane dump will be filled by 1971 and none of the substitute methods of disposal seem practical; some are regarded as too costly, some entail pollution of air or water, some, like pressing waste into building blocks, are untried on any considerable scale. The situation is just as bad in New York, where New York City alone generates 7 million tons of refuse a year and the place where most of it has been dumped, a land-fill operation on Staten Island, has little room left. North of the city, Westchester County's Croton-on-Hudson dump has its 80 acres filled to a depth of 40 feet, and the end is near.

In many situations technological ingenuity finds a way out, but waste has so far baffled the engineering profession, although some desperate remedies have been suggested. The special case of industrial waste has led to the drilling of a well more than half a mile deep at the Hooker Chemical plant in Niagara Falls, which every minute produces 250 gallons of unwanted liquid waste, including hydrochloric acid. Though this facility is not yet in use, New York State has permitted the well to be drilled and it is expected to be in operation next year. Some 150 deep wells are receiving industrial waste, but in some cases there appears to be danger of polluting water supplies. In one instance—the Army's 12,000-foot-deep well at the Rocky Mountain Arsenal near Denver—there have been indications that earthquakes may be triggered by the injection of large amounts of liquid which, acting as a lubricant, might unstabilize the underlying rock. This expensive installation is no longer in use.

The broad question is why the problem of waste disposal was allowed to grow to its present proportions. It is a case of each company, industry, municipality, etc., acting in its own short-term interest and the devil take the hindmost. But with growing population, growing industrialization, growing affluence, the devil takes us all. In the waste disposal field (see article page 282), as in many other areas (see article page 274), it has become clear that the public interest can no longer be regarded, if it ever could, as merely the sum of private deals. Environmental problems—problems affecting in equal measure the entire population—have acquired an immediate urgency which requires a new conception of the public interest.

Lindsay and the Future

Qualification of the new Independent Party, which has designated Mayor John Lindsay as its candidate, for a second line on the ballot, should prove to be a useful device for marshaling independent and Democratic votes for his re-election. But it could have a larger significance. If the Mayor is re-elected (he deserves to win and we hope he does), then the coalition of forces supporting him, including those who will vote for him on the Independent Party line, might play a key role in efforts to form a new national coalition.

The New York campaign is indeed a strange one. The Mayor seeks re-election without the nomination of a major party, with the backing of only one of five Republican borough organizations, without a city-wide political organization of any kind, and with nothing more than a loose coalition of forces, including volunteers, party defectors, issue-oriented groups, young voters and independents. But the coalition supporting him could well foreshadow the emergence of a new national coalition, with a strong base in the major urban communities. It includes: Negroes, Puerto Ricans, the younger Jewish voters, liberal and reform Democrats (Rep. Shirley Chisholm, at present National Democratic Committeewoman; Paul O'Dwyer; Bronx Borough President Herman Badillo; Howard Samuels, former Under Secretary of Commerce and a likely candidate for governor next year; Percy Sutton, Manhattan Borough President; City Councilman J. Raymond Jones, the Harlem Democratic leader; Arthur J. Katzman, Democratic Councilman from Queens, and a number of Democratic assemblymen), an important section of labor's rank and file (principally the municipal unions), and liberal-moderate Republicans (the Mayor after all did receive 49 per cent of the Republican vote in the primary).

The fact that these elements can unite in support of Mayor Lindsay is a measure of his appeal as a "new coalition" candidate. He could play the same role nationally. In the past the Mayor has been handicapped not merely by the fact that he is a Republican but by Governor Rockefeller's unfortunate tendency to regard him as a rival. Now, by nominating John Marchi, a leader of the Conservative Party, the Republican Party has given Lindsay a new freedom of action, and Governor Rockefeller, who was trapped into endorsing Marchi (an action that he and the Republican Party will regret), has relieved the Mayor of any personal obligations. Lindsay is now free to seek state office at a later date—or in 1970, in the event that he should be defeated—as an independent fusion candidate or as a Republican with coalition backing. Should the war drag on in Vietnam, an independent candidacy by Lindsay in 1972, in selected Presidential primaries, might be an effective means of challenging President Nixon and his policies, just as Senator McCarthy's candidacy tapped the opposition within the Democratic Party to President Johnson and much the same policies in 1968. Against this background, a vote for Lindsay has a dimension of national significance.

Ulster's 'Spoils System'

The Rev. Ian Paisley, spokesman for the Orange Order, is now in this country to answer charges made by Bernadette Devlin of discrimination against Catholics in Northern Ireland. If there is job discrimination against Catholics it is, he assures us, solely because of the spoils system. "If there is one political party in power and you don't work for it," he tells us, "you don't get the spoils of office." Simple. But suppose a faction (the Orange Order) controls one party (the Unionist Party) and through skillful gerrymandering is able to minimize the vote of the entire opposition, to the extent that it cannot win even in those areas where it constitutes a majority?

Consider, for example, the situation in Tyrone County, where in 1961 (when the census last tabulated denominational figures) Catholics totaled 73,395, Protestants and "all others" 60,521. In this county, therefore, Catholics outnumbered all other groups by 12,874 and since 1961 the margin has increased. Yet a recent study by one of the civil rights organizations indicates that of twenty-two clerical employees in the County Surveyor's office not one is a Catholic; of nine surveyors, only one is Catholic; Catholics are absent from the County Rate Collector's office (nine employees) as well as the County Secretary's office (thirty-six employees); there is only one Catholic on the County Library staff of twenty-three; only two Catholics in the County Engineer's office of fifteen employees; of forty-two top-salaried posts in the Health and Welfare Department only five are Catholics, while all thirty-one of the clerical employees of this department are Protestants; in the Education Department, of seventy-seven salaried employees only one is a Catholic.

In brief, Tyrone County is very much like a Deep South county in which Negroes constitute a majority but are denied all but a few crumbs as "spoils." In a sense the trouble in Northern Ireland is that it does not have a spoils system; if it did there would be less discrimination.

La Guerre Est Finie

More than thirty years ago, some 7,000 young Americans went to Spain to fight Franco. When they came home—the half of them who survived—these men of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade formed a veterans organization. Since 1947 it has been on the Attorney General's list of subversive and Communist organizations.

Some of the volunteers in the Brigade were certainly Communists; some may still be, though many say they broke with the party years ago. In any case, there is no evidence that their veterans organization has engaged in subversive activity of any sort and even the Justice Department no longer requires that it register with the Subversive Activities Control Board. The Brigade has been suing since 1953 to be removed from the Attorney General's list, and is now before the Supreme Court, alleging that the compilation of such a list violates the First, Fifth and Tenth Amendments, and citing damages suffered by the group and its members because of the designation.

The Spanish Civil War was one of the darkest tragedies of this century and the part played in it by the United States (as by England, France and the other Western democracies) was not pretty. The men of the Abraham Lincoln Brigade fought, quite literally, as the conscience of their country and when they returned they were greeted as heroes by countrymen whose consciences were ill at ease. For more than twenty years now they have been stamped subversive, suffering the handicaps in employment and other associations that such labeling confers. Guernica is a world away; what these men thought and said in those days is no longer relevant. What is relevant is that they fought on the right side of a terrible war—and have been paying for it ever since. The Supreme Court should give them the relief they seek.

The Cracks Are Showing

The Nixon Administration, like the Johnson administration before it, is fumbling the ball in Vietnam. Nixon, like Johnson, is having a difficult time trying to make it appear that "the two Presidents"—the one in Washington and the one in Saigon—see eye to eye on the strategy and tactics of the war and efforts being made to end it. While the American forces reduced their offensive operations sharply during the recent cease-fire—if it can be called that—the South Vietnamese increased theirs. For a twenty-four hour period the differences were out in the open, for all to see, despite manful efforts in Washington to make it appear that none existed. But these efforts, instead of allaying doubts, only increased them. Much the same effect is produced when Washington prods Thieu to broaden the base of his regime and he proceeds to call in more generals. Such actions are evidence of Thieu's confidence in his ability to counter any Washington peace initiative of which he does not approve. And the Administration seems to be having as much trouble with the Pentagon as with the Saigon regime. The President keeps stressing his determination to withdraw troops but the Pentagon insists that there is a point beyond which any withdrawals would endanger the stability, such as it is, of the South Vietnamese regime. No doubt the American command would go along with plans to remove 25,000 or 30,000 troops; but beyond some such figure they will be as difficult to "persuade" as their allies in Saigon. It is obvious that none of the regimes we have backed in South Vietnam have wanted peace except on their terms, which imply a permanent division of Vietnam, guarantees of the continued existence of the South Vietnamese regime and heavy long-term commitments of American aid. But the time for such posturing is over. With the formation of the Provisional Revolutionary Government of South Vietnam on June 8, the North Vietnamese made it clear that they were no longer prepared to negotiate on the basis of the integration of the NLF into the structure of the Saigon government.

What they are apparently willing to negotiate is the setting up of a new representative regime in the South and the withdrawal of all foreign troops. The President must now accept the fact that the Saigon regime will not long survive the withdrawal of U.S. troops, even with our backing. To force Thieu to negotiate realistically, Mr. Nixon should announce a schedule for the withdrawal of a significant number of troops by the end of the year, and then adhere to it. But, as Senator Javits said, "There is renewed danger that the United States Vietnam policy will again fall captive to the false optimism and lack of realism which continue to pervade the thinking of some top U.S. officials in Vietnam, both civilian and military." By and large they are the same advisers who misled the Johnson administration. The fact is that their point of view is much closer to that of the Saigon government than that of the government they serve. The cease-fire hiatus has already joined the long list of opportunities, not so much missed by Washington as sabotaged in Saigon.

The Theory Topples

Words, phrases and slogans have a coercive effect on public opinion and on decision makers and policy planners. "Appeasement," "Munich," "isolationism" are cases in point. But even more troublesome is the false "model" of a situation which is built up over a period of years and comes to be regarded as reality itself. Communications experts tell us that once a model of this sort has been thoroughly inculcated, people will readily accept information that confirms or is consistent with the model but will reject anything that is at variance with it.

One of those phony models which has had a disastrous effect on American foreign policy in the Pacific is the "domino theory," first propounded by, or in the name of, President Eisenhower. Discussing Southeast Asia, Mr. Eisenhower had recourse to an analogy which would be understood at all age levels: If one regime in the area succumbed, the rest would tumble over like so many dominoes. Widespread and monotonous reiteration of the theory had the effect of winning nearly universal acceptance of it as a "model" of reality in Southeast Asia.

Now, however, it is not the dominoes that are toppling but the theory. Quite suddenly commentators are deriding it, Senators reject it, and recent statements by President Nixon and Secretary of State Rogers strongly imply that the domino model is being shelved at the highest levels of policy planning and decision making. C. P. FitzGerald, our Southeast Asia correspondent, tagged the domino theory as a fallacy some years back ("Fallacy of the Dominoes," The Nation, January 28, 1965). Even earlier, another contributor and editorial consultant on Southeast Asian matters, W. Macmahon Ball, had pointed out in a book which the State Department might have studied to good effect (Nationalism and Communism in East Asia, 1953), that nationalism was the best counter to communism in the region.

If the views of these two men, who knew the differences between dominoes and nations, had found wider currency and acceptance, it is altogether likely that the hypnotic spell cast by the "dominoes" model might have been dissipated long since, at a considerable saving in American lives and treasure.

NIXON'S DRUG BILL

GEOFFREY C. STOKES

Mr. Stokes is Director of Program Development for the Addiction Services Agency, City of New York, and has recently served as consultant on drug abuse to the government of Puerto Rico.

This is, apparently, the year for drugs. Television relentlessly offers addicts, ex-addicts, kids who smoke pot, and parents who worry about it. Congress already has before it a number of thoughtful bills, including that of Rep. Edward I. Koch (D., N.Y.) suggesting creation of a Presidential commission on marijuana, and Rep. Lloyd Meeds's (D., Wash.) proposal to assist local educational units in developing curricula on drug abuse. Action on these, and on other worth-while bills, has been held back for some months while Congress awaited the Administration's bill; it is finally out, and it is deeply dishonest, because it does not deal adequately with either the criminal or the social aspects of drug abuse.

For several months prior to its release, word on the proposed legislation (S.2367) had been selectively leaked at various international conferences on drug abuse. It was supposed to be a "rationalized and liberalized" overview of the drug situation. Penalties for marijuana possession (which now carries a minimum two-year jail term) were to be sharply cut back, and a great deal of emphasis was to be placed on research, treatment and prevention.

Despite favorable reaction from the professional community, comments from Congressmen who had been briefed on the new bill were almost uniformly negative. College drug use had been widely publicized, and hometown reaction against student demonstrations was so strong that a hawkish bill was called for. The Administration responded, and early in June, at just about the time when the bill was supposed to have been sent to Congress, a new and ominous set of rumors replaced the earlier reports: the Attorney General's office had taken over drafting the bill; National Institute of Mental Health scientists were no longer requested to give advice; the bill was to focus on law and order; there would be no permissive attitudes toward crime from the Nixon Administration. All the latter rumors have proved correct. The President's message, as it was released on July 14, is a throwback to the era of Harry Anslinger; the bill which was sent to Congress one day later is, if anything, even worse. The message at least paid lip service to education, research and rehabilitation; the legislation embraces only increasing police activities as a way of controlling drug traffic. When reporters challenged Deputy Atty. Gen. John Dean about the bill's silence on education and treatment, he argued that adequate legislation was now on the books for those purposes. He stated further, "All we need to add to what is there is men and money." He did not specify the amount of either commodity which the Administration might deploy in the battle.

With this background, it would be all too easy to dismiss the Nixon bill as simply law and order propaganda, of a kind which reveals a limited understanding of the causes of drug abuse. That would be a mistake, as the peculiar viciousness of the bill lies in its actual targets. In the words of one government mental health professional: "This is not an anti-drug bill. It is an anti-student bill," for its provisions are aimed at the occasional drug user, rather than at the system which supplies him.

The truth of that judgment is borne out by the changes in present legislation which the bill makes, and those which it doesn't make. The penalties for simple possession of marijuana, despite the growing body of information indicating its relative harmlessness, remain unchanged; those for sale are raised. The penalties for possession or sale of LSD are raised even more sharply. In addition, the bill provides "no-knock" license for police officers. Under this provision, police who have a search warrant in a narcotics case can break into the home of any suspect without knocking or otherwise identifying themselves. The rationale behind giving this power, according to Justice Department officials, is that its use could prevent suspects from destroying illicit drugs before the police were able to seize them. (The same official rather breezily announced that anyone who shot a police officer who broke in unannounced would be tried for murder.)

With respect to the justification advanced by the Justice Department, it is necessary only to point out that the logistic difficulties attendant to flushing a kilo of marijuana down the toilet, or of burning a similar amount of heroin, are such that the no-knock provision is simply not needed to reach the dealer, who would be likely to have substantial amounts of any illegal substance. Its inapplicability has long been recognized in New York State, which has had a no-knock provision for five years. Manhattan Dist. Atty. Frank Hogan's office reports seeking no-knock authority in only three out of 903 narcotics cases last year. In Queens County, where the District Attorney's office also has a reputation for toughness, a no-knock warrant has never been used. In fact, the no-knock provision is of use only against persons who are likely to possess a relatively small and easily disposable amount of a drug: that is to say, against typical younger activists like (and here the examples of police use of a drug charge in a political context are factual) Mark Rudd, Abbie Hoffman and Huey Newton. In short, the bill attempts to legitimize "Stony Brooks," the kind of promiscuous midnight raid on a college dormitory which yields large headlines, but no progress against the forces which control illicit drug traffic in America.

Despite the brave rhetorical flourishes which accompanied it, Mr. Nixon's bill is timid. It treats drug abuse as a criminal problem, but provides no real weapons against organized crime. Neither does it provide for research, treatment or education. It does contain, in its penalties against marijuana and LSD and the no-knock provision, a major weapon against America's student activists. With Attorney General Mitchell in his ascendancy, we can be sure that this function of the bill will be fully utilized.

LABOR AND RACE

CONFRONTATION IN PITTSBURGH

CHARLES C. ROBB
Mr. Robb is editor of The Pittsburgh Point, a weekly newspaper that has dealt extensively with racial issues in its city.

Pittsburgh

The growing drive by blacks to crack the building trades unions has reached a head in Pittsburgh. The week before Labor Day saw the city convulsed by five successive days of demonstrations by blacks and counter demonstrations by white construction workers. The issue was sharply—and at times violently—drawn.

The week's confrontations began on Monday, August 25, when about 1,000 blacks, and white supporters, answered the call of the recently formed "Black Construction Coalition" for a mass demonstration at the new stadium under construction on Pittsburgh's Northside. From there the protesters marched across the Allegheny River to the "Golden Triangle" where they massed on Grant Street—one of the city's busiest—beneath the towering steelwork of the new 64-story U.S. Steel Building. The objective was to shut down construction at the stadium, the U.S. Steel Building, and every other major job in the city until contractors and trade unions agreed to a program for putting more blacks on the jobs.

City authorities, forewarned of the demonstration, avoided trouble that first day by requesting contractors to shut down their jobs in advance. The Black Coalition did not appreciate the gesture and called its forces back the next day. When the demonstrators assembled at the stadium on Tuesday, the police were there in force to see that both construction and traffic stayed open. Before the morning was out, there had been clashes between demonstrators and helmeted officers of the police "tactical" unit, who on many occasions rushed into crowds with riot sticks flailing. Nearly 200 demonstrators had been arrested on charges ranging from disorderly conduct to conspiracy and inciting to riot.

The show of police force served only to strengthen the Black Coalition, and a still larger and angrier crowd turned out on Wednesday for another march from the stadium to the U.S. Steel Building. This one culminated in a sit-in on Grant Street which totally tied up traffic until the police, having arrested more demonstrators, cleared the streets. That was enough for City Hall, and in the afternoon Mayor Joseph M. Barr ordered all city construction sites closed down until after Labor Day, to permit a "cooling off" period and negotiations.

On the next two days the white construction workers became the demonstrators, protesting the suspension of their jobs. On Thursday several hundred assembled; on Friday there were several thousand. They marched around and around City Hall, often cheered by bystanders and saluted by police officers. They left with the assurance of Police Supt. James Slusser that their jobs would not be shut down again.

The week after Labor Day the city waited anxiously while Black Coalition leaders met with white union and contractor representatives, a three-man panel set up by the Mayor serving as "moderator." The parties sat dutifully each day, all afternoon and into the early evening, but at the end of the fourth day the blacks stormed out of the meeting room. "There has been absolutely no progress," said the Rev. James J. Robinson, of the Black Coalition. Robinson added that the blacks would return to the negotiations after the weekend, but that in the meantime "we're going to mobilize ourselves."

By the time the negotiations began again, the Coalition had announced plans for "Black Monday" on September 15. It was to be a day of street demonstrations, walkouts by blacks and their white supporters from jobs and schools, and other activities. It was hoped that contingents of demonstrators would come from other cities.

Meanwhile, plans were being made for legal action to stop construction on public projects like the stadium. Byrd R. Brown, an attorney and chairman of the Pittsburgh NAACP, said that he was preparing the necessary papers for an injunction suit similar to those filed recently by the NAACP in Buffalo and Chicago.

Because of their recent experience, the Black Coalition leaders assume that "Black Monday," if it happens, will be accompanied by police retaliation, violence and many arrests. This prospect seems only to have reinforced their determination to carry through at whatever risk. Pittsburgh's black community is unified today as it has never been before (which is not to say the unity is total). Even moderate black leaders have decided that now is the time to stand and fight.

They have good reason to fight. In no city is there a more clear-cut case of discrimination by the building trades unions. There are twenty-six such unions in the Pittsburgh area, with a total membership of about 32,000. About 2,200 of these are black, or just under 7 per cent. However, the totals include the Teamsters, which boasts a 24 per cent black membership this year, and the Construction General Laborers Union with a 49 per cent black membership. When these two noncraft unions are excluded, the percentage of black journeymen in the building trades unions drops to about 1.5 per cent.

In four unions there are no black journeymen at all—the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, which has maintained its white membership rolls at 1,000 for the past twenty-five years; the Asbestos Workers, with 217 members; the Bridge and Iron Workers, with an estimated 2,000 members; and the Elevator Constructors, with 225 members.

Because of the self-governing nature of building trades unions, this discriminatory pattern has been unaffected by the welter of employment and job training programs put forth by the anti-poverty program, the Urban League, the state employment service and other agencies. The first invasion of the union privacy was made by Nate Smith, a black former prize fighter (his ring nickname was "Available"), who is a member of Operating Engineers Local 66, the union of heavy construction equipment operators. Nate Smith was one of about 125 black men in a union of 7,000 members, and he didn't like it. So he came up with the idea for a program which would give black men training on heavy construction equipment. It would be significantly different from other training programs in that the men would be guaranteed union books at the conclusion of a one-year period of instruction.

Smith took his idea to the director of Pittsburgh's anti-poverty program in the early spring of 1968. A few weeks later the idea received the boost it needed: a group of militant blacks in the city's Northside ghetto let it be known that they would not tolerate the absence of black operators on heavy construction equipment then (and still) engaged in building a superhighway through the ghetto. The threat was plain—either black men work those machines, or the machines will be destroyed.

The Northside is a racial tinderbox, and the city administration was not disposed to quibble. Nate Smith's idea was handy, and City Hall grabbed it. Smith himself went over to cool the Northside, and recruited many of the men there into what became known as Operation Dig. Four months later, Mayor Barr officiated at the signing of a contract between the U.S. Department of Labor and the Pittsburgh Constructors Association for a fifty-two week program to train heavy equipment operators, carpenters, pile drivers and teamsters.

A year later Operation Dig was a success. It had cost a lot of money—$485,000 in Labor Department funds—but it had gained journeyman union books for sixty-seven men. It was praised as one of the best programs of its kind—if not the only one of its kind—in the nation, and Nate Smith figured that a good program deserved to be repeated. So he came up with a proposal for Operation Dig II, which would have trained 110 men to become heavy equipment operators, carpenters, cement masons and bricklayers. The proposal was approved by the U.S. Labor Department, but it was rejected by the Pittsburgh Master Builders Association, comprising fifty-five general contractors, and the Pittsburgh Building Trades Council, representing the unions.

Smith refused to take the rebuff lying down. He went to the Pittsburgh Human Relations Commission, which held a public hearing and listened to the usual arguments from both contractors and unions: a one-year training program could not produce qualified journeymen; it was not an acceptable alternative to the time-honored apprenticeship programs of three to five years. The commission made some halting attempts to get at the reality of the apprenticeship system—is it really necessary and is it really followed as scrupulously as the unions say it is?—but in the end the hearings produced no more than a plea for the parties to get together and negotiate.

Some of the blacks had plans for more direct action. Several weeks later a group of Operation Dig men appeared at the stadium and attempted unsuccessfully to block access to the construction site. It was the first skirmish of a swiftly escalating war. Two weeks later, in early August, a larger group turned up at the stadium and succeeded in blocking trucks. Police arrested twenty-six, including eight women, on the charge of loitering. Most of those arrested were employees of the Bidwell Cultural and Training Center, another black organization in the Northside ghetto. The Bidwell Center, started after Pittsburgh's 1968 riots (touched off by the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King), has had some success in training outside the building trades. But its experience with the building contractors and unions made it an ally of Nate Smith and Operation Dig.

Among those arrested was the Rev. James J. Robinson, then president of the Bidwell Center. At the hearing in police court, Robinson explained why the stadium was the target: "The stadium is the real shining example of bigotry and everything that the labor unions stand for." The police magistrate dismissed the charges, and counseled moderation, but the blacks were beyond moderation. "We're going on the jobs and stop them," declared Nate Smith. "Now it's time for war."

At that point the Black Construction Coalition was announced. It was to be composed of Operation Dig, the Bidwell Center, and almost every other black organization in the city.

A week later the Black Coalition staged its first action, again against the stadium. More than 100 demonstrators appeared, blocked trucks, and became involved in several confrontations with construction workers and police. Eight were arrested and charged with disorderly conduct.

The contractors' response was to obtain a court injunction limiting picketing at the gates to the stadium. The Black Coalition's counter response was to call for the mass demonstration at the stadium the Monday before Labor Day. The war had been declared.

As in all wars, once the combat begins, the price of peace goes up. When negotiations began after the Labor Day truce, it was apparent that the Black Coalition, having tested its strength in the streets, was not going to weaken at the bargaining table.

Two months ago the contractors and unions could have satisfied the blacks by accepting Nate Smith's Operation Dig II for 110 jobs. Several weeks ago, the contractors, in an apparent effort to deflate the black protest, put forth their own proposal to provide apprentice training for ninety to a hundred men. The blacks rejected it then because they had not been involved in developing it. When the same program was put forth a second time at the post-truce negotiating session, Nate Smith tore it up and threw it in the face of the builders' representative.

The Black Coalition then put forth its demands: a minimum of 1,130 jobs, excluding laborers, in one year; within two years, a minimum of 40 per cent black membership in each of the craft unions. The Coalition specified that 20 per cent of the trainees be recruited from "detention facilities" in western Pennsylvania. The Coalition also demanded that no training program take more than eight months; that qualifications for journeyman status be determined by a committee including representatives of the Black Coalition.

It was obvious that these demands would never be agreed to by the contractors and unions, and the blacks regarded them as no more than starting points for negotiation. "Our position is negotiable," said Nate Smith. "We know eight months for training is low. We left room for them to come up with a figure. We're willing to go up to fifteen months. But they won't come down at all."

"As for the 40 per cent," Smith went on, "the black population of Pittsburgh is not 40 per cent. We're willing to go down to 10 per cent. But they haven't offered anything."

The contractors and unions, naturally, felt they had offered something in their original plan with some later modifications. "We don't feel it got proper consideration," said one contractor. The Black Coalition considered the industry plan just long enough to decide that it left the apprenticeship system basically intact, with no guarantee that there would be black men in the IBEW or the Iron Workers union. Their answer was "Black Monday."

PRIVATE DEALS & PUBLIC INTEREST

THE POLITICS OF TOBACCO

EDWARD SCHNEIER

Mr. Schneier is in the Political Science Department at City College, New York. He is the editor of Policy-Making in American Government, recently published by Basic Books.

There are billboards in the South which read: CAUTION: ANTI-SMOKING PROPAGANDA MAY BE HAZARDOUS TO YOUR ECONOMIC HEALTH. And well it might. Smoking is big business in the South. In Kentucky it accounts for 40 per cent of the state's total income, 77 per cent of its cash crops. It is the most important single industry in both North Carolina and Virginia, and the leading cash crop of five states. Half a million farm families and 100,000 factory workers in these five states earn their livelihood from Lady Nicotine. For many Southern Congressmen it is more important that they vote "right" on tobacco than that they champion the cause of States' rights.

Cigarettes are more than a business. They are a regular and accustomed part of the daily routines of 60 million Americans. The average smoker consumed 9,100 cigarettes—twenty-five a day—last year, and by so doing reduced his life expectancy by six and a half years. Every day 4,000 teen-agers and young adults took up smoking as a like number of their parents and friends began the torturous process of kicking the habit. For every one smoker who succeeded in giving up, there were hundreds who would have liked to. Surveys have shown that as many as eight smokers in ten are dissatisfied with their habit and would like to quit. Nine in ten believe that smoking is dangerous to their health.

As an issue of public policy the smoking and health controversy has a number of interesting facets. Attempts to control the tobacco industry confront the classic dilemma of regulation: minor benefits for the many can be gained only at the expense of major reverses for the few. The hazards of smoking, though real, are remote, intangible and diffuse. Smoking damages the health of millions, but for any given individual the degree of damage is at best problematic. On the other side of the coin, however, any significant decline in the number of cigarettes consumed would have an immediate, tangible and drastic impact on the economic well-being of tobacco farmers, fertilizer merchants, cigarette factory workers, cellophane and aluminum foil manufacturers, salesmen, vending machine companies, and perhaps even the corner druggist. And how would the state and federal governments replace the more than $4 billion in tax revenues which they derive each year from cigarette taxes?

The American political process usually works to avoid regulatory issues. The interests of tobacco growers, of cigarette manufacturers, and of television broadcasters (who derive almost 11 per cent of network advertising billings from cigarettes) are immediate and direct, and of course well represented in Washington. The tobacco lobby was able to bring more than twenty distinguished doctors and medical researchers before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to argue that the health case against smoking is not clearly established. The Governors of two Southern states testified on behalf of their major industries. Thirty members of the House—all but three from major tobacco-producing districts—introduced legislation on behalf of the tobacco industry. And of course the tobacco growers, tobacco workers, the broadcast industry, and the major manufacturers were also represented.

Weighed in the balance against this impressive array of knowledgeable and concerned citizens is a motley, ill-coordinated hodgepodge of public officials, private citizens and independent researchers speaking on behalf of that elusive concept known as the public interest. In contests such as these the general public almost invariably loses out.

What makes this year's smoking and health controversy interesting and significant is the very real possibility that for once the public interest may triumph. There are encouraging signs, moreover, in this and in other current controversies, that a new and very meaningful concept of the public interest may be evolving. In a system long accustomed to defining the common good as the sum of private deals, the change will not be wrought overnight, but there are signs of a shift. In this controversy it is the tobacco industry and not the public which is on the defensive.

The major forces behind the shift have not been generally associated in recent years with progressive policies. The key agent of change has been the Public Health Service. The 1964 Report of the Surgeon General's Advisory Committee, with its stark and startling conclusion "that cigarette smoking is a health hazard of sufficient importance in the United States to warrant appropriate remedial action," was the opening gun in the government's war on cigarettes. Traditionally a conservative agency, dedicated to the maintenance of close ties with the medical profession and with local health officials, the Public Health Service (PHS) had concluded as early as 1956 that there was a definite causal relationship between excessive smoking and lung cancer. Not until 1964, however, was the PHS willing to suggest that the health hazards of smoking were of sufficient magnitude to warrant public action. The PHS has little direct power. It has been able to encourage further research and to mount a modest educational campaign. But by the very fact of its having found smoking a public hazard, the Surgeon General's report became the critical catalyst to the development of new policies. What the PHS did in 1964 was to transform the problem of smoking into the issue of smoking, and a problem must be perceived as an issue before the policy-making process can begin.

Once smoking had been defined as a public issue, once the problem had been injected into the public arena, the balance of political power began to shift. No longer simply a contest between private groups such as the American Cancer Society on the one hand and the tobacco industry and its allies on the other, smoking became an issue on which Congress, the press, the medical profession, and various agencies of government were forced to take a stand.

In 1964, two forces in particular were moving in on tobacco. Most important were the courts. Citing the findings of the Surgeon General, literally hundreds of lawsuits were initiated against the cigarette manufacturers by the families of individuals who had died of lung cancer and related diseases. Even if unsuccessful, these suits were a source of major embarrassment to the industry. Second in importance was the Federal Trade Commission. Like most regulatory agencies, the FTC has not recently been noted for the vigor with which it has defended the public interest. In the characteristic cycle of institutional development, the FTC is in its "mature" stage, a stage when, in Emmette Redford's words, "the agency has lost the original political support, when it has found its position among the contending forces in society, and when it has crystallized its own evolved program. It then becomes part of the status quo and thinks in terms of the protection of its own system and its own existence and power against substantial change." Such agencies seldom rock the boat. But in 1964, within months of the Surgeon General's report, the FTC rocked and shocked the tobacco industry with a proposal to require a health warning on all cigarette packages and in all cigarette advertising.

It was this FTC order which sent the tobacco lobby scurrying to Congress and which resulted in enactment of the Federal Cigarette Labeling and Advertising Act of 1965. That act represented an overwhelming victory for the tobacco industry. One minor concession—the warning on the pack—was traded for a blanket four-year preemption of all other governmental actions in the field. By the terms of the 1965 law no federal agency, no state or local government could act in such a way as significantly to control the cigarette industry. And as an added bonus the warning helped to absolve manufacturers from any legal responsibilities for premature deaths.

The only meaningful victory for the anti-smoking forces in 1965 was to limit the effect of the act until June 30, 1969. It is that magic date which has a second time put Lady Nicotine on trial. And in the interim her opponent has grown in strength. Two significant allies have been added to the anti-smoking coalition. The medical profession, through some very aggressive state medical associations, has become an increasingly vocal supporter of the Surgeon General's report.

It was widely rumored in 1964 that the AMA had reached an agreement in Congress whereby tobacco states' opposition to Medicare would be traded for AMA neutrality on the issue of smoking and health. Though agreeing that smoking was "a serious health hazard," the AMA's policy position was, in the words of FTC Com. A. E. MacIntyre, "precisely the position of the tobacco industry." If an explicit agreement with the industry ever existed, however, it is not now in effect. The AMA no longer defends tobacco interests; and it has been largely at the urging of state medical societies that California, New York and Utah have taken steps to curb tobacco sales. In the most far-reaching proposal the California state assembly passed an act in May which would have banned all advertising of cigarettes in the state. If Congress fails to act, the pre-emption provisions of the 1965 act will lapse, and strict state laws such as these will be allowed to go into effect.

The final, and in some ways the most surprising source of anti-smoking pressure, has come from the Federal Communications Commission. If the Federal Trade Commission is in its "mature" stage, then surely the FCC is in its dotage. In a special study of the regulatory commissions which James Landis prepared for John F. Kennedy in 1960, the FCC was described as more subject to pressure, more subservient to industry, and more in need of a total overhaul than any other agency. The FCC has not been overhauled, but it has become a key factor in the smoking and health controversy. In 1967 it ruled that broadcasters carrying cigarette commercials must give a significant amount of time to information on the health hazards of smoking. More recently, on February 6, the FCC proposed to adopt rules which would ban the broadcast of cigarette commercials by all radio and television stations. In view of the overwhelming evidence, publicly sanctioned by the Bureau of Public Health, that smoking constitutes a serious health menace, the FCC ruled the "presentation of commercials promoting the use of cigarettes is inconsistent with the obligation imposed upon broadcasters to operate in the pubilc interest."

A revived coalition has apparently emerged. At best loosely coordinated, it includes such old stand-bys as the American Cancer Society and a surprisingly heterogeneous group of public and private agencies: the AMA and American Dental Association, the FCC and FTC, ASH (Action on Smoking and Health), the Public Health Service, and a growing number of state legislatures. The actions of these groups once again have confronted the tobacco lobby with the need for Congressional action.

More than ninety members of the House of Representatives sponsored bills this term dealing with the smoking issue. They ranged in severity from those proposing a simple extension of the 1965 law, to bills proposing an outright ban on all radio and television ads, a requirement that the warning statement be strengthened and placed on the front of the pack, and an authorization for the Public Health Service to regulate the length of cigarettes. The House, acting with unusual dispatch, quickly passed a modified version of these bills. Six of thirty-seven members of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have given up smoking, but only five could be prevailed upon to vote against the combined interests of the tobacco and broadcasting industries. A floor motion to send the bill back to committee for strengthening amendments was defeated by a vote of 252 to 137.

The coalition which rallied to the defense of tobacco in the House was a familiar one. Only six Southern Democrats—Wright Patman and five Floridians—voted to recommit the bill. Only a handful of Northern Democrats, most of them from rural districts, voted against the motion. Among Republicans a similar pattern prevailed. Of the fifty-two voting for recommittal (and against the tobacco lobby) only three—Kyl, Mayne and Schwengel of Iowa—represented Midwestern agricultural constituencies. Thus it was at base the old farm bloc which passed the bill. It was not a partisan issue, it was not a split between liberals and conservatives: it was the quintessence of the old politics.

Rep. Joe Skubitz of Kansas, the only Northerner to sponsor a bill acceptable to the tobacco industry, gave away a part of this game when he rhetorically asked a witness at the House hearings what would happen if the tobacco crop were reduced:

> If you stop raising tobacco you are going to go into raising more cattle (there are 8,700 livestock farms in the 5th District of Kansas). You are going to go into raising more grain products (with 6,500 commercial farms, feed grains are the second most important product in the district), and you are going to be in competition with a lot of states that are now in the production of these commodities, and perhaps add to their surpluses. Is that correct?

Correct or not, an alliance of economic convenience has long united the grain and livestock farmers of the Midwest and the cotton and tobacco growers of the South. And it is not simply the fear of competition that holds the alliance together. Call it logrolling, accommodation, horsetrading or whatever, it is the system of bargaining which has dominated American politics for close to four decades. It is a system in which public policy is arrived at through a simple summing of private deals. So long as each minds his own business, each major interest from tobacco to corn, and from airlines to atomic scientists, is free to write its own ticket. Government exists to ratify these programs.

This system, which Prof. Theodore Lowi of the University of Chicago calls "interest-group liberalism," operates in almost every important policy arena. Educators make education policy, bankers make banking policy, military men make military policy, railroads make railroad policy.

New York Times Book Review

"No! No! No! No! You Haven't Got it Cheerful Enough! You Haven't Got it Light! I Want it Merry—I want It To Bounce! Let's Take It Again from 'Caution, Cigarette Smoking May Be Hazardous. . . .'"

The system has operated most smoothly in the field of agriculture where, in Lowi's words "government-by-conflict-of-interest" has been elevated "to a virtuous principle." Under this system the public interest, if such an interest is conceded to exist, is simply one more interest among many. Thus Joseph P. Cullman, chairman of the Tobacco Institute, has attacked the actions of the FCC and FTC as follows:

> A great diversity of interests is involved. Any legislation or regulation affecting cigarette advertising or labeling would have important consequences for farmers and growers of tobacco, processors, distributors, retail merchants, and cigarette manufacturers, as well as the general public. . . . It is wholly inappropriate for a decision of this scope to be made by any Federal administrative agency whose jurisdiction and expertise are limited to one particular aspect of this complex national problem.

Leaving aside the substantive merits of Mr. Cullman's statement, what is incredible in it is the assumption that the public interest is simply one among many to be considered in making policy. The interests of the general public should not be ignored, Mr. Cullman seems to be saying, but neither should it be exalted above the interests of tobacco growers, processors, et al.

It is possible to run a government according to the tenets of interest-group liberalism. Indeed in some policy arenas the system has worked quite well. But it is a philosophy of government that is inherently shortsighted. All interests are not organized, and therefore all interests are not represented in the making of policy. Moreover, there are general public interests which are difficult to represent but which transcend the interests of any particular groups. Public health is one such issue. And even if we confine ourselves simply to problems of economic injury, the arguments are not all on the side of tobacco. All of us share some of the costs of cigarette damage in cleaning public buildings, trains, planes and hotels, of forest fires caused by smoking, of higher life insurance rates attributable to the higher mortality rates of smokers, of higher fire insurance rates, and of the higher costs of automobiles and public facilities engendered by the need to accommodate to the needs of smokers. Arthur T. Roth of the Franklin National Bank—in a report presented at a Congressional committee hearing—has estimated that the total annual costs of such items related to smoking is more than $10 billion a year. When this figure is compared with the $3.7 billion received from tobacco sales, a plausible anti-cigarette case can be made on purely economic grounds.

That this case did not prevail in the House is not surprising. As noted earlier, the interests of the industry, in contrast with those of the anti-smoking forces, are immediate and direct. One could hardly expect Republican Rep. Tim Lee Carter, whose Kentucky district includes 36,000 tobacco farmers, not to champion the industry's cause. And the bargaining structure of the House is such as to virtually insure the victory of such special interests. Senators, however, have broader constituencies and broader policy perspectives. The bargaining structure of the Senate is much less specialized. If a new concept of the public interest is in fact emerging in our politics, it is here that we are likely to find it.

As this is written, the Senate Commerce Committee is beginning its consideration of the House bill. The composition of the committee adds to the problems of the tobacco lobby. Unlike its counterpart in the House, which is one-third Southern, the nineteen-man Senate committee includes only four Southerners, just two of whom—Spong of Virginia and Hollings of South Carolina—are from major tobacco states. Both Chairman Magnuson, of the full committee, and Moss of the Consumer Affairs subcommittee, who now has charge of the bill, have been consistent advocates of strong regulation. There is a very good chance that the bill will die in committee. And if this happens, or if the bill is filibustered to death, or if it is defeated on the Senate floor, or if the House and Senate conferees are unable to compromise, the pre-emption provisions of the 1965 law will die. With those restrictions no longer in force, the FCC and FTC, the California legislature, and other state and local governments will be free to act as they see fit.

It is this frightening possibility which has sent the industry and its allies running for cover. In the true spirit of interest-group liberalism, the tobacco industry has once again pledged itself to a program of self-regulation. In preference to allowing the FCC to set an arbitrary date, the National Association of Broadcasters in June announced plans to phase out all TV and radio ads by 1973. A month later, the tobacco industry itself proposed a 1970 ban provided that the Senate passes the pre-emption bill.

What self-regulation will do is postpone tobacco's day of reckoning. As the president of the National Association of Broadcasters bitterly lamented on hearing of the manufacturers' action, it's "no great sacrifice on their part" to switch to other media. "They will save $200 million with full knowledge that consumption of cigarettes will not decrease." Self-regulation was also proposed in 1964 in a similar attempt to ward off an adverse vote in the Senate. The nine leading cigarette companies hired

Robert Meyner, former Governor of New Jersey, to administer the code. The broadcast industry too established voluntary regulatory standards. Both the tobacco and broadcast industry codes attempted to avoid unsubstantiated health claims and direct appeals to youth. Athletes, seductive women, uniformed professionals, and models under 25 years of age were banned from media ads, as were health claims ("not a cough in a carload," "more doctors smoke Camels . . .") or promises of social prominence to be derived from smoking.

In some respects these rules were effective. Athletes lost a major source of revenue. College newspapers were effectively declared off-limits by the tobacco code. Health claims have disappeared from cigarette ads. But as a staff memorandum of the Broadcast Code Authority put it in 1967, overall cooperation on the part of the manufacturers has been "more token than real." Lorillard withdrew from the manufacturers' code in 1966. In 1967, the American Tobacco Company, arguing that the broadcast code was sufficient, also withdrew from the tobacco industry agreement. They then took the view, as Warren Braren, a former manager of the broadcast code's New York office, put it, "that if a commercial was approved by the television networks there should be no reason for the code authority to raise any questions." And of course the networks themselves refused to question ad material on the ground that this was the function of the code. Self-regulation became a farce. Its only remaining function was to ward off Congressional action. As Braren says, "Broadcast self-regulation became synonymous with trade association lobbying."

Whether effective or not, however, self-regulation derives from a radically different set of political values than does regulation by a public agency. It is this point, this question of a fundamental philosophy of government, which underlies Senate consideration of the issue. The real question is this: Is the public interest in the question of smoking and health sufficient to justify appropriate public action: or is this a question which can be trusted to the private sector? Former Governor Meyner posed this larger question quite clearly when he told the House Commerce Committee:

> The outcome of your deliberations in this matter . . . will reach far beyond the cigarette industry alone. The whole concept of industry self-regulation is at stake here. For if Congress now turns its back on this serious effort and resorts to broadened government control, future efforts at self-regulation will be discouraged. What might have been the start of a new era of cooperation between industry and Government will become just another step down the road of business-Government conflict, leading to slower and ever more inefficient regulation.

To put Meyner's alternatives somewhat differently, the issue at stake is whether Congress will affirm the unique status of the public interest and the special role of government in defending that interest; or, alternatively, whether it will continue to encourage the blurring of the lines between the public and private sectors, and in essence define the public interest as a summing of private deals.

In a previous article ("The New Tide of National Politics," The Nation, January 22, 1968) I argued that we were approaching a significant break-point in our political history. Substantial numbers of Americans are disaffected with the interest-group liberals' approach to politics and are searching for a new public philosophy. In the 1968 elections two candidates in particular, George Wallace and Eugene McCarthy, were able to capitalize on this mood of restlessness. Though poles apart on most specific issues, Wallace and McCarthy were alike in denouncing government catering to special interests. Both were alike in calling for majority rule rather than government by coalitions of minorities.

This vague and not very clearly articulated call for a new public philosophy appears to be bearing fruit not just in the area of smoking and health but with regard to such issues as automobile safety, conservation, pollution. But like invocations of patriotism, the public interest can be a last refuge of scoundrels. It can be a dangerous concept, and there are aspects of the smoking and health controversy which point these dangers up.

One of the more serious potential problems is the tendency for popular majorities to be rough on the First Amendment. Freedom of speech is not clearly involved in the present instance. As the United States Court of Appeals ruled in 1968:

> Promoting the interest of a product is not ordinarily associated with any of the interests the First Amendment seeks to protect. As a rule, it does not affect the political process, does not contribute to the exchange of ideas, does not provide information on matters of public importance, and is not, except perhaps for the admen, a form of individual self-expression.

True as this may be, the line between activities which can be protected by the First Amendment because they are political, and those which need not be because they are commercial is not easy to delineate. Is violence on TV a proper subject for public action, or is it permissible, as Congressman Broyhill of North Carolina puts it, "to pollute the mind but not the lung"? And if government can take steps to control violence, what other kinds of content can it regulate?

A second difficulty is in guaranteeing expert action. One of the signal advantages of interest-group liberalism is that it locates power and knowledge in the same hands. The tobacco industry people probably know as much about tobacco as anyone—certainly they know more than does the FCC. That they are almost undoubtedly blinded by bias does not alter the fact of their knowledgeability, and a plausible argument can be made that this knowledgeability entitles them to special consideration. Just as the views of welfare recipients should perhaps be given special consideration in formulating welfare policies, or students in making educational policy decisions, so perhaps should the concerns of tobacco growers and producers be given extra weight in making policy in this area. This is not to say that they should be allowed to make that policy but only that their views should be specially sought and specially considered. In a large and complicated society it is particularly important to find effective means of decentralizing some decision-making powers into the hands of those most immediately concerned with the issues at hand.

NOTICE TO SUBSCRIBERS

Because of postal regulations, The Nation's mailing list must be arranged according to Zip Codes. Therefore—with any correspondence about address changes, renewals, etc.—please enclose the address label from your Nation. If you don't have a label, be sure to include your Zip number, and be sure it is correct. Without it, we cannot find your name plate.

These caveats notwithstanding, the emergence (or perhaps it is a re-emergence) of a public philosophy in America cannot help but have a salutary impact on our political system. With such a philosophy, in the words of New York City's Commissioner of Consumer Affairs, Bess Myerson Grant, "We need not surrender our social and physical environment to the vast corporate and political bureaucracies, which now too often stand beyond any meaningful public accountability." The assertion of the public's interest in the issue of smoking and health is part of a much larger rebellion against the increasing privatization of the political process. Even if self-regulation and private control win out in this instance, the battle has been joined.

Greece: A Chance for Democracy

W. G. FORREST

Mr. Forrest is an instructor in ancient history and a dean of Wadham College, Oxford. He is the author of The Emergence of Greek Democracy (McGraw-Hill) and A History of Sparta (Humanities Press).

Friends of the military junta claim that there was no democracy in Greece before the coup of April 21, 1967; its enemies say that the revolution destroyed democracy. Paradoxically both are right.

The Greece which was invented in 1833 was poor and primitive; it was still poor and comparatively primitive a hundred years later. Economically there had been little industrialization and even by 1967 some 50 per cent of the population was still employed on the land. Politically, a constitution of a sort was established in 1844 and another in 1864, when a Parliament was also created. But 300 politicians do not make a Parliament unless they have some Parliamentary marrow in their bones and the politicians who assembled for the early Parliaments, more often than not, were the same local barons who had run the near-independent local units of Turkish Greece. They were supported by their constituents for the power they could exercise for them and the patronage they could give them; ideology was a rare commodity and it was small wonder that General Metaxas, as late as 1936, could dissolve Parliament with Parliament's own initial approval. He could not destroy democracy for there was none to destroy.

But he did other things. In the political establishment's corridors of power little was changed, but at street level his persecutions turned a Communist Party, which had acquired some artificial significance by electoral accident in 1936, into an organization which was ready to become the chief focus of resistance to the Germans after his death in 1941. Communists had become numerous; those who were prepared to associate with them also had increased. Ideological thinking was creeping in.

But if it crept in still further during the Nazi occupation, it seemed to have been swept out again by the end of the Civil War in 1949, a war which left Greece broken —morally, economically and politically. The disreputable Left had been destroyed and this brought chaos to the Center. Britain, America, the traditional establishment had apparently won. The forty-four parties which presented themselves at the elections of March 1950 inspired little hope for a restored "democracy." The institutions themselves were unsatisfactory and the old corruption, inefficiency, nepotism and intimidation prevailed. Besides there were still many Greeks in prison for no apparent reason.

Nevertheless there were some Greeks, particularly among the youth of the country, who were beginning to see that the old-style political game was outdated; that the need was for efficient government; that there could be no efficient government without a stable parliamentary system (or, of course, a stable dictatorship). And even among the politicians there began to appear an awareness of change. For the elections of November 1952 the right-wing parties came together under General Papagos; the Center grouped itself uneasily around General Plastiras; the Right gave itself an overwhelming majority of seats (247 against 53) on a minority vote, and so began a government which did more good for democracy in Greece than had any before it.

That is a judgment that would shock any doctrinaire democrat. The administration set up by Papagos and taken over by Karamanlis in 1955 kept itself in power by gross electoral chicanery. But it did keep itself in power until 1963 and when it fell it was no longer a mere electoral coalition; it had become a party. Meanwhile it had been efficient and stable, and its stability, which continued against an apparent background of parliamentary opposition, conditioned Greeks to the idea that the opposition might one day take power. It also conditioned the opposition to produce a rival party to fight the elections of 1961 and to win the elections of 1963.

The old-style politicians of the Center were slow to find an answer to Karamanlis' National Radical Union (ERE). It was opposed at the elections of 1956 by a loose coalition of no less than eight parties which gained more votes but substantially fewer seats than ERE. Fortunately, it was not a coalition that could have lasted. Further left the picture was brighter. The Communists were banned but a new party had been created, the United Democratic Left (EDA), under Communist influence but with many non-Communist members and an impeccably moderate program. It had joined the coalition of 1956 but in 1958 it stood alone and won seventy-nine seats against ERE's 171 and, more significantly, only fifty for the other parties.

So the Center came to see that, while part of EDA's appeal was to genuine left wingers, many Greeks were voting for it because it was the only solid opposition to Karamanlis. Many others were voting for Karamanlis because they saw him as the only alternative to the "Communist" EDA; in other words, a united Center party could win. Thus the twelve parties that had fought in 1958 were only six in 1961 and of those only three mattered, ERE, EDA and the new Center Union (EK); in 1963 there were only four; in 1964, when EK won handsomely, there were only three.

This was the result of a belated, unenthusiastic response by parliamentarians to the changing patterns of Greek political feeling; but it was only partly superficial. EDA had at its core the established solidarity of the extreme Left; eight years in office had given ERE a real identity; remarkably, in a year or two EK too acquired a common purpose, a common loyalty which was unlike anything there had been before.

This was largely due to two men, George Papandreou and his son Andreas. George had done little to create the new climate, but was quick to sense it and well suited to exploit it. The politicians were not converted overnight and it needed old-style political skill of a high order to hold them together. This Papandreou had. He also had a consistent liberal record. What he lacked was a new look, but this was provided by Andreas, an American-trained academic economist, a Kennedy-style liberal who had returned to Greece when the Kennedy myth was at its height. Here was someone whom the young people could believe in and want as a leader.

On the surface, the elections of 1961, 1963 and 1964 were fought on specific issues—education, defense, the civil service, agriculture, etc.—which concerned EK in office. Collectively EK's answers raised another, wider issue. Even with an annual growth rate of 6 per cent—which Karamanlis had established and EK was maintaining or increasing—could the economy stand the strain which the Papandreou reforms were putting on it? It was a legitimate question and it produced a healthy democratic argument. Unfortunately the argument which led to the fall of the Papandreou government in July 1965 was less healthy and much less democratically conducted.

The Greek army had long played an important part in politics, since 1936 a right-wing Royalist part, for Metaxas had removed nearly 1,000 Republican officers. There also had been a further major purge under British guidance immediately after the war. Inside the army "secret societies" had always flourished, innocent enough organizations designed in the main to engineer promotion for their members, but sometimes possessing political color. In 1965, one such organization, "Aspida," was uncovered. It was of a definite political color (allegedly Red), and linked with Andreas Papandreou himself. George Papandreou then moved to bring the army under more direct political control. The army's commander in chief, the young King Constantine, countered by dismissing Papandreou. Thus old quarrels were revived, about the monarchy, the army, other things; but the real quarrel was a new one. Who ruled Greece, the establishment or a popularly elected government?

The chaos which followed the July crisis illustrates the balance between new and old that had been reached by 1965. The King and his advisers resorted to traditional intrigues and were able to arrange for the defection of about thirty EK deputies, thus making possible an ERE coalition government. To many observers, including some influential foreign diplomats, this was proof that Greek politicians were what they always had been: fickle, venal and unprincipled. But these same observers failed to notice that this time the price for defection was abnormally high (it was a defector, Stephanopoulos, who became Prime Minister), nor did they notice that more than a hundred EK deputies remained loyal. In 1952 the electoral defeat had shattered Plastiras' coalition; now, despite every kind of maneuver, a substantial party remained in existence.

The significance of the decision to hold new elections in May 1967 was also missed. There was much in-fighting before the decision was taken and there was much more to come. But the essential facts were that the man who had succeeded Karamanlis as leader of ERE, Panayiotis Kanellopoulos, was ready to face a straight fight with Papandreou in spite of the likelihood that he would lose; that he is a man of great integrity who would have accepted the result; that a substantial part of the establishment seemed to have recognized that the King's and its own antics during the preceding eighteen months had led nowhere and could lead nowhere. There was a strong desire to settle things in a civilized way. Instead, the tanks moved in.

Here then is the answer to the paradox. There was no democracy in Greece in April 1967. It had been suspended by the King in 1965 with strong support from the army and the right wing. But there had been a fair democracy in operation two years earlier and something that resembled democracy for the preceding ten years. More important, that democracy, or a better one, might be restored in May. There were two other possibilities: a military dictatorship of the Right or a Communist dictatorship.

The danger of the latter was unreal. First, the number of hard-core Communists was always small, and the number of their possible sympathizers, as measured by the EDA vote, had been dropping steadily (from 24.5 per cent in 1958 to 11.8 per cent in 1964) as EK moved ahead. They could not win alone. Second, there was no reason for EK to encourage Communist revolution when they were confident of winning alone. Third, of the seventy truckloads of evidence for a Communist plot, which the colonels claimed to have discovered at the time of their own coup, only a handful has been published, presumably the most incriminating.

The danger of a right-wing coup was no such mirage—it happened, though not as expected. There were some reasons to think that the army, led by its generals, with the support of the King and some substantial right-wing elements, might try to put into effect a NATO contingency plan (the "Prometheus" plan), either to forestall or prevent an EK victory at the polls. It can be said that such a coup would have been more intelligent and more humane than that of the colonels. But it did not happen. A group of virtually unknown junior officers took over the plan and set themselves up as the saviors of Greece.

"You've Arrived Just in Time—The Natives Have Been Getting Restless"

Greeks have not shown much eagerness to be saved. For a time there was some hesitation on the Right, caused by the foolishness of the King. He was not privy to the colonels' plans but by his collaboration gave them a spurious respectability which influenced some in their favor. He then took a step, perhaps fatal for the monarchy, toward organizing a counter coup in December 1967. The attempt was understandable but the act was both incompetent and cowardly in execution. Nevertheless his failure and his exile have cleared the air. The colonels are now on their own.

To senior officers even to those who have survived the present purge, the colonels are disobedient upstarts. To the Athenian aristocracy they are uncouth, brutish yokels. To right-wing politicians their claim to sweep away the corrupt old political world has had little appeal. They have even alienated the nonpolitical Right, members of their own Council of State, judges whose desire for law and order led to initial collaboration. As for others on the Right, who believe in democracy, and were prepared to accept the test of May 1967, they are considered criminals.

Only the Communists can be happy. More and more the resistance-minded youth are attaching themselves to the Communist groups and, if it comes to civil war, the Communists will again win the disproportionate influence they had in the forties. Moreover, the same change in attitude to politics which made the Center Union possible, the shift to more party-conscious thinking, has made a strong Communist Party possible, given the right conditions. The colonels have provided the conditions.

Meanwhile, in the rest of Europe the revolution has met with little favor. The Communist countries, true to the spirit of Yalta, have maintained a decorous silence. In the West, reaction has varied from the noncommital coolness of France and the spineless dithering of the United Kingdom to outright condemnation by Italy, the Netherlands and, above all, the Scandinavian countries. The Council of Europe has postponed decision on the expulsion of Greece until the autumn, but that was out of cowardice, not for any love of the junta.

If all are against, who is for? How do the colonels stay in power? They appealed, of course, to the Greek fear of communism and to the frustration felt after two years of chaos; to the desire for efficiency at all costs. They won good will by remitting agricultural debts; by their religious fanaticism (one of their most repulsive characteristics) which attracted some orthodox elements. And the prospect of stability, however achieved, was agreeable to powerful business interests. But all this has brought very little enthusiastic support. Half a million Greeks came into the streets, whatever the risk, to mourn the death of George Papandreou in November 1968 and made a hero of his old rival Kanellopoulos who gave the funeral oration. Would there be half a dozen to mourn Papadopoulos?

George Papadopoulos would have mourners where in life he has had his only support, in the United States. The CIA was almost certainly aware of the generals' plan for a coup, but had probably overlooked the colonels. Nevertheless neither the CIA nor the State Department nor any other organ of the U.S. Government has shown any marked opposition to the junta. The United States has behaved like an incompetent nanny with a disagreeable child. And Mother Britain, who handed Greece over to the nanny during the Civil War, has sat back and made helpless noises.

There are two reasons why this has happened. First, American diplomats have been no more successful than the British in plotting the changing political consciousness of Greeks since 1945. To innocent third secretaries and equally innocent ambassadors they were still the "knavish Greeks" or the "childish Greeks." Second, there is the magic formula called "the security of the Western Alliance." Since 1946 the Greek army has been a reliable "Western" army, and it is no exaggeration to say that Greek governments have been judged in Washington as much or more by their acceptability to the army as by their own political activities. It was Papandreou's "interference" with the army that first alienated American sympathy; it was the fact that a part of the army (even if the wrong part) organized the April coup that softened American hostility to it. Whatever distaste might be felt on the political side, Greece was at least "safe for NATO."

The problem cannot be solved without Washington's realization that these were errors, that the Greeks are now capable of running a democratic government, and that military rule does not make Greece "safe for NATO." The first is difficult, if not impossible. It demands an act of faith of a kind that diplomats and governments are rarely willing to make. The second is much more easily demonstrated.

The sad events in Czechoslovakia seemed at first to strengthen the military case. If tanks of the Warsaw Pact had a place in Prague, NATO tanks had a place in Athens. But the tanks in Prague have not won many Czechs to the Russian cause, and there have been some expressions of disapproval from Warsaw Pact countries. The tanks in Athens have taught Greeks a hatred for America that few of them felt before, and not all NATO countries are happy to see the democracy which NATO was designed to preserve treated with cynical contempt by those who direct its policies. However strange tne thought may seem in the corridors of the Pentagon, many Europeans welcomed an American presence in Europe because they saw it as a guarantee of the preservation of institutions in which they believed.

What then, is the answer? A long time ago a very wise Greek remarked that "tyranny was a fine situation, but it had no easy way out." Nor does it. In a broad sense there are three possibilities: that the colonels be forced to liberalize themselves, that a caretaker government be installed with instructions to hold elections as soon as possible on the pattern intended in 1967, or that a government should be installed to watch over the preparation of a new constitution under which new and better elections could finally be held.

There are signs that American policy is still optimistically concentrating on the first, for on April 24, the State Department announced that the colonels had been given such orders. (There may have been earlier American pressure or fear of it behind Papadopoulos' announcement of improvements to be made.) Greeks, said Papadopoulos, are now to enjoy the right to security in their own homes. Apart from the tacit admission that they have not enjoyed it hitherto, it is clear that this new freedom will be exercised under the colonels' proposed constitution, but with the proviso that anyone who abuses such rights "will suffer the loss of the corresponding right or of all rights." But how, we may ask, can the abuse of such a right be detected except by infringing it, by breaking into the security of the home? And what could be blunter than Papadopoulos' comment on the quarrel with the Council of State—"Disagreement with me constitutes a coup d'état"?

The second possibility, quick elections, is scarcely realistic. For one thing, Greeks have probably moved too far in the last two years for a mere return to the status quo ante. Also, in the eyes of the State Department it would seem to offer far too easy a route back to power for Andreas Papandreou, and no one likes to confess that four years of effort have been in vain.

The third solution, though difficult and in some ways depressing, is practical and might prove to be beneficial. A right-wing government centered around Karamanlis would be acceptable to the State Department; with the support of other leading right wingers, Kanellopoulos, Markezinis, Mme. Vlachos, Rallis, Averov, even perhaps poor Constantine, it could have some genuine and popular backing—a minority backing, but more than the colonels will ever have and possibly enough to take Greece through without disaster to a a new and genuinely democratic life.

This would mean a return to 1952, and the Greeks do not want that. Most of them have acquired a taste for democracy—real democracy—and it will not be easy for them to be patient. Nor will they readily accept government by those they rightly see as the begetters, however indirectly, of their present horrors.

Nonetheless, it is a chance. It is the only chance if civil war is to be ruled out. So far the resistance groups have behaved well—a few explosions beautifully calculated to produce maximum effect with minimum damage and no casualties. But how long before they may decide that it is easier to kill than not to kill? At such an awful moment America will have to say farewell to Greece as a "safe" ally—or face up to a new Vietnam.

THE GARBAGE EXPLOSION

CHARLES A. SCHWEIGHAUSER
Mr. Schweighauser is with the Center for Environmental Studies at Williams College.

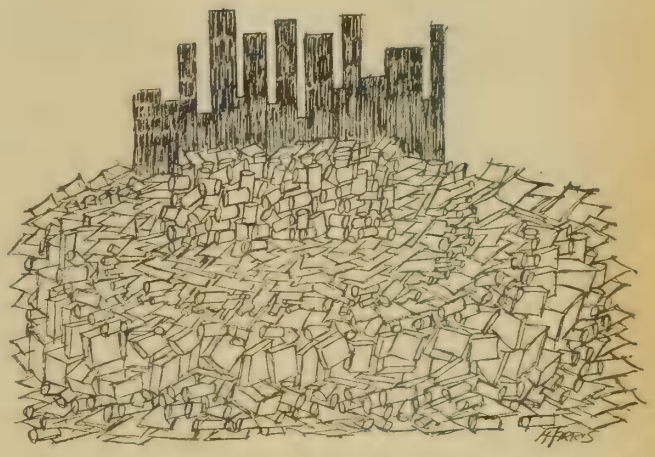
The accumulation of solid waste in the United States is reaching alarming dimensions. Each person throws away more than half again as much waste as he discarded fifty years ago. A larger and more affluent population, buying an increasing quantity of goods designed to be discarded after temporary use, produces a gigantic disposal problem. Each one of us in a year throws away 188 pounds of paper, 250 metal cans, 135 bottles and jars, 338 caps and crowns, and $2.50 worth of miscellaneous packaging. And every year we amass 2 per cent more refuse which, coupled with a 2 per cent annual population growth, indicates a 4 per cent annual growth in the solid waste disposal problem.

In 1920, the daily per capita disposal was somewhat less than 3 pounds; in 1965 it was 4.5 pounds, not including industrial solid wastes, which account for an equal amount. In 1920 the citizens of this country were throwing away 100 billion pounds per year; today the amount is more than 720 billion pounds per year—not including 6 trillion pounds of mineral and agricultural solid wastes. By 1985, household wastes alone will amount to an estimated 1.25 trillion pounds per year.

The trend is illustrated by the history of glass containers. The first "no deposit, no return" beer bottle was made in 1938; in 1958 more than 1 billion bottles were made, and in 1965, nearly 5 billion bottles were distributed. The throwaway soft-drink bottle production was more than 1 billion. By 1970, the estimated combined beer and soft-drink use will exceed 12 billion nonreturnable bottles. That's 33 million bottles a day.

Nearly all major urban areas have run out of suitably inexpensive land for solid waste disposal, and are forced to dispose of solid waste by either long-distance removal or incineration. Incineration is more expensive than land disposal because of smoke pollution laws, and incinerator residue must be disposed of somewhere on the land.

The traditional method of disposing of solid waste was to put it either on the land, under the land, or down the side of a bank, where it decayed and was covered by vegetation. Very little thought was given to the pollution that resulted from using the land as a dump. Water, air and visual pollution weren't noticeable because their effects weren't very large. With an increasing population producing proportionately more waste, the physical insult to the land and to human sensibilities can no longer be tolerated. Urban areas must look for new methods and procedures to handle solid waste, as traditional techniques become unsatisfactory.



Few successful attempts have been made to re-use the paper, glass, plastics, rubber, rags and garbage that make up most of our domestic solid waste. About 35 per cent of total paper production, and about 10 per cent of plastics are recycled; glass not at all. The re-use of some metals is higher, as most major nonferrous metals can be economically salvaged. Copper re-use accounted for about 40 per cent of the supply in the United States in 1963, discarded lead was recovered at a rate that was more than double that produced from domestic mines, and scrap aluminum accounted for about 25 per cent of the total supply in the same year. Recovered scrap iron and steel currently account for about 50 per cent of total production. The recovery of rubber for chemicals, rubber and fibers is beginning to increase, and now stands at about 15 per cent.

The nearly 180 million tons of annual municipal refuse are estimated to contain ferrous and nonferrous metals valued at more than $1 billion. Each ton of residue from incineration contains 500 pounds of iron and 50 pounds of aluminum, copper, lead, tin and zinc. Fly ash from incinerators weighs about 20 pounds for every ton of refuse incinerated, and contains enough silver and gold to be comparable to a normal mine assay in the West.

Our solid waste disposal problems would be much worse if some materials were not recycled. A great deal more recycling could be done, but rising labor costs, uncertain markets, synthetics, and the mixing of refuse all make re-use costly and difficult.

Our industry is organized to use continuous input of new, rather than recovered, materials, and is sustained by constantly increasing consumer affluence and demands, built-in obsolescence, self-service merchandising, and competitive enterprise. We collect sometimes widely scattered resources, process and distribute them. But the responsibility of the private enterprise manufacturers stops at the shipping door. Neither distributors nor the retailers ever took responsibility for the disposal of the material they distribute (returnable bottles were an exception). Goods are used and then discarded; there are no consumers in the literal sense of the word. Responsibility thus passes from producer to user to a local government disposal agency.

So far it has been economically more feasible to build a new product out of new resources, because our industrial systems are so constituted, than to recover and re-use old products and their parts. Re-use systems could work in one of two ways: the material to be recycled could be collected by the producer, or the public agency or private individual keeps responsibility for returning the product to the producer/manufacturer (reverse distribution). The former system has worked, but in a rather disorganized and unsystematic manner; missing are economic incentives to encourage an efficient re-use system. Compounding the problem is our resistance to investment of money in an item that we will never use again. Solid waste disposal, therefore, has a low priority status with the general public and its agencies.

Recycling of garbage presents some interesting and difficult situations. Before urbanization, domestic garbage was recycled through pigs, chickens and other farm animals. Piggeries still use domestic garbage, but on a lesser scale. Garbage must be separated from nonorganic solid waste, usually in the home, which causes problems. Most states require domestic garbage to be cooked before it is fed to swine in order to stop the trichinosis cycle, a requirement that is necessary for public health but that is also expensive and time consuming for the piggery operator.

Another recycling method for garbage is composting, a process that involves biochemical degradation of the organic material. This material must be separated from ferrous metal, usually by magnet, and from all other metals, glass, paper, rubber and plastics by hand. The remainder is shredded, put through a short aerobic period to increase bacterial action and to hasten decomposition, and then allowed to cure for several months. The final product is a soil conditioner.

The product is of good quality, but the cost of producing it is greater than that of other types of soil conditioners. The cost of compost material from other sources is higher in Europe than in the United States, and thus composting of solid waste is much more widely practiced there. Contribution to the cost factor is labor (including pickers), rather expensive equipment, time for the product to mature, and the relatively low percentage of organic material in the total refuse. About 30 per cent of the original material must still be disposed of by other means. Vermin are also hard to control in a compost operation.

A number of schemes have been proposed, and a few are being developed, using other kinds of technology. For example, containers that dissolve in water or by the action of soil acids and sunlight are being investigated. Organic solid waste, mixed with sewage sludge, may give a high-grade composting material, provided that the pathogens can be removed. This process may also be valuable in curtailing excessive use of nitrogen, and thereby slowing down the tendency toward entropy in lakes and waterways.

Home solid waste grinders, analogous to contemporary garbage grinders, have been proposed. These larger and more rugged units might handle objects of paper, glass, plastics and light metal up to a cubic foot or more in size. After grinding, the material would be disposed of through sewer systems.

The Japanese have built large compactors to reduce solid waste to high-density blocks, which are then encased in an asphalt sealer and used for building foundations and other construction purposes. The city of Cleveland is also experimenting with a similar technique, using a mixture of solid waste, fly ash, dried sewage sludge, river and lake dredgings, and incinerator residue made into small, compact bricks for use as fill material to reclaim submerged lands adjacent to Lake Erie.

Paper products make up the largest percentage of most domestic solid waste. Since paper is nearly all cellulose, and since ruminants (cattle) can digest cellulose and turn it into protein, a number of public and private groups are experimenting with the use of paper products, supplemented with vitamins and minerals, as cattle feed. Today's newspaper may be tomorrow's steak.

Power production from incinerated solid waste has also been proposed. Milan, Italy, will soon be running all of its streetcars and subways by electricity generated by incinerated solid waste. Similar attempts in this country have been less successful, however, because of the inconsistent quality of the refuse to be incinerated and the production of electricity by other, hitherto less expensive means.

Other ideas have been put forward, such as adding hydrogen to wastepaper to make a high-grade fuel. Sanitary land-fill techniques along the sides of highways, power lines, sewer interceptors and other public rights of way have also been suggested. Such innovations have met with little enthusiasm, however, due to economic factors, entrenched procedures and lack of organized promotion campaigns.

The annual sum spent on solid waste collection and disposal in this country is large in comparison with other services. The annual cost of refuse collection and disposal, according to a recent federal document, is estimated at more than $4.5 billion, an amount that is exceeded only by schools and roads among public services. An estimated additional $750 million will have to be spent each year over the next five years to bring the collection and disposal systems of the nation to an acceptable health and aesthetic level.

The figures show only how much we have extracted from our natural environment, used briefly, and discarded permanently. They tell nothing about the supply of metals, pulp and other resources still left in the natural environment that we will use once and discard. Will we run out of resources before we choke on our own midden?

We can no longer treat solid waste as something to be shoved so far away that we'll never see it. There just isn't anywhere left to put it. We must learn to treat solid waste as a fact of life, and learn how to live with it, as we have learned to live with, or at least tolerate, sewers, automobiles, manufacturing plants and all other aspects of our modern age.

It should also be realized that our traditional attitude toward solid waste disposal is untenable in view of further environmental deterioration. This attitude can be characterized by the phrase "symptom-chasing." The disposal problem will not be solved by improving procedural techniques: it can only be postponed for a few years at best. The ultimate goal of refuse disposal—or any pollution control—is 100 per cent recycling of materials and energy. Advanced refuse recycling systems for urban areas are in the distant future; for the countryside they are even further away.

The problem can be viewed from another perspective. To control the effluent of our affluent society one must understand and rectify the causes in human behavior, and not just the symptoms. If a man has a brain tumor we would hardly expect his total treatment to be an aspirin. We must somehow convince the refuse makers—both the producers and the consumer-users (that means all of us)—that our overpackaged, overstuffed, throw-away life-style will bring long-term ecological and economic disaster. We probably will not much longer have the luxury of making decisions that will affect the ecosystem, as nearly all decisions ultimately do, based solely on economic and political expediency.

It is comparatively simple to write about solid waste practices and to recommend certain changes and improvements. It would be infinitely more difficult—but much more to the point—to study ways of drastically reducing solid waste effluent. And we must recognize that our solid waste situation, as well as our larger environment, can be improved only by self-imposed restraints.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

The Apostle of Nonviolence

GANDHI'S TRUTH: On the Origins of Militant Nonviolence. By Erik H. Erikson. W. W. Norton & Co. 474 pp. $10.

RONALD SAMPSON

Mr. Sampson is a lecturer in politics at the University of Bristol. His most recent book is The Psychology of Power (Pantheon).

Under the slightly melodramatic title "Near Death's Door" Gandhi begins the 28th chapter of his Autobiography with the bald but plaintive statement: "I very nearly ruined my constitution during the recruiting campaign." The year was 1918. Gandhi was 49 years old. His doctor diagnosed his prolonged illness as "a nervous breakdown." Gandhi's suffering was very real; but it is difficult to repress a sad smile at the spectacle of the apostle of Ahimsa (Nonviolence) trudging a weary 20 miles a day through the villages of Gujarat to recruit soldiers to fight the enemies of the King-Emperor, George V. No wonder Gandhi fell ill—particularly since the villagers, to his chagrin, were not taken in by the devious arguments he advanced for betraying his own principles, and refused to be recruited. Even Gandhi's iron constitution was not equipped to contain with immunity a repressed inner conflict of such explosive dimensions.

Since Gandhi was, of course, unaware of the true source of his symptoms, he treats us to a lengthy disquisition on his experiments in dietary therapeutics, the temptations of the excellent cooking of his devoted wife, the value of ice packs, and the state of his anal tract. Finally he found relief in the milk of the goat, the milk of the cow being excluded by reason of an earlier vow. But Gandhi's love of the truth was irrepressible also; and tucked away in the midst of all the quack medicine—Western and Eastern—he tells us of the arrival of news of the end of the war with Germany. He acknowledges frankly: "The news that I had no longer to worry myself about recruiting came as a very great relief." A masterpiece of understatement.

Gandhi in South Africa, by his exemplary fearlessness and espousal of nonviolent resistance, had led the Indian community in successful struggle against legislative discrimination. By middle age he had thus decisively found his role in life, but on returning to India in 1915, he was faced with the problem of how to establish himself as heir apparent to the leadership of the Swaraj (Independence) movement in the eyes of the existing nationalist leaders, the British and the people at large. The people could be won by devoted service, and Gandhi gave it. Political power could be conquered only by the methods of power, and Gandhi resorted to them—at a price, as we have seen.

Professor Erikson, with that acuity of analytic insight to which he has accustomed us, enables us to relate Gandhi's lifelong ambivalence in the matter of the relation between morals and politics to the Oedipean conflict of his childhood. Gandhi's father, a powerful figure both politically and domestically, aroused his son's ambitions as well as his resentment. Gandhi refers to his father as short-tempered and "given to carnal pleasures." Gandhi's mother, a pious Hindu, was his father's fourth wife, an 18-year-old mate for her thrice-married, 40-year-old husband. Gandhi's unconscious pity for his mother, the object of aggressive "carnal pleasure," was combined with strongly ambivalent attitudes toward his father which were intensified when he was himself forced by his father into marriage at the age of 13. To disobey would arouse heavy guilt feelings as well as run counter to powerfully developing libidinal emotions. To obey would be to commit the same "offense" which he despised his father for committing—only more so, for his own bride was a playmate of 13. An impossible and cruel dilemma!

That Gandhi's own sexual history throughout life was compulsive in expression and fanatical in abstinence is scarcely surprising. In his attempts to escape, Gandhi alternated between revolt against his father and efforts to appease his guilt by painstaking devotion in nursing him when ill or stricken. Hence the morbidity of his guilt when his failure to be present at his father's deathbed was occasioned by his own concupiscence. Similarly Gandhi alternately rebelled and fought against the British and yet twice recruited for ambulance corps (and once even for soldiers) for them when the Empire was in danger.

Erikson, with characteristic discernment, quotes Gandhi's revealing imagery when speaking of the Mother of Parliaments as a prostitute in the service of successive Prime Ministers (Gandhi's father was a Prime Minister). The imagery, says Erikson, bespeaks not only Gandhi's infantile emotions; it speaks also to all the sons of ravished colonial countries. Tolstoy, who admired Gandhi and wrote to him on the need to concentrate primarily on refusals of military service, also commented that Gandhi's fatal weakness was his Hindu patriotism. This patriotism, which led logically to the struggle for political power to evict the British ravishers of Mother India, was grounded in powerful infantile emotions. There is unconscious pathos in Gandhi's "it behooves every lover of India to cling to the old Indian civilization even as a child clings to the mother's breast."

Gandhi understood the truth clearly; he brought to the task of implementing Ahimsa unrivaled capacities for heroic courage and self-sacrifice; but the complex of emotions within his breast was never freed from the corrupting love of power at the roots. The struggle with Jinnah and its appallingly tragic consequences was again logically entailed. Nationalism feeds nationalism—others' besides one's own—and the compromises demanded by power effectively becloud and confuse the clarity and simplicity of the truth that liberates men's souls. "Prophet in His Own Country" Erikson entitles one chapter. But that would be to violate one of the laws of life. Gandhi was a hero in his own country, but a compromised one, nevertheless. The gallows still flourishes in India when it has been abolished elsewhere. The army is a revered institution there as elsewhere. It would be absurd to hold him responsible, but Gandhi's military funeral was not entirely undeserved, all the same.

Professor Erikson unfortunately shares Gandhi's own ambivalence on the subject of Gandhi's recruiting efforts; and is therefore unable to diagnose the true nature of his middle-age identity crisis without ambiguity. While he gives fascinating and highly relevant material, much of it brilliantly construed, the central problem is never clearly focused. On the contrary, the central hinge of Gandhi's crisis is seen as the Ahmedabad strike, reviewed in great detail with the aid of first-hand witnesses, which though interesting never substantiates the author's exaggerated claims for its crucial role in Gandhi's development. The Champaran campaign was surely at least as important, subjectively as well as objectively.

Erikson not only condones Gandhi's rationalization to justify his role as recruiting sergeant but adds embellishments of his own. Only those who lived in India under the Raj can fully apprehend the humiliation and degradation that corroded human relations in the social pyramid from the Viceroy to the lowest of the untouchables. Nevertheless, Gandhi's reasoning that in order to restore the subjugated to a sense of their lost manhood and give them back their self-respect, it is first necessary to teach them to learn the courage to kill in self-defense, is false, pitifully false. For Erikson to accept this reasoning and then extend the parallel to the Jews of the Diaspora in relation to contemporary Israel, is false and highly dangerous. He speaks of "the greatness of leaders who sanction the killing of those led by other kinds of leaders." There is no such greatness. He speaks of "honoring the duty [a military oath] stands for." It stands for legalized murder: it cannot be honored. These arguments are best refuted by Erikson himself later in the book: "For all have become obedient to the policing mind; and once we have learned to reduce 'the other'—any living human being in the wrong place, the wrong category, or the wrong uniform—to a dirty speck in our moral vision, and potentially a mere target in the sight of our (or our soldiery's) gun, we are on the way to violating man's essence, if not his very life."

Genetic Programming

MEN IN GROUPS. By Lionel Tiger. Random House. 254 pp. $6.95.

JACK LEAVITT
Mr. Leavitt is an assistant professor of law at John F. Kennedy University, and a free-lance writer.

Men In Groups is a dull book with profound implications. Although its writing is stilted, endlessly apologetic and somewhat inconclusive, its main premise demands respectful attention. According to Dr. Lionel Tiger, a 32-year-old Canadian anthropologist now teaching at Rutgers University, men are attracted to other men by urges as basic as those which draw them to women. The man-man (or man-men) bond is not a sexual attraction but a linkage that gives the resulting combination of males—the team—an opportunity for individual and group fulfillment. The coin of that fulfillment is invariably aggression, biologically sponsored aggression, against outsiders. Men unite and aggress because they cannot do otherwise.

Dr. Tiger's opting for biological necessity is the result of "promiscuous eclecticism," i.e., lots of reading. He rejects personal efforts in field research and specific experimentation largely because those approaches, he feels, would contribute nothing to an understanding of how males relate to one another and what this means for their communities. An intellectual "lumper," he advocates a multi-disciplinary approach by biologists, sociologists and anthropologists to see human problems in their fullest dimensions.

His leap from recognition of world-wide "male" phenomena to acceptance of an inherited socio-sexual determinant is, of course, a great—and possibly unnecessary—leap. Dr. Tiger himself says that he does not know what kind of biological mechanisms would operate to produce the postulated result. Yet the absence of certain variables in a world that was allegedly free should make us question whether the freedom really exists or whether we have optimistically assumed that it does because we prefer having a choice about our destinies. If we had no choice, how would we know it? Whatever else we decide, we should not reject his data out of hand because of distaste for its implications and consequences.

While Dr. Tiger tries to distinguish between aggression and violence, he never defangs his own proposition that any attempts to minimize aggression amount to tampering with ancient and central patterns of human behavior. The more harmony there exists within a male group the more unified strength—and necessity—there is for pressure outside the group. Equally true, we cooperate best when we have a common enemy. Dr. Tiger edges away from the implications of his analysis by suggesting that human beings, as a hunting species, must have hope—but the only optimistic feature of his work is the chance that his surmise is wrong.

To the extent that we refuse to accept genetic programming as conclusively governing our behavior and capabilities, much as our ancestors snubbed great-grand-uncles who lived in trees, we are bound to resist Dr. Tiger's arguments, regardless of the plausibility of his approach. The liberal ethic demands no less.

Without any assurance of the ultimate perfectability of mankind, through acts of good will, where can we place our faith? Without the illusion that the only time is right now and the only toll for progress is courage, how can we improve upon the past? And if we can do no better for ourselves than has already been done to us, why bother with anything?

Even so, we should be impressed by the simplicity and universality of Dr. Tiger's examples. He finds male bonding—and aggression—in baboon groups, college fraternities, political "back rooms," armies, poker clubs, secret societies, athletic teams, barroom regulars, hunting organizations, and the like. We see the pattern and claim it for our well-reasoned plan. We realize, for example, that despite women's numerical strength, only men consistently hold positions of power in government and the military anywhere in the world and at all levels of culture. Why? Because, we annotate our excuses, of childbearing, menstruation, stamina, tradition and, above all, popular choice.

And underlying our entire explanation is the promise that, on signal, we could reverse our field and adopt new cultural values. But if male dominance in the social activities that determine group safety is an incidental, changeable arrangement and not an inherited necessity, why are we unable to find a "genuine matriarchate" in any known civilization? (The mythical Amazons, remember, burned off their right breasts to make themselves better archers.) Are we faced with a statistical curiosity? Inadequate data? A common denominator of highly efficient social organization? Or, perhaps, something else?

If Dr. Tiger has woven his research into a valid pattern—and he has marshaled his evidence well enough to be troublesome—we must then concede that biological factors lead directly to human aggression. As the necessary end product of our inherited genes, rather than the erratic result of our cultural choices, aggressive behavior is the human condition. Under this theory, men, wherever they are, will band together with other men to engage in "conscious coercion" against the will of other individuals or groups. Whether tuxedoed, painted blue or wearing bones in their noses; whether worshiping a God who promises peace or an idol who shrieks for war; whether eager or reluctant, men will mate and strike. Male plus female yields male with aggressive tendencies; male with aggressive tendencies plus male with aggressive tendencies equals human society.

We can look to the stars, knowing that physical laws will prevent us from ever traveling to those brilliant pinpoints. We can look at ourselves, suspecting that genetic patterns old as Cenozoic mud will prevent us from living in peace. We do, after all, destroy ourselves. The only question is, "Must we?"

The Astronomer and the Boy

NUDE CROQUET. By Leslie A. Fiedler. Stein and Day. 288 pp. $5.95.

THE EGG OF THE GLAK. By Harvey Jacobs. Harper & Row. 276 pp. $5.95.

ANNETTE GRANT
Miss Grant, a free-lance writer, was formerly a book reviewer for Newsweek.

It would be difficult to find two collections of short stories more unlike than those of Harvey Jacobs and Leslie Fiedler. Jacobs is an idea man and Fiedler a man of ideas: the first spins tales that are comical and inventive; the second constructs virtual fables of social or philosophical attitudes. One is innocent of ideology, the other proposes Important Truths with a debater's fervor. To paraphrase Mark Twain, the difference is that between a boy and an astronomer.

The stories in Nude Croquet represent, according to the book jacket, "all of the short fiction that Mr. Fiedler wishes to preserve." Only four of the stories are newly collected and one of these—"Bad Scene at Buffalo Jump," a description of an Indian peyote ceremony—also appears in his novel Back to China. Some of these stories were first published twenty years ago, and it is a good deal harder now to become excited about yet another exposure of the hypocrisies and ambivalences of the liberal mind. But together, they offer a panorama of the author's pet obsessions: Jewish identity wrung from exile and alienation; gentile desire both to assimilate and to discriminate against outsiders; white guilt about Indians and Negroes; the political failure of liberals of the thirties; men's sexual revenge on women; the fear of (or desire for) sterility; and the various forms of male homosexual love.

Fiedler has explored these ideas brilliantly in his essays and criticism, particularly in Waiting for the End and Love and Death in the American Novel. But his strength as a social, intellectual, and literary historian is his weakness as a writer of fiction. Nude Croquet might be subtitled "pedagogical parables," so frequently do the ideological or symbolic overtones obtrude. His characters tend to remain abstractions anthropomorphized but insufficiently humanized. ("An Expense of Spirit," "Nobody Ever Died from It" and "Pull Down Vanity!" are honorable exceptions.) In "The Stain," which concerns itself with black self-hatred, a party member Negro (named Ham, yet), dreams that he is white and conscripted to wash from a stone an ancient and ineradicable stain. An army officer addresses him as "Stein," thus killing two black birds (only one being Jewish) with one stain. (The pun is laboriously explicated.) In case anyone misses the point, Fiedler spells it out in black and white: "Their stain, he cried in his head bitterly, their shame! . . . their lie. . . . Either the internal blackness was a human blackness, the dark failure of everybody, or else there was no stain, as the Party had taught—no stain at all."

In "Dirty Ralphy," a childhood memory based on the evolution of Jewish self-hatred, the symbols are less ostentatious. But again the story founders in sociology. "Later, when poverty came to seem to me not a symptom but a cause of disease, and I had been convinced that we others, not poor, were dying of it too, I felt remorse for my contempt of Ralphy, and could only believe him a victim, our hostility a disguise for social guilt, an uneasy hatred of what nurtured and defined our comfort."

"Let Nothing You Dismay" also explores a child's world of little understood ancestral burdens. The daughter of a gentile-Jewish marriage tries to puzzle out why "At the heart of her Christmases, she was aware of the sore." She rejects Santa Claus as probably unreal but, still, he might be that equally mysterious entity, a "Joo." Her father isn't much help. "It's mine, my crime, my disease, my sore. . . . If I had thought, marrying you, I would infect you, my children. . . ."

The inhabitants of Fiedler's tales have in common the rawness of their various wounds, their talent for pouring salt, however inadvertently, on them, and, finally, their propensity to assert that "unhappiness is a virtue." In the title story, a group of dropouts of the 1930s gathers for a reunion. As the long evening wears on, the company, middle-aged, flabby and drunken, strips for an indoor game of croquet (the wickets are formed by spraddled books). Once their defenses are down, their intellects conquered by the starkness of ugly bodies, the consequences are obvious, but still horrifying. They revert to primitivism and orgiastically sacrifice the weakest man's life to the communal gods of guilt and shame.

"The thing is, I was overly concerned with my own symbols." The line might have been written of Fiedler. Instead it is Jacobs' Oliver August ("The Girl Who Drew the Gods") who speaks. The way he continues suggests the difference between the obsessions of the

"We are special." "We are different." "We are outward bound from the old corruptions of the world."

Today's young people are creating a new culture, says Theodore Roszak—one that may transform our deepest sense of the self, of others, of our environment. His penetrating examination of this counter-culture and its major influences—including Herbert Marcuse, Norman Brown, Paul Goodman and Alan Watts—is an important antidote to the frequent hysteria of the mass-media on the subject. For in finding an answer to the question "How shall we live?" the new culture will be countering the crowning achievement of our technocratic society—the promise of thermonuclear annihilation.

THE MAKING OF A COUNTER CULTURE
THEODORE ROSZAK
$7.95 at all booksellers
Anchor paperbound, $1.95
DOUBLEDAY

one author and the vagaries of the other. August has been suffering from his last visit to the dentist, and the symbols he is overly concerned with are scarcely Fiedler's: "Every night, my book by my bed, I dreamed about inlays, crowns, and unnatural bridges. With the equipment I used for chewing, a family in Peking could live like mandarins."

The guilts and taboos of Fiedler's world appear in Jacobs' only to be dismissed. Sickness, sterility and death—Fiedlerian themes—may receive explicit notice, but only as fugitives. The triad is no more than the last of a series of topics discussed in a course called "Know the Navaho II." "Wakanda Good. Love. Babies. Corn. Wakanda Evil. Dwarfs. Ogres. Underwater people. Thunder people. Maize blight. Sickness. Sterility. Death."

Where Fiedler's stories are intractably abstract, Jacobs' are winningly direct. There are, as the title suggests, elements of science fiction, but usually just enough to give the unmistakable stamp of true-to-life absurdity. In "The Voyage of the Peanut," a country boy gets a job in the big city (Los Angeles) as a walking advertisement, dressed as a giant peanut. His first day begins "when out of the blue a little kid off the sidewalk ran up to me and threw an arm lock around my haunches." She bites into his ankle, not because he is a Jew, Negro or Communist but because she is hungry. Later, the peanut is picked up by a famous movie actress with novel sexual tastes. "Now," she said. "Emerge! Cast off thy shell." The prince in a peanut is eager to oblige but cannot extricate himself and must be cracked open with a nutcracker. So much for the inner life.

Jacobs, unencumbered by the obligation to expose the failures of civilization, peoples his stories with an engaging abandon. At the center there is usually a man beset, a man in a quandary—but never a very serious one, never more serious than being trapped in a peanut shell. In "Reasons of Health" it is an American businessman trapped in Teheran by a phony health official; in "The Lion's Share," a campus epic, it is a shy poet who tries to keep his muse on a pedestal while she wants only to stoop to folly; in the title story it is a young man who agrees to transport the last egg of the extinct Glak to its native habitat in Labrador. The ordeal has all the earmarks of bedroom farce, for the hero must not only satisfy the sexual demands of four women but must also cohabit with the egg.

The Horatian dictum that art should either instruct or entertain suggests the differences between Fiedler and Jacobs. The distinction is not absolute. Fiedler sometimes abandons his didactic posture and achieves powerfully direct scenes, such as the unconsummated seduction in "Pull Down Vanity!" or the concurrent stripping of clothes and the vestments of civilization in "Nude Croquet." Jacobs makes tentative forays into the Fiedlerian territory of morality and conscience, as in "Epilogue" (typically, the first story in the collection). But on the whole, the two writers' apprehensions of the world still remain as far apart as those of the astronomer and the boy.

The Human Environment

EXPEDITION NINE. By Benton MacKaye. The Wilderness Society. 56 pp. $4.

FROM GEOGRAPHY TO GEOTECHNICS. By Benton MacKaye. Edited by Paul T. Bryant. University of Illinois Press. 194 pp. $5.95.

MAN IN THE LANDSCAPE: A Historic View of the Esthetics of Nature. By Paul Shepard. Alfred A. Knopf. 295 pp. $6.95.

THE SUBVERSIVE SCIENCE: Essays Toward an Ecology of Man. Edited by Paul Shepard and Daniel McKinley. Houghton Mifflin Co. 453 pp. $8.95.

FREDERICK GUTHEIM

Mr. Gutheim is a Washington-based consultant on urban affairs and planning and former president of the Washington Center for Metropolitan Studies. His volume, The Potomac (Rivers of America Series) was recently reissued by Grosset & Dunlap.

The world around us has become increasingly a universal human responsibility. As hunter and fisherman, man lived innocently with nature, a part of it. With the domestication of animals, with engineering technologies, with chemicals, man exploits nature, interferes with natural processes, depletes natural and human resources. The polarity of man and nature becomes man versus nature. The dominance of man that is assured by technology has now made inescapable the question whether man can avoid destroying his natural environment (perhaps including himself), and if so, what balance should be struck between the interests of man and the deteriorating human environment.

The history of agriculture offers many illustrations of the possibilities of such a harmonious relationship. If we knew as much about urban history it is likely that we would find a shrewd appreciation of such natural relationships to be the fundamental interpretive consideration in Venice, in Amsterdam and other cities built in fragile natural situations. Regrettably, not human history but the broader concerns of biology have inspired the mainstream of environmental studies and created the science of ecology. Thus far we have been shown the profound and widespread changes in nature—the extinction of entire species, the changes of ocean and climatic scale—that have been produced by technology. More recently, in terms of the human environment, the pollution of air and water, noise, the impact of urbanization, and above all, the pressures of increasing population, have been described. We are at the threshold of understanding the deficiencies of the urban environment—which is rapidly becoming the universal human condition—and its deteriorating effects upon man. The search for such understanding is frustrated, however, by the lack of an intellectual discipline which embraces both man and his environment.

Neither biology nor the social sciences has shown a convincing ability to move in this direction. Those who determine the human environment—architects, engineers, planners—are armed with blunt weapons. For the lack of such insight, the entire apparatus of government, law, economics, morality and human behavior hesitates, indecisive and mute. Those engaged in the tasks of environmental conservation often appear public moralists rather than men acting in the light of scientific authority, and their urgings are intrinsically the topics of controversy unresolvable except by the political process. These doubts and contradictions have been reflected in three important books during the last year: Raymond Dasmann's A Different Kind of Country; William H. Whyte's The Last Landscape, and Ian MacHarg's Design With Nature. No one can read such frequently apocalyptic utterances without the conviction that they are at best descriptions of problems, and at worst, nonsense. Until we have achieved and developed with greater certitude an apparatus for controlling human interventions, there will be little chance either of doing the right things or even of agreeing on what must be done to answer the question, "Can Man Survive?"—a query somberly posed and unconvincingly answered in this year's centennial of the American Museum of Natural History.

To face this question, we might look at earlier intellectual and cultural efforts at understanding man and nature. This is the approach of Paul Shepard. Or we can look at the results of organized practical activity in this field—principally the movement to conserve natural resources, commencing in the United States about 1908—the approach reflected in the writings of Benton MacKaye.

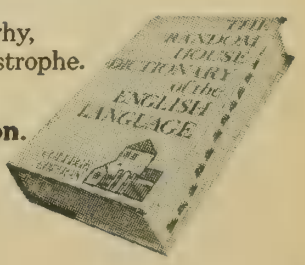
MacKaye is living history. He celebrated his 90th birthday this year. Educated and professionally active as a forester, he early expressed broader interest in the human environment, or the habitat as he termed it. The habitability of regions, of cities, of the world has been his concern; and doing something about it, his activity. Some landmarks in a notable career have been his creation of the Appalachian Trail, proposals for sustained yield forestry based on the planning of stable communities for such work, participation in the initial regional plans for New York State and, with greater skepticism, of the Tennessee Valley. As a member of the Regional Planning Association of America he was associated with Clarence S. Stein, Lewis Mumford and others in initiating national programs of housing and community development which yielded Radburn, the Greenbelt towns, and much of the present technique of new town building. (Such planning programs could provide a most valuable stock of experience. Yet they have received almost no careful examination, except an excellent but rather specialized account by Roy Lubove in his Community Planning in the 1920's. The continuity of planning efforts over such a long period of time—more than half a century—commands attention. In the context of the projected United Nations 1972 conference on the human environment, one is even more conscious of the value and uniqueness of our national contribution to both the theoretical and the practical aspects of the problem, and even more frustrated by its relative obscurity.)

Nothing short of a full biography with extensive documentation, and a collection of his writings and letters, will really make clear MacKaye's contribution. The two volumes under consideration here must be regarded as contributions to the more comprehensive story, rather than as complete works in themselves. MacKaye's "expeditions" in the vicinity of Shirley Center, his Massachusetts home, are charming, insightful accounts of the changing environment of what is today part of the Boston exurbia, but still retains its aspect of a New England town. As in Expedition Nine, and everything else he has written, there is a strong flavor of personal experience, if not autobiography, in From Geography to Geotechnics. The series of essays from which this collection receives its title, published in The Survey when MacKaye had retired, is the outline for a more ambitious work. One can see now that such a work would have been impossible to complete, given the state of environmental thought in 1950, yet MacKaye's contribution is both clear and valuable in this form, and it can be accepted as his most mature statement of his views, reflecting a lifetime's experience with nature and human beings, regions and cities, practice and theory.

Paul T. Bryant has rounded out the volume with a well-selected group of MacKaye's other essays dating from 1919 to 1940, chosen to document the outlines of his philosophy. Bryant persuasively contends that MacKaye belongs, with Thoreau and others, to a select group of American writers who have contributed to the American awareness of our continental engagement with nature and the responsibilities we must assume. He regards MacKaye as a primary figure among those concerned with the quality of the environment, with, as Bryant expresses it in an excellent introduction, the "race to preserve habitability and establish the general practice of geotechnics before the environment has been finally and irretrievably destroyed." This collection of essays re-establishes at the right time a seminal thinker in a great national tradition and his importance in finding a solution to an urgent contemporary problem.

In a longer historical framework we have Paul Shepard's book, Man in the Landscape, and his anthology of readings in ecology, The Subversive Science. Biologists and anthropologists will not take kindly to many of Shepard's ideas and assertions; scientists will be uncomfortable with his mysticism; historians will doubtless pick flaws in his wide-ranging treatment of prehistoric animal husbandry, the attitudes toward nature of Italian Renaissance poets and 19th-century romanticists, and Theodore Roosevelt's philosophy of field sports and the strenuous life. But Man in the Landscape is an original and challenging presentation, rich with ideas, references and information. Ecology for Shepard is a cultural adventure.

A still richer feast has been laid in the collection of essays Shepard and Daniel McKinley have assembled. The authors include Paul Sears, René Dubos, Raymond Fosberg, LaMont Cole and other authorities. It is a genuine editorial accomplishment to have selected writings that are at once representative of their authors' thought, contributory to the overall themes of the volume, and fresh and contemporary in tone and style. But to complement this orthodoxy (if "the subversive science" can be said to have any establishment viewpoint) there are less familiar figures like Paul L. Errington, Erich Isaac and Colin Bertram, and stimulating contributors from peripheral



What is James A. Michener reading?

One of the books James Michener reads is our dictionary. The Random House College Dictionary. It has more definitions of words than any other college dictionary. More of today's new words, too. Maybe that's why Mr. Michener uses it. The Random House College Dictionary. $6.95. ($7.95 thumb indexed.)

If you want to read James Michener, his newest book is Presidential Lottery. It's an urgent book all about our electoral system. It tells why the system is inadequate and irrational for our time, and why, under certain circumstances, it could be a catastrophe.

The Random House Dictionary of the English Language/College Edition.

One of the books writers read.

fields, including Jacquetta Hawkes, J. B. Jackson, Laura Thompson and Edith Cobb. I cannot imagine anyone reading this collection without finding literary pleasure, intellectual stimulation and the solid satisfactions of learning. A most valuable anthology.

Incredible amounts of trash, from Pop science to Pop mysticism, are being offered a reading public that is increasingly alarmed by the environmental deterioration it sees on every hand, whether in cities or in national parks, at home or abroad. Predictably, environmental quality will decline further before the elaborate and necessary long-range measures to deal with population pressures, with environmental pollution, with the major economic forces involved, can become effective, or before the necessary public resolution is mustered to make the enormous expenditures needed to achieve a high-quality environment. No one can really escape some responsibility for such matters and these books, particularly the last, offer a splendid beginning from wherever you are.

Mies and the Closing of the Bauhaus

RICHARD STERN
Mr. Stern has just finished his sixth book of fiction, Veni, Vidi . . . Wendt, and his first book of poems, Some Home Truths (Some Abroad).

Building and literature are the political arts, but builders have often had to be more politic than political. How else will they get sites, get materials? And it's a fortiori for classical builders, the designers of those "typical" buildings of the age which anonymities reproduce for the quick appetite of business. What were the politics of Callicrates, of Bramante, of Mies van der Rohe?

What are the politics of rocks?
Resistance.

In the farewell salutes to Mies, I read no word of his part in the closing of the Bauhaus. Perhaps the story isn't known. It certainly isn't known as well as it should be. I heard it from the genial—the genialisch—old fellow a year ago. Four of us paid him a cocktail-hour visit in the old apartment next to the Pearson Hotel on the near North Side. A thirties apartment, chambered beyond need, wary of outside light. Rather bare within, for there were no rugs and the furniture was against the wall so Mies could wheel around the place. For decoration, marvelous pictures of his buildings, the Barcelona Pavilion, a stage of the great National Gallery not yet open in Berlin. And one of the clearest, most beautiful Picassos I'd ever seen, a Spanish cousin of Klee. Against the walls, Mies chairs and non-Mies sofas, many covered with blueprints and ruled drawings, extraordinary in a glimpse for line, detail and delicacy.

The builder himself, in his wheel chair, was—in seconds—not only presence but personage. A wonderful talker, ebullient, a fountain of ease, his great arched head tilting in the humor of things with memories, comment, hospitality.

The memory I want to recall here is the closing of the Bauhaus. I may have some of the details wrong, but this is substantially what he said of it.

He'd been head of the school for a few months. It had moved from Dessau and one other place to Berlin (or somewhere near Berlin). He said: "One day we came in and found it closed up. I went in to see Rosenberg to complain about it. He said to me, 'It's not me that's shut it. I don't want to close it, I'm an architect myself, have my degree from Riga.' I said, 'If you're an architect, how can you sit at such a desk? If I were you, I'd throw it out the window.' He said, 'It must be the Gestapo who's closed it.' So I went over to the Gestapo. The head of it then was a young fellow, 27 or 28, and I sat outside his office on a narrow bench, day after day, all day long. He kept avoiding me, going out the back door, but one day, he came out to call someone, and I went up to him and asked what it was all about. He said, 'There's So-and-So in your group who keeps shooting off his mouth.' 'That may be,' I said, 'but that is not our business.' 'Well all right,' he said, 'we'll let you open, but let's hope you can control things.' And the next day we came and it was open, and I called everybody together and said, 'They've given us permission to reopen. Now I suggest we close it.' And we did."

It may not be politics, but let's make the most of it. Cheers, Mies, and fare you well.

Unicorn French Poets

DAVID KLEINBARD
Mr. Kleinbard teaches at Queens College and is at work on a novel.

The Unicorn Press of Santa Barbara, Calif., has published a number of the most talented modern French poets in a series of handsomely designed paperbacks. The series reflects the richesse and variety of French poetry from Corbière, the 19th-century symbolist of the harbor and the slum, through the psychic revolutions and dream countries of surrealism, to the lucid, controlled visionary realism of three very different poets —Supervielle, Char and Guillevic. Four of the volumes are reviewed below.

MICHAUX. Translated by Teo Savory. Unicorn Press. 70 pp. $4. Paper $1.50.

"I come to cut you to bits," Henri Michaux snarls at the world in "Contre!" one of the many violently revolutionary poems in this collection. For Michaux the world is a carcass, its cultures are "frozen," its inhabitants "walking dead." In its place he promises not a return to Paradise or a City of God, but a city built with rags, smoke, diluted fog, whirlpools, shocks and blows, "snake-venom" and "wolf-teeth." Michaux writes to lash the "walking dead" into life, to pummel the soft "mediocrities" he sees around him into a state of painfully awakened awareness. This is "an eternity" of "seeking without finding," and of intolerable emptiness and solitude, when the self and its surroundings seem insubstantial and the "arms of desires" are twisted with endless frustration.

In the afterword to Mes Propriétés, Henri Michaux insists that he writes without method or deliberate construction. A mood, a dream, or a narcotic hallucination opens an artery leading up from the unconscious. Sometimes the absence of logical connections is exasperating. But even then, the interplay of rhymes and the irregular, impulsive rhythms may save the poem for the reader. In "L'Avenir," the last poem of the Unicorn edition, Michaux breaks free from the constraints imposed by language itself and brings poetry even closer to music with a marvelous celebration of sounds. Bizarre animals of language, the "mahahahahahas," "matratrimatratrihahas," and "honcucarachoncus" of "L'Avenir," seem perfectly at home in the poetry of Henri Michaux, where all things undergo astonishing metamorphoses, and even God turns into a magnificent monster with a thousand infected buttocks sitting in a strangled world.

CORBIERE. English Versions by Teo Savory. Unicorn Press. 48 pp. $4. Paper $1.50.

In his poetry Tristan Corbière sought to be a young Proteus, clowning, swiftly changing from one grotesque shape to another, escaping comprehension. "Meditations on My Self-Portrait" flaunts his desire to be a whore's pet dog or a goddess with flowing tail and mane on the African coast. Corbière, the "toad" with an "eye of light," the "nightingale of the mud," escaped the insipidity of ordinary life by deforming and degrading himself into the most singular creature in his corner of Brittany. Living among sailors and prostitutes, he dressed as a convict, a woman, or a bishop with two eyes painted on his forehead, wearing a miter and leading a beribboned pig. The last years of his short life (he died at the age of 29 in 1875) created a legendary model for the surrealists and Dadaists.

Corbière adopted the sailors' slang and developed an ironic, conversational style that later influenced T. S. Eliot. In "After Rain," for example, his argot reverberates with double meanings, and the rhymes of dissonant words provide a richly varied play of wit in the dialogues between the eager poet and the woman who insists she isn't a whore. Like Baudelaire, Corbière invests vulgar and disgusting objects with the power to awaken awe or fascination. In "Paris by Night" he endows the corpse of a drowned man with a hideous sublimity, as he describes the fountain of life singing its "eternal song on the slimed green head / Of the ancient sea-god, lying naked, dead / On the marble slab: staring, with wide eyes." In the five rondels at the end of the Unicorn edition Corbière addresses a dead child (really himself) with a remarkable mingling of sardonic ferocity and tenderness. He conjures up the horrors of the grave, only to make them beautiful: marsh fires flaring from the child's eye sockets, when the wind-blown grass will be his hair.

SUPERVIELLE. Translated by Teo Savory. Unicorn Press. 54 pp. $4. Paper $1.50.

In Jules Supervielle's deeply moving parable of the poet, "Orpheus," the eyes of an enchanted lion thank the father of all poets "for having so exactly expressed what I, who can only roar, have long felt." Many of these poems convert the silent presences and inarticulate noises of nature into a language that bridges the abyss between nonhuman existence and human experience. Supervielle achieves these miracles of verbal transmutation without lapses into whimsicality.

The dead frequently appear in Supervielle's poetry, remembering the time when their senses were alive to the sunlight on the twigs, the sound of a friend's footstep, the feel of a polished pebble; other phantoms rise from the "deep waters" of the self, and the poet struggles to recognize their veiled, swiftly changing faces in his "most secret mirror." In some poems both the poet and his world become a whirlpool of metamorphosing shapes. The horse he rides in a "field of sky" seems a ship, then a desire, the head of a charger with a robe of delirium, a wind that whinnies in expanding. At this altitude of imagination, the poet loses sight of himself. He's not the same man who spoke a moment ago. Not only the self's identity but the universe itself may change beyond recognition and the future appear as a "blind space turning" where the earth once was.

GUILLEVIC. Translated by Teo Savory. Unicorn Press. 56 pp. $4. Paper $1.50.

Guillevic was born at Carnac, the Stonehenge of Brittany, where giant megaliths brood in a field, incomprehensible messages from Druid prehistory. Here Guillevic may first have felt the desire to discover what objects can reveal about the men who have lived among them, or, as the French critic Gaëton Picon put it, to wrest "from things what they know of man." In the poem "Ant" a tiny victim of boiling water suggests that man's penchant for killing is linked with his fear of whatever lives beyond his narrow circle of fellow feeling and understanding. Another poem recalls the "incomprehensible body-heat" which once trembled miraculously in "Flayed Beef," where "there is still / a little light in the depths of its eye." The poet's tenderness for the flayed beef may repel some readers, but it cannot fail to shock them into feeling and awareness. "You could still caress its flank, / You could still put your head there / and lull your fear."

Guillevic's work reflects a struggle to maintain the greatest possible concision and lucidity. Often his poems concentrate his extraordinary perceptions of ordinary objects into a few starkly simple lines. A chair made of old wood, resting, forgetting its tree and its rancor, powerless. It wants nothing more, owes nothing more. "It contains its own whirlwind." Implicitly the poem evokes an old person's existence; and it comments upon people who live in a world of objects without noticing them or who make

NABOKOV
STRINDBERG
O'FAOLAIN
CALDWELL
KOMROFF di DONATO
SAROYAN
TROYAT
SINCLAIR
SANTORA
PADRE PIO
DUKE of BEDFORD
TESHIGAHARA

VLADIMIR NABOKOV
THE EYE—short novel $4.50
LOLITA in Russian $7.95
soft cover $5.95
THE WALTZ INVENTION—play $4.95
NABOKOV'S QUARTET $3.95
THE STRINDBERG READER
Hard cover $7.95
soft cover $5.95
SEAN O'FAOLAIN
BIRD ALONE soft cover $2.95
ERSKINE CALDWELL
WRITING IN AMERICA $4.95
MANUEL KOMROFF
THE WHOLE WORLD IS OUTSIDE $5.95
PIETRO di DONATO
NAKED AUTHOR $7.95

WILLIAM SAROYAN
THREE NEW DRAMATIC WORKS
20 OTHER SHORT PLAYS $4.95
SHORT DRIVE SWEET CHARIOT $4.95
HENRI TROYAT
AN EXTREME FRIENDSHIP $4.95
UPTON SINCLAIR
THE FLIVVER KING $4.95
PHIL SANTORA
ANIMALS & STATUES I HAVE INTERVIEWED $3.95
PADRE PIO
BIOGRAPHY $4.95
DUKE of BEDFORD
THE BOOK OF ANSWERS $5.95
TESHIGAHARA
WOMAN IN THE DUNES
soft cover $2.95

27 WASHINGTON SQ. NO. PHAEDRA, INC. NEW YORK, N.Y. 10011

TO MY MOTHER

Lay me down again in porcelain, mother,
your ceiling was my first sky.
Old woman, your fingers were curtains for my belly, your breasts' white windows took my breath away.
In new spoons I saw our flesh stretch and blend,
my lip was a red balloon,
your leg had a brown eye;
we made each other monsters behind green bottles.
I saw stars wash your back, watched television on your yellow night skin, our bed steamed from the gulfstream of your thigh,
jetstream of your soul,
your eggs threw dice and won me brothers,
we grew into three birdhunters . . .
And I left home the night you burned our game meat and your graying hair and you no longer turned me on . . .
Yet today, in these photographs before my time, your name is not the same as mine.
At first I do not recognize your young, sunlit body and I say,
as a suitor long strayed from your beauty:
Oh, who were you, and where was it we once slept together?
Did you have a son by someone stronger?
When again will one like you hold my minute hands?

JAMES BRUNOT

SNOW IN THE POEM

It is snowing there is no moon standing yet not standing dancing yet not dancing touching yet not touching snow in the poem like us leans away from the center.

This element outlining shadow locates me drifted against you where melting yet not actually melted crystalline stars touch us brighter than shadow.

Trees grow white to the wind while dancing up through the dark we are not trees nor do we begin to be their shapes as kisses have no shape but trace on lifting branches

a pure curve that trembles delicate as wavering birds as we warm and begin to tremble.

FRANCES McCONNEL

THE ORCHARD
(To Martin Luther King)

"The land is within."—Louis Simpson

The air has been planted that we breathe.
These branches start from the sky and grow downward. They gather in a trunk to blossom beneath the hot ground.

Where their fruit begins the long fall toward our faces. Passing through stone like morning coming down, their seed is falling toward the sun.

Our hands are lifting ladders at the east—
the air has been planted that we should kneel.

EUGENE RUGGLES

MORNING FOG
(For Dixie and Theo Caldwell)

Morning after morning, fog hugs the car;

half a block away
in every direction

I see an ocean;
it even smells like ocean.

If I drive straight ahead
it will engulf me:

a kind blur. Like that morning last July

when we awoke,
the cheeks of our tent

sucked in against us.
We nested safe

in that hollow, swaddled
by a grey cave.

The harsh surf scraping at the beach was a reality we didn't have to bear.

Later, the sun burnt off the fog, and the washed trees rose sentient as beasts.

The sun, unwrapping

the beach revealed stones luminous as eyes:

we trod with care.
By sundown, the last cloud clarified by fire,

we slept like the trees,

unhoused,
breathing mildly.

BETH BENTLEY

such objects without feeling for them and for the trees from which they come. The extreme simplicity and repetitiousness of the original give it an incantatory tone, as if it were a religious litany. For Guillevic, as for Rilke, who influenced him, the penetration "into the confidence of things" is a sacred act, a religious experience, as well as an act of completely devoted love. But no fuzzy mysticism or elusively subjective fantasy bars the reader who wishes to follow Guillevic into this region of awareness. Like the singing carpenter to whom he compares himself he has planed and sanded away all the superfluous words and images from these gnomic revelations.

Teo Savory's translations reflect a sensitivity to the rhythms, tones and textures of the French originals. In the Supervielle, and her "versions" of Corbière she sometimes substitutes her own ideas and images for the poets'. Occasionally the results are awkward or obscure; but more often Miss Savory's inventiveness effectively re-creates the spirit of the original.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

I have often in the past referred to the inadequacy for theatre criticism of the brief time allotted the daily reviewer. I have lately become aware that even the few days vouchsafed the weekly reviewer are not enough for truly considered discussion.

It occurred to me long after the performance that I would probably have been more impressed with Tyrone Guthrie's production of The House of Atreus if I had seen it on the open stage in the Minneapolis theatre for which it had been originally designed rather than on the proscenium stage on which it was given in New York. Not only would the settings and costumes—aimed for sculptural effect—prove more expressive on the open stage but the actors' movements would have had more weight, amplitude and heroic dimension. In the theatres we ordinarily frequent, we lose sight of the architectural framework of a production as part of the total impact of the plays we see in them.

The same is true, in another way, of Nicol Williamson's Hamlet. In London it was presented in a factory, where the rough plainness of the environment, with its "proletarian" vibrations, must have made that crude and unkempt interpretation seem natural.

These thoughts recurred to me as I was directing Uncle Vanya this summer in Los Angeles. I began with a production idea the first item of which was that the play was not to be given a mournful tone, that it was to be physically active. Directing it on a thrust stage necessitated even more movement than I had anticipated.

I am not a partisan of the theatre in the round, the arena stage or any one of the other new scenic arrangements which are calculated to "free" the theatre. These sometimes prove advantageous, especially for the Greeks, Shakespeare, Molière's "low" comedies, and generally in plays which demand exuberance or plasticity of movement. For the Restoration pieces, for Wilde, Ibsen, Chekhov and the like the proscenium stage is more useful.

It became clear to me when I began work at the Mark Taper Forum (the 700-seat house which is part of the Center Theatre Group) that if the actors were not to move most of the time in all directions they would not be comfortably seen or even be sufficiently audible (particularly on the extreme left and right) for the audience to enjoy the performance.

Chekhov's characters are sedentary. In the first act of Uncle Vanya, for example, they are sitting on an open terrace on a hot summer day, drinking tea. But apart from my initial scheme—to make the characters more active than customary—I was now compelled to activate them sharply because of the relation of the playing area to the seating arrangement of the house. As a consequence, there was far more movement in the first act (indeed, throughout) than, let us say, in the Moscow Art productions of Chekhov.

This created a certain "Americanization" of the play. Yet for all its heightened energy, it remained Chekhovian in its brooding inwardness, as well as in its humor. This was not because I dwelled on "psychology" or "mood": I rather avoided such emphasis. Yet a number of people spoke of the pace as slow or too "Russian"!

There are several reasons for this reaction: one is simply the nervousness or lack of repose in our theatre audience; living as it does in an atmosphere of haste, confusion and general din, it is unused to compose itself to quiet observation. When the pace of a play becomes that of normal breathing or civilized behavior, we hear complaints of slowness. (Any director can make actors speak and move rapidly. Some years ago there was one New York reviewer who judged all direction by its "speed.") But there is something at the very heart of Chekhov's world (apart from its locale in sleepy country towns) which makes his plays seem "slow" no matter how crisply they are acted.

Chekhov's characters are passionate people constricted by conditions which afford little practical scope for their ideals. Hence we speak of their frustration. The quiet in which these people live is to a certain extent imposed upon them. They therefore fuss, fritter about, talk too much and succumb to sudden gusts of excitement. Gentle Vanya, for example, attempts to shoot his brother-in-law.

Chekhov's personages are usually people of delicate sensibility, dreamers. They aspire. In this respect they have a fuller inner life than many of us today who, spiritually undernourished, live in a world of furious displacement. The apathy of Chekhov's people is not in their souls; their pain sings. They are full of the juices of desire and rich human experience. They are aware of their existence—which is one way of being very much alive.

The texts of Chekhov's plays call for numerous pauses. But this does not mean that in these pauses nothing is going on. Living is going on. The notations of pauses in the text indicate an absence of overt behavior—the action is silent, but that does not signify that there is none. Apparent non sequiturs, tiny indications remind us of this. In Vanya one hears Astrov say, "It's quiet here. Just pens scratching, crickets chirping, it's warm and cozy. . . . I don't want to leave." In the second act the Professor, still awake after midnight, repeatedly asks, "What time is it now?"; time seems suspended.

The inanition of the sultry afternoon

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 9-22-69
[illegible] Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $[illegible]
☐ 6 Months, $[illegible]
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

in Act I is highlighted by the poor landlord (Telyegin) playing the guitar while the old nurse on the estate scurries about the yard calling, "Here, chick, chick, chick": passive and innocent Telyegin thinks, "the weather is enchanting," while for Vanya, convinced that he has been cheated of life, it is "lovely weather to hang oneself." Chekhov's "slowness" is part of his meaning. The ruckus of the attempted killing in the third act is more than an acceleration of tempo: it is the outburst of a slowly brewing resentment and an almost farcical prelude to the ultimate resignation of the final act in which the antagonists forgive one another and everything goes on as before.

The endless dreariness of Vanya's life (it is perhaps stoically heroic) is accented by Astrov's seemingly pointless remarks about the lameness of his horse and his observation on looking at an inexplicable map, "It must be so hot now in Africa. . . ." And all this interspersed with the quasi-musical repetition which accompanies the various departures that leave Vanya isolated: "They've gone. . . . They've gone . . . he's gone . . . he's gone."

To my astonishment and satisfaction the thrust stage, I repeat, besides compelling even more movement than I had planned, also served to clarify the sense of each action. It did not alter the nature of Chekhov's truth nor impair the perfection of his craft which make Uncle Vanya, like Chekhov's other major plays, a poetic as well as a dramatic masterpiece.

FILMS / Robert Hatch

For me, the central figure in Alice's Restaurant is not Arlo Guthrie, who plays the lead, but James Broderick, who plays Alice's husband. By and large, Guthrie is acting himself; Broderick is acting an aspect of a good many of us.

He is a man no longer quite young who finds that in this era youth has a corner on life. Like so many today—I doubt that there is a historical parallel for the impulse—he wants to be part of that scene. The reasons are obvious: the adult world has rarely offered so few satisfactions, rarely presented miseries so intractable; the efficacy of intelligent choice seems, at least for the time being, to be gone. At the same time, youth has developed a style that is often witty and that seems to offer compassion and fulfillment. It is also terribly vulnerable, since it believes in taking chances and lacks the history on which to base the odds. That's where people like Broderick's Ray Brock see their opportunity: they will contribute the wisdom of experience to the commune.

As a rule, it doesn't work out—not from failure of sympathy or because of flagging energies but because the generations run on different time tracks. The peculiar quality of the young today—those, that is, who make up what might be called the movement—is that they are willing to travel light and uncommitted. Relationships have depth, but not much length, and when the vibrations falter, there is always another scene down the road (these young, incredibly, seem never to run out of travel money). But once you have passed 30, you can no longer afford that kind of freedom. Eventually, something has to work out, because you have no time to be repeatedly starting from scratch. Ray Brock, for example, wants his marriage with Alice (Pat Quinn, very beautiful and with emotions of mercury) to work; I think the boys and girls around him see that as quaint. And at the end of the film, he is talking about land in Vermont, where they can all settle down, raise their crops and grow in love for one another. The kids have perhaps never heard of Brook Farm; in any case, theirs is a kaleidoscope utopia. They understand love, but cohesion escapes them. That is the tragedy of Ray Brock.

The picture that Arthur Penn has directed, using Arlo Guthrie's autobiographical song—The Alice's Restaurant Massacree—as a spine, is a triumph of unstressed understanding told in a style of relaxed professionalism (the camera work is technically superb, but does not take on that commercial gloss that was so assertive in, for example, Pretty Poison, made on location in the same Berkshire neighborhood). It looks like a psychedelic carnival, but it works deep into the assumptions of the time. Alice and Ray have bought a deconsecrated church in Stockbridge (the restaurant, downtown, is presumably set up to pay for the venture) and run open house and haven for vagrant hippies. The gypsies flock in. The place is, in their language, beautiful: the Brocks are good people—they offer understanding and peace.

Comes the great bust, when Arlo and a friend are arrested for littering by Stockbridge Police Chief William Obanhein (played by himself in a tone of baffled outrage tempered by curiosity), followed by Arlo's Whitehall Street army physical (he doesn't get past the "shrink"—or, more accurately, he does get past the "shrink"), the death of Woody Guthrie in Bellevue, the death also of a young addict whose return to the drug produces from Brock a shocking outburst of rage induced by disappointment. It begins the breakup of the colony.

That script is hardly a plot: indeed plot is not the preoccupation of Alice's Restaurant. It is concerned with a panorama of relationships that are more juxtaposed than integrated: with what people expect of one another, what they are willing to give, what they will not accept, under what circumstances they recognize responsibility and when they get in their cars and travel. Those, it might be said, are the ingredients of all plots, but here no "line" emerges because the parts are too discrete. Instead, the film offers a mosaic of great sensitivity and acumen. Aside from the entertainment joys of the picture—the wild humor, the music, the young, engaging and often very handsome cast—Alice's Restaurant provides a primer on youth surviving the decade of Vietnam. It should be noted, however, that Arlo Guthrie has more talent and a better mind than the general average of his generation. He can better afford, perhaps, to run free.

LETTERS (Continued from page 266)

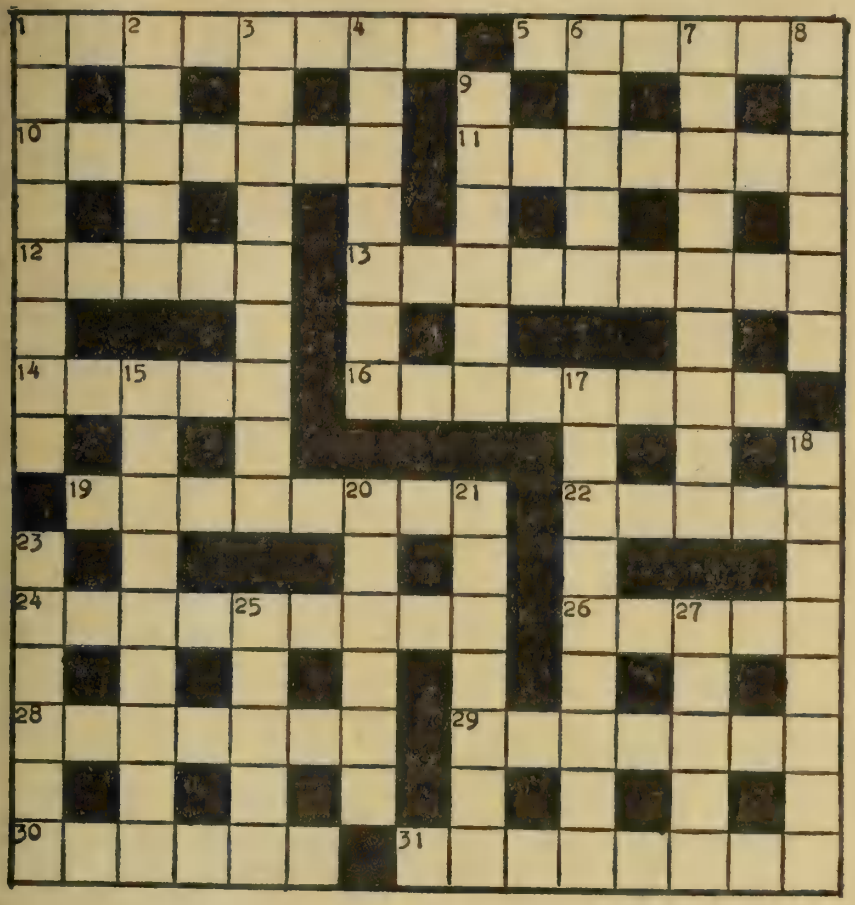
those observations in either Michael Coe's Mexico and the Maya or Terry's Guide to Mexico, if he read them at all. Or maybe he never even made the trip to Mexico.

Sydney H. Brisker, Architect, A.I.A.



Cambridge, England

DEAR SIRS: If Mr. Brisker thinks that Camino Real is "pure Legoretta" and not the most breath-taking example so far of Luis Barragán's influence, as well as his actual participation, then he is either as insensitive as he accuses me of being, or else he hasn't actually been to see the building, nor to talk with the people who were the clients. Mexico and The Maya are two books, not one, so I guess Brisker is fooling about his knowing them too. There is no evidence presented elsewhere in the letter which justifies Brisker's virtually actionable malice, leaving me to suspect that his own judgments about Mexico are as vacuous as his phrases.

Nathan Silver

Crossword Puzzle No. 1313

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 A thing once stuck in a pie to eat afterwards, indicating approval. (6,2)
5 See 2 down
10 You'd naturally expect to find them over a buck, which isn't bad for wall hangings. (7)
11 Far from a sure pleaser—more of a letdown! (7)
12 Rather loose description of one of those products of mine that got quite broken up. (5)
13 Sometimes set up by will-power. (9)
14 and 29 When tied up, game might easily go into them. (5,7)
16 The rough make-up of part of Iberia might go well on the stage. (8)
19 Not all at first is an irregular type. (8)
22 So-called expensive brew? (5)
24 What the Ladies' Garment Worker used to do might be expedient. (9)
26 and 28 Part of the press of business, perhaps. (5,7)
29 See 14 across
30 Growing more quickly, to a certain extent? (6)
31 Tundra? It should be this plain. (8)

DOWN

1 Make over. (8)
2 and 5 across Overseas color? (11)
3 Some basketball teams certainly do eat early! (9)
4 Hair-dos or crumbs might be. (7)
6 Take into account. (5)
7 It's a bad time to be about an improper caper—curse one! (9)
8 Puts into vigorous action. (6)
9 Beginning of a grave conclusion, as they say. (6)
15 Running gear to follow diamonds, perhaps. (5,4)
17 Over wrought? Or just wrought, for example? (4,5)
18 A very quiet suggestion soothes one, and altogether satisfies. (8)
20 Runs out of lighting material? (6)
21 Comparatively crazy description of some taste. (7)
23 Marked by three accidental signs with gold leaf, alternatively? (1,5)
25 If 21, one might have less, or something might appeal to one more. (5)
27 Was she up in arms on Broadway? (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1312

ACROSS: 1 Washington; 6 Peep; 10 Realtor; 12 Macerate; 13 Skier; 15 Up-end; 17 Copyright; 19 Pleasance; 21 Taboo; 23 Emeer; 24 Backfire; 27 Extreme; 28, 29, 16 down and 11 One good turn deserves another; 30 Child's play. DOWN: 1 and 26 Workaday; 2 Sea lane; 3 Istle; 4 Gerfalcon; 5 Osage; 7 Echoing; 8 Peroration; 9 Bowsprit; 14 Supplement; 18 Preschool; 20 Elector; 22 Barn owl; 24 Beech; 25 Frets.

AGENTS WANTED

CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. 54 Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York, N. Y. 10023.

EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

PUBLICATIONS

STORIES FOR FILMS & TV

sought by new story analysis service. Novels, plays, screenplays with high film and TV potential will be reviewed for producers, agents, etc. Brief synopsis and return envelope required with ms. Immediate reading.

ManuSearch International
PO Box 5819, Santa Monica, Calif. 90405

FASCIST PIGS, Birchers, neo- Nazis, Kluxers, and Minutemen have their sights on you. Uncover the ones in your area. Free colorful details from: National Information Center, Dept. N, Box 21, Springfield, Mass. 01101

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

PERSONALS

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Printed by Milford Publishing Inc., Milford, Conn.

Ho and the Senator

In the span of one week, death silenced the voices of Ho Chi Minh, one of communism's most eloquent spokesmen, and Senator Dirksen, one of its most implacable and colorful foes. Both were men in their 70s and both had fought all their adult lives on opposite sides of the great ideological conflict of the century.

Of course, the coincidence of their death will not put an end to the controversy, but it does provide a moment for asking again what are its causes and consequences. A book that searches into these questions from the American side of the barricades is ANATOMY OF ANTI-COMMUNISM, a report prepared for the American Friends Service Committee. It examines the anti-communism complex: how we got that way, what it does to us, what it really is, and what we can do about it.

This seems, thus, an appropriate moment to offer ANATOMY OF ANTI-COMMUNISM as a gift to all new one-year subscribers to The NATION. Subscribe today.

FREE OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year we will send ANATOMY OF ANTI-COMMUNISM, prepared for the American Friends Service Committee, free of charge.

THE NATION 333 Sixth Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me ANATOMY OF ANTI-COMMUNISM.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; ($2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State ..... Zip .....

N 9-22

WHY THE POOR PAY MORE JENNIFER CROSS

THE NATION

SEPTEMBER 29, 1969 — 35 CENTS

BURLINGAME
SEP 23 1969
LIBRARY

SCIENTOLOGY: TOTAL FREEDOM & BEYOND DONOVAN BESS

Higher Learning in California

The Education of Ronald Reagan

ROSS Y. KOEN

The Tupamaros

URUGUAY'S URBAN GUERRILLAS MARYSA N. GERASSI

Sanford Watzman: Nader and the FTC

Robert Claiborne: War Games

LETTERS

lending our ears

Hollywood, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Paeans of platitudinous praise . . . on behalf of the late Everett McKinley Dirksen have inundated the land. This . . . purple prose has pictured Ev (late of the team of "Ev & Charlie") as a combination Abe Lincoln, Mark Twain and John Wayne. . . . The only way I can explain all this is that there must have been two Everett Dirksens in the U.S. Senate: the one so completely canonized currently and the one who shrewdly parlayed a small-town law practice into a position that wielded enormous governmental power. . . . Then, of course, there are all kinds of definitions of Americanism, patriotism and statesmanship.

Harry Cimring

the draft and the Constitution

Pine Plains, N. Y.

DEAR SIRS: Your otherwise excellent article, "Why the Draft Should Go" by John M. Swomley, Jr. [The Nation, Aug. 11], left out an important reason. The New York Civil Liberties Union is now challenging conscription in federal court as unconstitutional. It is involuntary servitude, unauthorized anywhere in the Constitution, and violating the Fifth and Thirteenth Amendments.

Yet every month another 1,500 youths are forced into uniform and shipped out to Vietnam, while we simply wring our hands and deplore. I urge all of The Nation's readers to join me in belling the cat. Let our letters descend in a blizzard on Congress immediately, telling our Senators and Representatives that we want a repeal of the draft at once. Let Nixon put up or shut up on his promise of a volunteer army.

Jules Archer

P.S. I'm a World War II veteran with four years of overseas duty in the Pacific.

handcuffed speech

Santa Barbara, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Two young housewives were arrested when they refused to leave the local draft board office at closing time and insisted on continuing to read the names of the dead in Vietnam. A municipal court jury quickly found them guilty of trespass. Instead of sentencing the women to a fine, the usual penalty for this minor offense, the judge put off sentencing for five days, ordered them handcuffed and sent to county jail without permitting them to post bail. . . .

Before the trial the judge attempted to intimidate the women into pleading guilty or nolo contendere, and threatened to penalize them if they insisted on exercising their right to a jury trial. He further made clear that he won't permit the spouting of anti-war protests in his court. The judge made good his threat.

A shocked and outraged community is preparing a demonstration of support at the courthouse, while a writ of habeas corpus is readied.

Theodore Schoenman

correction

In the letter from Benjamin Szold Levin [The Nation, Sept. 8] the title of Prof. Wilbur J. Cohen's address at Brandeis University on Jan. 9 should have read "Social Goals for 1976," not 1967. We regret the error. Editors

EDITORIALS

'Trim and Hold'

Defense Secretary Laird is said to have a plan to deal with the war in Vietnam, the major problem of the Nixon Administration: (1) Cut down the number of U.S. troops in the field and "vietnamize" the fighting; (2) use mainly or solely volunteers, as the French did when public opinion forced the army to stop sending draftees to Vietnam; (3) continue to bolster the South Vietnamese forces with American air support, logistics, etc.; (4) try to reduce the level of fighting so that the South Vietnamese, with large-scale American help but few American casualties, can hold their own against the Vietcong and Hanoi.

Obviously this is not a plan to end the war but to continue it indefinitely. In announcing the current withdrawal of 35,000 troops, Mr. Nixon called on the North Vietnamese to negotiate an end to the war. That is pure verbiage. The reality is to be found in Mr. Laird's scheme, or some variant concocted by Henry Kissinger or some other Administration thinker. But it is reality only in the sense that it reflects the Nixon Administration's determination to keep the war simmering at a level that will disarm domestic criticism while avoiding acknowledgment of defeat, or what Kissinger calls an "elegant bug-out." It is a plan to make the war politically endurable.

The odds that it will work, even in this limited sense, are none too good. It assumes almost inexhaustible patience on the part of the American people and a degree of persuasiveness that Mr. Nixon does not possess.

The real realities of Vietnam cannot be glossed over. The North Vietnamese and the Vietcong obviously do not purpose to negotiate on the give-and-take basis which would be welcomed by Mr. Nixon, Mr. Laird, Dr. Kissinger (whose role is hardly more than that of a phrase-maker and heuristic expert), the Joint Chiefs, Ellsworth Bunker, Henry Cabot Lodge, et al. The North Vietnamese were taken in once, after Geneva, and do not intend to repeat the experience. But the obstacles in Paris, while serious, do not approach the roadblocks constantly built and rebuilt by Thieu and Ky in Saigon. These two, and the warlords they represent, are Frankenstein monsters, and the United States is Frankenstein.

If American withdrawals go beyond the rate at which they feel their necks are safe, there may well be still another military coup, as Ky threatens. Short of that, the militarists' opportunities for sabotage are unlimited. The events during the cease-fire declared by Hanoi in memory of Ho Chi Minh were an illustration. Under American pressure, Thieu agreed to observe the truce and went off fishing in the South China Sea. A South Vietnamese spokesman then announced that Saigon would continue to fight. There followed some further altercation between the "allies," but in the end the South Vietnamese increased their offensive operations during the truce period. Whether from this or some other cause, Mr. Nixon lost his composure (such as it is), halted the B-52 bombings in South Vietnam, then thirty-six hours later reversed himself, giving an impression of floundering that he will not soon live down.

If Nixon were to dismiss Lodge and Bunker and pull the rug from under the Thieu-Ky government, he could have the peace he desires. Hanoi and the Vietcong would negotiate with a successor civilian government. But in such negotiations Hanoi would have the upper hand, and the owning-class faction in South Vietnam, the hawks in both the Republican and Democratic Parties, the Goldwaterites, the Wallaceites, the governing bodies of the veterans' organizations, and all the other die-hards at home and abroad would be at Mr. Nixon's throat. Even aside from the suicidal political aspects, Mr. Nixon is too vain to allow himself to go down in history as the President who accepted American defeat in Southeast Asia.

He will decide that his chances are better in 1972—and in the high school history textbooks—if he follows the policy of "trim and hold," which in its domestic aspect is a policy of trim and hope: that the public will give him more time, that the anti-war students and professors will not riot, that there will be no flash-overs in Congress or in the streets. But is there any reality in that hope?

Icebreakers

That the Nixon brand of reaction is still potent is shown by the defeats the Senate Pentagon critics have suffered in recent weeks, notably a 56 to 31 vote for development of a new intercontinental bomber to replace the B-52. However, there is profound discontent among members of the President's party over the course of events in Vietnam. A group of House Republicans is preparing a letter to solicit co-sponsors for a resolution putting a deadline of December 31, 1970 on the 1964 Tonkin Gulf resolution.

These Republicans are aware that they cannot muster the votes for repeal, but they wish to set a termination date on the statutory authority which Lyndon B. Johnson extracted from a supine Congress by blowing up a trivial naval engagement into a major affront to American power. It would serve public notice on Mr. Nixon that some Republicans want firm action leading to negotiations and an end to the war. The strategy was devised by two young, second-term Republicans, Riegle of Michigan and McCloskey of California. Senator Hatfield of Oregon has agreed to introduce the resolution in the Senate.

In the universities, a group of Eugene McCarthy supporters in 1968 have set up a "Vietnam Moratorium," which they call an "icebreaker" type of protest. The leaders include Sam Brown, David Hawk, David Mixner and Marge Sklencar. On October 15 there is to be a one-day protest demonstration on 200 campuses. The hope is to spread the protest movement from the campuses to the surrounding communities. The demonstrations are to be in the nature of "moratoria" rather than strikes, to emphasize the absence of coercion. The goal, however, is hardly low key—it is to gain a specific indication from the Nixon Administration that all American troops will be withdrawn in a short time.

The members of the central group organizing the demonstration had been associated with Rep. Allard K. Lowenstein (D., N.Y.) but split with him over his insistence that the call for the moratorium must be coupled with a condemnation of campus disruption and violence. The organizers certainly do not favor violence, but they

IN THIS ISSUE

September 29, 1969

EDITORIALS

298

ARTICLES

302 Higher Learning in California: The Education of Ronald Reagan — Ross Y. Koen

306 The Tupamaros: Uruguay's Urban Guerrillas — Marysa N. Gerassi

311 Scientology: Total Freedom and Beyond — Donovan Bess

315 Meat and Potatoes: Why the Poor Pay More — Jennifer Cross

BOOKS & THE ARTS

317 Nader's Raiders and the Traders — Sanford Watzman

318 Get Well Soon — Shaun O'Connell

319 Global Gamesmanship — Robert Claiborne

320 Crayola (poem) — Dave Etter

321 Testament of a Myth-Shrinker — Ruth M. Vande Kieft

323 Enlightened Imperialism — M. Maldonado-Denis

324 Theatre — Harold Clurman

325 Music — David Hamilton

326 Films — Robert Hatch

326 For a Still-Born Niece (poem) — William Witherup

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL [redacted]

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, MAX KOZLOFF; Music, BENJAMIN BORETZ; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 209 No. 10

know that Washington fears violence and the resulting headlines, and is much less perturbed by protest that does not disrupt normal activities.

The National Mobilization Committee to End the War in Vietnam, which organized the Pentagon demonstration of 1967, is planning a "March on Washington" for November 14-15. The Students for a Democratic Society, or one part of it which survived the June split, is planning an October 8-11 anti-war action in Chicago, to synchronize with the trial of the "Conspiracy Eight." But some of the projected tactics, such as racing through high school halls shouting "Jailbreak!" are scarcely calculated to aid either the defendants or the anti-war cause.

Other anti-war movements are in the embryonic stage. All one can say at this point is that the Administration's hopes for tranquillity may prove as illusory as the past assurances of American military leaders that the Vietcong and Hanoi were practically licked.

The Cameron Report

The Cameron Commission—an official inquiry into the disturbances in Northern Ireland—has now issued its report (see The Nation, August 25, p. 140). Lord Cameron, a distinguished Scottish jurist, and his two associates (one Protestant, one Catholic; both on the faculty at Queens University, Belfast), have, in all substantial respects, sustained the charges that Catholics have been discriminated against in such fields as housing, voting rights and employment. To be sure, the commission found that the Catholic minority was not wholly free of fault, but the report traces the underlying causes of the disturbances to legitimate social and political minority grievances which have been ignored these many years.

It also makes the telling point that since the Government of Ireland Act of 1920 one party has been continuously in power, and no effective parliamentary opposition has so far been developed. The commission notes the inevitable consequences: "An opposition which can never become a government tends to lose a sense of responsibility, and a party in power which can never be turned out tends to be complacent and insensitive to criticism or acceptance of any need for change or reform." In a statement aimed directly at the Stormont government, the commission points out that it would be "a grave political and social error to regard the civil rights movement as narrowly sectarian or subversive; it was and is a movement which drew—and still draws—support from a wide measure of moderate opinion on many sides and to that extent is a novel phenomenon in . . . Northern Ireland."

That is indeed so, but the warning will probably go unheeded. It was not, of course, the task of the commission to inquire into the larger issue: the wisdom, fairness and present-day viability of the compromise that resulted in Ireland's partition. Some political problems—and partition is one—cannot be settled by compromise. In the end the division of 1920 must be squarely faced in terms of its latter-day consequences. On this matter it is a pleasure to quote a statement from a recent column by John P. Roche, whose views have not always been received with approval in these pages. "Ulster," he writes, "is an improvisation which has outlived its usefulness."

The Old Order

Of the generation gap we have heard more than enough. More interesting and significant is the slowly accumulating evidence that the old order is passing. In this instance by "old order" is meant the way in which the top-ranking chains of command impart consistency to institutions by preserving a similarity of views and assumptions over periods of time much longer than a generation. The death of individuals does not necessarily imply a change in "the old order"; individual leaders die every day. A change in the old order is signaled when institutions themselves begin to move in new—that is, nontraditional—directions. Several recent events illustrate the process.

At this year's meeting of the State Bar of California everyone, including the delegates, was surprised when the majority voted for abolition of capital punishment and approved lighter sentences for marijuana offenders. Then, by voice vote, the delegates rejected a recommendation that a mandatory prison sentence, without possibility of parole, be substituted for the death penalty. It was obviously felt by the delegates that murderers, like other prisoners, should retain the right of parole. Even more surprising, the Pasadena Bar Association, long regarded as a citadel of legal conservatism, pushed through a recommendation that in effect would eliminate "perversion"—oral copulation by consenting adults in private—as a criminal offense. Startled by this upsurge of rationality, Michael Harris of the Chronicle attributed it to "the rising influence of younger lawyers in California's legal establishment."

The sects affiliated with the United States Congress on Evangelism have long been regarded as the last holdouts against ecumenical cooperation. Yet the delegates to this year's annual meeting, held in Minneapolis, felt that the time had come to modify their traditional isolationism. "They now realize," one observer pointed out, that "they can't withdraw into a kind of Protestant monasticism and expect to reach people." A "new breed" of evangelists has evidently emerged, some of whom conduct "love-outs" and insist that members of the congregation not only make the traditional "decision for Christ" but commit themselves to a specific act of social involvement (The New York Times, September 14).

It is true that, timing his action to coincide with the Minneapolis meeting, the Rev. Carl McIntire, a leading fundamentalist, tacked a manifesto on the door of Riverside Church (which has become a kind of bulletin board for manifestoes) demanding $3 billion in reparations for "fundamentalists." But here too observers noted that "problems are piling up for Carl McIntire . . . his organization is eroding around him." He does still operate two colleges, a resort for fundamentalists at Cape May, N.J., and three radio stations, and publishes a weekly paper, but clear proofs that his problems are indeed mounting are the trend manifest at the Minneapolis meeting and the desperate bid for publicity implicit in the reparations stunt.

Other illustrations might be cited, for the phenomenon of the "new breed" is apparent not merely where it might be least expected, among fundamentalists and lawyers, but in other professions and institutions as well. Old orders change more slowly than do people—often more slowly even than the people who comprise them—but a shift in interests and values can be discerned on a wide institutional spectrum, and now that it has started it is likely to accelerate.

Northwest Passage

The voyage of the combination oil tanker-icebreaker Manhattan is a feat of no small consequence. It may presage economic tumult in the oil industry—conceivably to the advantage of consumers in some parts of the world, although this is an industry which does not easily relax its grip on those who cannot do without its products. If the passage is actually opened for year-round commercial traffic, there could be vast economic benefits for Alaska and for Canada, with such incidental effects as a boom for American shipyards. Most of the supertankers now in service have been built in Japan, but by American law oil shipments between points in the United States must be made in American-made tankers.

But the manly hysteria which is aroused by prospects of mammoth gain tends to obscure the possible ecological losses. For almost the first time, these may be taken into account before the financiers and engineers make the plunge. Although ecology has only recently become a household word, it is now something to be reckoned with, even by oil tycoons. The Torrey Canyon is not forgotten, and conservationists ask what would happen if an even larger tanker should break up in the ice. The pollution is bad enough in warm waters, where bacterial action is comparatively rapid; in the Arctic, the destruction of the fish and animal life on which the Eskimos live could be catastrophic. Another consideration: who would pay for the damage, assuming that compensation were possible? Canada may claim the Northwest Passage as part of its territorial waters. If so, will the Canadians be willing and able to provide icebreakers to aid a tanker in trouble, and all the other facilities required for traffic control in narrow straits, under rigorous conditions?

The larger social aspects of the Alaskan bonanza are even more disquieting. The state government has already realized about a billion dollars by auctioning the oil leases along its north shore. The tendency in such situations is to seize immediate benefits and let the future take care of itself. Alaska has a chance to learn from history, but will it? It can reflect on the headlong rush into the Oklahoma Territory, the "destruction of California," the depredations of the railroad and lumber interests, the long, sad story of rampant special interest going back to colonial days. Alaska has the opportunity to enjoy the benefits of the oil discovery and the technology that has gone into the exploitation of oil and other mineral reserves, at a price that is not prohibitive. Perhaps the new feeling for the public interest can be made to prevail, in a sensible combination of development and conservation. But both the people of Alaska and the federal government must guard against the psychology of carpe diem.

Chop

Journalistic karate has come into fashion again in the mass magazines. It is not primarily muckraking as the generation of Lincoln Steffens knew it, which was directed against institutions and conditions, but is aimed rather at highly visible and controversial individuals. How justified it is will be more evident when the pattern of lawsuits such exploits inevitably produce is better developed.

The new era of reportorial chop began when the late Saturday Evening Post, frantic to emancipate itself from the financially enervating image of Ben Franklin, went "sensational." Most conspicuously, this produced an expensive libel suit as a result of allegations made against Wally Butts, the University of Alabama football coach. Post officials were said to have remained "high" on the story, despite what it cost them in settlement fees, but the new policy did not save the magazine.

Soon thereafter, Life raised the machete: Rep. Cornelius Gallagher of New Jersey (charged with Mafia connections), the Abe Fortas-Wolfson Foundation story, and a piece on Governor Rhodes of Ohio similar to the Gallagher attack. When Life went after Roy Cohn, indicating that his influence with the FBI was such that he could shift its agents about at his pleasure, the clever former satellite of Joe McCarthy replied, in tones suggesting that he had just been hit in the kidneys, that the story was "disastrous" to him. He is now trying to use it to his advantage in the government's case pending against him.

More recently Look, smelling the arena, has sunk its claws into Mayor Alioto of San Francisco (charges again of fraternizing with the Mafia). Alioto, whose ambitious political career (he would like to be governor) is at stake, is suing for the headline grabbing sum of $12.5 million.

Time, surveying all this street fighting from a prudent distance, lumps it together as muckraking and says that that is a cyclical form of journalism which emerges from time to time when a society is troubled. This society is indeed troubled, and a good deal of muckraking is going on, the most useful examples being associated with the exploits of Ralph Nader. Some of the celebrity daubing may also be useful (throwing the rascals out is a sound American impulse), but one cannot be altogether certain that the journals in question are moved entirely, or primarily, by a sense of outrage.

In circulation wars, the struggle is not for readers as such but for readers as advertising bait. And the readers must be of a certain kind. The layman might suppose that advertisers would prefer subscribers, who put loyal trust in the magazine. But on Madison Avenue, where the enigmatic "media men" play their hunches, the preference is for impulse buyers. Subscription copies may lie on the coffee table, but when a guy grabs a magazine from the newsstand he must intend to read it. They like to see the public rioting for its favorite reading in the railroad terminals and along the busy streets. And nothing produces such a riot more reliably than the blaring headline that the eminent Mr. So-and-So was found with his hand in the wrong till or his hat in the wrong apartment. It may be good citizenship to carve his respectability into steaks; it is certainly thought to be good business. Next victim?

The Education of Ronald Reagan

ROSS Y. KOEN

Mr. Koen is executive secretary of the Association of California State College Professors, associate editor of Voice of the Faculties, and author of The China Lobby in American Politics.

Sacramento

To observe that higher education is in trouble anywhere these days is hardly news, but in California the trouble is spelled with three Rs. They stand for Reagan, Rafferty and Reinecke. Reagan hardly needs introduction but there may be some who are unaware that Max Rafferty, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, and Ed Reinecke, the Reagan-appointed Lieutenant Governor, are, like Reagan, members ex-officio of the Board of Regents of the University and of the Board of Trustees of the California State Colleges.

His membership on and his power to appoint members to the governing boards of the university and state colleges gives the governor of California a special position of power which Reagan has not hesitated to exercise in order to achieve his twin goals of restructuring the basic social fabric of California and furthering his own political ambitions. Public higher education in California is as critical an element in achieving these goals as it was in attaining the governorship.

During his 1966 campaign, Reagan placed heavy emphasis on campus turmoil and on what was wrong with the university. It is a commonly held view that he rode the 1964 free speech movement at Berkeley to his seat in the governor's chair. He was scathing in his denunciations of dissenting and demonstrating students, and of university administrators who failed to put a stop to the dissent and the demonstrations. The language he used to describe those to whom he directed his attention was provocative and inflammatory. While he claimed—and still claims—that his attacks on the university were dictated by public outrage at what had occurred there, the fact is that Reagan and Rafferty together have done more to inflame public opinion and provide copy for reporters than all the events combined. Furthermore, each new round of speeches and each new incident on the campus requires more inflammatory and provocative language than the previous one, if public interest is to be kept at a high pitch.

More serious than his belligerent and inflammatory language were Reagan's campaign promises that he would "clean up the mess" on the campus by getting rid of the "small dissident minority" who were creating the disturbances, and would fire "weak" and "spineless" administrators who failed to take the measures necessary to restore order. Having no understanding of the sources of student discontent; having no knowledge of the machinery which keeps a university functioning; and having no ability to distinguish between order which is the result of an adequately functioning system of education and order which flows from the barrel of a gun or a tear-gas canister, Reagan made promises which no one, whatever his office, could fulfill. Even so, his campaign rhetoric produced victory for Reagan, just as it had on two previous occasions for Max Rafferty.

Whether or not to his credit, Reagan has remembered his promise to restore peace and quiet to the campuses; indeed, he has continued to repeat that promise, although no longer in the simplistic terms of the campaign. He discovered very quickly that, unlike the movie version, nothing happened simply because he, as Governor, had ordered it. The firing of Clark Kerr and the subsequent opening rounds of the battle to impose tuition on college and university students taught Reagan that securing control of the system of higher education—whatever effect that might or might not have on campus turbulence—would be a slower and more difficult process than the mere magic of issuing commands.

Firing Kerr was accomplished only by a careful stitching together of conservative and moderate members of the Board of Regents and required the three new votes which Reagan carried with him, as Governor, to that meeting. That the governor does have considerable power, even over the appointees of previous governors, is quite evident. People who have made their way up in the corporate and professional power structure in a manner conducive to their appointment to academic governing boards usually have a proclivity for submitting to the authority of elected officials. Moreover, the fact that the governor appoints the regents and trustees without any outside check or confirmation gives him great personal power over those members who hope for reappointment and whose terms will expire during the expected gubernatorial term. Even when the terms of members are sixteen years, as is the case with the regents, a new governor can frequently, with luck, gain control of these boards in less than one four-year term. Reagan's luck was either little short of magical or it was not luck at all. Evidence of the latter was one regent's complaint that Reagan threatened to turn loose every investigative agency of the state on the affairs of recalcitrant board members. The regent said that even the most scrupulously honest man could be ruined financially by such a procedure.

In any case, Reagan's acquisition of control over higher education was hastened considerably by the fact that he could appoint his own lieutenant governor after Finch left for Washington, and by the fact that Max Rafferty supported Reagan's election and is his ideological mentor. They think alike, both ideologically and politically. In addition, each new governor has an instant regental appointment upon taking office because he appoints the president of the state Board of Agriculture who is, by constitutional mandate, a regent ex-officio.

Reagan's control over California's colleges and universities was also enhanced by legislation, passed in 1967, creating a new fifteen-member state-wide Board of Governors for the public junior colleges. Each of these eighty-two institutions is governed locally by an elected Junior College District Board, but the new board will set overall policy and will control the expenditure of the rapidly increasing amounts of state funds going to them. Reagan appointed all fifteen members early in 1968.

Reagan's first appointments to the Board of Trustees of the California state colleges went to two Republicans who were originally appointed by Brown, and whose terms expired in 1967. They were George Hart, an ultra-conservative who thinks Chancellor Glenn Dumke is an incompetent left winger, and Daniel Ridder, editor of one of the conservative Ridder newspapers.

Later in the year, Reagan made his first new appointment to the board by naming Earle M. Jorgensen to fill out the remainder of the term of liberal Democrat Victor Palmieri who resigned after frequent clashes with the controlling clique. Jorgensen, known chiefly for his opposition to increasing college budgets and faculty salaries, said last year that he would be happy to lead the police and National Guard forces onto the San Francisco State campus to clear it with machine guns.

In 1968, two members who had consistently espoused the cause of law and order and opposed any concessions to faculty or students, but who were Democrats, were replaced by two Republicans. One of the new members, Karl L. Wente, is the moderate, conscientious, independent head of the Wente Brothers Winery who had "never met Reagan before his appointment." He was apparently the nominee of the Democratic president pro tem of the state Senate, Hugh Burns, who, however, supported Rafferty in the 1968 race for United States Senator. The other is the extreme right-wing chairman of the board of National Airlines, Dudley Swim, who had already shown his colors as a Reagan appointee to the public membership of the Coordinating Council for Higher Education. He would solve the plane hijacking problem by offering pilots a $1-million reward for each hijacker brought back dead. He concedes that the attitudes of passengers in such a situation might present a problem.

Reagan gained almost complete control of the Board of Trustees of the state colleges this year when he appointed Reinecke and named two Republicans to replace Brown appointees whose terms had expired. One of these is a hard-line former district attorney, William Weissich, who has campaigned for right-wing Republicans. The other, E. Litton Bivans, is a Los Angeles businessman whose reputation as a moderate has not thus far been reflected in his actions on the board.

Currently, then, a majority of the members of the state college Board of Trustees, including all the ex-officio members and all of Reagan's appointees with the occasional exception of Wente, can be expected to support Reagan's "hard-line" approach and to turn the screw on students and faculty at every opportunity.

As for the Board of Regents of the university, Reagan gained control more quickly than had been expected in view of the sixteen-year terms. In part, this was due, as noted, to the fact that he appoints other officials whose position makes them regents ex-officio. In part, it was due to Reagan's early success in persuading the regents to fire Clark Kerr as president and regent. The key element in his early success, however, is the fact that he was able to name four new regents in the past year—one regular appointment, one to fill a vacancy created by death, one because of a resignation, and the fourth the lieutenant governor.

For several years the university was steered through a number of crises by a moderate-liberal coalition on the Board of Regents. As James Wrightson of the McClatchy newspapers has observed, "It was the moderate-liberal coalition which defused the free speech crises in Berkeley in 1964 by granting reasonable concessions to students and giving more authority to Chancellors to deal with student demands.

"It was this group on the board which backed U.C. Chancellor Roger Heyns's deft handling of the anti-Vietnam protests at Berkeley and kept them in bounds.

"This was the group which . . . rallied behind University President Charles J. Hitch last fall to keep the Eldridge Cleaver lectures controversy from moving into the realm of a direct challenge to academic freedom on the Berkeley campus."

The resignation of Mrs. Dorothy Chandler, one of the owners of the Los Angeles Times, clearly foreshadowed the break-up of the coalition. Whereas a year ago thirteen to sixteen members could usually be mustered to block any drastic action likely to lead to a confrontation with students or faculty, today Reagan seems to be able to count on twelve of the twenty-four regents, plus his own vote. Observers of the board place another seven in the moderate category. Only four are classed as liberals.

Reagan has also managed to gain substantial control over two other agencies in California which have considerable impact on public higher education. The first is the Coordinating Council for Higher Education, created by the 1960 "Master Plan for Higher Education" and designed to coordinate the development of all the segments. The second is the Constitutional Revision Commission which has been at work for five years developing proposals for revising and shortening California's antiquated and much amended constitution.

The Coordinating Council is made up of six public members (the original number of three was doubled by legislation in 1965), three members each chosen by the state college and university boards, three members representing the junior colleges, and three members representing the private institutions. The function of the council is to advise the governor and the legislature on the "orderly growth" of higher education in the state. Prior to the increase in the public membership, the council was dominated by the state's institutional representatives and was unable to take any action which encountered serious opposition from any one of these segments. Doubling the public membership has resulted chiefly in a stalemate, with the six public members and three private institution representatives evenly balancing the nine members from the public institutions.

Since the public members serve for only four years, and with an even higher turnover because of deaths and resignations, it was relatively easy for Reagan to gain control of that portion of the membership. He can now end the stalemate and turn the council to positive support of his policies.

The Constitutional Revision Commission is important for public higher education because for almost 100 years the University of California has enjoyed a highly privileged constitutional status. Article IX, Section 9, of the present constitution gives the regents "full powers of organization and government" over the nine-campus university. In practice, this has meant that the university could use whatever funds were provided by the legislature as the regents saw fit, and that it was immune to intrusions by other agencies of government for accounting and auditing purposes. Only in recent years has the legislature begun to insist, as a condition of its continuing appropriations, on detailed fiscal reports from the university. The primary educational considerations thus before the Constitutional Revision Commission are whether the university should be continued in this privileged status, whether other public institutions of higher education should be granted the same status, or whether none of the institutions should be given constitutional protection.

The eighty-man commission, as originally constituted during the Brown administration, was largely made up of persons of traditional liberal and moderate views. They ranged from college professors and administrators, through the usual range of business and professional people, labor leaders, League of Women Voters housewives, and other civic leaders, to one almost unbelievable Uncle Tom, who was the only black member. Several vacancies on the commission have been filled by Reagan. Some of the changes in attitude on the part of the commission reflect, of course, the polarization caused by events of the past few years. Nevertheless, Reagan's new appointees are clearly having an effect.

If his past actions provide any guide, what Reagan will do with his newly consolidated control of the boards and agencies which govern the policies and direction of higher education in California is fairly predictable. At the same time that he was demonstrating his power with the regents by getting rid of Kerr, Reagan was also testing his power over educational finances. In his first budget submitted to the legislature early in 1967, Reagan reduced the proposed appropriations for the universities and the state colleges by some 15 per cent. These were not reductions from the previous year's appropriations but were cuts in the amounts proposed by the Brown administration for 1967-68 which were, in turn, substantially below what had been requested by the trustees and the regents. Part of Reagan's cuts in the higher education appropriations were restored by the legislature. Reagan responded by vetoing or reducing specific appropriations so that the university emerged with a budget 17 per cent below its own scaled-down request; the state colleges took a 12.2 per cent cut.

Although higher education has taken the brunt of the state's economy drives since Governor Brown's "bare bones budget" of 1964, and is living through a period of unprecedented annual enrollment increases, Reagan has permitted no rises in their appropriations beyond the minimum required to handle the projected increase in student population. The projected increases in enrollment, however, have fallen far short of the actual numbers seeking admission. In 1968-69, the state colleges were forced to seek a supplemental appropriation to pay for an enrollment of almost 7,000 students larger than had been projected. The money then allotted was about one-tenth the amount per student which had been included in the regular budget.

In a recent directive on preparation of 1970-71 budget requests, Reagan allocated to the university and the state colleges only as much money as was appropriated for their support in 1967-68. He ordered college officials to request additional funds for work-load increases (enrollment in the state colleges will have risen more than 30 per cent for the three-year period) on a strict priority basis. Requests for funds for new and expanded programs must be submitted in a third-stage priority list.

Throughout his 1966 campaign Reagan insisted that a substantial part of the financing of the public colleges and universities should be accomplished by charging tuition. He lost little time after his inauguration in making his first move in that direction. In his first budget, he proposed that a tuition charge of $250 for students at the university and $180 for students in the state colleges should be used as an offset against the general fund appropriation. He added a small carrot by agreeing that a portion of the funds from tuition could be used to augment the proposed appropriations.

Reagan soon learned that the constitutional status of the university prevented either him or the legislature from forcing the regents to charge tuition. The regents could have been placed under severe pressure had the legislature been willing to reduce the appropriations for the university by the amount which it was anticipated could be raised by tuition. The requirement of a two-thirds' majority for passage of the budget in California, however, made that a political impossibility.

When he found that tuition could not be imposed on the university at that time, Reagan abandoned the budget approach and concentrated his attention on getting the regents themselves to adopt tuition. After a fifteen-month campaign, during which he was forced to abandon the term "tuition," the regents approved an $81 increase in students' "fees." The trustees of the state colleges have also increased fees for 1969-70 in an amount slightly less than one-half that of the university increase. Reagan has not abandoned his campaign for tuition, and another substantial increase in charges to students can be expected.

But the most dramatic—and the most serious—of Reagan's approaches to higher education are his attacks on students and faculty. One must grant that Reagan has remarkable intuition when it comes to selecting issues to exploit. The rise in frequency and seriousness of campus demonstrations and disturbances in the past two years has provided him with the grounds for returning to the inflammatory language of the campaign at precisely the right time to prepare for 1970. Here again, the pattern of Reagan's actions emerges with perfect clarity.

The first meeting of the Board of Trustees of the California state colleges which Reagan attended was an emergency session which he forced after a relatively minor incident on the San Francisco State College campus in December 1967. The Governor made nation-wide headlines and massive television film footage as he threatened and cajoled the board into adopting drastic emergency regulations to prevent such disturbances in the future. His actions could be seen at the time, and this view is confirmed in retrospect, as the opening step in his campaign for the Republican Presidential nomination in 1968. The regulations were subsequently very sharply modified because of persuasive evidence that they would not work and were probably illegal. Reagan, however, had attained his objective of being depicted as a tough man who in a crisis could force a weak board to do its public duty.

During the first several months of 1968, Reagan was busy promoting his Presidential candicacy in other states and fighting off a recall movement at home. His return home from defeat at the convention was marked by a sharp escalation in his battle with higher education. Two events which occurred almost simultaneously at Berkeley and San Francisco State provided the framework.

At San Francisco State a controversy was brewing over a report that a part-time black instructor, George Murray, had warned black students that they would be well advised to carry guns to protect themselves. Murray is a member of the Black Panthers, had been placed on probation for his alleged part in a fracas with the staff of the student newspaper in the spring, and had made an unauthorized trip to Cuba in the summer.

Following the report that Murray had advised students to carry guns, the college brought charges against him and was preparing to hold hearings to determine what, if anything, should be done. Before such hearings could be held, Reagan and state college Chancellor Glenn Dumke demanded that Murray be fired summarily, or at least be suspended pending the results of the hearings. College President Robert Smith resisted these demands while Reagan and Dumke fumed and blustered.

Meanwhile, an announcement from Berkeley that Eldridge Cleaver would give a series of lectures in a special course kicked off a new furor. Reagan demanded that the course be canceled and that those responsible for arranging it be fired. A series of sharp exchanges between faculty and regents made it appear for a time that a major confrontation over academic freedom was in the making. The issue was eventually settled without a serious revolt, but only because Reagan did not have a majority of the regents with him. This incident unquestionably helped radicalize many additional students and contributed substantially to the disruptive events later in the year.

A curious side effect of the Cleaver incident was its role in helping to push Chancellor Dumke over the brink on the Murray affair at San Francisco State. In the week preceding the November election, Dumke put the state colleges back in the headlines by ordering President Smith to suspend George Murray immediately. Smith complied with the order and on November 6, the day following the election, the student strike at San Francisco State began. There is little doubt that one of the motives for the timing of Reagan and Dumke's move on Murray was the hope that it would provide the margin of victory in Max Rafferty's campaign for the U.S. Senate. The move failed to achieve that objective but it gave Reagan a new source of headlines for the next three months.

San Francisco Chronicle

"Imagine if You Will, Gentlemen, a Row of Dominoes"

It is important to note that Reagan had been able to prevail on Dumke to do for him at San Francisco State what the Governor had not been able to persuade the regents to do at Berkeley. Smith, responding to a vote of the faculty and the extreme danger created by an attack on students by San Francisco police, closed the campus, tried to reopen it, then closed it again. An emergency meeting of the Board of Trustees on November 18 provided Reagan a forum for demanding that the campus be opened immediately, that it be kept open "at the point of a bayonet" if necessary, and that there be no negotiations with or concessions to striking students until "order has been restored and the educational process resumed."

This "nonnegotiable" stance was maintained firmly by Reagan throughout the student strike and the strike by the AFT local of professors and teaching assistants which began on January 6. The true nature of Reagan's position, which is still not understood by the public, is that the nonnegotiation stance was applied to the professors by Reagan before they struck, thereby forcing them to that drastic action. To their credit, a group of trustees did begin negotiations and ultimately brought an end to the strike, but they could do so only by allowing Reagan and the board to maintain that no negotiations had taken place.

Restoration of relative peace to the San Francisco State campus came almost simultaneously with new disruptions at Berkeley in the form of a strike by teaching assistants and Third World students. Reagan reacted with what has come to be recognized as his characteristic response to any development at Berkeley—he declared "a state of extreme emergency" and ordered the State Highway Patrol to the campus. The conditions thus created ultimately merged with the people's park confrontation, the dispatch of National Guard forces to Berkeley, the tear-gassing of the campus by helicopter—all accompanied by Reagan's daily reiteration of his nonnegotiable stand.

Then as if he were desperately afraid that all the turmoil he had done so much to foment would go away over the summer, Reagan raised two new issues in the spring. First he made the statement that college and university faculties, particularly those in the social sciences and the humanities, were unbalanced to the left and that conservatives could not get teaching jobs. He proposed to remedy the situation by seeing to it that departments in those disciplines have a "balance" of liberal and conservative members. He denied, when questioned, that he was proposing a political test for prospective teachers.

Shortly after raising this issue, Reagan persuaded the regents to take into their own hands the granting of tenure to each faculty member. The regents will now review the recommendations of each chancellor and will approve or reject each professor as they see fit. Regents denied that the decision would be based on political considerations, but one opponent of the move said he had never heard a professor's appointment or tenure discussed except as to his political beliefs. The trustees of the state colleges will have a similar proposal before them in late September. It is almost certain to be adopted.

One cannot review the actions and policies of the Reagan administration toward higher education, noting also their parallels in other areas of public concern, without reaching the conclusion that California is almost certainly facing a period of unprecedented crisis. San Francisco State is in many ways, even more than Berkeley, a microcosm of the condition of the state. The ruthless manner in which Smith was forced to resign; the appointment of the colorful but jingoistic and dangerous S. I. Hayakawa as acting president and then permanent president, in a way which violated every previously agreed on and established procedure for making such appointments; the firing of the chairman of the black studies program; the reduction in the promised number of minority student admissions this fall; the continued harassment of professors who struck last year, are only a few of the factors which suggest that the outward calm of last spring belies the underlying tension. Anyone familiar with the campus is aware that it could explode at any moment.

What has happened at San Francisco State, at Berkeley, with respect to all of public higher education, is typical of the Reagan administration in general. The entire pattern of actions presents to the observer the strange and disturbing phenomenon of the demagogue building up and using popular sentiment against the public.

For a variety of reasons, including the tax structure and educational discrimination against disadvantaged and minority group sections of the population, the parents of no more than one-fourth of the school-age children in California have any reasonable expectation of college attendance or completion for their children. Reagan's skill in cultivating nihilistic reactions is considerable, but it is obvious that many Californians are predisposed to condemn and punish any seeming misbehavior from college students as members of an advantaged group.

Reagan seems to draw heavily from the lower middle class to gain support for policies which will sharpen the tendencies toward inequality already so noticeable in California public higher education. A student body which has been wracked by reactions to the American social condition is condemned for its concern by sections of the public that stand particularly to gain from the very reforms of American society which are advocated.

Governor Reagan's special contribution to California politics is thus the use of artfully cultivated reactions from the middle 60 per cent of the population against themselves and against the bottom 20 per cent, on behalf of the rich.

The American political system has generally provided the means for constant correction and regeneration. In a matter of weeks, Governor Reagan is expected to announce his candidacy for re-election next year and his handling of educational issues will be a major facet of the campaign. One must hope, therefore, that the people of California are becoming disenchanted with the Reagan excesses and will return to the world of mid-20th-century realities. Meanwhile, it is particularly urgent that college and university faculty, administrators and governing boards, and students understand what is happening and see to it that the voters understand as well. They are the targets of Reagan's demagogy, but they need not be sitting ducks.

THE TUPAMAROS

URUGUAY'S URBAN GUERRILLAS

MARYSA N. GERASSI

Mrs. Gerassi, a member of the history faculty at Dartmouth College, is the author of Los Nacionalistas, recently published in Buenos Aires.

Among the many protests staged by Latin Americans to demonstrate their opposition to U.S. policies during Gov. Nelson Rockefeller's recent visit was the destruction of the General Motors offices in Montevideo, Uruguay, by a commando of the Movimiento de Liberación Nacional (MLN), also known as the Tupamaros. Despite extreme security measures, four men, dressed as police officers and armed with machine guns, broke into the G.M. office building and tied two night watchmen. They sprayed fuel in several rooms and on some six cars and set the building on fire. The pamphlets found at the scene bore the five-pointed star of the Tupamaros and protested the visit of Rockefeller, "agent of imperialism." In July, with Uruguay under martial law, the Tupamaros killed one policeman and disarmed several in five raids.

The Tupamaros have been President Jorge Pacheco Areco's major headache since he took over the Presidency in 1967, after Gen. Oscar Gestido died in office. They are the major guerrilla movement in Latin America today and operate in an area—urban guerrilla warfare—where all other revolutionary attempts have failed in recent years.

Since Fidel Castro and his followers overthrew Batista, many Latin American revolutionaries have become convinced that the only means to achieve power is guerrilla warfare. They agree that the "foco" can create the "subjective conditions" for the revolution and have forsaken other possible strategies. The main disagreements have centered on the evaluation of "objective conditions" and on the role of political parties in the revolutionary process. The type of guerrilla best suited for each individual Latin American country has also been a topic of discussions. In certain countries, notably Venezuela, revolutionaries have tried both urban and rural warfare. On the whole, rural guerrilla warfare, advocated both in writing and in action by men like Ernesto Che Guevara, Régis Debray and numerous Latin Americans, among others Douglas Bravo (in Venezuela) and Luis de la Puente Uceda (in Peru), has been the more widely accepted strategy. In fact, urban guerrillas were considered to be totally inadequate for Latin America, especially after the failure of the Venezuelan guerrilleros in the early sixties.

The Tupamaros have done a good deal to advance the opposite case in Uruguay. Almost at the same time that urban guerrilla warfare was abandoned in Venezuela, the Tupamaros adopted that strategy as the most adequate for the "objective conditions" existing in their country. For many years Uruguay was one of the most stable nations in Latin America, where democratic traditions had profound roots, where the most varied parties of the Left had accepted the rules of democratic procedure, and where civic obligations were strongly felt. Uruguay had never shared the problems of the rest of the continent: dire poverty for most of the population, racial divisions, blind oligarchies, bloody dictatorships and exploitation. Its population had benefited from an advanced welfare system and its predominant middle class had enjoyed a high real standard of living in comparison with the rest of the continent. In fact, Uruguay was the "Switzerland of Latin America."

By the mid-fifties, however, Uruguay's economy, based on wool, meat and hide exports, began to falter and the two-party system organized by José Batlle y Ordóñez at the beginning of the century showed signs of strain. As the economic situation deteriorated, the anti-inflationary measures applied by the government in the early sixties met with increasing opposition. In June 1968, after the cost of living had increased 160 per cent in fifteen months, President Pacheco Areco sought to stop inflation and obtain credits from the International Monetary Fund by establishing wage and price controls. The decision was preceded by a month of violent clashes between the police and workers, civil servants, teachers and students (striking for more money for education and a lower bus fare). Before setting up wage and price controls, Pacheco Areco declared Uruguay under limited martial law, which empowered him to close labor unions, ban public meetings, establish press censorship, and jail any political agitator. This state of siege did not calm the situation and strikes went on. In September 1968, hundreds of students clashed with the police and three students were killed; the government closed the university and all schools on September 22. In January 1969, striking civil servants clashed with the police in Montevideo. One person was killed and thirty-two were injured.

On March 15, 1969, the state of siege was lifted. The workers who had been imprisoned were released; Extra, a leftist newspaper which had been closed, was permitted to reappear, and the special mounted police disappeared from Montevideo's main streets. However, as a result of the unrest provoked by Rockefeller's visit, Pacheco Areco reinstated martial law and added one item: all news concerning the Tupamaros was to be censored.

The fundamental factor that prompted the Tupamaros to launch their strategy in the early sixties was their belief that Uruguay had entered a deep and prolonged crisis. The measures adopted to cure Uruguay's economic ills have hit the middle class particularly hard. As it saw its standard of living go down, it joined the workers in protests against the rising cost of living. Civil servants, bank employees and students have defied martial law and gone on strike. Some have joined the Tupamaros. The two Tupamaros arrested after a Banco de Cobranzas holdup in 1964 proved to be a professor of the Escuela Nacional de Bellas Artes and an ex-student of that institution. The police subsequently arrested an engineer who had provided the arms for the robbery. The Tupamaros boast: "Most of the people may not be ready to take part in our struggle, but at least they are not willing to get killed defending a government that harms them."

Since 1963, the Tupamaros have carried out at least fifty-three commando raids, displaying a showmanship that is comprised of humor, audacity and good planning. Perhaps their most spectacular feat was exposing the operations of the Financiera Monty, an investment activity of the sort not legal in Uruguay, since such financing is reserved to banks. On February 16, 1969, Montevideo's broadcasting stations and newspapers received a statement signed by the Tupamaros indicating that two days earlier an MLN commando had broken into the offices of the Financiera Monty in downtown Montevideo and had "expropriated" some $25,000, three packages containing stocks and six account books. The Tupamaros demanded an official statement, saying why the public had not been informed of the holdup, and promised to publicize the contents of the account books at a later date. The police then issued a statement acknowledging that the robbery had indeed taken place and that an investigation was already under way. On February 25, the MLN sent another leaflet to Montevideo's news media, giving a list of the assets and the people connected with the company. The latter included a minister, politicians and figures prominent in Uruguay's business community. This second note was accompanied by photostatic copies of the pages from which the information had been drawn.

On March 1, a mysterious fire in the Monty offices burned most of the documents that could have either refuted or substantiated the Tupamaros' accusations. A few days later, the company books were deposited at the door of the attorney in charge of the investigation.

The origins of the MLN are still very obscure. In a country small enough for everybody to discover the best-guarded secret, very little is known about the Tupamaros, how they came into being as a group, who the leader or leaders are. The name comes from Tupac Amaru, the 18th-century Inca cacique who led an unsuccessful rebellion against Spain.

The Tupamaros first identified themselves as a revolutionary group on August 9, 1965, when shortly before midnight a high caliber bomb exploded in front of the offices occupied by Bayer, the chemical concern. A leaflet with the following message was found nearby: "Death to Vietnam's Yankee assassins. The assassin's intervention in Vietnam must be answered by the union of all oppressed people. The common enemy must be crushed. Bayer, a Nazi enterprise, provides gas for the gringos' intervention. Viva Vietnam. Viva la Revolución. TUPAMAROS."

The beginnings of the MLN, however, go back at least to 1962 and are connected with the activities of a prominent union organizer, Raúl Sendic. Between 1959 and 1962, Sendic, a former law student in his mid-30s and long-time member of the Socialist Party, organized first the sugar beet workers of Paysandú and then the sugar cane workers of Salto and Artigas, in northern Uruguay. In June 1962, Sendic led the cañeros, their wives and children on a 350-mile march to publicize their demands. His long and arduous struggle, reminiscent of Cesar Chavez's drive with California's grape workers, finally paid off. He organized the UTAA (Unión de Trabajadores Azucareros de Artigas) and obtained the implementation of legislation long ignored by the local landowners. Other new UTAA demands, for better working conditions and the expropriation of 30,000 hectares left uncultivated by absentee landowners, were not met despite repeated marches to Montevideo in 1964 and 1965. The cañeros still use the slogan, "For the Fatherland and with Sendic," although he has not been officially connected with UTAA since mid-1963.

On July 31, 1963, a small group of men broke into the Rifle Club of Nueva Helvecia, a sleepy town in Uruguay's hinterland, and stole thirty-one rifles and two carbines, most of which had been lent to the club by the Uruguayan armed forces. At first, the police attributed the robbery to common criminals, but gradually concluded that it had been a political act and singled out Raúl Sendic as the leader. They are probably right.

The Nueva Helvecia robbery marked the beginning of a long series of attacks against arsenals. Dynamite, rifles, guns, military and police uniforms have disappeared in swift commando operations. On January 1, 1964, the customs office of Bella Union, a town on the border of Brazil, was attacked by a handful of men who escaped with nineteen rifles. In February 1966, a commando broke into a theatre showing an Arnold Wesker play and stole ten Mausers and eighteen military uniforms lent by the Uruguayan armed forces for the performance.

Banks have been another target. On October 14, 1964, a branch of the Banco de Cobranzas was held up by two armed men. They managed to get away with a few thousand dollars, but were later arrested. The Tupamaros have been far more successful since then—in their last bank holdup they got away with almost $10,000. Their most profitable "expropriations," however, have been from Uruguay's casinos. On November 29, 1968, six men entered Montevideo's Casino Carrasco at 3:45 P.M. and left with $25,000. On February 18, 1969, seven men dressed in the Tupamaros' favorite disguise, police uniforms, forced their way into Punta del Este's elegant Casino San Rafael and escaped with some $200,000.

Besides "expropriating," the Tupamaros attack U.S. business concerns. When Uruguay broke diplomatic relations with Cuba on September 18, 1964, they placed bombs in a Montevideo bank, in the offices of the Moore-McCormack Lines, in a building owned by Coca-Cola, and burned two official American cars parked in front of the U.S. Embassy. To protest Governor Rockefeller's visit, they not only set fire to General Motors (causing $1 million worth of damage) but started at least a dozen blazes in businesses connected with U.S. capital—Coca-Cola was again one of the targets. Montevideo's main radio stations have also been attacked by the Tupamaros. The sabotage of Radio Ariel, owned by Jorge Batlle, a close adviser of Pacheco Areco, was particularly effective. The station was raided a few minutes before the President was to address the nation and the damage was so great that it had to be closed for several days. The Tupamaros escaped, taking some short-wave transmitters with them.

The most unusual Tupamaro raid was that of the "Hunger Commando." That group held up a truck owned by a food-store chain on December 24, 1963, and distributed its chickens, turkeys and sweets to the inhabitants of a slum for their Christmas dinner.

The transformation of Uruguay's left-wing militants into Tupamaros took place somewhere between 1962 and 1963. That year, Sendic and the Socialist Party militants who had been organizing the nonunionized workers of Uruguay's countryside, became convinced that both tactics and strategy had led them to a dead end. Thus they decided to form a paramilitary group, independent of the official line adopted by the Socialist Party. That group was the Tupamaros and their first holdup, at Nueva Helvecia, was carried out without the support or knowledge of the party. The Tupamaros have not explained this transformation, but observers agree that the cañeros' struggle was crucial. The cane workers and their organizers faced not only the indifference of the government but that of the leftist parties as well. Furthermore, they met with the violent opposition of a labor union, now extinct, the Confederación Sindical del Uruguay. The death of a passer-by during a confrontation between the CSU and the UTAA in 1962, exposed the increasing radicalization of trade unions and political groups. This incident is regarded as one of the probable direct antecedents of the Nueva Helvecia rifle "expropriation" the following year.

The second stage in their evolution came about when the Tupamaros decided that a paramilitary group connected with a specific party was not an adequate solution. Whether the Tupamaros attempted to engage the Socialist Party in revolutionary action and failed, or decided that it was to their advantage to dissociate themselves from a party, the fact is that the group's ties with the Socialists were severed. They became the Movimiento de Liberación Nacional, which welcomes all militants who agree with its strategy and tactics.

The only document stating the ideology and strategy of the MLN was published in the leftist Chilean magazine, Punto Final. The July 2, 1968 issue carried a long article, still the major source of information on the evolution of the movement, and an appendix entitled "Thirty Questions to a Tupamaro." The thirty answers, given to a magazine the Tupamaros could trust (Fidel Castro also chose Punto Final for the Latin American edition of Guevara's Bolivian diary) are considered to be the movement's official position.

The basic principle which has guided the MLN is that "revolutionary action in itself, that is, the process of arming and preparing oneself, acquiring equipment and finally carrying out actions that violate bourgeois legality, generates revolutionary conscience, organization and conditions." This principle is what separates the MLN from all other Uruguayan leftist organizations. Platforms and documents are important, but they are not sufficient to make a revolution. Furthermore, the principles of "a Socialist revolution have been spelled out and tried out in countries like Cuba. They cannot be discussed any longer."

Their position concerning strategy is quite clear. "Although the efforts to create a party or a mass movement before initiating the armed struggle cannot be disregarded, there is no doubt that armed struggle quickens and precipitates mass movements. Both Cuba and China are examples of this . . . . In other words, the rigid formula advanced by certain theoreticians, 'first create the party and then start the revolution,' has more exceptions than applications, historically. Nobody can doubt any longer that the smallest armed group has more chance to become a popular army than the group that limits itself to taking 'revolutionary positions.'" This rejection of the debate among numerous Latin American leftists over the role of the political party in the revolutionary process is typical of the Tupamaros and stems from their lack of dogmatism in everything except their ultimate goal, socialism. They have even managed to remain outside the usual bitter fighting of the Left. They place themselves in the Marxist-Leninist camp, consider their struggle to be part of a continental strategy aimed at creating "more Vietnams," but they are not sectarian. Punto Final described the MLN's relationship with the Uruguayan Left in these terms: "Their work receives fraternal treatment from the Socialist Party, the MRO (Movimiento Revolucionario Oriental) and the FAU (Federación Anarquista del Uruguay) and respectful treatment from the Communist Party."

Another indication of the MLN's flexibility is the refusal of the Tupamaro interviewed by Punto Final to give any detailed strategy for Uruguay or any other country: "Strategy is elaborated on the basis of real facts and reality changes, independent of our will." He indicated the following general lines, "valid for this day, this month and this year . . . . To create as soon as possible an armed force capable of taking advantage of any favorable situation created either by Uruguay's crisis or any other factor. To create consciousness in the population, through the actions of armed groups or any other means, that only revolution will bring change. To strengthen the labor unions, radicalize their struggle and connect them with the revolutionary movement. To create bases in the cities and in the countryside. To connect ourselves with other Latin American revolutionary movements for action throughout the continent."

More specifically, strategy was based on: "The conviction that the present crisis, far from ending, is worsening every day. Our country is bankrupt. A capitalist development plan aimed at increasing production of export goods, were it feasible, would give meager results and only in a long range. In other words, people will continue to tighten their belts for many years . . . . The second basic fact in our strategy is the high degree of unionization among Uruguayan workers. All unions are not equally combative—either because of their composition or their leadership—but the fact that practically all the employees of the government-owned services, banking, industry and commerce are unionized constitutes by itself a highly positive factor, unparalleled in America. The possibility of paralyzing the state services has created and can create a very interesting situation from a revolutionary point of view . . . ."

The Tupamaros discarded rural guerrilla warfare because Uruguay lacks the mountains or jungles where a "foco" can be organized. On the other hand, it is highly urbanized, at least 70 per cent of its 2,560,000 inhabitants live in cities and almost half in Montevideo alone. The capital also dominates Uruguay's economic life, handles most of the international trade, consumes 75 per cent of the electricity, and contains most of the industry. Montevideo was considered a far better setting for a guerrilla base than the flat, sparsely populated countryside.

Although police estimate that there are some 100 hard-core Tupamaros, the exact number is unknown. A recent publication indicates that the total is 1,000 but with only fifty or a hundred participating in commando operations. The members are divided into completely independent cells of six or seven men, coordinated through the leaders, and each Tupamaro ignores the real identity of his fellow cell members. Decisions for commando operations are put to a vote, individually or by cells. Leaders meet once a year to discuss their units' instructions and evaluations. It is not known whether the MLN has both a military and a political leadership or whether they are united in one person.

MLN prefers single men, but both men and women are accepted. The future guerrillero must be sponsored by a Tupamaro, who has to write an exhaustive report on the candidate. The Tupamaros who participate in commando operations must undergo intensive training. They must be in perfect physical shape; smokers are encouraged to cut down, and drinking is forbidden. Part of their preparation includes learning how to handle weapons and explosives, how to escape, how to start a car without a key, and how to sabotage police cars.

The Tupamaros train at bases for the most part located outside Montevideo, often at one of the numerous beaches along Uruguay's southeastern coast. Some of these bases also contain hospitals, manned by medical students. In December 1958 a police raid uncovered a base where eight Tupamaros lived in two shacks and a barn which was part hospital, part laboratory for the fabrication of bombs, and part garage. On the premises, the police found twelve weapons (machine guns, rifles, shotguns and pistols), 700 rounds of ammunition, medical instruments, medicines, license plates, a Volkswagen (the Tupamaros' favorite car), a VW hood and seats, guerrilla handbooks, correspondence, fourteen false identity cards, uniforms and a list of police headquarters cars.

In the last three years, the police have uncovered some eleven Tupamaro bases. Several were hide-outs, others were makeshift ammunition factories, and still others provided services. In one of them, a photographer's shop, the raiders found equipment to make ID cards similar to those issued by Uruguay's police. All the machines used in the forgeries and even the paper were legitimate and had been obtained from police headquarters. The type of equipment found in Tupamaro hide-outs has led observers to believe that the movement provided Guevara with the false Uruguayan passport he used on his way to Bolivia.

Only two Tupamaros have been killed since 1965, when the MLN stepped up its activities, but at least twenty men connected with the movement are in jail. Although some are thought to have been tortured, the information obtained by the police has not led to a major crackdown because of the cell organization. No top-ranking Tupamaro has been caught. Sendic, whose capture was ordered after the Nueva Helvecia holdup and who is believed to be one of the top members of the MLN, if not the leader, is still at large. He is thought to have led the Casino San Rafael robbery, having spent at least two months in Punta del Este before the holdup, with his wife and youngest child.

The Tupamaro intelligence service has infiltrated even the police and the current joke in Montevideo is that if you want to find out the exact weather forecast, ask a Tupamaro. Their information on Uruguay's armed forces is voluminous. The police have captured documents which disclose a precise knowledge of Montevideo's garrisons—number of men, identity of officers, schedules, private addresses, logistics, etc. On February 7, 1969, a guerrilla deposited a package containing some sixty pounds of dynamite at the doorstep of the captain who is the Uruguayan army's armament technician. The following letter was attached to the package: "Captain Manzino: This material is in bad shape; since it is dangerous to handle it, we have decided to destroy it. We believe you are best equipped for this task. We are aware of your technical expertise. At any rate, since these boxes were ultimately going to be examined by you, we decided to avoid delays and give them to you. Movimiento de Liberación Nacional (Tupamaros)."

The Tupamaros have not attacked the government frontally, but have sought either to expose its corruption, i.e., the Monty holdup, or force it to display its weakness and respond with irrational repression. On August 7, 1968, a commando kidnapped Dr. Ulises Pereira Reverbel, president of the state-owned Electricity and Telephone Services, a close friend of President Pacheco Areco and one of the ideologues of the hard anti-labor line followed by the government. MLN issued a statement taking full credit for the kidnapping and warning the police not to search for the prisoner. Despite strenuous efforts on the part of Montevideo's police force, Pereira Reverbel was not found until he reappeared five days later, haggard, unshaven but unharmed, in a Land Rover parked near Montevideo's main football stadium. The kidnapping was not done only for publicity, like Fidel Castro's kidnapping of Juan Manuel Fangio, the Argentine racing champion. It sought to create support among the workers who had been subjected to Pereira Reverbel's anti-labor policies. In its efforts to locate him, moreover, the government ordered the search to include the university. The police entered some buildings without a warrant and without requesting permission from the rector. Students opposed the search and violent clashes ensued.

The Tupamaros have achieved the first stages of their strategy without terrorism. They fight with the police only when they are forced. Whenever their raids might hurt civilians, they make a point of protecting them. During a bank holdup, the Tupamaros helped an elderly lady who had fainted. Afterward, even Montevideo's chief of police had to admit "the perfect organization, the good manners of the robbers and their humane behavior." On another occasion, when the Tupamaros blew up the transmission room of Radio Ariel, they first took time to warn the people in a nearby house that they might be hurt by the explosion. Consequently, Uruguayans have not been seriously harmed by the Tupamaro raids, although on occasion passers-by have been wounded. Thus to a certain extent, and without necessarily approving its goals, they admire the MLN's audacity and expertise.

The Tupamaros have shown that urban guerrillas can be organized and survive, that they can use tactics which will not necessarily alienate the population, and that urban guerrilleros do not always develop the neuroses that the theoreticians of rural warfare, like Debray, attribute to them. Up to this point, the Tupamaros have relied almost entirely on their own resources, although they may have received aid from Cuba. They are also thought to be in contact with a newly started Brazilian "foco" which is using MLN tactics (as, for example, the recent exchange of the kidnapped United States ambassador for a group of political prisoners), and with Tacuara, an Argentine group whose origins are in the extreme Right. Uruguayan authorities failed to rout the Tupamaros when it was easiest to do so; now they may not be able to do it alone. Uruguay may ask either the United States or one of its powerful neighbors, Argentina or Brazil, to help destroy the MLN. Far from showing concern at the possibility of foreign intervention, the Tupamaros say it would benefit them in the long run. "In any case," writes a New York Times correspondent, "Uruguay and her Tupamaros seem likely to become a major problem for the United States in Latin America in the immediate future."

TOTAL FREEDOM AND BEYOND

DONOVAN BESS
Mr. Bess is on the staff of the San Francisco Chronicle.

San Francisco

This is the year of Apollo 11. It is also the year in which that psychological sophisticate, Richard Alpert, came back from his guru in India to reap a big following of inner-space explorers with his story of spiritual conversion. It is a time of burgeoning meditation societies on the college campuses, and of passionate rebellion against the amorality of our technology.

Thus it is a year promising much to any man who can blend the psychological allurements of these two movements into one product, and such a product is indeed being ardently pushed. It is called Scientology. Serious work on the blend began in 1950 when L. Ron Hubbard, a science-fiction writer with exuberant red hair, set millions of Americans to playing a psychotherapeutic game called dianetics. His book on the subject became a best seller—helped, probably, by the almost panicky chorus of disdain expressed by respectable intellectual luminaries.

The Church of Scientology is a recent extension of dianetics into bizarre spiritual levels, where practitioners report the kinds of ESP experience abundant in the literature of psychedelic drugs. They commonly and casually assert that they know they have lived in past human bodies; some even remember how much they weighed. Creation of this church gave Hubbard a lot of new levels to offer his devotees, and at the same time stymied defenders of the public treasury, like the Internal Revenue Service, which so far has not persuaded the courts that Scientology is more of a commercial enterprise than a church.

Scientology offers its novitiates a system of psychological "processing" as specific as any program for learning shorthand or engineering. Each grade has been firmly fixed, in writing, by Hubbard. You go through all of the lower grades face to face with an "auditor," who does his best to keep his face stony and his mind bland so as not to ruffle any of Hubbard's precepts. You and your guide use an "E-Meter," a device that measures electrical resistance in your body; it is supposed to tell the auditor when you have an emotional "withhold" from him. He keeps asking you questions or giving you rote commands until you sweat your way through your memory and expose some traumatic deposit ("engram") which supposedly has blighted your life.

Perhaps it is not surprising that Scientology strongly attracts men and women trained in the tidier scientific disciplines, engineers and computer programmers. One of the top officials in American Scientology is John Michael Smith, a young chemist who resigned as an assistant professor at the California Institute of Technology after getting processed to the highest level so far invented by Hubbard. "I've looked at the physical sciences and I know what knowledge is there," he said. "Scientology deals with the spiritual aspect of the main source of the world we live in. The answers don't come from the physical aspect of man."

The theatricality of Scientology has also brought many entertainment personalities into the movement, including all of several leading rock bands and actor Stephen Boyd —who, like Smith, reached the Scientological peak and observed from there: "I guess that is about six steps above Nirvana." The church has established a Celebrities Center in Los Angeles, to make maximum use of the Hollywood talent among its members.

According to Bob Thomas, top administrator for the church in the United States, the E-Meter is as useful to Scientology auditors as the thermometer is to doctors. The person who is getting processed is called the "preclear," and regarded as a patient who wants to get well. His objective is to become a "Clear"—a man "who has got control over his thoughts, and has gone to the source of his aberrations."

During processing, the preclear hangs on to two tin cans wired to a Wheatstone Bridge in the E-Meter box. The auditor watches the device's circuit board. He pounds away with the Hubbard prefabricated commands or questions, commands like "tell me something you wouldn't mind forgetting." After repeated pokes into the memory with this command, a preclear will produce something painful. John McMaster of South Africa, Hubbard's world-roving spokesman, said an example of an engram is: "A man thinks of the time he wanted to show his penis to somebody but his mother said 'naughty.' "

Until the preclear fights his way back to the engram, the E-Meter needle does all kinds of fancy jiggling. When the auditor sees the needle float free, he feels the preclear has gotten a release from the grade. The preclear, himself, is felt to proclaim his emancipation by the blissful look of freedom on his face.

By hard work, sometimes as much as twelve hours a day, a preclear climbs through the first six grades of release and is entitled then to come to grips with the level in which he may try for Clear.

What interests the Internal Revenue Service about this spiritual escalation is that there is a stiff charge for every grade. Scientologists estimate the cost of getting Clear at $4,000 to $5,000. You can get through the first four grades of processing for a package price of $617.50, if you pay in advance, but the cost rises with the ascent. At the bottom are free lectures and a free "personality test." Then comes a basic communications course for only $15. For many an alienated person hungry for companionship and structure, this course may be worth the money if only because it puts him for hours opposite another person who has agreed to look him straight in the eye and to give or take commands rapturously. Some neurotic inhabitants of big cities have never had even this much interchange with other human beings (even in sexual intercourse you can keep your eyes closed).

Many novitiates emerge with high enthusiasm from this preliminary orientation track. Dozens of Scientologists who went on into processing have told me with evident sincerity that they are getting rid of long-standing personal problems. Many report extraordinary healing of ailments ranging from headaches to diabetes. A typical testimonial came from Myron Ruderman, a 32-year-old graduate in physics from Reed College. "I think," he said, "that very shortly psychiatrists will have to learn Scientology and dianetics. There is a way the mind works. The truth is the truth." Pat Price, an ex-mayor of Burbank, Calif., said he came to this church with a 70 per cent hearing loss, but "while undergoing a [Scientology] process my hearing came back to me entirely."

"Clear" used to be the top level of Scientological striving, but Hubbard, employing the creative gifts that made him succeed in science fiction, has invented six levels above Clear. Spiritually ambitious folks now have that much more to work for, and that much more time and money to contribute to the church. A dry comment on this expanding theology came from H. Charles Berner, who was a close associate of Hubbard and spent fifteen years in the movement before rebelling at the rigidness of the founder's policies. "Every six months," said Berner, "he comes out with a new something or other."

At the moment, Hubbard is doing "advanced research" on two additional levels he will offer a constituency which, church spokesmen claim, now includes 15 million persons on four continents, 250,000 of them Americans. Jane Kember, Guardian Worldwide (chief administrator) of the church, said last month in a statement issued at the organization's headquarters in England: "Mr. Hubbard is currently engaged in a treatise on the decline and fall of Western civilizations in order to discover the future of Western civilizations in the context of what has gone before. There is possibly no end to a research which seeks to find the ultimate spiritual capability of Mankind."

John McMaster—"the world's first Clear"—recently told reporters that income sent to the church headquarters had stood at only $10,000 a week in January 1968, but rose to $140,000 in the succeeding six months. Scientology's churches and franchises (now called "missions") give 10 per cent of their income to the world headquarters in a thirty-room, baronial mansion near East Grinstead, Sussex. So the weekly gross income of the church presumably now stands at well above $1.4 million. (The church has expanded even faster in the past fourteen months.) The magnitude of the financial flow is reflected in Hubbard's statement a year ago to his top officers that the Scientology organizations owed him $13 million but that he had forgiven the debt. His administrator for the United States, Bob Thomas, said Hubbard had a salary of about $22,000 from 1957 to 1959, but has drawn no salary since then. Thomas said: "The average (Christian) minister's salary is $9,000 to $30,000."

Mrs. Kember's suggestion that there may be "no end" to Hubbard's research leaves the door wide open for the kind of out-of-this-world inventions dear to a science-fiction writer's heart. Already, Hubbard and his associates speak of "the galaxy" as though they have traveled to, or at least know about, the other planets. One disenchanted ex-Scientologist, Woody McPheeters, said that during his years in the movement he got the impression that the church leaders' expansion program includes "the entire galaxy."

Most Scientologists are too busy heading up toward Clear to worry about postgraduate striving. The people who make Clear demonstrate in their lives that they are better than lower-level parishioners at influencing people, winning friends and making money. They apparently are virtually assured of getting a lifelong position in the church hierarchy. Even knowledgeable preclears can claim advantages beyond spiritual growth. Alan Albert, training director for the Palo Alto mission, said that after only a few hours of training to become an auditor he quit a $17,500-a-year job with Philco-Ford—and makes "about the same" salary now. Training is a career opportunity in which you get processed as well as learn how to process others. Currently it costs $1,300 to become a Hubbard Advanced Auditor, but this year Hubbard & Associates are offering newcomers a $500 quickie training course by which you can get on the staff as an auditor in two months. With this training, church spokesmen in San Francisco said, you are eligible to process anybody. Your income while doing this will run to about $200 a week.

About three years ago Hubbard moved out of the English manor house headquarters, occupied previously by the Maharajah of Jaipur. "He is trying to retire from public life," Mrs. Kember reports. At the moment he is cruising on the Apollo, a 5,000-ton ship that once ferried passengers between Scotland and Ireland. This is the flagship of a fleet operated by the church's exclusive Sea Organization. There are at least five other vessels in the fleet, two of them tied up near Los Angeles, Scientology's national headquarters and the site of buildings where you can get processing at the top levels, including the mysterious OTs.

"OT" stands for "Operating Thetan." There are six OT levels above Clear. Clear, according to Arthur Maren, Scientology administrator for the Western states, is "one who has cause over all mental matter, energy, space and time." So what else can a man do?

Soar on to the OTs, of course. An OT, says the Scientology dictionary, is "not in a body." Indeed, every OT I've talked to speaks of himself as a spirit ("Thetan") who not only wafts himself in and out of his contemporary body but gets his mind back into vivid remembrances of bodies past. Maren, who is OT-4, said Hubbard created the new levels "because there's more to life than your own time—I want to be cause over what's happening out there, too."

The style of the OT is exemplified by McMaster who, according to headquarters, "has achieved one of the highest States of Existence in this Universe." One day during processing, he said, "I was looking at the floor through the bottom of my feet." Advanced Scientologists do not question such reports, for they have their own experiences of extrasensory perception. McMaster said he had done so well at Scientological remembering that he picked up details of his experiences in the last womb he was conceived in. "In the womb," he said, "I recall fights between my mother and father." How did he pick that up? "I used to come out and look at them fighting," he recalled. He said he didn't want to "be born in a family of squabbles" but unfortunately got lost somehow, "became a helpless little baby" and got born from that South African womb. "If I hadn't become Clear," he said, "it's very likely I'd have gone into the dwindling spiral of not-knowing."

The spiral he did get into certainly has produced a happy personality. This pink-faced, white-haired, self-styled "pope of Scientology" good-naturedly parries television interviewers who doubt his faith or accuse him of psychosis. On one TV show a Roman Catholic priest complained that Scientologists "don't describe a deity." (Hubbard's name is sacrosanct, but the word God seldom shows up.) McMaster told the priest: "You must admit that for 2,000 years Christianity has failed." He is almost cavalier about his past lives. Here is an exchange on the subject:

Q. Who were you in previous lives?

A. I have been mostly male. In most of the lives I died early.

Q. Which body were you in last?

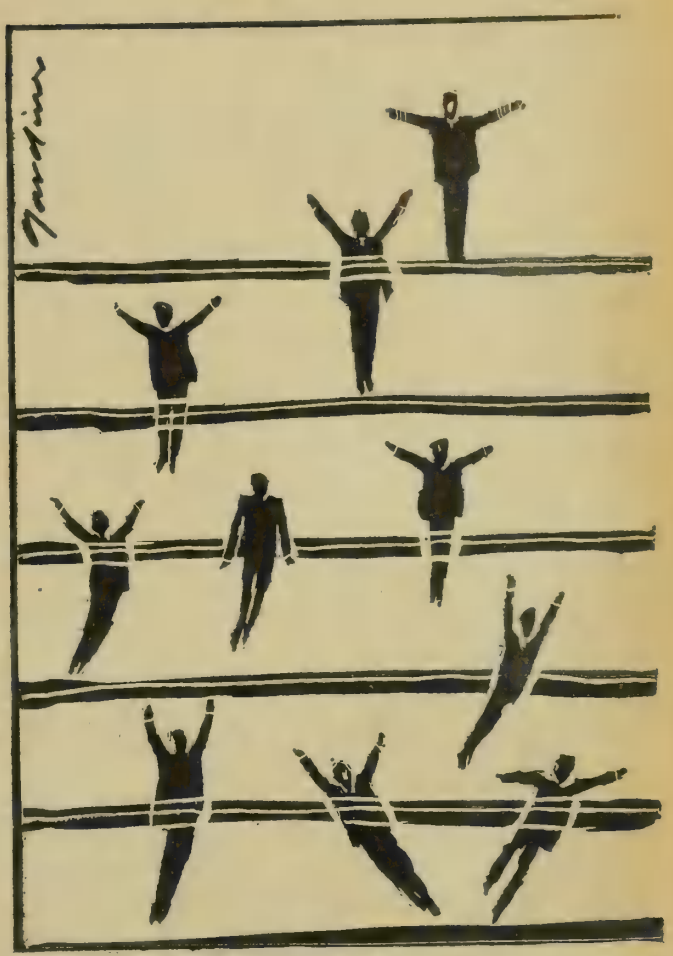
A. My last body died in New York in 1926.

Q. Who were you?

A. I won't say it, because it's a very well-known name. (Hesitating, smiling.) I was an actor.

Q. When did you die the last time?

A. The last time I was about 30.



Q. Ah, so you perhaps were Rudolph Valentino? [Valentino died at age 31 on August 23, 1926.]

A. (Smiling enigmatically.) Rudolph Valentino knew he had lived many times, and announced it.

You don't have to be a blue-ribbon Scientologist to detect such memories in your psyche. Tony Shelton, a 17-year-old beginner reported: "The last time I was in a coal miner's body in Iowa. I was about 6 feet 4 and weighed 240 pounds." This time he's 6 feet tall and weighs only 190.

The atmosphere in Scientology churches is not one you would expect of a religious institution, except for the huge portraits of Hubbard. He gazes out into the room, not looking at you in the least but seeming to be concentrating fiercely on some profound and momentous idea.

The people you meet are very bright-eyed. They tend to say "Hi!" They peer brightly into your face, as though to find out just where you may be on the "road to total freedom." Public relations officials jealously defend top officials from making gaffes. At the San Francisco church, no media cameraman may take pictures "within the organization," that is, on the premises. At the Los Angeles church, the receptionist will not let you by until you sign in. I got the feeling I had wandered into a building operated by the Defense Department. The Scientologists talk about their philosophy with the same humorless dedication I became familiar with when covering a convention of Jehovah's Witnesses.

Their certainty that they have The Truth may be rooted in the processing, which, defector Scientologists complain, tends to produce automatons. The church leaders take an opposite viewpoint: they think we are the automatons, puppets operated by the engrams in our "reactive bank." Ex-scientologists claim the church people operate under an authoritarian structure; Hubbard says the opposite —he says we are not democratic, and to get democratic we'll have to get rid of our reactive banks and become Scientologists.

Hubbard, wearing his commodore's uniform as commander of the Sea Organization, sometimes conceives odd concepts as he paces the deck of the Apollo, fingering the solid-gold bracelet that carries on it the words, "Operating Thetan."

Early this year, this 58-year-old native of Nebraska sat down at an electric typewriter especially built to keep up with his fast-moving mind, and wrote for his devotees an urgent essay on the need to expand. "Hitler, like Caesar," he wrote, "did not 'consolidate his conquered territory.' It was not possible to do so, not because he did not have troops but because he didn't have a real demand for German technology and social philosophy before conquering. Thus Hitler lost his war and fascist Germany died." Hubbard then added: "Only a Scientology organization has an unlimited horizon. But any organization must expand to survive."

In another essay, on "politics," he concedes that he has spoken "derisively of governments and ideologies—including democracy." He wrote: "Watching the U.S. and Australia fight Scientology with blind fury while supporting oppressive mental and religious practices proves that democracy, applied to and used by aberrated people, is far from an ideal activity and is only aberrated democracy."

Why did England, that bastion of tolerance, last year ban visits to the island by foreigners planning to study at the Sussex headquarters of this church? Kenneth Robinson, then the British health minister, said Scientology's "authoritarian principles and practices are a potential menace to the personality and well-being of those so deluded as to become its followers." An investigation is now under way in London under the direction of Richard Crossman, director of the Department of Health and Social Security.

It is possible that only psychologists could adequately investigate aspects of Scientology that seem to parallel those of totalitarian movements from the medieval Catholic Church to fanatical leftist and rightist organizations of this century. From the beginning, the would-be Scientologist is trained—or perhaps conditioned—to command and be commanded. I have never heard one well-advanced Scientologist utter a word of criticism or implied criticism of the founder.

"Scientology," Hubbard has written, "gives us our first chance to have a real democracy." Does this mean that his church is to make the future definition of what democracy is? And does he feel that people who don't at least try to be Clears can't be good citizens?

There's a clue to his feelings in one imperative of the Scientology Code of Honor: "Never fear to hurt another in a just cause." To explore this, I asked a question of David Ziff, a Columbia anthropology graduate who supervises the top level of auditing at the Advanced Organization of the American Church in Los Angeles. A "just cause," he said, "is expressed in any patriotic statement made by any country." The implication conveyed by such statements is that Scientology's ambitions extend beyond giving people spiritual help. Ziff also was told about criticism of his church by an ex-Scientologist who has set up a rival group. "If he's an ex-Scientologist," Ziff said, "he's an ex-human."

Hubbard's claims for the Sea Organization have a Wagnerian flavor to them. "The Sea Org," he has proclaimed, "is the most valuable and dedicated group of beings on this planet and is the spearhead of a new and greater civilization." Does this not suggest the concept of a Chosen People? Why is Scientology so popular in South Africa?

In recent years, the church has followed a policy of getting members to "disconnect" from those who failed to live up to the standard of the Ethics Department. Such persons were declared "Suppressive Persons" and for months and for years they received letters from former associates and others in the church who informed them coldly: "I hereby disconnect from you." This cold-blooded practice has now been dropped, says Bob Thomas. "We found this was not a very popular solution to the problem."

Worse than leaving the church is "plotting to misuse" the Hubbard manuals employed in upper-level processing. "Any Sea Org member" who becomes aware of such alleged plotters, he proclaimed, "is to use Auditing Process R2-45." In a Scientology handbook he has described this as "an enormously effective process for exteriorization but its use is frowned upon by this society at this time." Exterioration is defined as the separating of the spirit from the body. So what's this all about? Jane Kember explained: "Process R2-45 was coined as a joke—is not authorized, and I am afraid occasionally 'misfires' as a joke when taken literally."

Hubbard used to tag a Ph.D. to his name. When reporters pressed him on his acquisition of the degree, he said he got it from the Sequoia University of California. This institution, now defunct, was headed by Dr. Joseph Hough, a chiropractor who refused to testify before a California assembly subcommittee looking into reports that some colleges in the state sold graduate degrees for profit. Hubbard had some schooling as an engineer. He certainly does not have respect for psychiatrists and clinical psychologists. He conducts a holy war on them, but nevertheless wants to win them over. This summer California's psychiatrists and psychologists got letters from the church notifying them it has "a near but unwanted monopoly on results in mental healing." It offered the M.D.s and Ph.D.s a 50 per cent discount on Scientology services, but appended a condition that they must "not mix Scientology with older practices. We have no wish," the letter concluded, "that you should suffer." "I had the feeling," said one psychotherapist, "that I was being threatened."

In a leaflet distributed last spring, Hubbard wrote: "The psychiatrist and his front groups operate straight out of the terrorist text books. The Mafia looks like a convention of Sunday School teachers compared to these terrorist groups." His roving ambassador, John McMaster, wrote that "the idea of mental institutions such as they are now is generated by Communism, but Russia will not allow any of these so-called therapies to be practiced on its own people, only on its supposed enemies." The leaflet attacking psychiatry contained a cartoon depicting that medical specialty as death holding its scythe and walking toward us out of a map of Russia.

Meanwhile, the U.S. Food and Drug Administration sticks to its accusation against Scientology that it is "peddling auditing services" on the basis of "pseudo-scientific representations." The United States Court of Appeals in the District of Columbia reversed a lower court decision against the church. But in response to an FDA brief for a rehearing, two of the three appeals judges, on April 18, said the government had "improperly framed" its case. The court virtually invited the FDA to seek a new trial and to challenge Scientology's claim to tax-exempt status as a religion.

If the organization should lose its religious status, it would lose the protection of the First Amendment and might be found guilty of "false labeling" under the Food, Drug and Cosmetics Act.

MEAT AND POTATOES

WHY THE POOR PAY MORE

JENNIFER CROSS
Miss Cross has written a consumer book on the food industry, The Jolly Green Giant, which will be published shortly by Indiana University Press. It developed from earlier articles published in The Nation.

At a time when shoppers are barely controlling their fury over food prices, up nearly 5 per cent since January, it is disquieting to come upon new evidence that the poor are, directly or indirectly, forced to pay even more for their groceries than the rest of us. The Federal Trade Commission economic report on food chain selling practices in the District of Columbia and San Francisco Bay Area, released in July, is the latest document in an impressive body of evidence. Its findings are ruffling an industry which constantly brags of its efficiency and faith in free competition. They are also an eye opener for shoppers who often do not study prices as carefully as they should, or let their gaze wander as the check-out clerk rings up the purchases.

The report finds that the 25.4 million people with annual incomes of under $3,553 for a family of four spend 40 per cent of their take-home pay on food; the national average is 17 per cent. The poorer you are, of course, the more you must pay proportionately to eat, but adding to the burden is the fact that supermarkets are scarce in low-income districts. Unable to commute to the cheaper, better stocked suburban emporia, the poor are forced to rely on "mom and pop" stores, where prices are 2 to 3 per cent higher, and convenience stores, which may be 8 per cent or more above chain supermarket prices.

Supermarkets that do operate in the ghetto compete less vigorously than elsewhere. Services tend to be more meager, facilities smaller and shabbier, meat and other produce inferior to general chain standards. There are fewer price wars and promotions. (When the $1,000 jackpot prizes for supermarket games are handed out, they are planted among prosperous suburban matrons rather than with their counterparts in the ghetto.)

The degree of sloppiness in pricing and stocking exhibited by all food chain outlets is unpardonable, but it is particularly glaring in the low-income outlets. The FTC found that 23 per cent of advertised specials were unavailable in Washington, D.C., and 7 per cent in San Francisco, compared to 11 and 5 per cent in their respective suburbs. On the shelves, 8 to 9 per cent of all advertised items were mispriced (the errors ran as high as 35 per cent), and three times out of four the customer paid more than was necessary. Two large chains in the Bay Area (Safeway and Purity) did not change the stamped prices on their specials, leaving the door open for checker error. Also, 5 to 10 per cent of all regular shelf prices failed to tally with the official "book" prices.

This rate of error—far higher than the 0.5 to 3 per cent the industry admits—adds small but annoyingly cumulative sums to anyone's food expenditures. It prevents shoppers from taking full advantage of advertised specials, which can save 10 to 20 per cent on the grocery bill. And the poor, who can afford it least, are victimized the most.

It is unlikely that the chains are deliberately gouging their customers. The FTC report denies the accusation made two years ago to the House Government Operations Committee that Safeway and other firms raised prices on the days when welfare checks were cashed, and charged more than elsewhere for certain items in their low-income outlets. A large proportion of pricing errors can be attributed simply to poor management. This could explain both why the chains' accuracy ranges from mediocre (Safeway) to downright awful (Lucky), and why regional offices fail to keep track of how well individual store managers perform. A minority of these have a built-in incentive to inflate their sales record, either because they are paid on a commission basis, or because they wish to compensate for pilferage and spoilage, which can be higher in low-income areas.

More commonly, stores become mired in the administration of their own marketing strategies—that constant juggling with prices designed to make them appear competitive without actually being cheap. When hundreds of prices must be changed each week, and staff is limited, mistakes occur, on the shelves and at the check-out.

One immediate solution is for chains already operating in the ghetto (in the suburbs, too) to raise their standards of operation. The FTC suggests tighter management control of prices, and better attention to stocking, including the marking of new prices on all advertised items and, if these items run out, offering customers a comparable alternative.

Ghetto shoppers ought to learn the buying skills which the middle classes practice (in theory). The FTC makes the usual pitch, favored in consumer circles, for "a meaningful consumer education program, both within the school system and through adult education groups." The grocery trade, too, needs educating. A few small or medium-sized operations claim that they can make a reasonable living in the ghetto; their experiences could form the basis for industry training programs, and not be confined merely to features in the food trade press.

However, all the education in the world will not compensate for the lack of low-cost markets. The free enterprise system, which is so eager to serve the prosperous suburbs, whimpers to a halt at the edge of the ghetto. Many chains are reluctant to set up shop there, claiming that their expenses are 2 to 3 per cent higher than elsewhere, that land is expensive and hard to get and storage space inadequate. Insurance can be expensive, the pilferage rate discouragingly high, and ghetto violence—holdups, muggings, tire slashings—makes it hard to keep staff or maintain the morale of workers who stay. With its static or declining population, the inner city market is so tight that new entrants can succeed only at the expense of "mom and pop" or of one another, and the fact that so many chains have pulled out is proof of difficult business conditions. The poor are an unattractive market that food retailers, working on a 1 per cent net profit, do not particularly want.

The long-term remedy, says the FTC, is to improve the balance of competition by inducing more supermarket chains to move into the ghetto, and tangle with one another as well as with "mom and pop." Thus urban renewal agencies should make enough land available to accommodate "two or more competing supermarkets within a convenient shopping radius of most inner city residents." The federal government may also have to dangle a carrot, by guaranteeing loans and possibly underwriting physical losses from riot and insurrection.

Suggestions for giving the poor at least as good a break as the middle class have a fine utopian ring, but they do not make one particularly hopeful for the future. To be effective, consumer education would have to combat the $2.172 billion spent by food manufacturers, mainly to promote brand names—a practice which results in the paying of millions of dollars a year more by the poor for the brands they recognize than it would cost them to buy the cheaper items carrying non-ballyhoo labels.

Pinning much hope on urban renewal is unrealistic at present. Many renewal agencies—at least in the San Francisco area—complain that they have a hard job persuading one supermarket chain to settle, let alone several, and that they have enough problems of their own without tinkering with the balance of business competition. That Congress would provide much help is also doubtful. It allows the U.S. Department of Agriculture to pay farmers more than $3 billion a year to boost their income or to compensate them for not growing food, but would it vote even a fraction of that sum to provide the poor with better shopping facilities, given its reluctance to increase federal spending, especially for programs which smack of socialism?

And even if Congress provided the incentives, there is no guarantee that the chains would bite. Wedded quite understandably to the profit motive, they are not yet convinced of the need to operate as a charity, and only the largest of them could afford to maintain marginal stores for reasons of social benevolence. Indeed, should they be asked to subsidize society's failure to provide the poor with an adequate income?

Far out as the FTC's proposals are, however, they should be read by every legislator during the current political season. Congress will soon vote on a number of important measures designed to combat hunger and malnutrition and boost the spending power of the poor. These are principally the Administration's welfare proposals and a number of bills to extend the food stamp program. The FTC's findings support critics' complaints that the proposals most likely to win are laughably inadequate. The Nixon welfare plan would guarantee only $1,600 a year for a family of four; a family of that size needs $1,200 for the USDA's extremely spartan low-cost food plan—though they could get stamps, thanks to liberal pressure on the Administration, which was going to deny stamps to welfare recipients.

Two of the four food stamp bills—the Senate committee bill (S.2547) and the Nixon-May bill (HR 12222)—are not strikingly more liberal than those now in effect. Their fund ceilings are $610-$750 million for fiscal 1970, only double the present pitiable amount, and poor families would still shell out 30 per cent of their income to obtain $1,200 in food. Far better alternatives are the Farbstein (McGovern) bill (HR 10728) or the Foley-Green bill (HR 13423), which would virtually write an open check for funds to provide families with stamps worth up to $1,440, and costing no more than 25 per cent of their income.

It is to be hoped that Congress will err on the side of generosity, knowing that any handout to the poor will not only be devalued by rising prices but will leak away to the friendly neighborhood grocer, struggling to make ends meet at the dark end of the market place.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Nader's Raiders and the Traders

THE NADER REPORT ON THE FEDERAL TRADE COMMISSION. By Edward F. Cox, Robert C. Fellmeth and John E. Schulz. Richard W. Baron Publishing Co. Distributed by E. P. Dutton & Co. 256 pp. $5.95.

SANFORD WATZMAN
Mr. Watzman is a reporter in the Washington bureau of the Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Ralph Nader is becoming a plague on all the houses of power in Washington, so much so that it is now difficult to keep track of him to know where to cheer him on. Latest reports have him not only at the Agriculture Department charging deception in the marketing of hot dogs but also mobilizing some of his "Raiders" for an assault on the invisible tentacles of giant law firms in the capital. With public attention focused for the moment on his current operations, his updated and expanded report on the Federal Trade Commission (drafted by three of his Raiders, law school students who worked with him) comes at an opportune time. Its publication is a reminder that there is much unfinished business at the FTC from the public's point of view. This agency, a slacker and a coward, at times even a traitor—in recent wars waged on behalf of the consumer—has withstood the plague first visited on it with the release of the original Nader report last January. The Lord has turned back to smite again. One hopes that the FTC and those in authority over it, not to mention the people, will take note.

Does this quiet, inoffensive commission deserve such treatment? For years, it has minded its own business, largely content to take care of the needs of the Tennessee courthouse crowd that dominates it—such as Judge Casto C. Geer, for whom an unneeded field office was established at Oak Ridge. In all this time the FTC, unlike some other government agencies, has hardly ever been guilty of power-hunger. It has needed more funds and a larger staff, as Nader shows, to protect the consumer; but it has not especially lobbied for a larger appropriation. It has needed more laws to strengthen its enforcement powers; but it has been too shy and retiring to make a big fuss about it.

If this weak posture has led to an exasperating number of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce cases (the fictional lawsuit that Charles Dickens wrote about sustained whole generations of barristers), why, then, it might at least be said that the agency patriotically believes in due process of law—overdue, perhaps, for the consumer but at the same time protecting the inalienable property rights of big business, which should never be vulnerable in a democracy. Is this not an adequate defense of the FTC in the infamous Geritol case? With so many legal technicalities yet to be explored, should the agency finally have insisted that its orders against false advertising claims by Geritol really be obeyed after all these years? Would it really have been fair to the manufacturers, like those of Geritol, if the FTC were to aggressively seek legislation authorizing it to issue restraining orders against evidently misleading advertising while legal issues are adjudicated?

And, since Nader raises the point, who can criticize the FTC for its time-honored policy of demanding "voluntary" compliance? Should an agency begin throwing its weight around just because some "volunteers" are setting a bad example? Does that change the principle involved, or give cause for a diminution of good will at the agency? And since when (just because of the urban riots?) does the FTC have any special obligation to concentrate on exploitation of consumers in the ghetto when, as everyone knows, the most loyal and steady patrons of the agency all these years have been those trade interests that are offended because the Kirschner Brush Co. of New York has been advertising a " 'Pure Chinese Bristle' not made entirely of hog bristle imported from China"? Stop Kirschner! That's the kind of proceeding that ought to be the preoccupation of the agency's limited staff! What did the ghetto ever do for the FTC?

The question whether the agency deserves such a plague by Nader and his Raiders is easily answered by this observer. It deserves worse. It should be legislated out of existence, and the fact that Nader does not consider this idea, seeking rather to reform and retain the agency, is perhaps the only serious shortcoming of this book. The indictment on which a case can be made for abolishing the FTC altogether is convincingly spelled out, count by count, in this study. Only the sentencing is lacking. But when one contemplates the fact that the FTC has had such a bad record for so many years, is it entitled to probation? Is rehabilitation possible?

No. By its very nature the FTC, as Nader proves, is unreachable and cannot be expected to respond to those most in need of its services, namely, the people. Since the commission members are not elected, they have no popular constituency. The public has no awareness of who these commissioners are, or even of the commission itself, so there is no particular reason for the agency to have any fear of the people. It has two other constituencies it must satisfy first. One is the President, who has appointive powers and budget-making authority, plus ordinary political clout coupled with his own associations in the business community.

The second constituency which the FTC must honor is Congress. Members of the House and Senate control the agency's appropriation, not to mention its basic operating authority, which is another way of saying that the lawmakers ultimately have quite a bit to say about whose job is safe at FTC and about what the persons in those jobs ought to be doing. Too often, as Nader and everyone else in Washington knows, FTC personnel are kept busy running errands for Congressmen—checking on and adjusting the complaints of businessmen with Congressional connections.

This is the order of priorities at the FTC. When let alone, it is possible for the agency to accomplish something meaningful—for example, its publication of tar and nicotine ratings of cigarettes. Yet, to the extent that the agency truly does act independently of the White House and Capitol Hill, as the law intends it to do, it is apt, because of its special relationship with industries it is supposed to regulate, to draw up an agenda which is blind to the needs of the times. Hence the campaign against Kirschner rather than a serious investigation of ghetto problems. What it all adds up to is confusion. Who is really responsible for the FTC's sorry record on automobile warranties? The FTC? The President? The Congress? The newspapers? Perhaps Ralph Nader, because he has been neglecting the FTC lately while worrying about the chicken content of hot dogs?

Abolition of the FTC would be a step toward pinpointing responsibility. After all, the consumer problem as a whole is bigger than just the FTC itself. It could be that the creation of a Department of Consumer Affairs in the Executive branch, as advocated by Rep. Benjamin Rosenthal and others, might center the responsibility on the President, who is reachable at least once every four years. This would seem to be in keeping with the trend of recent years. Both Presidents Nixon and Johnson acknowledged responsibility for consumers' interests by appointing a "coordinator" for such affairs at the White House level. These coordinators have enjoyed great prestige and a great press. All they have lacked is authority.

Get Well Soon

SICK FRIENDS. By Ivan Gold. E. P. Dutton & Co. 372 pp. $6.95.

SHAUN O'CONNELL
Mr. O'Connell teaches English at the University of Massachusetts.

A very deceptive, subtle novel. It seems to be a verbal eruption of one man's innards and privates, unchecked dross and drek up to here. There's this writer, see, Jason Sams, who has this big advance for his second work of fiction but who doesn't do much writing; and this girl, Christa Sarkissian, who comes and goes, with him and without him, for him and against him, fore and aft. Of course, there've been stacks of chicks before her—resulting in at least one case of venereal disease and much anguish for him—and many men before him—resulting in at least two abortions and many diaries for her. We hear about all of them. In detail. Then there are the more literal "friends" of the title about whom we get great gobs of unassimilated poop. Dave Denby from Arizona who sent Christa to Jason in New York and, you can just bet, has his own problems, detailed again. Paul Pisacano—"an architect, man-of-property, part-time painter, lover of ladies, noisy sage"—who might or might not also be making it with Christa. Much speculation. Dino Gardella, the central character of the novel, Gino Travels, which Jason is not writing. A pair of twins who trigger much gas on duality and duplicity. The therapist, the next-door snoop, hostile black cabbies, aunt somebody Jason liked for once putting his Dr. Dentons on upside down.

It all seems just as true to life as any unhinged, over-the-edge confession could be. It's all here, not a jot left unjotted. We know where he gets his raincoats (Korvette's) and his plastic delft dishes ("Triple S Blue Stamps; housewarming gift from my mother"), how he seduces girls (from chair to floor to couch), and what he does when he gets them there (Vaseline, bowling-ball grips). All the blues that are fit to print. Reading this novel is a cleansing experience, like an enema or a three-day grippe. Still, despite this achievement, we might miss elements present in other confessional novels: the obvious significance beneath and beyond cited experiences in Herzog, the high comedy of Portnoy's Complaint.

But if this is all we got from Sick Friends we would be understanding Ivan Gold too quickly. For, while Bellow and Roth do things Gold cannot, Gold does something in his novel that neither of them attempts—he refuses to fictionalize experience into a literary construct, or sacrifice life to wit, as they did: but, rather, stays in the midst of life as it is really lived and presses there for its significance—and he succeeds in his way as they did in theirs. The art of Sick Friends is in seeming to lack art.

In letting Jason Sams tell all about himself, Ivan Gold has told us more than Jason can really know, how he moved through events he had set up to turn in on himself, how he seized his day, how he made his life come to a head and pop, like a man lifting his mud-stuck Volkswagen bodily back onto the road. For Jason Sams is a marvelously flawed, fuming, funny character, one of the unstraightest guys around. "I sit on a manhole cover, a fumey personality which may yet put me into orbit." His furious energy, his glibness, his independence, pomposity and honesty are caught by Gold in an edgy, angular style, as, for example, where Jason notes —apropos of what?—his indifference to the "Jewish question":

> Doubtless the loss is mine: clues to my physiognomy and soul lie in there somewhere, back in some shtetl or some oven, and some day I will look into it further, for just such private reasons, but my opinion at the moment was, Jew me no Jews, six million me no six million.

When he applies these mutually repelling forces to his own life Jason goes far in tearing it apart. He isn't really making it with chicks, he suspects, because he isn't getting anywhere with his novel; but, on the other hand, he isn't writing because he isn't living. Turning and turning in the widening gyre. With Christa he wants to get untracked, make it or break it, love it or leave it.

When Christa comes into his life, he doesn't know all this. She's just another girl to put the arm on in his spider-web garden apartment. He rates her B- but gives her a Mailesque ride caught in rhetoric so right that one suspects (hopes for, really) parody: "When she finally went shuddering past her ending I turned off the talent and came galloping after." But she soon begins to intrigue him, get under his skin in ways he can't quite pin down in words: "she gave off heat, she took up space in a totally splendid way."

Gold makes it clear to us, however, that what really catches Jason's eye is Christa's own art-life hang-up. For they are twins of a sort; Christa is a projection of Jason's problems. He secretly reads in her letters, which she unmistakenly leaves behind during one of her trips, about the way she has banged around. Then, another time when she is off again, he gets the real thing: her European diary. Momentarily Jason is happy, "as moved as I have been by any book or soul in several years." Literature and life converge:

> This much her diary taught, or reaffirmed: she was the author and the heroine of her days, her life was work-in-progress, she could hardly wait to architect a new affair or new disaster, to get that part over with so she could write it down, and if she was not, in this, so different from the rest of us, in or out of these pages, she was unique for me in that she'd finally drawn me in, however I might bitch and sulk and beg a larger role; somewhere I had consented to be a bit player in her life.

She represents, then, to Jason, a refracted image of himself—he who tried to put his faintly disguised life into his novel—and a world of gratifying complexity which could absorb him so completely he would be protected from having to deal with his own writing. He reads her diary entries about him, takes notes in his journal which she finds and reads. Turning and turning. Finally Jason can't stand it. Everything that ever happened to him seems to happen again, like a drowning man. Girls who had shut him off and put him down on the Cape in the fifties and London in the sixties squeeze their way briefly back into his life, just long enough to shut him off and put him down again. Jason tells his analyst: "Isn't it a gas, Frank, how one's tiny life pursues and catches up, whatever evasive action one takes, however one struggles to get well?"

Of course, this is just what Christa digs, even cuts out at times, we suspect, so she can get mail from the guy she left and make of her trip bigger and better diary entries. But Jason's been there before, and back; he's sick of secret journal reading, life as a Durrell novel. He wants in or out, tells Christa, "I love you and want to marry you, I'll say it again. Look, I'll buy us combination locks. Our lives are not lived on the page." He cannot get her out of her literature into his life, though he follows her West, pleads, belts her, cries. But that's all right, painful but true. Losing, he really wins. Jason has pushed his life off dead center, lifted himself out of his rut, grown to the point of preparing himself to recapture life in art, to serve as the writer-narrator of Sick Friends.

And that art is no small thing. Herzog is so cosmic in "significance" that you find it hard to believe that anyone like Moses Herzog could exist outside books. And Portnoy is populated with such caricatures that it seems as artificial and contrived as a brilliant burlesque routine. The novelist performing his tricky craft is front and center in both books. But Gold takes life as it is, creates a central character who is in the middle of things, and looks for significance and humor in that.

There is no doubt, either, that Gold knows just what he is doing, for he includes a kind of internal aesthetic justification for his seeming artlessness. Christa is given to reading fabulists like Genet and Grass. Not Jason: "Perhaps one day in a less hectic moment I'll manage to generate some interest in jailed homicidal faggots, or hunchback musical midgets, but not then, not now." Reality is interesting enough, forget fantasy. Of course, reality is not so easily ordered as fantasy: "To dangle these real-life involvements is artless, to try and knit them up may be absurd." Thus the irrelevant data, the unassimilated poop. That's just the way things are. Fiction me no fictions. As Jason says, the novel, based upon life, "is the highest form, since it demands solo response and intensity. No filters, no scrims."

The novel, if it is truly written and true to life, can get beneath the anarchy of our lives, can contain pattern and purpose. Within the pages of Sick Friends Jason Sams cures himself, gets caught in life's sensual music and comes out the other side to sing of that life in a novel. In Sick Friends—even more than in his brilliant collection of stories, Nickel Miseries—Ivan Gold has beautifully and artfully suited his method to his ends, his passion to his purpose.

Global Gamesmanship

THE BOMB AND THE COMPUTER. By Andrew Wilson. Delacorte Press. 218 pp. $5.95.

ROBERT CLAIBORNE

Mr. Claiborne is a writer and editor specializing in the sciences and their interaction with society. His most recent book, Climate, Man and History, will be published next year by W. W. Norton.

There exists a source of bias to which even the most scrupulous journalists are subject: the symbiosis between reporter and reported. Precinct captain and police reporter, scientist and science writer, brass hat and Pentagon correspondent—each is dependent on the other, the one for favorable (or at least not grossly unfavorable) publicity, the other for the authoritative, inside information that is the reporter's stock in trade. And along with the professional game of backscratching goes the human game of sociability. Covering a particular beat for months or years, chatting, lunching or drinking daily with his subjects, the journalist unconsciously absorbs their assumptions about their world. Thus even while he continues to report their statements accurately, he ceases to ask embarrassing questions. Or even think them.

It is this enmeshment in journalistic gamesmanship, I think, that accounts for most of the inadequacies of Andrew Wilson's troubled and troubling book about war games—the elaborate and today often computerized techniques with which soldiers and statesmen simulate political and military conflicts in the hope of improving their strategies for winning them. Wilson is an honest man and (I wish this didn't sound so patronizing) a man of good will. He gives us many interesting and some significant facts about war games; he reports the bad opinions with the good.

But he is also defense and aviation correspondent of The Observer, with "special access to Pentagon and other sources of information"—and there's the rub. In that position, one may question one's special sources—but not too aggressively. One may criticize them—but with apologies. And one may not even consider the possibility that these friendly, intelligent, cooperative fellows are in fact engaged in a monstrous game of deception, of themselves and of the public that pays their salaries—a game at times possessing overtones of criminal lunacy.

War gaming, like many other aspects of military pseudo-science, dates from the 18th century. Today, like so many other defense-related activities, it has become big business. Wilson estimates that some 15,000 to 30,000 American "officers and scientists" are engaged in it, which would seem to imply an annual tab approaching half a billion dollars. And what are we getting for our money?

Significantly, Wilson never asks this question directly, but a careful reading of his book makes clear that the answer is approximately sweet damn all. Precision is difficult because of his habit of muddling together war gaming and operational research, two related but by no means identical phenomena. But so far as his information goes, war games as such do not appear to have made a single significant contribution to American decision making—and have been at least a factor in several historic bum guesses.

Wilson himself, in fact, is unwilling to say much more than that "a well-run game could encourage policy makers to think more flexibly if it examined the whole basis of an existing policy and not just a variety of tactical alternatives for seeking the same end." What he does not say, but what his book makes clear to the critical reader, is that there is no such thing as a well-run game.

Sometimes the mishandling is gross and obvious, as when Admiral Ugaki, supervising the trial gaming of the Midway invasion in 1942, arbitrarily cut the simulated American hits on the Japanese carriers from nine to three, thereby turning a paper defeat into a paper victory. (In the event, the Americans got their nine hits, almost wiped out the Japanese carrier force, and ended any Japanese chance of winning the war.)

American officers and officials, of course, never engage in this sort of blatant self-deception. Or hardly ever. But they are still up against two fundamental fallacies of any war game.

The first of these was summed up unwittingly by Spencer Wilkinson, the 19th-century promoter of war gaming in Great Britain. "The only difference from actual war," he wrote, "is the absence of danger, of fatigue, of responsibility, and of the friction involved in maintaining discipline." War games, that is, take account of every factor but people.

The rules of any game must encompass a host of quantitative assumptions; this was true even in Wilkinson's day and is a fortiori true of today's computerized exercises. Some of these concern the effects of weapons: a bombardment by x guns for y hours over an area of z square miles will produce w casualties. Even this sort of equation has its pitfalls; as Wilson points out, its relevance depends chiefly on the amount of actual experience with the weapon in question under the given conditions. But the big leap into the unknown comes when similar equations are drawn up encompassing human behavior: a unit suffering w casualties will disintegrate or retreat. Maybe it will—but sometimes the enemy has not read the rules and keeps on fighting.

In this area, to be fair, Wilson is almost as critical as one could wish, possibly because he already has plenty of experts on his side (including both Curtis LeMay and Hyman Rickover). He repeatedly emphasizes that war games attempt to "quantify the unquantifiable"—and that this basic weakness too easily leads war gamers to downgrade or ignore factors that cannot easily be reduced to numerical terms. Yet even here one finds a curious reluctance to get down to cases, to ask the really tough questions. Thus in several places the author cites air war as "involving a high proportion of quantifiable factors"—and therefore particularly suited to computer simulation.

What, then, of the 1965 Air Force prediction that bombing North Vietnam would end the war in six weeks? (This was not just propaganda: as Stewart Alsop has recently noted, the air generals believed it utterly.) Was this prediction based on Pentagon computer games—and if so, what was wrong with the equations? Or did the Air Force brass, to whom Victory Through Airpower has been an article of faith since Billy Mitchell, simply pull a Ugaki and junk the computer print-outs? Either way, the answers (or the silence) of Wilson's special Pentagon sources would have been instructive—but alas, he never queried them on this subject.

Vietnam is, indeed, the acid test of war gaming; it has, as Wilson notes, been "the fullest gamed, fullest analyzed, and most extensively 'planned' war in history. It may not have been literally planned by computer. . . . But all the neat concepts of the computer gamers are directly interchangeable with those taught at U.S. Army and Special Forces schools." Well, what were those concepts which have landed us in a quagmire? Wilson gives us only one: in all the Air Force tactical games, apparently no one ever suggested the possibility that aircraft could be lost by accident, or by enemy ground action. Yet these two causes are admitted to have accounted for 40 per cent of our plane losses in Vietnam!

After this appetizer, however, the table is cleared and Wilson embarks on an after-dinner speech of unexceptionable but unsatisfying generalities. To get a taste of the omitted courses, one must turn back several chapters and fork through the computer flow sheets of a game called AGILE-COIN, the COIN standing for COunter-INsurgency. (I refrain from pointing out its significance for the private research group hired to create the game.)

Work on COIN began in 1964, "when planners began to suspect that the Vietnam war was not responding to their predictions." (One wonders what games they had been playing up to that point, but as usual Wilson doesn't tell.) The object of the game for the belligerents was to win the "loyalty" of a certain proportion of "villagers." (For the villagers, the aim was defined, not without some irony, as surviving the game.)

Since it is quite impossible to define "loyalty" in any terms that a computer can absorb, the COIN gamesters simply ducked the question. Each village was initially given an arbitrary, numerical "loyalty rating" which particular actions of the belligerents could alter according to various equally arbitrary equations. More important, however, the flow sheets embodied many assumptions about both the villagers and the belligerents.

Hence at one point the question is asked, "What does this village perceive as its major problem?" Only three answers are possible: "Wants [conscripted] men returned," "Wants ambush removed," and "Wants protection." No circuits are available for "Wants land," "Wants honest officials" or "Wants independence." The options are equally sparse when the computer reaches the question, "What actions can this belligerent take to change village loyalty?" "Terrorize," "Bribe" and "Communicate," which I take to mean "Propagandize." No belligerent can "Distribute land" or "Shoot crooked police chief" or "Build school." If the situation seems to call for installing a government administrator in the village, the flow sheet asks only whether one is available—not how much he can pay for the job, or how much graft he will extract from the village. Like Wilson, the COIN minters didn't ask the right questions—and got the wrong answers.

All war games beyond the simplest tactical exercises are based on "scenarios"—which at times have even less reality than the Hollywood variety. One game, indeed, began by assuming that America has "surgically removed" China's nuclear capacity and set up a pro-American Government in Peking. Just like that.

Thus the war gamers, even could they quantify the unquantifiable, would remain prisoners of their own politico-military assumptions. Blue (our side) is the Good Guys; Red (their side) is the Baddies. Revolutionaries who by definition can only Bribe, Terrorize or Propagandize are not revolutionaries but International Communist Conspirators—people with whom no villager would involve himself except under duress. And anyone who questions these basic rules of the game will not be allowed to play; Wilson tells us that "all participants, inside or outside government, must have a high security grading."

Pentagons, State Departments and Kremlins do not want games that examine "the whole basis of an existing policy"; what they are willing to pay for is precisely "tactical alternatives" for pursuing their own elitist games. By the same token, a writer who sticks to the conventional rules of the journalistic game will produce a critique which, despite its evident and sincere concern over the dangers of war gamesmanship, remains blurred and superficial.

War gaming survives, despite its clear fatuity, in part because (like other branches of war industry) it is profitable. But an even more potent survival factor is its place in—indeed, almost at the summit of—technocratic decision making. As such, it serves, along with such bureaucratic devices as psychological testing and motivational research, as insurance for the bureaucrat. Surrounded with enough tendentious mathematics, the stupidest decision becomes merely a regrettable but unavoidable error. Even more important, war games and comparable simulations can give a gloss of objective rationality to the technocrats'

CRAYOLA

It was just a child's crayon drawing,
but perfect somehow:
broad blue prairies
soaking in mist,
a lightning tree still supporting a rope swing,
and in the foreground
a bushy dog asleep on a hill
of sycamore leaves.
And where am I
in your picture?
I asked her,
kneeling down
to kiss a fat cheek.
Oh, gone to Cincinnati,
she sighed,
dreaming of me
lost in a brick town with too many weeds and fences.

DAVE ETTER

crackpot realism; "I was only following orders" gives way to "I was only following the printout."

The ultimate weakness of war games and similar bureaucratic techniques was summed up a century ago by George Eliot in a passage on chess, itself a prototypal war game. In George Eliot's imaginary game, "all the chessmen had passions and intellects, more or less small and cunning. . . . Your Knight could shuffle himself on to a new square on the sly . . . your Pawns, hating you because they are Pawns, could make away from the appointed posts. . . . You might be the longest headed of deductive reasoners and yet you might be beaten by your own Pawns. You would be especially likely to be beaten, if you depended arrogantly on your mathematical imagination, and regarded your passionate pieces with contempt."

Testament of a Myth-Shrinker

THE DEAD SEA SCROLLS 1947-1969. By Edmund Wilson. Oxford University Press. 320 pp. $6.50.

RUTH M. VANDE KIEFT

Miss Vande Kieft teaches English at Queens College. She is currently working on a book on literary criticism of the Bible.

Edmund Wilson once confessed that "there are few things I enjoy so much as talking to people about books which I have read but they haven't, and making them wish they had—preferably a book that is hard to get or in a language that they do not know." The Dead Sea Scrolls would seem to fit this prescription admirably, though here Wilson assumes the dual position of both the uninitiated, curious listener and the savant who expounds. He explains his position in this field as being "rather like that of Hemingway in relation to bullfighting—also an occupation which requires thorough training, strict self-discipline, and a willingness to take certain risks." Wilson is the "attentive and enthusiastic onlooker who has learned in the course of time to know something of the matadors and their managers"—the individual scholars and the schools they represent. These he has mediated to the general reader. The present volume includes the text of his 1955 book on the Scrolls, and the results of a return visit to these places, persons and materials, conducted for The New Yorker (and there first serialized, as was the original volume)—a visit which took place literally on the eve of the spring 1967 Israeli-Arab conflict, and figuratively during the intervening years (1955-69) of further developments on the Dead Sea Scrolls front.

Apparently, hostilities have not ceased. The new material begins with a chapter on "Polemics" and ends with an appendix Wilson finds exemplary of Biblical controversy; polemics sound like distant gunfire throughout the entire volume. But this is not, fortunately, the whole of it. Wilson surveys a wide variety of human interests, since any broadly inclusive account of the Scrolls involves the fields of archaeology, paleography, philology, Biblical criticism, theology, and politics—territorial, racial, religious. He recounts fascinatingly how, where, by whom and in what political and religious contexts the Scrolls were found and unrolled, and how they have been interpreted—a continuing history. He renders vividly the scenes of the barren Judean desert, the glories, heats and colors of Jerusalem, and he introduces some of the chief personages in the battle of the Scrolls.

The Scroll texts are both Biblical and sectarian (i.e., products of the Qumran community); in Cave Four alone were found fragments of some 382 manuscripts. All of the canonical books of the Hebrew Scriptures, with the exception of Esther, are represented, though only one, Isaiah, is complete, and the textual problems involved in comparisons with the Masoretic and other texts are complicated in the extreme. Among documents which have been made public since 1955 are the "Genesis Apocryphon" (an Aramaic version of Genesis found in Cave One); a group of Psalms; a "pesher" (prophecy interpreted in the light of present events) on the book of Nahum; a pair of copper Scrolls which contain mysterious directions for the discovery of a hidden treasure; a "Temple Scroll" with plans for building the temple. Illustrative of Wilson's report on scholarly developments is his summary of Dupont-Sommer's "masterly reconstructions" of historical persons, dates and events, "on the basis of scrappy and scattered evidence" to be found in the Nahum Pesher; his chapter on the Testimonia (an anthology of prophetic quotations); and on the Epistle to the Hebrews, thought by some scholars to have been written either to members of the Qumran community, or at least by one who knew their literature. If the arguments seem intricate and formidable to the layman, even as summarized and simplified by Wilson, they are relieved by his eye for oddities in the texts; his appreciative accounts of the heroism of the Masada Zealots, and the new Israel National Museum; and his impressions of old and new friends, mostly scholars of the Hebrew University and the Ecole Biblique, all forceful personalities.

A characteristic fairness and candor is seen in Wilson's frequent allusions to his status as "layman," "observer" or "journalist"; his careful evaluation of conflicting opinions and his considerable attempts to present both sides of most controversial points; his free use of such qualifying phrases as "I gather," "one feels," "one cannot but ask oneself whether"—a tendency visible in one of his own most controversial summations about the Essene monastery, that it "is, perhaps, more than Bethlehem or Nazareth, the cradle of Christianity." Wilson would seem here to have entered the ring as bullfighter, the remark itself resembling the red flag waved to further incite the stupid and prejudiced among clerics, Biblical scholars, and other believers who are made to seem like bulls in mindless, snorting fury, though unlike bulls in animal (or human) nobility. With that qualifying "perhaps" Wilson technically keeps his seat as "attentive and enthusiastic onlooker"; but again and again the reader is struck, almost as much in

Controlling Small Wars

A Strategy for the 1970's

An investigation into the evolution of local conflicts in the developing world and of the policies that can be pursued to avoid, control, and settle them.

James M. Gavin says: "Very good in every respect . . . A thorough research job . . . a well documented analysis. It fills a very great need in our literature today." $8.95

by Lincoln P. Bloomfield and Amelia C. Leiss

ALFRED • A • KNOPF

this volume as in the earlier, by a sense that Wilson has leaped into the arena, being as combative by nature as any contestant present, his own nostrils set aquiver by any controversy ranging from the broadest issues of culture (history, politics, religion, language and letters) right down to the minutiae, even the trivia, of scholarship.

How does Wilson fight? Honestly and openly, under no falsely assumed credentials; respectfully, in the presence of genuine intelligence and commitment; formidably, because of the accumulated authority of his life's work and stance; and all but indefatigably. But not without blinders, a stubborn defensiveness of his own or other favored positions, occasional pettiness. His response to the reviews of his 1955 volume on the Scrolls is a case in point. He found that serious nonclerical reviewers, "with the exception of . . . superior professional scholars such as Arnold Toynbee and W. F. Albright," had misrepresented what he said. "My clerical opponents knew well how easy it was in this field to lead the layman astray. The devices to which they resorted sometimes took the line of declaring that it was much too early to come to conclusions, by which was meant, to form any hypotheses, or that the really sound Biblical scholars were dismissing the flights of the superficial or, as they are often called, 'sensational,' ones—the assumption being, of course, that the reviewer was quite competent to pronounce as to which scholars were sound and which were superficial. . . ."

Reading such a defense, one is baffled and dismayed at its lack of justice, lucidity and self-awareness. The charge against the nonclerical reviewers fails to recognize how difficult it is to summarize Wilson's several representations, each with its own qualifications, of the complex scholarly hypotheses he chose to include in his volume, presumably, because of their authors' lively imagination, unfettered by religious dogma. Such leaps to conclusions inevitably produce returns in kind. Which leads to Wilson's charge against his clerical opponents, who "know well how easy it is in this field to lead the layman astray." Wilson calls himself a layman, as are, in the main, his readers; how or why has he not himself been "led astray" by the imaginative nonclerical scholars; or how was he, as exponent of their hypotheses, to guarantee that he would not, in turn, have led astray his layman readers, religious or nonreligious? As for the "device" of declaring that it was too early (before 1955) to come to conclusions —here, if anywhere, one feels the affront of unjust accusation against scholarly integrity, both in Wilson's failure to recognize how much was already being done, and in the right, sometimes the duty, of the scholar to proceed slowly in a field so ancient and so ravaged by conflict. Biblical scholarship, often cautious and patient, has been nurtured quietly, during these two decades of the Scrolls' unrolling, by the movement Wilson nowhere acknowledges—that of ecumenism: the growth of understanding among men of differing and historically opposed faiths. And when it comes to the device of summoning names, Wilson here uses it with his references to Albright and Toynbee: why should his reviewers be denied the same privilege?

Wilson further accuses the critical clerics of asserting that "the falsity of certain conjectures had already long ago been proved." The instance, described at length, is that of an Anglican churchman's appeal to a treatise on the Essenes by a 19th-century scholar, J.B. Lightfoot, who purportedly demonstrated, long before the Scrolls' discovery, that Jesus "was not and had never been an Essene." To ignore the fresh evidence provided by the Scrolls is indeed foolish. If that was the main thrust of the argument, why does Wilson trouble himself, and his readers, with it, when far more worthy scrutiny of his book has been made since 1955?

Or why does he add the appendix to this latest volume—an exchange of testy letters, published in 1956 in the London Listener, between Wilson and an anonymous reviewer of Millar Burrows' book on the Scrolls? The reason Wilson provides is that the exchange is "an example of the kind of controversy that goes on in this Biblical field." Indeed, such controversy is not limited to that field; it occurs, for example, in exchanges between Wilson and Nabokov on translation from Russian, or Wilson and the Modern Language Association on scholarly editions of American Literature. "Note the lofty tone of the reviewer, who never really gets so far as to substantiate all his points—as well as my eagerness to harass one of these pretentious scholars." We do note these things—and also that Wilson has the last word (in a letter here printed for the first time, since the Listener never published it). And we draw our own conclusions as to the kind of controversy it exemplifies.

More enlightening than Wilson's account of polemics is his final chapter of "General Reflections." "What is the fascination that is exercised by this much-damaged Dead Sea library," which ought to seem as unpromising and irrelevant to a modern man as the Dead Sea is hostile to any form of life? His answer to the question comes obliquely, in the form of Wilson's shared scrutiny of his own point of view in writing on the Scrolls. "I have discovered that I am by temperament, by congenital cast of mind, a born shrinker of myths." He finds the same tendency in his books on Marxist socialism and the Civil War: "I had to some extent undermined the idealistic pretensions of both. In my writings on the Dead Sea Scrolls, I have performed a somewhat similar function for the myth of the origins of Christianity—though I was not, of course, the first in this field." What follows is, in effect, Wilson's testament of nonfaith. He is aware of the meaning of religious experience to some few exceptional people, and moved by passages of authentic Christian vision—in Dante's final illumination and the last poem of Doctor Zhivago; but he is contemptuous of human credulity in accepting such "charismatic leaders" as the fraudulent Joseph Smith (the rise of Mormonism is discussed at length, and scathingly), and exalting as political saviors such tyrants as Stalin and Hitler. The "obtuseness and brutality" of a Herod, or a Stalin, seem to produce a "counter-tendency toward harmony, forbearance, and peace" in the form of a Jesus Christ, a Pasternak or a Svetlana Alliluyeva; but once again the polarity asserts itself. Communism is now identified with despotic government, and Christianity with "fanatic persecutions and internecine wars."

The effect of this sweeping survey is indeed reductive. But one wonders, uneasily, of what—of the myths, or the scope of a certain kind of human mind? It is no wonder that Wilson sounds, in the end, rather weary and discouraged; the myths, and the inciting idealism of the men and movements which lie behind some of them being so much larger than even the most capacious mind of a born myth-shrinker.

The Best Way To Get THE NATION

THE NATION 9-29-69
333 [illegible] Ave., New York 10014

☐ One Year, $10
☐ Two Years, $18
☐ 6 Months, $5
☐ Bill Me ☐ Payment Enclosed

(Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....
Address .....
City .....
State ..... Zip No. .....

Enlightened Imperialism

THE UNREVOLUTIONARY SOCIETY: The Power of Latin American Conservatism in a Changing World. By John Mander. Alfred A. Knopf. 352 pp. $6.95.

M. MALDONADO-DENIS

Mr. Maldonado-Denis is associate professor of political science at the University of Puerto Rico (Rio Piedras). His book Puerto Rico: una interpretación histórico-social has just been published by Editorial Siglo XXI (Mexico).

Mr. Mander tells us in his Introduction that he is out to grasp the "individuality" of Latin America. His book purports to be a "Latin Primer, a groundling's grammar. But also an aperitif, an opener for the mind." After reading his Primer, one is tempted to send Mr. Mander back to grammar school. His book can hardly be considered an "introduction" to the countries he has chosen to write about (Mexico, Venezuela, Guatemala, Brazil, Argentina, Peru, Panama, Colombia, Chile), and his approach to the subject of Latin America as a whole reveals the deeply felt prejudices and misconceptions which seem to be the lot of the Anglo-Saxon liberal in his encounter with the continent south of the Rio Grande. The Unrevolutionary Society illustrates what Noam Chomsky has called "the perils of liberal scholarship."

Beneath the thin veneer of the Anglo-Saxon liberal it is easy to detect the imperialist mentality:

> Puerto Rico has become something of a showcase for what elightened [sic] Imperialism can do.

> By 1850, Mexico had lost half her territory to a forward-thrusting United States, thanks to her own misgovernment, corruption and incompetence.

> Nevertheless, a great deal has been done [with respect to Panama]; we have only to imagine what health, hygiene and standard of living would be like without the gringo presence.

> The Americans are not more insolent than the British were in similar circumstances. . . . Part of the truth, ironically, may be that the Americans have not been imperialist enough.

> The United States is an elephant. The elephant is by nature a peaceable, vegetarian beast. But even an elephant imbued with the ideals of Albert Schweitzer cannot lie down in the jungle without crushing a number of lesser beasts. The trouble with America is not that she is very strong; but she does not yet know her strength, and what to do with it.

> What is extraordinary about America's post-war policy, I believe, is her restraint in the use of power (Vietnam excepted).

> The superiority of the immigrant [in Latin America] is still apparent, and very significant. For it points to a real weakness in Latin America, a weakness none the less real for being taboo to some of her self-appointed champions; I mean the inferior quality of her spiritual and intellectual life. [All italics mine.]

The passages I have just quoted are not taken out of context. They are the gist of Mander's interpretation of Latin America. To assert that the United States has used its power "with restraint" in Latin America after the Bay of Pigs, Santo Domingo and Bolivia; to argue that the United States is "not imperialist enough" and that it should act through the power of its "example" (what example, Mr. Mander?); and to blame all the ills of Latin America upon some cultural traits that doom it to continue under the present state of underdevelopment —this is an affront to all those who have struggled throughout the history of Latin America for a juster and more humane society.

The author contends that Latin America is an "unrevolutionary society." I was originally impressed by the title as well as by the subtitle: The Power of Latin American Conservatism in a Changing World. But upon reading the book I found much to my amazement that Latin American society is a conservative society not because of the alliance among the landed interests, the urban oligarchy and American interests but because of the existence of a large mestizo class which is really intent upon "keeping up with the Joneses." This category is defined by the author in purely racial terms, not in terms of class. In what must be considered a sociological non sequitur he states: "Nobody would claim that Latin America has inherited a just social order: few societies are more flagrantly self seeking. But there is no contradiction between the continuing power of the oligarchs and a generous degree of social mobility. It is this degree of social mobility that helps to make Latin America so conservative a continent." To assert that Latin America enjoys "a generous degree of social mobility" flies in the face of all sociological

"MOON WALK" Apollo Films

Now you can own 8mm Color Movies and 35mm Color Slides of the Complete Flight of Apollo 11 including the Spectacular "MOON WALK."

400 Ft. COLOR MOVIE $40
Color Movies of Complete Flight of Apollo 11; From Blast-off to Touchdown on Moon to Splashdown. Includes Color Movies taken by Aldrin of Armstrong's "MOON WALK."

400 Ft. B&W 'Moon Walk' $20
"B&W MOON WALK" by both astronauts. See man's first step on the moon... planting the American flag... Pres. Nixon's phone call... picking up rocks ... etc. Videotronic reproduction much clearer than Telecast.

35mm COLOR SLIDES $10
Set of 24 Color Slides. Highlights of Apollo 11 Flight including the best 18 COLOR shots taken on the Moon.

MOVIE NEWSREELS, Dept. TN
1621 Cahuenga, Hollywood, Calif. 90028
Send following:
Enclose $ (If C.O.D. Please Send 25% Deposit)
NAME
ADDRESS
City, State, Zip
Please specify ☐ Reg. 8mm or ☐ Super 8mm evidence. Equally surprising from a sociological viewpoint is Mander's thesis that all Populist parties in Latin America are mestizo parties, and since the "mestizo attitudes towards criollo culture are imitative and deferential—in a word, conservative"—it follows that "it is at bottom the mestizo basis of these parties—with all that it implies of a desire to assimilate to the criollo norm—that causes them to gravitate to the political centre. If we choose to listen, what we hear in those movements is the voice of the mestizo caste demanding its place in the sun." Regardless of the author's failure to define clearly what he means by "Populist" parties, this assertion can hardly be considered valid if it is applied to the Peronist movement in Argentina or even to the P.R.I. in Mexico (parties that can be considered of a "Populist" nature).

It is a reflection upon Mander's book that the Cuban Revolution is omitted in his analysis of Latin American society. The book has not much more to say about the essential determinants of the Latin American power structure: all one gets is some rambling commentaries about the mestizos and their desire to belong to a higher class. The final gist is that Latin Americans have no one to blame but themselves for their underdevelopment and poverty; their underdevelopment is the expression of a fatal flaw, an "inferior quality" in the Latin American character.

It is the same old argument for the "white man's burden," if only a little more sophisticated. The fact that the Latin American ruling class, supported by American imperial power, has thus far stemmed the tide of the Latin American revolution is but a reflection of the ruthless power-seeking, not of the mestizos (who never have had the power) but of those who do, who cling tenaciously to their privileges in that "changing world" which Mander attempts to describe.

The ferment of revolution is present in Latin America. Cuba first kindled its flame. This in turn served notice upon the American empire and the Latin American elite that something had to be done quickly. We have all been witnesses to what has followed in the wake of the Cuban Revolution: the recrudescence of power of the Right through Army coups in Brazil, Argentina and Bolivia. The "unrevolutionary society" the author attempts to describe is but the expression of the essential continuity of a society so archaic that it is no longer able to command the allegiance of its members except through widespread repression and the perpetuation of obscurantism and ignorance. It may sound illusory to prophesy its impending doom. But it is also perhaps equally illusory to prophesy —as Mander does by implication—that the static nature of Latin American society is so deeply rooted in its character that it will never throw off the yoke of foreign and domestic domination.

It is precisely because there exists an "unrevolutionary society" that the need for revolution is becoming more and more apparent to Latin America. The opposite, namely the need for counter-revolution, also holds true, particularly when the specter of revolution shows its head to those who rule the "unrevolutionary society." The truth is that Latin America is both a conservative and a radical society if looked at from different perspectives. Mander has looked at it from the perspective of an outsider, as a white Anglo-Saxon liberal who has a scarcely concealed contempt for the Latin character. I look at it from the inside, from the very depths of a continent where I feel at home, and with whose struggle I feel identified. There lies, perhaps, the true difference between our approaches to the problem of revolution in Latin America.

THEATRE

HAROLD CLURMAN

The Grand Kabuki company of Tokyo, on a short tour through New York, Chicago, San Francisco and Los Angeles, provides a particular pleasure. No one truly interested in the theatre should miss it.

The sounds emitted by Kabuki actors, musicians, narrators, are frequently weird, startling or laughable to the Occidental ear. The movements, deliberate, pigeon-toed—the men playing women's parts walk with a slight break at the knees—are also peculiar. Colors are extreme, variegated, often clashing. The masculine costumes are elaborate, heavy with "trousers" which encase the feet so that one wonders how the actors manage to walk without tripping.

Yet all these elements evoke a passionate decorum, a special grace. Nothing is realistic; everything is right. There is a certain gaiety even in the tragedy; the differentiation between the serious and the comic can barely be discerned. Violence is made beautiful, bloodshed noble. Aesthetics are equated with morality. We who behold the wonderful figures before us gaze upon them as if we were gods bemused by the apparitions we have created.

Voices are not projected—one hardly sees lips move; sounds seem to proceed from the speaker's bowels. Forthright speech would be almost vulgar to these creatures. Anger is denoted by a sort of animal growl or an undirected hiss. Eyebrows twitch or rise sharply. The "ladies" coo like birds or sigh ineffably, while their hands flutter on wrists as delicate as stems. Benign persons are marked by chalk-white countenances; the faces of the less favored are earth brown with black stripes to lend ferocity to their expressions. Heavy breathing is meant to signify strong feeling.

When the hero of Chushingura (The Treasury of Loyal Retainers) strikes his antagonist, the flashing sword does not touch him (the stroke is indicated by the blade describing a swift arc), and his fury is shown by his companions gathering around him while he sways in their midst as if he were blown by the wind. The agony of harakiri is conveyed by the spasms of the actor's body and the distortion of his features. There is no "blood."

Apart from the perfection of the spare gestures, eyes are the most significant feature of this histrionic communication. They are clearly visible even at some distance because of the actors' masklike make-up. In Chushingura, the hero who has been humiliated by the governor reveals his resentment by glances as penetrating as a thrust dagger. The victim's attempts to show deference to his superior and his sorrow at what he knows to be his fate are the contraction of his brow and the lowering of his eyelids.

Much of this would be set down as mugging on the Western stage, but it is not so here. There is feeling behind the signs, which are economical, concentrated and, above all, hieratically formalized. All is style. Nothing is casual or accidental. The hauteur in these manifestations might be called grandeur if they were even a bit more ostentatious, but there is a modesty here which eschews the stress of personal emphasis. The acting seems to be an obeisance to a supreme law.

It is difficult to distinguish the precise degree of excellence among the individual players. Baiko, however, appears to possess the stuff and the finesse of craftsmanship of which great actors are made. There is enormous power in his bearing, in the keenness of his regard, and with it all, profound reserve.

In the second piece of the first program, Baiko first impersonates a lady-in-waiting called upon to dance with a lion's mask to ward off evil spirits. Frightened at first, she shies away from the task. Urged back she performs the rite in which butterflies (made of tin, held on long wires manipulated by visible "prop" men) come to tease the king of beasts, who at the beginning is only a wooden mask the lady holds in her hand while making its jaws snap. Soon the excitement of the frolic causes her to be transformed into the lion itself.

Baiko now returns as the lion, dazzling white of visage, blood-red around the eyes and lips. The previously soft, lilting lady has become cruelly menacing, except that the lion's mane is a flaxen blond longer than its body. It tosses in a way that suggests both awesome strength and a massive playfulness. Terror has become charm.

But what does it all mean? Is there any "content" to this colorful spectacle? Sustaining the entire event is a sense of honor: not alone the honor of man but that of the universe, the glory in the life of all things. Good and evil are equally celebrated. In his confrontation with all these the individual may be proud because he is part of the whole. He must be obedient to it with solemn splendor (and even with lightness of heart), so that in some way he may match it. This is pagan and feudal. Kabuki was the fruit of the rising merchant class of the 17th century, but it had not lost the desire to reproduce the magnificence of its forebears.

Why does Kabuki today still fascinate the Japanese? To begin with, because it is a gorgeous show and then because, despite its hectic plunge into modern industrialism, Japan is still a country where pride of manner, posture, self-discipline, tension directed toward balance, gracious ease born of strong will and practiced refinement are in themselves the deportment of wisdom. A savant asymmetry becomes loveliness in which the anarchy of existence is reconciled through cultivated care.

We talk a great deal about "total theatre." It is an ancient thing: Kabuki is one of its most brilliant forms.

MUSIC

DAVID HAMILTON

Since its opening seven years ago, Philharmonic Hall has been the site of numerous recitals and chamber concerts ill suited to its vast spaces and further hampered by its celebrated acoustical deficiencies; presumably the managers of such events felt that these disadvantages were outweighed by the additional business accruing from association with the magic phrase "Lincoln Center." With the opening of Alice Tully Hall, the new chamber music room in the Juilliard School building, the same apparently effective cachet is now available in more suitable dimensions (about 1,100 seats), and we may hope that New York's musical life will benefit, at least to the extent that events of less than orchestral dimensions will be drawn away from Philharmonic Hall, whether or not the latter's maladies turn out to have been successfully remedied by the most recent remodeling.

The further extent of the benefits conferred by Tully Hall will take longer to assess. The initial acoustic impression, at the opening concerts, was one of solidity and warmth—perhaps even a little too much of the latter, at least from the center seats about halfway back. Thus at the Guarneri String Quartet concert (September 13), a shadow of excessive resonance seemed to hover about the sound of Beethoven's Opus 130, bringing with it a slight blurring of detail. (The piece was played with its first finale, the Grosse Fuge—a strenuous assignment, but creditably accomplished.) However, the Tchaikovsky sextet, Souvenir de Florence (with the Guarneris joined by Walter Trampler and Leslie Parnas), fared rather better in the surroundings. Already scored to sound rich and full, it gave an eyes-closed impression of still greater sonority. Naturally, more experience, with a greater variety of concerts, will be needed to establish general characteristics and local peculiarities; meanwhile, surely something can be done about the pitched hum—lighting or ventilation?—that was audible during rests and pauses.

The opening concerts, although sponsored by the equally new Chamber Music Society of Lincoln Center, involved very few members of that organization. It would be premature, therefore, to pass broad judgment on the society's prospects for delivering a consistent level of performance. It must be said, though, that the first concert (September 11) produced one marked deficiency of competence, as well as what sounded like a lack of sufficient rehearsal among the guests. Why, one wonders, was a collection of ad hoc combinations offered at the inaugural of an organization presumably devoted to the maintenance of a stable and coordinated ensemble?

The announced programs of the Chamber Music Society certainly do little to wipe out the impression, intentional or not, that Lincoln Center's prevailing stance is conservative, effectively freezing musical activity into patterns and settings fundamentally more suitable for the 1920s (or, almost equally, the 1890s) than for the 1970s. In an era (say, since World War I) when a high proportion of composition has been channeled into the medium of the chamber ensemble, the society presents a series of sixteen concerts that virtually ignores this literature, except for a series of special commissions —the familiar "world première" complex in action again. Similarly, at a time when interest in and knowledge of music before 1750—a repertory just as heavily weighted with works of chamber scale—is broader than ever, only token examples will be offered to audiences at this series. It will be interesting, naturally, to hear a variety of unusual 19th-century pieces for odd ensembles, but this approach to programming hardly seems an appropriate response to the present musical situation, let alone a substitute for the long-range aims of enlarging audience experience in breadth as well as depth, and of bringing concert life into a valid relationship with contemporary musical creation.

By this time, the reactions of the powers that control Lincoln Center's musical components have become so predictably directed in favor of preserving the status quo that the appointment of Pierre Boulez as next musical director of the New York Philharmonic comes as a considerable surprise and deserves at least a qualified welcome. The implied judgment that no American conductor is equipped to hold the position is both absurd and offensive, a reflection more on the competence of those making the selection than on that of the musicians passed over. However, under the circumstances (which almost certainly involved the strong interest of C.B.S. in placing one of its contracted conductors in the position, perhaps more for prestige than for purposes of actual recording), we may at least express relief that the orchestra's directors have voted in favor of the 20th century, and swallow our national pride, with whatever reservations we may have as to Boulez's scope as a conductor.

One of the reasons for regarding this appointment optimistically is that Boulez has expressed some imaginative ideas about getting concert life out of the 19th-century rut, and an apparent determination to put these ideas into practice. (Most recently, on a C.B.S.-TV Camera Three interview with Michael Steinberg, shown on September 14 but actually filmed last season, before the Philharmonic announcement.) One tactic implied by his remarks is a division of concerts into separate categories for adventurous and conservative listeners—an arrangement that will only be feasible if it is possible to juggle rehearsal time, borrowing from the standard repertory concerts to permit adequate preparation of the new works. This would surely be preferable to the present unsatisfactory technique of "balancing" the most interesting novelties with the most outrageous chestnuts (a notable, if hardly unique, example is a forthcoming Philharmonic program in which Wallingford Riegger's highly regarded but rarely heard Study in Sonority is bracketed with Ibert's Divertissement and Orff's Carmina Burana). There is no doubt that our orchestras could do something about relating programming and subscription series: as things now stand, a season ticket guarantees only a specified procession of conductors, thereby inevitably attracting an audience of podium watchers rather than music listeners.

(An operation already in a position to experiment along these lines is Carnegie Hall's Festival of Visiting Orchestras. One of the several series offered there could be devoted to all-contemporary programs, each orchestra drawing upon works prepared for several different concerts at home to present one program for New York—but they would have to be genuinely adventurous programs, not pseudo-modernities such as Ibert and Orff.)

Another Boulez suggestion involves using the orchestra as a pool from which to draw smaller ensembles. With the help of skilled assistant conductors, this tactic would effectively stretch the programming returns from a limited rehearsal period. He experimented along these lines during his Philharmonic stint last winter, but the ultimate success of the idea depends in part on the improvement of the hall's acoustics. A further possibility would be the programming of electronic or soloist-plus-electronic works, thus increasing the relative rehearsal time available for orchestral music (but Philharmonic Hall has yet to be adequately equipped for the reproduction of electronic sounds).

There is, obviously, room for new ideas at Lincoln Center, and Boulez may be the man to provide them—but he will need the wholehearted support of the Philharmonic management. The mood for now is cautious optimism—tempered by patience. The appointment does not take effect for two years, and even then involves only eight weeks of concerts in the first season. Meanwhile, the mixture (if not quite as much Mahler) as before.

FILMS

ROBERT HATCH

Medium Cool—as the punning reversal of McLuhan's celebrated definition of television suggests—is a study of the competing realities of life and the tube. Haskell Wexler, the writer and director, has made a Godard sort of picture, using a virtuoso camera (Wexler is himself a cameraman), readily identifiable locales, very strong characters (many playing themselves) in passing situations, expensive-looking color, a considerable amount of overt argumentation—and of course the preoccupation with actuality fractured by technique—to drive home a point in a consciously mod style. It is more romantic—one might justifiably say more sentimental—than one would expect from the Frenchman, and that is perhaps its central fault. Not that the love story is implausible or excessively sweet according to the conventions of popular theatre but because it pins the viewer's hopes on the fortunes of one couple when the real nature of the picture is to juggle lives with a somewhat dispassionate dexterity toward a deeply felt goal.

There is also the question of audience. I don't see Medium Cool getting far on the popcorn circuit; it is too elliptical and often too wry to be munched through. But in the art houses, where it is now playing, the thesis that rigorous actuality processed through a machine becomes a kind of bearable ersatz fiction with catharsis supplied is long since assimilated. When the ace cameraman, John Cassellis (Robert Forster) works his way to understanding that his job may involve more than the joy of shooting vivid footage, it is hard to stay at his pace; he seems a nice fellow, but slow.

For all that, I would not sell the picture short. Wexler demonstrates his points with some exceedingly powerful episodes. I recall particularly a situation in which Cassellis has gone to a ghetto apartment to interview a black taxi driver who—the after-supper customers will be astonished to learn (as the police were reluctant to admit)—had turned in a large packet of money found in his cab. In the flat, Cassellis runs foul of a group of soul-dressed brothers and sisters who have no patience with whitey's hero bit, and want to get their lives on the air. One of the girls puts on a display of verbal bullying that is a brilliant example of an increasingly familiar kind of aggression. (But here again there is something a little simple-minded about having Forster use repeatedly terms of superficial endearment toward the girl in a set-up where conventions of speech are obviously going to be taken literally and thus used against him: Cassellis is supposed to be a quick thinker.)

Wexler designed his picture in anticipation of Chicago 1968, and the footage from the actual convention and the carnage in the streets is the blood-rousing climax of his work. But not as rousing as one might perhaps think. Movies are also a medium, and the blows are somehow diminished; you find yourself admiring the enterprise of the cameras and the tempo of the editing, as though watching some enactment of the Battle of Solferino. The camera—any kind of camera—tends to turn remembered experiences into recorded history. The effect is the stronger here, perhaps, because by the time the Democrats have come to Daley's town, the melodrama of Casselli's romance with his Appalachian war widow come green to the city is in full swing. She wanders through the ravages of law and order, looking for her lost little boy and seeking help from her new love, and the battle becomes a background for personal suspense. It seems enacted, though I understand she was really there.

What I don't understand as well is the conclusion. The man and woman have been reunited and are driving through the streets looking for the boy. Comes word on the car radio that they have been killed in an accident, and a moment later they crash. If that is meant to say that broadcasting creates reality, it says it in a much too literal way, raising teasing paradoxes when the social ambiguities are teasing enough. It is a switch from McLuhan to Robert Nathan—providing a "thought-filled" fictional clincher for a film whose main thrust has been to cut through the fiction.

FOR A STILL-BORN NIECE

A thousand miles from you, my sister,
I plunge my wrists in the ocean until they are braceleted with salt.
Then I raise them to the sun as beacons for the child's soul.

WILLIAM WITHERUP

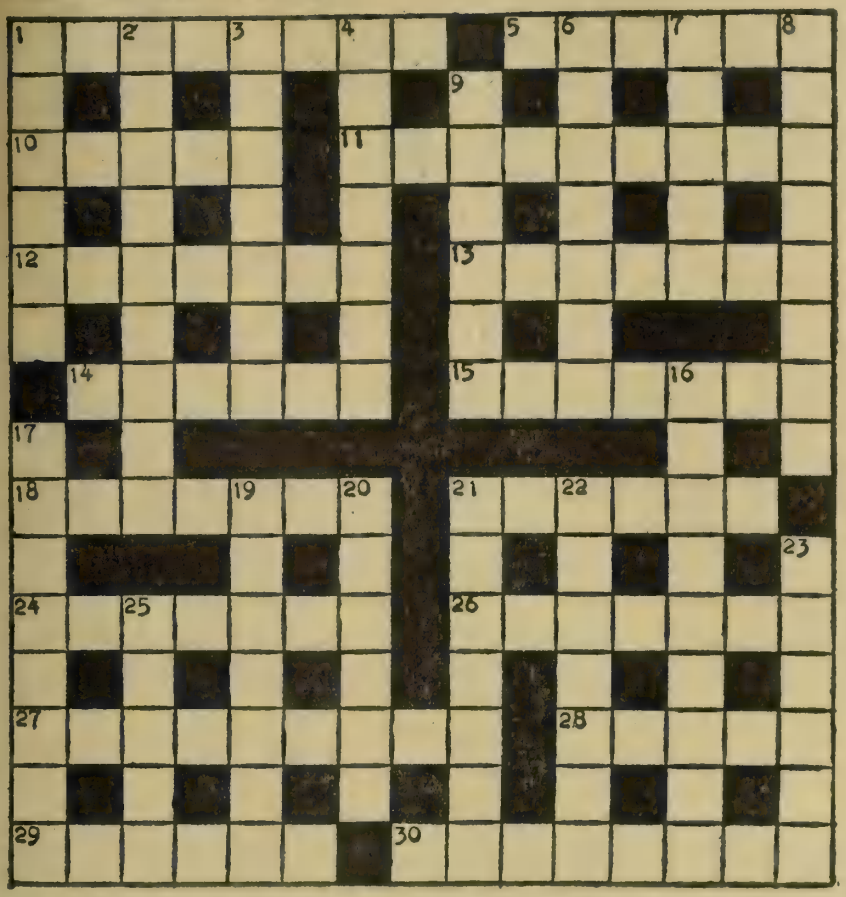
EDUCATIONAL

SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE—On Appalachian Trail overlooking Poconos. Grades 10-11, Grade 12 (1970), boarding 20 boys, 16 girls. Intercultural, venturesome, non-denominational, liberal but seriously Christian, related to Kirkridge retreat-and-study center founded 1942. All-teach-all-learn community including expert teachers for college preparation, social relevance, late-teen self-realization. 85 miles from Manhattan and Philadelphia. Write SCHOOL AT KIRKRIDGE, BOX 11, BANGOR, PENNSYLVANIA 18013. Phone: 215-581-8954.

RECORDS

FREE 40 PAGE CATALOG offers hundreds of recordings of rare Renaissance, Baroque and Classical music. Some records priced as low as $1.00 each! All late recordings in stereo only. MHS RECORDS, Box 932 NA, New York N. Y. 10023.

AGENTS WANTED



CHRISTMAS CARDS—Business and Personal. Customer's name imprinted. Earn unusually high commissions from this medium- and high priced line. No investment. No inventory. Free Sample Album. Process Corp. (our 48th year), 3430 S. [illegible] Ave., Chicago, Ill. 60650.

Advertising Rates

Classified: 74c a line (6 words) 3 line min.
Classified Display: $7.42 per inch (min.)
THE NATION, 333 Sixth Ave., N.Y. 10014
242-8400

Crossword Puzzle No. 1314

FRANK W. LEWIS

ACROSS

1 What one is told to do with 24 on one's 30, as one might boast. (4-4)
5 Builds up the story a little? It's a sort of a fishy sign! (6)
10 Encourage one with a rather raw sound, possibly? (5)
11 Village quarters closed tight—possibly shut down by the police? (9)
12 It doesn't pay him to participate! (7)
13 There's nothing in uncle's make-up to suggest the possible answer! (7)
14 Notices the absence of girls? (6)
15 Australian clipper, perhaps. (7)
18 One from Anjou given an unusual appearance? (7)
21 He acts improperly, and swindles one.
24 The light part of 30-7? (7)
26 Each chapter might have this as increased capital. (7)
27 Sailor-saint in protective covering. (9)
28 See 29
29 and 28 Tidies up the shelter, but not with Vandyke. (5-6)
30 and 7 down A number of years might be indicated by their 24. (8,5)

DOWN

1 Sound clasp, but it really indicates cheek.
2 An Air Force commander might be inspiring a certain amount of reverential fear. (9)
3 Listens to birds in the boat? Quite the opposite! (7)
4 Brings back an impression such as the sound of the fire? (7)
6 Get something other than a 12 remedy, certainly! (7)
7 See 30 across.
8 Do they impose burdens, or make the position of the rider more comfortable? (8)
9 Reduce some? Without capital, develops the answer. (6)
16 Acted fetchingly? (9)
17 It might be a drug on the market. (8)
19 The country house in many a play has one. (7)
20 Ensconce in the finest leaf. (6)
21 The city, in brief, ends up not in favor of drink. (7)
22 It's great for Alexander! (7)
23 A full supply to work with about 10, in a way. (6)
25 Tender, when you don't feel well. (5)

SOLUTION TO PUZZLE NO. 1313

ACROSS: 1 Thumbs up; 10 Antlers; 11 Relapse; 12 Slack; 13 Endowment; 14 and 29 Extra innings; 16 Thespian; 19 Partisan; 22 Steep; 24 Makeshift; 26 and 28 Trade journal; 30 Rather; 31 Treeless. DOWN: 1 Transfer; 2 and 5 Ultramarine; 3 Breakfast; 4 Upswept; 6 Allow; 7 Imprecate; 8 Exerts; 9 Cradle; 15 Track suit; 17 Past tense; 18 Appeases; 20 Spills; 21 Nuttier; 23 A major; 25 Sense; 27 Annie.

PUBLICATIONS

IMPORTANT BOOKS ON THE PEOPLE'S REPUBLIC OF CHINA, THE FIRST TWENTY YEARS, 1949-1969. All titles published in English by the Foreign Languages Press in Peking, as well as a wide selection from U.S. and British publishers: Mao Tse-tung, Lin Piao, Chu En-lai, et al. Also, annual subscriptions to "Peking Review" (weekly, air, $4.), "China Pictorial" (monthly, $3.), "China Reconstructs" (monthly, $3.00). CHINA BOOKS, Dept. N, 2929—24th St., San Francisco 94110. FREE CATALOG of publications and lp records.

STORIES FOR FILMS & TV

sought by new story analysis service. Novels, plays, screenplays with high film and TV potential will be reviewed for producers, agents, etc. Brief synopsis and return envelope required with ms. Immediate reading.

ManuSearch International
PO Box 5819, Santa Monica, Calif. 90405

FREE sample copies of Abas Magazine. Just write to: Abas Magazine, Box 1598, Newark, New Jersey 07101.

JUST OUT! The Third Book of the NATION'S BEST PUZZLES. Obtainable from Frank W. Lewis, 119 Northway, Greenbelt, Md., 20770, $2. postpaid. Special offer, all three books, 204 puzzles in all, $4 postpaid.

FASCIST PIGS, Birchers, neo- Nazis, Kluxers, and Minutemen have their sights on you. Uncover the ones in your area. Free colorful details from: National Information Center, Dept. N, Box 21, Springfield, Mass. 01101

'THE PRESS AND THE BAY OF PIGS'

A detailed study by

Victor Bernstein and Jesse Gordon

The role played by The Nation in breaking the Bay of Pigs story to the American public, reprinted from the Columbia University Forum.

Single copies—15c; 25 copies at 10c each
Orders over 25 @ 7c per copy

THE NATION
333 Sixth Ave., New York, N.Y. 10014

PERSONALS

DISCOVER an intriguing, fun way of meeting literate Jewish singles. FREE literature: OPERATION MAZEL TOV, 663 Fifth Avenue, N. Y. C. 10022.

SOCK IT TO ME—over 225 other underground buttons. 1/25c, 5/$1, 50/$5, 125/$10 and 1,000/$75. Bumperstickers, beads and peace jewelry, too. Free catalogue to all! Free sample to stores. A BIG-LITTLE STORE, 1077 Mission, San Francisco, Calif. 94103.

REPEAL ALL ABORTION LAWS by improving your arguments. Abolish All Abortion Laws, POB 36122, Los Angeles 90036.

MAN CANNOT LIVE BY BREAD ALONE — requires protein containing lysine. Make contraceptives free everywhere. Grand Central Sta. 4069, New York City.

SERVICES

MOVING? Professional moving at competitive rates. Anytime, anywhere. Licensed, insured, experienced. THE COVERED WAGON, ALgonquin 5-1788 (N.Y.C.)

Printed by Hillard Publishing Inc., Hillard, Conn.

Something Wrong?

The schools, the race question, the old morality, the war. . . . These are the issues that have made Americans stand up and fight back. And their fight is the subject of a new book, THE AGE OF PROTEST, edited by Walt Anderson and prefaced by Kenneth Boulding.

Beginning with a strong indictment by Paul Goodman, THE AGE OF PROTEST lets protesters speak for themselves. From James Ridgeway to the late James Pike, they describe and comment on the significant actions and tendencies of the protest movement as they saw them unfold. Here are the detailed and personal accounts that make history real.

Don't miss this enlightening and exciting collection. Subscribe to The NATION today and receive THE AGE OF PROTEST as a gift from us.

FREE OFFER: If you join us now for 1 year, we will send you Walt Anderson's THE AGE OF PROTEST free of charge.

THE NATION [redacted] Avenue New York, N.Y. 10014

☐ I'll join you for 1 year (48 issues). I enclose $10 and understand you'll send me Walt Anderson's THE AGE OF PROTEST free of charge.

☐ I'll try you for 6 months (24 issues). Enclosed is $6. (Add $1 per year postage for Canada & Mexico; $2 other foreign)

Name .....

Street .....

City ..... State .....Zip .....

9-29

ISRAELI TV HERBERT KROSNEY

THE NATION

OCTOBER 6, 1969 35 cents

5-70R PL-19526
BURLINGAME PUBLIC LIBY
BURLINGAME
CALIFORNIA 94010

BURLINGAME
OCT 6 1969
LIBRARY

Prisoners from Hanoi
WERE THEY TORTURED?
JON M. VAN DYKE

Civil Rights, the Nixon Fiddle
BARNEY SELLERS

Not in Service
THE INDISCRETIONS OF MA BELL
JOSEPH C. GOULDEN

Shaw's Autobiography / Alfred Turco

LETTERS

radio theatre

Bristol, U.K.

DEAR SIRS: Having just read the theatre book review by Albert Bermel [The Nation, Aug. 25], it occurs to me that he might like to know . . . one way that we in Britain have maintained a "writer's theatre."

Mr. Bermel writes, apropos of staged readings of new texts:

> . . . they do most for the play, it seems to me, when they are modestly conceived and the actors take on multiple roles, and when the script itself is of a kind that has to be listened to, not bathed in.

This could almost serve as a definition for radio drama as we have known it on the B.B.C. for many years. Long before the creation of a National Theatre in London, the B.B.C. served as a "national theatre of the air," putting on a range of serious drama from Marlowe to the most contemporary international avant-garde; it continues to do so through a flourishing Radio Drama Department whose head is Martin Esslin.

Not only is radio drama the most inexpensive to produce within the professional sphere but by its very nature it forces the listener's attention away from incidental distractions and onto the central qualities of the script itself. Certainly it is not a communal experience but it is the most private and intimate form of drama available. . . . I would draw Mr. Bermel's attention to its potentialities.

Brian Miller, Drama Producer,
B.B.C. South & West Region.

product testing

Mendocino, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: Articles setting forth the plight of the consumer, such as A. Q. Mowbray's "Show Biz or Hard Facts" [The Nation, Sept. 15] cannot appear too often. However, Mowbray's recommendation that private testing laboratories be set up to appraise products vitiates his whole argument. The fact that such facilities serve in dealings between U. S. Steel and General Motors proves nothing; GM can protect itself.

No elaboration of testing facilities is needed. Everything we buy is classified as to quality by the federal government in its capacity of world's greatest buyer. We pay for all the testing it does, but are denied access to the results. The government, setting business interests above all else, is the chief culprit in our sorry situation.

R. J. Kennedy

Asian Hessians

Berkeley, Calif.

DEAR SIRS: There is one aspect of the Vietnamese situation which should, I think, receive a great deal of attention: that the Vietnamese "on our side" are there only because they are drafted. Thus when U.S. troops are withdrawn, the United States expects Vietnamese to carry on because they have been drafted to carry on what is in essence a war to protect the United States from the two huge Communist powers. I am not saying the Vietnamese draftees won't do it; I am saying it is wrong of this country to compel them to do it.

To draft a mercenary army of aliens is a way of saving our nation's own manpower. Yet it amounts to military service without representation, since the decision to wage war and deny real elections is made here, while the men asked to fight are drafted there.

Tertius Chandler

EDITORIALS

The Other Wars

Sen. John Sherman Cooper's amendment to the current military authorization bill went through with flying colors—86 to 0. Its intent was to insure that none of the funds provided under this bill, or any other, would be used for American combat support of "local forces" in Thailand and Laos. Senator Stennis tried to water down the amendment; as he understood it, the prohibition would apply only to the $2.5 billion appropriated in one section of the bill. Senator Cooper would not abide any such restriction. The amendment was intended, he explained, to be "sweeping in application." Senator Javits, a co-sponsor of the amendment, intervened in the exchange between Cooper and Stennis. He asked: "Will the Senator [Cooper] confirm to me that what he is seeking really to do is to pass a Gulf of Tonkin resolution in reverse: that, instead of permitting the President to use the armed forces of the United States for the given purpose which got us into Vietnam, we would prohibit the President [from so doing]?" Mr. Cooper replied: "Yes. I do not assume the President wants to involve us in any war in Laos and Thailand. . . . But the Senate has its responsibility. I believe this is the way to insure, as far as we can, that we do not become so involved."

This Senate action demonstrates just how unpopular the Vietnamese War has become, and how determined the Senate is to prevent a recurrence. But the fact is that we are already involved in Laos in much the same way that we were involved in Vietnam in the early sixties. Senator Symington called this fact to public attention, dragging it out from under the camouflage draped over it by both the Johnson and Nixon Administrations. It was not the first time that Senator Symington had made this effort. In August he stated on the floor of the Senate: "We have been at war in Laos for years and it is time the American people knew more of the facts."

There is also fighting by local forces in Thailand, but American participation there has reached no such heights as in Laos. That, however, is only temporary comfort: it could escalate, as Vietnam and Laos escalated, unless balked by Senate and public opposition. The pride of the Thai satraps was sorely wounded in August when resistance developed in the Senate to a top-secret U.S.-Thai "contingency plan" that contemplated the use of U.S. forces to protect the Thais against domestic rebellion. The Thais did everything but demand the immediate withdrawal of the 49,000 U.S. troops, mostly airmen, currently stationed in their country. But within a few days it became obvious that all this indignation was fencing and word mongering. The Thais have no intention of giving up the flow of American dollars.

The particularly disquieting aspect of both the Thai and Laotian situations is that as soon as American combat participation slackens in one part of Southeast Asia, even as little as it has slackened in Vietnam, it is stepped up in another. When, for instance, we stopped bombing North Vietnam, the action seemed to shift to Thailand, and aircraft flying from Thai bases were freed for use in support of Laotian Government troops.

The President speaks soothingly of reducing American involvement but, as Senator Mansfield reported after his recent tour of the area, ". . . there is no indication, as yet, of when or how the size of the U. S. presence in Asia is to be reduced in any significant degree." About 1,000 Americans are serving in Laos, and our expenditures there total more than $300 million a year. In all these operations, candor is conspicuously lacking. The Johnson and Nixon Administrations seem exactly alike in their assumption that the way to deal with the Senate and the American people is to keep both in the dark as far as possible.

Korea Heats Up

The fatuity of Mr. Nixon's vague discussion of reducing American commitments abroad is nowhere more conspicuous than in Korea. A time bomb is ticking there, and if it goes off, say in 1971, it will be a miracle if the United States, with 56,000 troops in South Korea, is not involved. Both the Soviet Union and China have defense treaties with North Korea. When President Chung Hee Park, the military dictator of South Korea, visited the United States recently, President Nixon raised the possibility that South Korea might provide its own defense, but added weakly that the United States "will be proud to stand with you and your people in the future." If this noble ally of ours should find his regime tottering, he will not forget that declaration.

Korea was unified for a thousand years and has neither ethnic nor religious minorities. All that divides it is the great powers. North Korea is determined to achieve unification by 1971. The North Koreans think they discern a trend toward isolationism in the United States—at least that is how they read Mr. Nixon's speeches on American policy in Asia. They know that the United States is over a barrel in Vietnam and may be reluctant to get involved elsewhere. But they know also that if the war is ever settled in Vietnam the United States will be in a position to transfer troops to Korea, so the projected reunification should be effected while Washington has all it can handle and the American people are showing themselves to be weary of external adventures.

Our economic aid to South Korea is supposed to end in 1971. The North Korean military pact with the Soviet Union, unless renewed, will also terminate in that year. And a South Korean Presidential election is coming in the same year. It looks like a year of decision.

U.S. Army Chief of Staff Gen. William Westmoreland did not cover himself with glory in Vietnam, but he cannot have departed from Southeast Asia without picking up some ideas about the Asian situation generally. Questioned by a reporter in Idaho Falls, Ida., he agreed that a recurrence of the Korean War of the fifties is certainly a possibility. If he is right in this appraisal, it is one more argument for getting our troops out of the Korean line of fire. That may prove to be as important as getting them out of Vietnam.

IN THIS ISSUE

October 6, 1969

EDITORIALS

330

ARTICLES

334 Prisoners from Hanoi: Were They Tortured? — Jon M. Van Dyke

336 The Center at Santa Barbara: Anguish on a Hilltop — Robert H. Sollen

339 TV Comes to Israel — Herbert Krosney

344 Civil Rights, the Nixon Fiddle — Barney Sellers

346 Not in Service: The Indiscretions of Ma Bell — Joseph C. Goulden

BOOKS & THE ARTS

350 Making the World Safe for America — Ronald Radosh

351 Avant-Garde Forever? — Alfred Turco

353 Creator of Surfaces — John Dwyer

354 Poetry:
Two Variations on a Theme — Carl Rakosi
Faith of Our Fathers — William Matthews
Going on Thirty — Rosellen Brown
For a Shetland Pony. . . — Maxine Kumin

355 Nation Book Marks

357 Art — Lawrence Alloway

357 Theatre — Julius Novick

Publisher
JAMES J. STORROW JR.

Associate Publisher
GIFFORD PHILLIPS

Editor
CAREY McWILLIAMS

Associate Editor
PHIL KERBY

Executive Editor
ROBERT HATCH

Literary Editor
BEVERLY GROSS

Copy Editor, MARION HESS; Poetry Editor, ALLEN PLANZ; Theatre, HAROLD CLURMAN; Art, LAWRENCE ALLOWAY; Music, DAVID HAMILTON; Science, CARL DREHER; Advertising Manager, MARY SIMON.

Editorial Associate, ERNEST GRUENING

Washington, ROBERT G. SHERRILL; London, RAYMOND WILLIAMS; Paris, CLAUDE BOURDET; Bonn, C. AMERY; Canberra, C. P. FITZGERALD; UN, ANNE TUCKERMAN.

The Nation is published each week (except for the omission of four issues) by the Nation Company and copyright 1969 in the U.S.A. by the Nation Associates, Inc., 333 Sixth Avenue, New York, N.Y. 10014. Tel: CH 2-8400. West Coast office: 825 South Barrington Avenue, Los Angeles, Calif. 90049. Second class postage paid at New York, N.Y. and at additional mailing office. Address all manuscripts and editorial correspondence to the New York office.

Subscription Price: One year, $10; two years, $18. Add $1 per year postage for Canada and Mexico; $2 other foreign.

Change of Address: It is essential that subscribers ordering a change of address give five weeks' notice and provide their old as well as their new address. Please give Zip Code numbers for both addresses.

Information to Libraries: The Nation is indexed in Readers' Guide to Periodical Literature, Book Review Digest, Book Review Index and the Public Affairs Information Service.

THE NATION Volume 209 No. 11

Appeal to Conscience

The Congressional Record for September 17 carries 68 pages of House of Representatives oratory on the subject of American prisoners in the hands of North Vietnam and the NLF. The spate of speeches was touched off by Rep. William L. Dickinson (R., Ala.), who had chosen the occasion when two returned prisoners and a group of prisoners' wives were in the visitors' gallery to offer a resolution on the subject. The resolution is utterly impotent, merely an "appeal" to Hanoi to observe the terms of the Geneva Agreement, and the waves of rhetoric which swept the House must have been scant comfort to the wives present. Legislator after legislator rose to add epithets to the denunciation of the Communist enemy: he was savage, uncivilized, untrustworthy, cruel, a master of psychology and unconcerned with any human life, his own as well as ours. Thus, appealing to him would seem an exercise in bathos, and one wonders that 200 or more Congressmen were eager to add their names to Representative Dickinson's resolution.

Legislators, of course, are ever prompt to jump up and pay tribute to "our brave boys" in their hours of tribulation. Like saluting the flag, it is an exercise in primitive patriotism that requires no thought and costs no money. But something more seemed to be moving the House to grandiloquent cliché. In this war it has been hard to find grounds for vilifying the enemy; he has sat on his own territory and received our onslaught—stubborn is about the worst thing you could call him. But from time to time, American soldiers—bomber pilots for the most part—have fallen into his hands, and it is perfectly true that he has not behaved toward them according to the precepts of the Geneva Convention. The names of those held captive have not been released by Hanoi and the Vietcong, and only a few have been permitted to write home. Letters and packages sent to prisoners have been returned unopened.

Rumors of inhumane conditions, torture and "brainwashing" proliferate in the absence of information, and from their own viewpoint the North Vietnamese policy is probably wrong. But proof of brutality is lacking (see article on page 334). Meanwhile, we dispose of such prisoners as we take by handing them to the South Vietnamese. This was mentioned as a virtuous act early in the House exercise in righteous indignation, and it was not until considerably later that Rep. George E. Brown, Jr. (D., Calif.) got the floor to point out that the South Vietnamese consider their captives traitors, and that the savagery with which they treat them is an open secret in Saigon. Representative Brown suggested, reasonably enough, that if we are truly concerned for the welfare of American prisoners in the North, we should give some active heed to the fate of Vietnamese prisoners in the South.

But except for Brown, and a very few other voices, the tone of the day was glory to our splendid troops and anathema to the Communist fiend. It is true enough that the average American soldier (or any other soldier) is brave, true enough that the families are blameless, true enough that the suspense created by Hanoi is agonizing. And these truths, like the American flag stickers on the windows of the nation, cover up the tougher truths: that we are fighting an unjustifiable war with a disreputable ally; that we cannot win it honorably and do not know how to lose it gracefully. No wonder the Representatives talked for 68 pages—they were appealing to their own consciences to remain quiet.

A Case To Watch

The Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, through its Chicago Joint Board, has filed an action in the federal court which seeks to compel four Chicago newspapers to accept a full-page advertisement which they have all refused to publish. The ad is addressed to the issue of imported clothing—men's and boys' apparel—which the union contends is having a detrimental effect on the economic interests of its membership. The newspapers admit that they turned down the ad. A spokesman for one of them is quoted as saying: "It is our policy never to give a reason for refusing an ad." The Field publications (Sun-Times and Daily News) explain that they do not accept ads that attack an organization or an individual by name (the ad in question mentions Marshall Field & Company, the largest single importer of men's and boys' apparel in the Chicago area). But the papers have carried an ad of the American Tobacco Company which attacked The New York Times by name. We doubt that the Amalgamated ad was rejected because it attacked a company by name. Of much greater weight would have been the fact that it attacked a department store, than which no institution is more sacred to the accounting office of a big-city daily newspaper.

The papers carried stories of the controversy when it first arose, but the union contends that the accounts were unfair, in that they gave the company's statement in full without affording the union's side equal space. Television and radio have also reported the decision of the newspapers. In theory, the union could buy time to present its views, but spokesmen contend that time adequate for the purpose would be prohibitively expensive. A ruling in the court action is expected on October 24.

We are not concerned with the merits of the controversy over the economic effects of clothing imports, but the court action involves an issue of major importance. When a large community has only a limited number of channels of communication, electronic or printed, an obligation exists to make these channels available for the presentation of views on social, economic and political issues on a nondiscriminatory basis. That other means of communication exist—such as the union's right to purchase radio and television time or to print and distribute handbills or to employ a skywriting plane—does not dispose of the issue. The Chicago Tribune (800,000) and Chicago Today (435,000) are jointly owned. Field Enterprises publishes the Sun-Times (525,000) and Daily News (460,000). These are daily circulation figures. The Sunday circulation of the Tribune exceeds 1.1 million, the Sun-Times exceeds 720,000. Today exceeds 465,000. No other Chicago newspaper has a circulation as high as 40,000. The union contends that for the dissemination of information and opinions there is no substitute for access to some if not all of these papers.

For some years now various attempts have been made —notably in monopoly or near-monopoly newspaper situations—to advance the argument that newspapers should be regarded, for certain purposes, as a quasi-public utility. A number of law review articles have advanced similar arguments. Commissioner Kenneth Cox of the FCC has urged Congress to enact a law that would compel newspapers and magazines, in effect, to observe the "equal time" doctrine that now applies to radio and television. An obvious objection is that radio and television stations are licensed media, using publicly owned airways; the printed media are not. Even so, newspapers and magazines, which exercise an unregulated discretion about their news and editorial columns, should be most careful about rejecting ads on important social, economic and political issues—not merely because ads would seem to be the last recourse of those who feel aggrieved but because, as in Chicago, the possibility of entanglement with the antitrust laws looms large and clear. The best safeguard against proposals such as that advanced by Mr. Cox—and with provocation they will multiply—is, as the Louisville Courier-Journal pointed out recently, "a scrupulous regard for voluntary standards of fairness."

The Myth of Invulnerability

It is a disconcerting postscript to the long success story of AT&T when The New York Times (September 22) and The Wall Street Journal (September 18) feature on their front pages stories of service deterioration not only in New York but in Miami, Boston, Denver, Atlanta, Los Angeles and other cities. And history is being made when proud American Telephone and Telegraph, which provides about 87 per cent of the nation's interstate telephone service, is summoned to Washington by the Federal Communications Commission to give an accounting not only of what it is doing, or plans to do, about consumer complaints but of its management practices and its failures to anticipate demand—all this while AT&T is asking for higher income so that it can earn the 9 per cent on investment to which it feels entitled. Under such circumstances, the Wall Street Journal reporter who predicts an end to the "friendly informality" that has characterized FCC-AT&T rate conferences may well be proved right.

Some of these events are discussed elsewhere in this issue by Joseph C. Goulden, whose book on AT&T, Monopoly, published last year by Putnam's, should have received far more attention than it did. A few points may be stressed by way of supplementation. The first is that The Nation's conclusion (editorial, September 8) that in the long run Con Edison, New York's troubled power supplier, did not benefit from lax regulation is equally applicable to AT&T and its mammoth subsidiary, New York Telephone. The FCC employs about forty people to keep an eye on AT&T. Even if all forty were paragons of insight and vigilance, they would be hopelessly outgunned by AT&T's army of lawyers, accountants, financial experts, lobbyists, et al. So the monopoly, virtually unregulated, tends to take its efficiency for granted. Sooner or later, efficiency so assumed begins to decline—even, perhaps, at the highest levels of management.

Further damage is done, both to the company and its customers, when the latter are regarded by management as a feckless horde that knows nothing about telephony beyond lifting the receiver and twirling the dial. What can these unorganized primitives do to a great technical corporation? It turns out that they can do a great deal when they feel put upon. They can run full-page ads, storm into hearings, write their Congressmen, harass the FCC; sooner or later they get action. Thus Ma Bell's lapses may in the end benefit the public; the myth of her invulnerability is no longer believed, and regulation may become more than a pretense.

Dubious Appointments

President Nixon's appointments of Dean Burch, former Republican National Committee Chairman and Goldwater's protégé, to be chairman of the FCC for a seven-year term, and of Robert Wells of Kansas to fill another vacancy, are extremely dubious. Most commission appointments are in some sense political, but the Burch choice is partisan as well. Aside from services to the Republican Party, and the backing of Senator Goldwater, it would be difficult to suggest any claims he might have for consideration. Mr. Wells is the first broadcast station owner to be named to the commission since 1947. He is president and general manager of a Midwest chain that is licensed to a company which also publishes eight daily newspapers. As might be expected, Mr. Wells is on record in support of S. 2004, the Pastore Bill, which would have the effect of giving broadcasters their licenses in perpetuity (see "The Pastore Bill," The Nation, August 25).

The new appointments will retain three Republicans and four Democrats on the FCC, but the appointment of a new chairman usually produces a significant turnover in top staff posts. At the moment, the broadcasting industry is greatly agitated about licenses; for the first time since the FCC was created, there is a slight hope that the country may get more licensees with a satisfactory sense of public responsibility. The presence of Messrs. Burch and Wells on the committee would surely discourage it.

These appointments forecast the imposition of brakes on the efforts of Commissioners Johnson and Cox to breathe some life, vigor and courage into one of the most important regulatory agencies. The National Citizens Committee for Broadcasting has suggested to Mr. Nixon that a panel of citizens unaffiliated with the industry be empowered to review any list of persons under consideration for FCC vacancies. Where the public interest is so vital and so diffuse, and the industry position so powerful and vocal, some such procedure would have been desirable. More recently, the NCCB suggested that Messrs. Burch and Wells should attend a public forum under its auspices to answer questions from the listening and viewing public, the occasion to be carried live by the three major networks. The suggestion—utopian, we concede—was of course ignored. The public, or rather that section of it which senses the importance of the issues, will now have to make itself heard by other means. Committee hearings on the appointments will, we are told, be scheduled some time after October 5. Unhappily, the committee is chaired by Senator Pastore.

WERE THEY TORTURED?

JON M. VAN DYKE

Mr. Van Dyke, assistant professor of law at Catholic University, Washington, D.C., is now on leave of absence doing legal research in San Francisco. He is the author of North Vietnam's Strategy for Survival, to be published this year by Pacific Books.

Two of the American fighting men most recently released from North Vietnam held a press conference in early September to "blow the whistle" on North Vietnam's treatment of its prisoners, but their statements raised more questions than they answered—questions not only about North Vietnam's handling of its captives but also about how the Pentagon is using the released men.

At the elaborately staged press conference in the auditorium of the Bethesda Naval Medical Center, Navy Lieut. Robert F. Frishman and Apprentice Seaman Douglas B. Hegdahl said they had been tortured, by being put in small, ovenlike rooms and exposed to mosquitoes and rats. They also asserted that they had heard that other prisoners had received even worse treatment.

Until this press conference the authorities had not permitted any of the nine freed prisoners to give the press more than the most general information about their experiences. Wives of the pilots still in North Vietnam have similarly been discouraged from talking about the letters they receive from prison. The Defense Department's explanation of this muzzling has been that public discussions might dissuade Hanoi from releasing pilots in the future or cause them to retaliate against those remaining in prison.

After the torture-chamber tales of Frishman and Hegdahl, it seems hard to imagine how additional discussion could jeopardize the pilots remaining in North Vietnam, but the day after the press conference, officers of the Pentagon's Public Information Division phoned the seven other released pilots and told them to stay quiet.

Most of the seven followed these instructions and have continued to elude reporters. However, one pilot who was released in August 1968, Maj. Joe V. Carpenter, expressed surprise at the statements made by Frishman and Hegdahl. Although he would not go into any details because of the orders, Carpenter said he had not been tortured in North Vietnam nor had he heard of anyone being tortured. "In general," he stated, "my treatment was good." When asked why the Defense Department would not allow him to speak freely even after the press conference, Carpenter responded, "It's all part of a plan." The question inevitably arises: what plan?

Aside from the issue of the Pentagon's motives, the details given by Frishman and Hegdahl raise some doubts about their broad charge of "torture." The only first-hand examples they mentioned in their prepared statements were (1) being placed in solitary confinement in small rat-infested rooms with tin roofs which became inordinately hot; and (2) being exposed to mosquitoes which bit their legs until they swelled. These episodes, while certainly unpleasant, are different only in degree from the treatment the United States Army gave the Green Beret officers who are charged in the recent slaying of a Vietnamese counterspy. They were placed in solitary confinement in 5 by 7 foot cells with no toilet facilities and only a bare light bulb inadequate for reading. The Green Beret officers complained that their cells became inordinately hot.

Frishman and Hegdahl supported their charge of torture by giving examples of more serious physical harassment suffered by two other pilots. They said that Navy Lieut. Comdr. Richard A. Stratton, who made a well-publicized confession in March 1967, gave his statement only after having been strung up by his wrists and having his fingernails pulled out.

The confession was delivered through a loud-speaker to a Hanoi press conference at which one American photographer and a Japanese television crew were present. An American voice from behind a curtain gave a long statement about the war. When this was completed Stratton appeared from behind the curtain. He bowed deeply several times and then left without speaking. When the American photographer reported this scene, the United States protested that its pilots were being brainwashed, a charge which Frishman and Hegdahl now endorse.

It is hard to believe that Stratton actually had his fingernails pulled out, however, when none of the many persons who have seen him have reported physical harm. Because of the storm of protests which followed Stratton's "confession," North Vietnam invited many visitors, including Americans, to meet Stratton. Nobody reported seeing any scars or missing fingernails. Pictures taken of Stratton when he appeared from behind the curtain show that his hands were visible to the reporters, none of whom reported any injury. Pictures taken of Stratton in prison later show him to be a bit downcast, but in good health.

The second example offered by Frishman and Hegdahl was Navy Lieut. Comdr. John S. McCain III, son of the American Commander in the Pacific. McCain was injured quite severely when he landed in a lake in the heart of Hanoi after trying to bomb the city's main power plant on October 26, 1967. According to the two returned pilots, McCain has been kept in solitary confinement during most of his captivity. "It's hard enough just being in solitary confinement," Frishman said, "but when you're wounded like John it's harder." Frishman made no complaint that McCain had actually been physically hurt by the North Vietnamese, so it is difficult to understand why this is an example of torture. Furthermore, McCain was not kept in solitary confinemnt during the first six months of his captivity when his injuries were most severe. Air Force Lieut. Col. Norris M. Overly said after his release in February 1968 that he had shared a room with McCain.

There are other reasons for wondering about the charges made by Frishman and Hegdahl:

(1) None of the prisoners who had been released earlier complained of unprovoked physical mistreatment. Navy Lieut. David P. Matheny, who was freed in February 1968, said that he was beaten on one occasion but only after he had struck a guard. The other pilots, both in the limited public statements they have made and in private discussions with government officials, have uniformly described their treatment as decent. Air Force Maj. Fred N. Thompson, released in August 1968, said that he was obliged to participate in formal interrogation several times, but that the North Vietnamese did not use any threats or pressure during their questioning. When Thompson told his interrogator that a question involved classified matter, the interrogator dropped the subject.

(2) Frishman and Hegdahl gave no hint to the Americans who accompanied them from Hanoi that they had suffered physical mistreatment. Rennie Davis, the leader of the group, said he had long and frank discussions with the men and that they had said nothing about being tortured. Only after the pilots had gone through extensive debriefings did they tell their torture stories.

(3) Hegdahl is a man of limited experience and training who suffered greatly while in North Vietnam, not because of the conditions of prison life but because of his inability to adjust to a situation of confinement. One of the few prisoners who was not shot down while bombing North Vietnam, Hegdahl was captured in the South China Sea after falling off the U.S.S. Canberra while it was maneuvering to evade shelling from the North Vietnamese shore. He had grown up in a small town in South Dakota, had enlisted in the Navy at an early age, was only 20 when captured in 1967, and had received none of the conditioning that pilots are given. According to Maj. James F. Low, who had shared a room with Hegdahl for a while before his own release in August 1968, Hegdahl was in a distressed mental state and it was very difficult to live with him. Hegdahl may, therefore, not be the most reliable of commentators on North Vietnam's prisons.

(4) The Pentagon's previous conduct regarding released prisoners has failed to produce a record that inspires trust. After the first group of three pilots was released in February 1968, the Pentagon, with the active assistance of William H. Sullivan, then ambassador to Laos, persuaded the pilots to return to the United States on a military plane, despite the express desire of North Vietnam that the representatives of the U.S. peace movement who had received the prisoners in Hanoi be allowed to accompany them on commercial flights all the way home. (See The Nation, April 1, 1968.) No additional prisoners were released until the United States promised to allow them to return on commercial flights. An even more serious breach of the spirit of North Vietnam's releases occurred in the fall of 1968 when the Air Force assigned two of the three pilots freed in August 1968 to teach other pilots to fly and bomb. It costs about $300,000 to train a jet fighter pilot, and the North Vietnamese did not like the thought that they were saving the Pentagon money by releasing future teachers. A member of the North Vietnamese delegation in Paris complained to Averell Harriman in December 1968, and he arranged for the pilots to be assigned to other duties. Because of this incident North Vietnam apparently canceled a release it had scheduled for early 1969. Rennie Davis thinks that, by encouraging Frishman and Hegdahl to make their statements, the Pentagon has discouraged similar gestures by Hanoi in the future.

There are, of course, grounds for criticizing the treatment of American prisoners. North Vietnam refuses to release the names of even the total number of Americans it holds, insisting that this is a state secret which it wishes to retain for bargaining purposes in future negotiations. Partly to keep the number of captive pilots secret, North Vietnam refuses to allow many to write to their relatives. At least 388 and perhaps as many as 800 prisoners are held in North Vietnam. Fewer than 100 have been allowed to write home, and those 100 have written a total of only 600 letters. Also, perhaps, to keep the number secret, many prisoners are held in solitary confinement. This treatment is a clear violation of the requirements of the 1949 Geneva Convention on Prisoners of War (which North Vietnam signed in 1957) and it has had a demoralizing effect on many of the pilots. But until Frishman and Hegdahl spoke, that was all.

However, because the first six pilots who were released had all been in prison for less than eight months, because the prisoners whom Hanoi displayed to reporters tended to be the same ones again and again, and because many of the prisoners have yet to be identified, some U.S. officials devised the "Two Groups" theory. They surmised that North Vietnam treated some prisoners well, so that they would tell the world that the prisons were humane, and so that they could be sent home in good shape when the occasion suited, but that another group was kept in the background and treated badly. The release of Hegdahl after twenty-eight months, and of Frishman after twenty-one months, disrupted this theory, particularly when the two prisoners claimed mistreatment.

Shortly after the Frishman-Hegdahl press conference, some officials at the CIA expanded upon the "Two Groups" idea to suggest that the prisoners may be kept in three separate places. According to this theory, one camp holds those prisoners who cooperate, another those who are unusually difficult, and the third those who are neither cooperative nor difficult. This might explain the difference in treatment reported by the various pilots who have returned, but it poses another question: why would North Vietnam release prisoners who had been tortured?

Another explanation of the difference in treatment was offered by Frishman himself. He said that what he called "torture" may be the doings of jailers who act without the knowledge of North Vietnam's leaders. Frishman stated, as an example, that his conditions improved whenever a North Vietnamese general visited the camp.

North Vietnam's treatment of its prisoners and its method of choosing those it releases may be puzzling, but the behavior of the United States toward those who have been freed is at least as mysterious. After ordering all the released pilots to say nothing, the Pentagon has allowed two of them to tell melodramatic stories, while demanding continuing silence of the others. Before the accounts by Frishman and Hegdahl can be accepted, the other freed prisoners must be allowed to tell their stories.

ANGUISH ON A HILLTOP

ROBERT H. SOLLEN
Mr. Sollen is a reporter for the Santa Barbara News-Press.

Santa Barbara

The Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions in Santa Barbara is undergoing a change of life. It has some symptoms of menopause—demoralization and depression—but whether this is the end of its productive period is yet to be seen.

Demoralization has been obvious to the Center's friends for some time, but it became clear to the public only recently when it was announced that it had dropped several of its most prominent and active senior fellows. The result has been to reduce the influence of the innovative radical humanist activists in favor of the less radical intellectuals, whose activism expresses itself through existing institutions.

Dr. Robert Hutchins, president of the Center, wants to convert the institution into a world university. He said that its board of directors has agreed that "all limitation resulting from the American background of the Center and from the inclusion in its name of democratic institutions should be removed." Some observers feel that the broader, global approach will make its probe less incisive, but others feel that most contemporary problems cannot be investigated successfully within the limits of American democratic institutions.

"The most pressing problem," as Dr. Hutchins sees it, "is how can we live with science and technology. . . . It seems probable that we are entering a post-industrial age in which the issue is not how to produce or even distribute goods but how to live human lives; not how to strengthen and enrich the nation state but how to make the world a decent habitation for mankind."

Can the new "world university" adequately deal with this problem? "Everything," he said, "seems to turn on whether qualified persons are willing to make the organization their major interest."

In the attempt, the Center invited eleven leading scholars, several of them from abroad, to a one-week conference in July to discuss the reorganization. Some of the outsiders were invited to join the Center as senior fellows. It turned out that few if any were interested in joining as full-fledged fellows, but some have become associates, a new category. Associates are part-time members, despite Hutchins' expressed desire to do away as much as possible with in-and-out participation in the Center program. The new associates are Richard Ernest Bellman, 48, professor of mathematics, engineering and medicine at the University of Southern California; Alex Comfort, 49, British medical biologist and author; Bertrand de Jouvenel, 65, French political economist and author; Paul R. Ehrlich, 37, Stanford University biologist, specializing on an expanding population's pressure on resources; Mircea Eliade, 62, University of Chicago professor of history; Alexander King, 60, director of scientific affairs for the Paris-based Organization for European Cooperation and Development, and Sir Arthur Lewis, 54, Princeton professor of economics.

The Center is often presented in elaborate terms, but essentially it is a lush physical layout in the hills overlooking Santa Barbara, where scholars meet to discuss important social issues. These discussions, in edited form, emerge in booklets and on tapes that enjoy rather wide distribution. It also sponsors national and international conferences on peace, resources and other vital issues.

It often describes itself as unique, and rejects the idea that it is just another think tank or social research center. In some ways it is unique, but not in terribly significant ways. It is a think tank, or social research institute, and a number of other institutions do similar work. It is a university without a student body, if you will, a research institute without commercial contracts. As an institution, it is not required to reach conclusions on the problems it studies; it makes little or no binding obligations on its fellows. But if all these characteristics are not found in any other single institution, they are all found in part in other research and educational centers.

The Center, which will celebrate—or at least observe—its tenth anniversary in September, was set up by The Fund for the Republic. It has been for some time the Fund's only activity. The Fund, in turn, was established in 1952 by the Ford Foundation, which granted it a $15 million send-off in the battle for civil liberties during the peak of the great American postwar witch hunt.

The Center is out of financial difficulties for the time being, having just received a $5 million bequest from the estate of the late Chester Carlson who invented Xerox.

But to get to the manifestations of the present crisis: in mid-June, responding to the demands of the press for clarification of rumors that it was reorganizing without the services of some of its leading radicals, the Center issued a statement. It announced "plans for reorganization . . . that will require some changes in program and personnel," but did not say who—if anyone—was dropped. Pressed for this information, the Center said that among the senior fellows leaving were W. H. Ferry, Dr. James A. Pike, former bishop of the California Episcopal diocese; John Seeley and Hallock Hoffman. William Gorman, it was learned later, was also dropped.

Several other senior fellows were kept on in an administrative capacity, not as fellows. They will not take part in the discussions of social concern. Most of the consultants were dropped. The continuation of the program of junior fellows, mostly 20 to 30 year olds, is under discussion.

Reorganization of the Center was debated for more than a year in weekly sessions among senior fellows. More definite guidelines for future conduct of the Center were sought by some members; others agreed in principle with reorganization, but suspected that the plan was a move by Harry Ashmore, executive vice president, to assure his succession when Hutchins, now 70, steps down. Almost everyone agreed that a revamping was in order, but the technique was in dispute. Finally, Hutchins agreed on a plan whereby Hutchins would appoint himself first senior fellow, then would appoint one more. These two would appoint another, and from then on a two-thirds vote of those named would be required for further selection.

This meant that the Hutchins-oriented fellows would be most likely to be retained, as they would have the early votes while those not yet selected could not vote. Instead of appointing Ashmore, however, Hutchins appointed Harvey Wheeler, co-author of Fail Safe and author of other novels and political commentaries. Wheeler has been described by some insiders as the intellectual successor to Hutchins, and Ashmore as the executive successor. Wheeler and Hutchins then selected Rexford Guy Tugwell, an FDR brain truster, and these three named John Cogley, former religion editor of The New York Times and now editor of the Center Magazine.

Not until then was Ashmore appointed, and then came John Wilkinson, philosopher and physicist, and Elisabeth Mann Borgese, daughter of novelist Thomas Mann and a scholar of international affairs. She is the only woman among the present senior fellows.

In addition to the five whose resignations were requested, those deprived of their fellow status and offered administrative jobs include Stanley Sheinbaum, twice candidate for Congress and early critic of and expert on the war in Vietnam; Frank K. Kelly, a Center vice president, former newsman and one-time Truman campaign speech writer; Edward Reed, director of publications; and Donald McDonald, managing editor of the Center Magazine and former journalism teacher.

Sheinbaum has since been made an associate, in effect a part-time fellow with privileges to participate in the Center dialogue. A visiting fellow and a consultant also were granted associate status.

Many of the senior fellows feel that what happened is far from the answer to the need for rejuvenation. Boredom was settling over an institution that had a reputation for innovation, intellectual excitement and free-wheeling discussion. Hutchins observed that a number of fellows were more interested in activities outside the Center than within it, and he felt that "those who dip in and out of it for a day, or week, or even a month may get little from it and make little contribution to it." It was not clear whether he was referring to senior fellows or consultants, but it was obvious that he wanted senior fellows who would give their major attention to the Center. He would just as soon drop the consultant program, because consultants are not in constant touch with the Center program.

In the recent past, many senior fellows had become bored with the dialogue. Some attended the 11 A.M. to 2:30 P.M. daily sessions infrequently; others are reported to have written letters during the discussions. One said he could think of a dozen other things he would rather be doing. One frequent observer said that the dialogue often broke down at the critical moment. Just as it appeared that a major point or significant finding was to emerge, the discussion ended in favor of a new topic.

What the reorganization will do to the dialogue will depend on at least two things (probably more). One is the caliber of the scholars selected to replace the fellows who were dropped, and the other is the willingness of the staff and fellows to listen—to outside criticism of the Center and of society—and not just expound.

Hutchins, Kelly and some others of what has been referred to at the Center as the junta, have protested my attempts as a Santa Barbara News-Press reporter to characterize the split in ideological or philosophical terms. They say there are no such divisions at the Center as humanists vs. intellectuals, radicals vs. liberals, activist vs. scholars, etc. Dr. Hutchins told The Christian Science Monitor simply: "Some of these people were not recruited with the purpose we now have in view."

But a generalization—which has notable exceptions—can be made about those who have been dropped. They are the activists, the humanists, the involved. W. H. (Ping) Ferry has long spoken out publicly in caustic terms against the war in Vietnam, J. Edgar Hoover, the corporate establishment and other institutions often regarded as sacrosanct. The late Dr. Pike had attacked the conduct of the established church and many of its sacred doctrines, and had been associated to a degree with the new morality. John Seeley, until now dean of the Center fellows, and former chairman of the Department of Sociology at Brandeis University, has been outspoken in defense of student radicals, and has participated in their defense in his community. Hallock Hoffman, a pacifist, participates in draft counseling and speaks out pointedly against cherished institutions. Sheinbaum has twice taken leave to run for Congress to reach a broader audience for his plans for basic changes in foreign policy and domestic programs.

On the whole—again with exceptions—those who have not been retained as fellows are the men who have felt that their role was more than intellectualizing about man's fate. They believe there are emotional, psychological, personal factors to consider in addition to the intellectual aspect, in attempting to cope with society's major problems.

Some of the differences came through in the July Center Magazine in which writers on both sides of the schism are represented. Ashmore, in an article entitled "Where Have All the Liberals Gone?," defends the liberal who rejects the radicalism of Left and Right, but more important to the Center's present split are his comments indicating disagreement with the more humanistically inclined.

"A new sensibility has been proclaimed," he writes, "in which the rational, insofar as it is admitted at all, is subordinate to the sensory. . . . The senses are important but not ultimate; feeling is a part of learning but only an auxiliary to wisdom. . . ."

In the same issue, Hoffman reviewed Jacques Ellul's book, Violence: Reflections from a Christian Perspective. Hoffman says that "Ellul speaks from an intellectual and moral plane that is inhospitable to human beings. . . . As I think back over the structure of his argument, it seems to me M. Ellul is most of all missing in compassion—he seems not to be aware of love as a dynamic force."

Ashmore, who won a Pulitzer Prize for his Arkansas Gazette editorials during the 1957 Little Rock integration crisis, is an articulate liberal activist, though probably not generally viewed as an intellectual and surely not as a radical. He worked in the 1964 Johnson campaign against Goldwater, and in the 1968 McCarthy campaign during the California Presidential primary. He has made trips for the Center to Hanoi in which he did extracurricular diplomatic work for the State Department. His book (with the late William C. Baggs), Mission to Hanoi, is a valuable contribution to the literature of the nature of American Vietnamese diplomacy and conduct of the war.

His opposition to the war, however, was not especially noticeable until long after such Center personalities as Hoffman, Sheinbaum and Ferry had been publicly denouncing the American involvement. In his gentle but candid manner, Hoffman makes it clear how he feels about the present orientation of the Center:

"It would be easy to speculate about the reasons for these choices (of senior fellows)," Hoffman said, "but I have no basis for doing so. The new senior fellows are a capable and productive group. . . . But I am not distressed not to be among them. I have been struggling for some time to import more emotional and psychological qualities into our Center community. I believe I have lost this struggle. I am pleased that the new fellows are a compatible group. If I had been the only additional one chosen, I would have hesitated to accept the invitation."

Hoffman, along with Ferry, has been an executive at the Center since it was established. Both were instrumental in its founding.

If the Center is having troubles that might have been avoided, its friends must share the blame. Scores of articles on the Center have been written by friendly writers for major magazines and newspapers. Almost invariably, these writers have been profusely laudatory while using phraseology that tends to lend an aura of objectivity or critical examination. During very short visits to the Center, these writers have been charmed by the magnificent physical setting, the amiability of its personnel, the intellectual atmosphere, the scope of its interests and its future plans.

They are disarmed by the facetious self-criticism of Hutchins, which they then quote to project a sense of their own objectivity. Hutchins is fond of phrases like, "the truth about the Center . . . is that it is not a very good Center, but it is the only one there is," or that the Ford Foundation's $15 million contribution to The Fund for the Republic was given in "a fit of absent-mindedness."

No writers to my knowledge reported the gradual deterioration of the validity of the program. Now, however, such periodicals as the underground Los Angeles Free Press observes that the new program announced for the Center lacks pertinence: "Where are the studies on how to make the colleges and universities relevant? . . . Where are the studies on how to stop American imperialism? . . . Where are the studies to prevent huge corporations from polluting our environment? Where are the men like John Seeley who was with the people in the streets of Chicago during the Democratic convention? Where are the men like James Pike who had the courage to tell the world that the church is dead? . . . The studies don't exist and the men have been fired."

The programs in progress now—after the revamping—are studies in electoral reform, world order, the constitutionalism of education, revision of the U.S. Constitution, the constitutionalism of science, and the civilization of the dialogue.

Studies dropped were those dealing with the corporation, labor unions, church and state, mass media and voluntary associations. If some of the Free Press assertions were overstated, the article did raise relevant issues from the Left where little valid evaluation of the Center had been heard.

The Center, of course, has made a contribution to American thinking on modern problems that were not getting much thought elsewhere. But it was escaping valid criticism and outside evaluation which are necessary to keep any social institution pertinent and current.

Its most severe critics also were of little help. Their assertions were often beside the point. The cry that the Center was a tool of Moscow or whoever the international villain was from time to time, was not worth answering. The allegation that most of its publications have a liberal orientation is true, but the Center would not concede this point. It replied that the views expressed in its publications were the author's; the Center was simply offering an opportunity to make a number of viewpoints known.

The Center provided a great service by giving liberal-Left and radical-Left views wide circulation; during the postwar years this was a much needed antidote to the total acceptance enjoyed by outmoded reactionary concepts in the mass media. It appears that the Center, having provided this service, would not or could not take credit for it.

Although the center boasts of its role as a penetrating critic of the way things are, and says it seeks to promote the freedom of criticism, at times it has lost its cool over public criticism. When nineteen student leaders and former students met at the Center in August 1967, many of them severely criticized the Center and the educational system. The Santa Barbara News-Press reported the comments of the radicals, as well as those of the liberals and moderates. The radicals wanted the educational system replaced, not reformed, and told the Center fellows that they were hopelessly out of touch with the student movement.

A News-Press editorial criticized the Center for sponsoring a meeting where such comments would be made. Instead of boasting that it was free and brave enough to sponsor such a meeting—whether or not the News-Press liked it—the Center took a defensive position and complained of biased News-Press reporting. The radicals got a disproportionate amount of attention, said Harry Ashmore in a letter to the editor. But when the Center published its own report of the conference, based on a complete transcript, it indicated that the News-Press reporting was accurate and balanced.

The Center also has complained in anguish that the News-Press report of the current revamping emphasized the fact that prominent fellows were dropped, and speculated on the reasons why. The Center complained that its press release explaining the new program was subordinated. As the author of the News-Press reports on the Center reorganization, I do not resent the Center's taking issue with my news evaluation. It is certainly a legitimate challenge. But the almost traumatic way in which Center officials responded to our doing our own story rather than reprinting the Center's indicated an anxiety that should not be characteristic of a major study center that prides itself on its defense of free give-and-take.

Its sensitivity is also shown by the fact that its discussions are not open to the press and public. Its major conferences also are usually closed. The most frequently cited excuse is that there is not enough room for the public to attend. But there is space for at least some press representatives in the conference room. And big meetings could be held in larger quarters. The Center's friends, which include the News-Press, have not goaded them sufficiently on this issue. A January conference of top Japanese and American officials and former officials was closed to the press. Because Harry Ashmore provided extensive briefings, and because conferees were available for interviews between sessions, the Center implied that it was not really a closed conference. This is stretching a point rather perilously, especially for a Center for the Study of Democratic Institutions.

The Center has made a significant intellectual contribution to the nation and to the community of Santa Barbara. It was much needed, and the need will continue. Whether the "new" Center will be up to the challenge is yet to be seen. It will have to be young in its thinking, audacious in its approach, humanistic in its feeling, honestly receptive to criticism, as well as scholarly in its research. It must, I think, reverse what appears to be a trend.

TV COMES TO ISRAEL

HERBERT KROSNEY

Mr. Krosney, a frequent contributor to The Nation, is based in Jerusalem as head of documentaries for Israel Television. A former producer with National Educational Television, he is also the author of Beyond Welfare: Poverty in the Supercity (Holt, Rinehart & Winston).

Jerusalem

The second most popular topic of conversation in Israel these days is the state of its television. Within a year, the skyline of Jerusalem has been transformed: giant antennas top the myriad apartment buildings. Down in the Plains of Sharon, and especially in the coastal city of Tel Aviv, similar antennas poke up squalidly from almost every building—giving the city the incongruous air of a Long Island suburb. Antennas also stick up out of the brownstone apartment buildings of Ramallah, the rich Arab suburb ten minutes to the north of Jerusalem. Television has come to the Holy Land.

It is not yet full-time television. At the moment, and in the foreseeable future, television will be broadcasting four nights a week, about four hours a night. At least three of those hours are in Hebrew or with Hebrew language subtitles. The first hour, from 6 to 7 is in Arabic. Despite strong religious opposition, the Cabinet has authorized TV on the Sabbath, thus following the precedent set by Kol Israel, the state radio. It can be expected that the introduction of television on Friday nights will be a significant step away from whatever theocratic nature the Israeli society still retains.

Television began in Israel as one of the most hopeful broadcasting experiments in recent history. The Israelis, it was argued, were tired of being used as the target for Arab lies and Arab hate. They wanted a television that would tell Arabs the truth and spur the processes of dialogue that would bring accord to this embattled region. When one recalls the broadcast pictures of Nasser exhorting the Cairo crowds as they chanted "Death to the Jews" —pictures picked up in Tel Aviv as well as Damascus— it is not hard to understand that a counterbalance could be well worth an Israeli investment.

The Knesset passed a bill after the war authorizing the establishment of a "temporary" television authority under the Prime Minister's office, and directed that it get on the air as quickly as possible. Previously, old-timers— Ben Gurion and a number of others—had argued that television would hinder the building of the country. It would tend to introduce a mass culture which would diminish the uniqueness of the Israeli experiment. They reasoned further that television was harmful to children, and, fearing the American example, thought it would induce a preoccupation with violence. They were able to prevent its introduction.

The Six Day War gave TV its life. It was assumed that all Arabs in the West Bank and Jordan had access to sets. In Israel the relatively rich Arab kept in touch with his cousins across the border through television. In a population of more than 300,000, there were close to 10,000 sets, with high-power antennas receiving from Beirut, Cyprus, Damascus, Amman and sometimes Cairo. Israelis had another 25,000 sets, tuning in to watch I Love Lucy, children's cartoons or other English-language shows which emanated from the Arab countries.

Research later revealed—after the initial investment in television had been made—that the West Bank had only 5,000 sets, but this figure needs some interpretation. The study showed that the sets were concentrated among the elite and in the coffeehouses. The audience was important, and far greater than 5,000—if those who watched could be persuaded to turn to Channel 8, Israel Television. But it was still not great, and the potential Arab viewing audience had to include Amman, Damascus, Beirut and Cairo, as well as Nazareth and Nablus.

The purpose of broadcasting in Arabic was, I think, twofold. (I say "I think" because, to my knowledge, the policy of the Israeli Arabic service was never thoroughly defined beyond the broad statement that "it won't be propaganda.") In the first place, a truthful and dependable Arabic news service had to be founded. In the years before the war, the Israeli radio service had built up a large audience in the West Bank and the contiguous Arab countries, as well as in the Arab community inside Israel. My friend Elias, a hotel manager in east Jerusalem, told me he turned to Kol Israel in pre-June 1967 days simply to get the facts. "We Arabs have a tendency to talk a little too much and not to tell the truth all the time—and sometimes not even to realize we're not telling the truth. I always listened to Kol Israel to balance the facts out."

It has been said that Arabs are not a conspicuously literate people; that they tend to believe the evidence of their eyes far more than what they read or hear. Television was to be a weapon against the possible self-infatuation of Arab rhetoric, and at the least an additional tool for truthful news.

The second purpose of the Arabic television service was never defined. However, in my view, it was to lay the bases for dialogue on a human as well as political level. No one here in the Middle East really wants a society in which "integration" and thus homogeneity predominates. No one expects Arabs to become Jews, or vice versa. But one can hope that Arabs will participate openly in dialogue with Jews: to feel, through the media of television and other communications, that they and the Jews are not aliens but cousins in the same land and the same region of the world. The appearance of the two peoples jointly on television might be taken as a sign that they can live together peacefully in the Middle East.

My own hopes were totally idealistic, but based on a good deal of thought about the potential of television as a political instrumentality. I subscribed entirely to Israel Television's bridge-building purposes. I knew that, having been exposed to a distorted view for twenty years, Arabs would have to be "shown" Israel as it is. I granted that at times television must talk "to" and not "with," but I thought the "with" more important. I thought television could reach out to engage people and even nations in dialogue.

Most radically, I felt there would have to be a stress not on confrontation but on participation. I would open the doors wide to the infinite breadth of Arab opinion, and let it be spoken by Arabs. I would do a series of programs on Muslim-Jewish relations, searching for the common points from which talk could begin. I would even give a young Fatah member or sympathizer a camera and a crew and let him express his view of the world. And I would broadcast it. The reasons—and I am thinking from the standpoint of Israel—are obvious. When the key issue for the Arabs remains Israel's right to its very existence, every time Jews and Arabs sit down to talk with each other, or use the medium of the Israeli state to express their opinion—even if that opinion is counter to the existence of the state—a step has been taken forward to dialogue. Thus I wanted the television to become an aggressive participant in Arab affairs. I didn't want it to fall into the rut of most of Israel's traditional information approach to the Arabs. Israel has the position of strength; it should use it. Television needn't repeat yesterday's warning by any of a dozen Israeli generals or politicians. Instead, television has another, more important function: to help prepare the bases for dialogue.

But the Arabic television service was in trouble before it started. Its first problem was manpower. Despite all the ballyhoo, good personnel still remains in limited supply. The Six Day War had created tremendous demand for Arabic-speaking staff in the army, in a new newspaper enterprise, in a half dozen areas where previously the Arabic language had not been needed. The Arabic service on Kol Israel was the most likely source of skilled journalists, but it refused to release its best men to television. This unwillingness to cooperate was part of a wider battle over the future structure of television. For a limited time, it had been understood, there was to be a "Temporary Television Authority" operating under the Prime Minister's office; then—it was originally conceived—the facility would graduate into some form of autonomy. This structure worked to the disadvantage of Kol Israel, which had, perhaps justifiably, expected television to be part of its operation. It had, in fact, sent a number of its people overseas for TV training. It had promised some of them prominent places in the new venture, and now could not fulfill these pledges. Therefore, it was not going to drain its own staff to help a television service of which—as radio stations almost always do in the beginning—it stood in mortal fear.

The Arabic television news service started with three professional journalists under a warmhearted Iraqi Jew named Shlomo Imbari. The Arabic feature programming was also headed by an Iraqi Jew, Salim Fattal. Neither could find professional personnel. Considerable searching of Arab communities in Israel produced innumerable applications but few results: the candidates most often lacked a solid high school education, much less a university degree. Any Arab Israeli with the barest pretensions to a suitable education was eagerly grabbed up. There were even negotiations and experimentation with an experienced former broadcaster for Radio Amman who wanted to remain in Jerusalem. However, the security service disqualified him after he had been given an initial clearance and had been working a month.

The shortage, incidentally, was not reflected in the on-screen personalities chosen by Arabic news and the Arabic programs generally. Arabic news picked a Huntley-Brinkley combination. A chic blonde named Gloria Stewart, born and raised in Jericho, daughter of a British officer, was the star; a handsome and articulate Druze from the north of Israel, Said Kassem, fluent in Hebrew and English as well as Arabic, provided a sober punch. These two combined to give Arabic news a professional glamour, but the shortage of actual journalistic and producing talent kept eroding the qualities and possibilities of the service.

Almost as important as the manpower shortage was the internal politics. It amazed me, a newcomer to Israel, to see how tenaciously people fought for place and power—but not for money. To most Israelis money is only a means to live; power and prestige—and to a certain extent, a belief in one's purpose—are truly important.

A most important conflict lay in the fight for an integrated newsroom operation. Rivalry developed immediately between the Arabic and Hebrew TV operations. There could be no agreement on a joint assignment editor or on his powers. The director of television, Prof. Elihu Katz, a sociologist from Hebrew University with good ideas and good will but no previous broadcasting or Israeli political experience, did not see fit to give his chief news adviser, Tony Hatch (formerly producer of the WCBS-TV six o'clock news in New York) the power to get a joint operation functioning. Yet the television's C.B.S. consultants Hatch, Stuart Hood, formerly programming head of B.B.C., and to a lesser extent myself, had spent days working out a plan whereby a joint newsroom would work. And it seemed to us that in a small country with theoretically limited resources it was financial folly to set up two autonomous newsrooms.

Eventually, the rivalry developed to the point that two camera teams and reporters were often sent out to cover the same story. There were disputes over the footage coming in from the overseas news agencies—who would have the right to use it first, who would edit it first. Hatch came to believe that everything "Arab," or associated with Arabs (even if they were Jews speaking Arabic), was stamped second-class by the sabra Israelis. I saw it as less a stamp than a rivalry between two news outfits fighting with limited resources for different purposes and audiences.

Shlomo Aronson, the erudite and highly capable Hebrew news director, was blunt. He told me: "This is Israel Television. I don't care if the Arabic service goes on seven minutes a night. Our public cares about Hebrew news, not about Arabs. You'll see.

"You know what that Arab show will be? It's propaganda, nothing more or less. It can't be anything else. I'm interested in journalism. In my own, our language, the Hebrew language."

Although he was replaced because of the obstreperousness with which he expressed his views, his successor, Yorem Ronnen, pursued the same policies in a quieter way.

The conflict between Aronson and myself became more bitter because of a second aspect of essentially the same problem. The Documentary unit, of which I was head, was designed at this initial stage of television to feed features to both the Arabic and Hebrew programs—we were to tape features which could be used for both sections. I thought that a program, for example, on the problems of the kibbutzniks under fire in the Bet Shean Valley on the banks of the Jordan could be used for Arabic and Hebrew audiences. In fact, I was certain that such common usage, even on the same night, helped establish our credibility with the Arab audience. Aronson disagreed violently. He denounced the unit because it denied him autonomy over his operations; and he criticized Katz for giving a foreigner such extensive programming power. "It's not you. It's what the unit represents," he said once. "This is an Israel Television—for Israelis."

It was a question of priorities. And the priority of Arabic programming, or even a fifty-fifty relationship between Arabic and Hebrew—could simply not be established even internally in television.

Another understandable kind of pressure urged the TV producers and directors to work in Hebrew rather than Arabic. This was created by the public and the press. The chief gauge of quality in a nonprofit broadcasting situation is most often newspaper reviews. The newspaper stories and reviews concentrated almost exclusively on Hebrew-language programs, so it seemed to producers that in order to get public attention and notice —and eventually to assure oneself of a job—it was necessary to work in Hebrew. Any producer or director prefers to work in a language he understands; he also wants to address himself to the audience he considers most important. No influence operated inside television to reassure staff workers that the Arab audience was at least as important as the Jewish. A proposal to send directors and producers to Arabic-language classes was ignored. Staff members had no incentive to work in Arabic.

Yet the first year of television proved that these same producers and directors could work in Arabic and do good programs, given the proper encouragement. A series of religious films on Muslim holidays produced by members of the Documentary Department were actually better than similar fare produced in Amman, Damascus and Cairo. Other films showing the society of Israel—one on social security and how it operated, another on children growing up in a kibbutz—demonstrated that film was a third, a visual language, with a potential effectiveness to be judged not alone by its commentary but by its overall quality and emotional impact at nonverbal levels.

But perhaps the most important and interesting reason for the downgrading of Arabic-language television in Israel was the mentality of the people in control—and the lack of encouragement given them to broaden that mentality. Most Israeli broadcasting in Arabic is in the hands of Jews born in Arab countries. They tend to be more conservative in their views of the Arab population than most native sabras. They see Arabs as feudal, backward, totally responsive to concepts of "honor," and generally implacable in their attitudes toward Israel. Thus they think that the only way to persuade the Arabs to accept Israel is to force on them a recognition of Israel's power.

I do not agree with this view. At best, the Arab broadcasters are inclined to talk "to" rather than "with" their audience. In Israel Television all the experienced Arabic journalists were originally from Iraq. The news director was a capable and likable man who, because of the rivalries in the television and the manpower weakness of his department, was caught in an untenable situation. He had little chance to consider the potential of television and fell into the rut of traditional propagandistic broadcasting. Iraqi Jews are by and large sensitive and well-educated persons, but I don't think they are going to solve the problems of the Middle East. There are too many scores to settle, too much bitter history has flowed in a region where memories can be as long as 2,000 years. (I am not sure that starry-eyed American Jews will solve the problems of the Middle East, either. As Iraqi Jews tend to emphasize the personal tragedies and suffering of the last twenty years, so American Jews may not be properly aware of the blood that has already been spilled.)

One of the Arabic reporters was a converted (to Judaism) Palestinian Arab, who had previously been a top criminal investigator for the income tax bureau and before that, was reportedly with Shin Bet, the Israel Secret Service. His view of Arabs was even more extreme than that of the Iraqis. He tended to get into ideological arguments with the West Bank Arabs he interviewed, always trying to outsmart them on camera. He was usually successful but I doubt that he was effective; a softer approach would have been more persuasive on the screen. Yet his understanding of Arab psychology, even that of a raging street crowd, was intimate. One day a mob of refugee youngsters marched down the streets of Ramallah screaming "Palestine is Arab," "Nasser," and "El Fatah." As they approached the car where a defenseless Israeli camera crew was attempting to work (claiming they were American journalists, not Israelis) he announced determinedly, "we'll see about this." Jumping out of the car, he denounced the youngsters in perfect Palestinian Arabic: "Aren't you ashamed of yourselves? What would your mothers and fathers say of you? Get back to your homes and get your books and do your school work. Don't you want to make something of your lives?" The refugee youngsters looked at one another rather shamefacedly and immediately dispersed.

It was hard for me, new to the region, to tell such a man that he didn't understand how to talk to Arabs, whether on the screen or face to face. He was convinced that only strength and shows of strength would prevail in his part of the world.

There were some initial successes. One day Answar Nosseiba, formerly Defense Minister for the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan and once its ambassador to Great Britain, came to the studio to debate Moshe Shapiro, Israel's Minister of Justice, on the absentee property law in Jerusalem. Under this law Israel now holds "abandoned" Arab property (Israel never confiscated this land, but holds it in escrow, renting it to individuals, in the hope that it will be used as part of the final peace negotiations). Nosseiba argued well, as did Shapiro. The program got an amazingly good press in Beirut, and evoked generally favorable Arab reaction.

Even earlier, before we were ready to put programs on the air, I took a group of news trainees to nearby Bethlehem to visit a man named Sellim, who had also been a Jordanian minister. Sellim had been speaking extensively to Israeli students at the various universities. He held that if Jordan did not negotiate with Israel then the Palestinian Arabs remaining on the West Bank might have to negotiate for themselves—but "Tel Aviv must show the initiative."

We searched the narrow alleyways of Bethlehem for him (Arab towns do not have street numbers), finally finding his office on a main thoroughfare several hundred yards from Rachel's Tomb. He had no hesitancy in consenting to the interview. He told us off camera after the interview that the previous night he had been stopped on the way home from Hebrew University. He did not have his identity papers with him, and had been detained in a police station for two hours pending identification. He was shocked by this because he was no more than five minutes' drive from his home ("my home," he emphasized) when he was stopped. "When will the Arab misery cease?" he asked. Meanwhile his son was serving us—six Israelis and their American adviser—good Turkish coffee and tea. An atmosphere of civility prevailed. He evidently wanted to get his case across to the Israeli public.

Shlomo Imbary, the head of the Arabic news section, commented: "It's good just that they see Israel Television seeking them out for their opinions. It's a psychological point. A new psychology begins to develop."

But the first initiative was not properly exploited. I cannot say it was entirely our fault at Israel Television; the terrorist organizations, who threatened anyone cooperating with Israel Television, had something to do with it. As the incidents began to build up in the late fall of 1968, and there was evidence of growing unrest on the West Bank, Arab willingness to cooperate with Israel Television markedly declined. But I think better planning —and more trained professional journalists—could have helped Israel seize the psychological initiative from the Arabs. Too many of the news shows directed toward the Arabs displayed the most recently captured Fatah prisoner acknowledging his guilt in joining El Fatah and the folly of attempting to penetrate the lines of the Israeli defense forces.

A conservative, directive-oriented mentality often dominated the approach to information. We did one story on a marvelous Israeli-financed project for Arab refugees in a vast and now nearly empty refugee camp on the outskirts of Jericho. A group of ten Arabs remaining in the camp banded together into a farm cooperative for the raising of chickens. The Israeli Ministry of Agriculture immediately gave them technical advice; provided a grain expert to help them with the most modern and efficient methods of feeding; arranged a low-cost loan for the development of the farm and the installation of running water directly into the chicken sheds. The story described the empty refugee camp rather poetically, dwelt briefly on the poverty, showed the farm and what was being done, and then showed the Arab owners and the Jewish officials negotiating as equals on the terms of their arrangement.

The story was not used by Israel Television. In the judgment of the particular editor for that day (a judgment shared, incidentally, by the military government of the West Bank), it was against policy to acknowledge the poverty of the Arab refugees still living in Israel-controlled territory or to show the emptiness of the camp.

On another occasion, we showed Palestinian refugees parading in the streets of Beirut with a coffin raised above their heads, shouting revenge on Israel for the death of one of their martyred heroes. Our comment over the footage was that the Palestinian leadership was forced to a glorification of death; that death, not life, was the symbol of Fatah's misguided leadership. We then related the scene to Premier Karameh of Lebanon making a speech to the Palestinians encouraging them, while we in our commentary deplored the lack of courage in the leadership of the Arab states. The "politically astute" judgment was that we should not broadcast any sequence on the Lebanese in fear of embarrassing them. A week or so later the Israeli Government embarrassed them considerably by blowing up thirteen planes at the Beirut airport.

Perhaps the most interesting television program in the area of Arab-Jewish relations is one called Two Sides of the Barricades, which has not been shown at this writing.

It concerns two families—one Jewish, one Arab—both of whom lost two children in the 1948 war. The families are roughly typical of their nations, although each has suffered more than the ordinary family. Life in each family is rather sterile. The Arabs live in a refugee camp near Ramallah; they came originally from a village near the once Arab city of Ramle. They lost their children while fleeing from the front lines in 1948. The Jewish family came originally from Russia and live in Haifa. They have never recovered from the loss of their two sons within the space of one month in the spring of 1948. Yet both families are "moderate." The Jewish family has no basic hatred of Arabs, shows a continued devotion to the cause of the state, and longs for a secure peace. The Arab family recalls some good associations with Jews in pre-1948 days, believes the Jewish state has no right to exist on the "bones of the Arabs," resents and rejects Jewish rights to immigration, but hopes that Jews and Arabs can live together on some basis.

By its honest exposition of both viewpoints, the film leaves one with the feeling that there is something to talk about, and that dialogue on a human, if not a national, level can and must begin. The new director of television has made a bold but tentative decision to broadcast it after the fall election. It will be interesting to see if he runs into difficulties with his overseers.

It is difficult to gauge such intangibles as "trust" or "respect." How can one know what a $6-million investment in communications means? It is much easier to assess the results of a similar investment in planes or tanks.

And the attitude of the public also carries weight. The Israeli viewer, very simply, wants a television for himself. He has had to pay a high luxury tax on his set. (The cost to him is usually about $400—more than one month's salary for many people. There is, in addition, a yearly licensing fee of about $30. For the moment the budget of Israel Television comes out of general taxpayer funds.) The owner wants his money's worth. He wants the news and sometimes a good documentary; also entertainment programs for himself or his children. He feels it's his television; why should he surrender time to the Arabs?

A change of television administration came in March, following the resignation of Professor Katz. The new leadership of both radio and television, under the overall direction of Shmuel Almog, former head of radio, confirmed TV in its already apparent direction as "an Israeli Television for Israelis." (The new director of television, Haggai Pinsker, also a radio man, seems an especially promising choice, but the extent of political experimentation he can undertake will probably be limited. In sum, Israel Television became a "normal" television, with all the political, administrative and programming implications of normalcy. The era of political experimentation by television had finished before it ever really started.

CIVIL RIGHTS, THE NIXON FIDDLE

BARNEY SELLERS

Mr. Sellers has just completed a yearlong study of federal civil rights enforcement for the A. Philip Randolph Institute; he was formerly special assistant to the director of the Office for Civil Rights in the Department of Health, Education and Welfare.

Because school desegregation has traditionally been the main area of government civil rights activity, the Johnson administration is generally credited with at least effecting more change than had come about before. The ex-President's deliberate decision to absorb the political consequences of pushing Southern school desegregation was certainly unprecedented and stands in his favor. Though the Johnson White House gave no active leadership to the score of federal agencies whose civil rights responsibilities occur in a variety of contexts, it did not as a rule block action initiated by the separate departments, and its intent to advance social justice in this area was not doubted. But now the Nixon Administration, through a series of confusing steps, has raised again the question of intent. It is dangerous even to ask such a fundamental question; it only supports the argument of those who claim the system is unable to accommodate peaceful change.

One of the first indications of confused enforcement started not in education but in employment, where the government demands fair hiring on the part of its 225,000 contractors. Deputy Secretary of Defense David Packard decided shortly after coming into office that a yearlong Johnson administration discrimination case against a group of textile mills, which he found on his desk, could best be resolved through personal agreement between himself and mill executives. This produced an immediate $14 million in contracts for the mills. Transportation Secretary John Volpe changed, and in some respects seriously weakened, the equal hiring rules covering the highway construction industry. In March 1969, Sen. Edward Kennedy's subcommittee on Administrative Practice and Procedure held hearings to investigate the nature of these two civil rights enforcement decisions, and demonstrated that both had been made without consulting civil rights groups. Secretary Volpe soon approached such groups to smooth over differences and improve the department's program. In Defense, Mr. Packard eventually agreed to ask the mills for written plans to end discrimination.

The Department of Labor, which oversees the entire government contract compliance program, has shown some disposition to take a strong stand for enforcement, but as yet little has been accomplished in fact. The President attended the West Coast swearing-in of the program's director and promised firm enforcement. The department announced that it would reinstitute abandoned plans to set target goals in construction hiring, and moved to improve management of the program by cutting, from twenty-six to thirteen, the number of federal agencies involved in overseeing contractors. And though no final enforcement actions have yet been taken against any contractor (this record stands unbroken for more than twenty-five years), an award to one defense contractor, the Hayes International Corporation, was at least delayed until the firm agreed to government hiring demands. Finally, some attempt is being made to define "affirmative action"—an amorphous term for serious moves made by the suppliers to overcome hiring inadequacies, which in the past has produced repeated hassles within and outside federal agencies.

In the Department of Housing and Urban Development, rhetoric has raced far ahead of meaningful action. Secretary George Romney, perhaps sticking to his promise of not holding out what he cannot deliver, has not delivered much. Though federal fair-housing officials have promised a more vigorous prosecution of individual complaints under the 1968 open housing law, the department has not taken advantage of the much more important, yet less widely appreciated, powers in the law which require HUD and other departments to act "in a manner affirmatively to further" the purposes of the act. With more than $11 billion in federal aid now flowing to urban areas, this broad mandate, the first Congressional approval of governmental initiative in civil rights matters, could significantly affect the administration of such programs as model cities, community planning and community facilities. The language also affects the independent banking regulatory agencies which control the financing of housing. To date, however, HUD's initiative has been frustrated by bureaucratic infighting.

Contradictions are also apparent within the Agriculture Department. In 1965, the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights issued a devastating public report exposing widespread discrimination in farm programs. In October 1968, the commission's staff conducted a less intensive, but still critical survey of the department's fair treatment activities; its findings prompted the outgoing Secretary, Orville Freeman, to add $250,000 for civil rights to his 1970 budget. When the new Administration took office, it deleted these funds, but in an unusual gesture the Bureau of the Budget suggested that Agriculture reconsider the decision. While the issue was pending, certain Department of Agriculture bureaus—most notably, the Federal Extension Service—tried to weaken the department's civil rights program even further. In the midst of this dispute, the new Attorney General wrote the department, referring to the commission's findings, and declaring that no "meaningful action . . . has been taken to correct the situation." The Justice Department letter became public and was of great help to a liberal group in the House which managed to return the $250,000 to the Agriculture appropriations bill. As of now, Agriculture's principal activities in the area have been a civil rights training program and a review of its enforcement program. It has yet to take action against any of its major program recipients who discriminate.

In the matter of employment by federal agencies themselves, the President has again professed a personal desire for improvement (this solicitude has become something of a tradition among recent Chief Executives). He has issued a new order covering the government's 2.6 million employees (about 20 per cent nonwhite) which, though it recites agency requirements more specifically than did previous directives, still leaves the government's own standards far lower than those for private employers and unions. Improvement within government agencies will not be easy for the new Administration, however good its intentions. Though nonwhite employment in federal agencies has traditionally been relatively high, it has been restricted almost entirely to the lower grades. In HUD, for example, of 530 top policy jobs, fewer than forty are filled by blacks and Mexican-Americans. In the Bureau of Indian Affairs, which by statute gives preference to American Indians, 99 per cent of upper-level jobs are held by whites. For the Nixon Administration, which has had little success in attracting blacks and browns to its service, this problem will be particularly difficult.

The worst confusion, however, has come in the school desegregation program. Federal pressure for school integration, based upon prohibitions against the discriminatory use of federal aid (Title VI of the 1964 Civil Rights Act) and positive litigation (Title IV), has caused increased public resistance, especially in the South and primarily because the Johnson administration had set this school year as the target date for total desegregation. In addition, the Democrats, eventually backed by the Supreme Court in Green v. New Kent County, insisted that "desegregation" meant positive local efforts to end all vestiges of racially separate school systems, and not simply the opening of previously closed white school doors, or so-called freedom of choice. During the 1968 campaign, when the mounting school battle was an issue, Mr. Nixon promised the South relief from federal coercion. The present confusion occurs because he is in the midst of deciding how to keep that promise.

Nine days after the new Administration took office, HEW Secretary Finch announced that for five local school districts impending federal aid terminations would be delayed, to give the districts time to develop desegregation plans (the Johnson people had already given them between one and three years). Finch's action, though subsequently excused as an interim, exceptional move, started a debate about whether the Administration intended to change existing school policies. In early March, Finch hinted that some change would come, but also indicated his desire that desegregation should continue. Later in the month, he met with both civil rights leaders and liberal Republican Senators and promised that no modifications were in store. Nevertheless, a series of internal battles began in the department over the nature and extent of changes in school policies, with the strongest argument for continued enforcement coming from Leon Panetta, the new young director of HEW's integration program. On July 3, change finally came in the form of a joint statement from Secretary Finch and Attorney General Mitchell. The statement itself was a masterpiece of double talk, rhetorically supporting desegregation, but clearly threatening its future. The September 1969 target date for complete desegregation was dropped in favor of a more flexible approach which would recognize that "in some districts there may be sound reasons for some limited delay." No other date was substituted; no mention was made of action that would be taken against districts that reneged on their promises to desegregate; no explanation was made about what would happen to districts whose plans were already accepted, or who were already subject to enforcement action. (In questioning which followed, HEW officials gave assurance that such loopholes were not real.) The statement promised more vigorous action against segregation outside the South, renewed emphasis on technical assistance to desegregating school districts and, most important, heavy reliance upon judicial enforcement, which has proved invariably to be slower than administrative action.

"Maybe He's Carryin' on Secret Talks With Us Too"

In reaction to the outpouring of liberal criticism which followed, the White House emphasized that it was "unequivocably committed" to ending educational discrimination, and within a week the Justice Department filed six school desegregation suits, including one against the state of Georgia. While this court action was getting under way, the House was considering an anti-civil rights amendment to the HEW appropriations bill—almost identical to one that had been defeated a year earlier—which would have legalized freedom of choice desegregation plans and thus guaranteed the re-segregation of hundreds of local districts. During the legislative fight, Secretary Finch failed to say a word about this amendment, though it would cripple his desegregation program; Republican House leader Gerald Ford worked actively to secure its passage. It passed the House and is scheduled for consideration by the Senate in late October.

Late in August, the Justice Department announced suits against districts that refused to live up to desegregation promises, but Secretary Finch then asked the federal courts to delay HEW-encouraged desegregation in thirty-three Mississippi school districts because "I am gravely concerned that the time allowed for the development of these plans has been much too short . . . to develop terminal plans which can be implemented this year." The NAACP Legal Defense Fund, a party to the school cases, asked the court to name the United States as a defendant, and in September the fund issued a blast at the Administration for fostering "a deliberate policy of confusion." In addition, Justice Department civil rights attorneys have protested en masse to their superiors against the Administration's moves—an extraordinary occurrence in that conservative agency. Finally, Father Theodore Hesburgh, personally selected by President Nixon to be chairman of the U.S. Commission on Civil Rights, publicly criticized the government for its "retreat" on school desegregation. The Administration replied that greater progress had been made this year than ever before.

It is evident that from the outset the Nixon Administration has created confusion where, after years of legal battles, the basic victories had been won. The law clearly requires local districts to end the racial separatism they created. Emphasizing this early in September, Justice Hugo Black said:

> There is no longer the slightest excuse, reason, or justification for further postponement of the time when every public school system in the United States will be a unitary one, receiving and teaching students without discrimination on the basis of their race or color. . . . In my opinion there is no reason why such a wholesale deprivation of constitutional rights should be tolerated another minute.

But the Administration demonstrated its capacity for just such tolerance by implying in its July statement ("there may be sound reasons for some limited delay") that exceptions will now be a part of public policy. This tolerance, defended at the time as applying to "only a handful of districts," has been widely used.

The Mississippi request for delay came as a result of personal intervention by Secretary Finch at the instance of Sen. John Stennis (D., Miss.). The thirty-three districts in question still send, on the average, 95 per cent of their black students to segregated schools. One of them is Neshoba County, site of the Cheney-Schwerner-Goodman murder, which to this day has maintained total segregation through the efforts of its school attorney (he defended one of the accused murderers) and federal Judge Harold Cox, who granted the Finch request for delay.

More alarming than this single HEW instance, however, is the Justice Department's policy of softening the court approach to laggard school districts. In Louisiana, for example, where thirty-seven districts are in court, HEW officials appear as witnesses to support immediate desegregation, while Justice attorneys retire to court chambers and settle for delay. Furthermore, in Florida and Georgia the Justice Department is refusing to appeal cases unless the proposed desegregation dates are delayed beyond September 1970. Finally, any routine reliance on desegregation by court action will slow the tempo of change: in the past Justice Department court cases have proceeded half as fast as HEW administrative desegregation.

It would be unfair, and it may prove inaccurate, to dismiss the good intentions of the Nixon Administration in the matter of civil rights. There is, if only for party reasons, a likelihood that the new Administration will attack union discrimination more vigorously than did the Democrats, and there is some hope that a recent White House review of government-wide civil rights problems indicates a stiffening of purpose. But determination is only too likely to falter when confronted by the increased public resistance to change—which in turn has been encouraged by the Administration's vacillation.

NOT IN SERVICE

THE INDISCRETIONS OF MA BELL

JOSEPH C. GOULDEN

Mr. Goulden, a Washington journalist, is the author of Monopoly, a critical study of AT&T (Putnam's) and of Truth Is the First Casualty, on the Tonkin Gulf incidents, to be published by Rand McNally in October.

The Bell Telephone System is attempting to brighten its image this fall through lavish spreading of paint. No longer will phone company trucks wear the drab green that makes them look like strays from an army convoy or prison farm. Blue and yellow stripes are accentuating the new two-tone vehicle motif (white on top, gray-green on bottom). Also a new, crisper "logotype" will replace the bell symbol that has adorned company property since the Bell Telephone monopoly was assembled in the 1890s. AT&T internal publications suggest that workers stop calling their employer "Ma Bell"—that the term "Miss Bell" sounds friendlier, and encourages the public to think of the phone company as a young swinger rather than a frumpy old dame peeling potatoes in the kitchen.

The Fundamentalist preachers who bedeviled my Southern youth often shouted (in trying to terrorize girls who had succumbed to the evils of lipstick and rouge) that "a little paint covers a lot of dirt, both in a house and in a woman." So be it with Ma Bell—but much more than two-tone trucks and a jazzy emblem are needed to conceal that the American Telephone & Telegraph is suffering a massive collapse of service and customer relations.

This is truly the year when three-quarters of a century of monopoly has caught up with AT&T. Telephone horror stories are sweeping the land and are being told even in such dignified places as The Wall Street Journal, which isn't exactly anti-capitalist. The Journal does, however, have a keenly personal interest in phone service: its offices are in Wall Street, the very eye of telephony's disaster area, where as many as 10 per cent of long distance calls don't go through on the first dialing, according to New York Public Service Commission data; and where staid law firms are suing New York Telephone Company on the ground that its service is "inadequate, uncertain, irresponsible and untimely."

Unable to gain relief from the utility commissions, discontented customers are turning to that ultimate weapon of citizen protest, the full-page advertisement in The New York Times. When hit by such heavy artillery, the phone company occasionally listens. On August 20, Avery, Hand & Company, a communications firm in Westport, Conn., offered a prize "of no particular value, but of great interest and memorability," to whoever came closest to guessing when New York Telephone would restore a service that ceased on July 15, and remained so despite daily appeals to AT&T and Avery, Hand's phone came alive at 10:55 o'clock the morning the Times ad appeared.

But for the rest of us, only frustration. A teacher in a Washington school runs to the corner drugstore phone to notify a parent that a child is ill; she can't get a line through the school switchboard. Dial for the operator, and wait . . . and wait . . . and wait. (My personal records: fifty-five rings to place a long distance call from Arlington, Va.; 109 rings to reach an information operator from a New York booth.)

Nor does contact with the operator mean an end to the citizen's troubles. Miss Bell or Ma Bell, by either name AT&T can be a snappish wench quick to spew billingsgate at a customer, or abruptly disconnect his call rather than check whether Stewart's name could possibly be spelled Stuart. Their behavior is the more infuriating because it is so sharply divergent from what we were taught to expect from Ma Bell's girls, who had that famed "voice with a smile." (To Bell's credit, the slogan is no longer used.) As a Texas newspaper man I once sought to locate, by phone, a man who had been bitten by a rabid dog, who lived in a rural area, and whose comments were deemed of sociological importance by a city editor. The Bell operator in the town knew the man, but said he didn't have a phone. "But if he's being treated," she said, "Doc Smith is the one, and I know he's out on Forney Road tending to Miss Sally. Let me ring him there and I'll tell him to give you what you need." She did, and he did. Call information in the same town today, and you are connected with a Southwestern Bell operator who sits in Dallas, with responsibility for all of north central Texas, and with no interest whatsoever in the whereabouts of anyone so insignificant that he isn't listed in a Bell directory.

What happened to Bell? Why the public disintegration of Bell's long-time image of total efficiency? Why cannot the world's largest company in terms of assets ($40.1 billion at the end of 1968) perform its basic mission? After all, Ben S. Gilmer, now the AT&T president, earnestly told the Federal Communications Commission during the 1966-67 rate inquiry: ". . . the ultimate criterion of all we do is service to the public. This is our responsibility and our license to exist . . . . In our business, service means being ready, willing and able to respond to the existing and emerging communications needs of the nation."

Willing or not, Bell has not been ready and able. Its failure is twofold: physical and personal. The demand for phones is outstripping Bell's willingness to supply them. And, once in place, Bell cannot operate them satisfactorily. In both instances, the blame falls on AT&T management. The company's excuse is that inadequate earnings prevent it from expanding fast enough to meet customer needs, and that "local conditions" such as strikes and the stock market boom are responsible for many of the more spectacular collapses (Chicago, northern Florida, Detroit and Wall Street). Its statistics are impressive, as statistics tend to be. "In 1968 we handled 16 million more messages per business day than in 1967," board chairman H. I. Romnes wrote in the 1968 AT&T annual report. "Long distance messages increased by 620 million. The gain of 4,245,000 telephones was the largest ever. . . ." The U.S. population increased 13 per cent during 1959-68; phones in use by more than 50 per cent (57,944,000 to 88,007,000). And so forth.

As of June 1, 1969, state utility commissions had before them requests for phone rate increases totaling more than $468 million, chiefly from Bell System companies. But there is no credible evidence that higher rates would revive services. Simon Lazarus, former special assistant to FCC member Nicholas Johnson, and now with New York City's Department of Consumer Affairs, notes that New York Telephone has exceeded its authorized 6.5 per cent rate of return every year since that rate was established by the public service commission in 1957. In 1968, when it dipped to 6.9 per cent, New York Telephone asked the PSC for $175 million in new revenues and a return of 8.5 to 9 per cent. Meanwhile, New Yorkers wait three weeks for phone installations—and almost as long to complete long distance calls.

Phone service has collapsed because the Bell System is engaged in a technological power grab designed to insure its continuing domination of the communications market. Bell "defends" its monopoly by an active offense; thus it is devoting a substantial portion of its engineering skills and financial resources to esoteric electronic gear: interface devices which permit "computers to talk to computers"; data transmission systems to service everything from brokerage houses to libraries, banks and department stores; and new broad-band circuits which permit literally thousands of voice and other transmissions to travel the same route simultaneously. As William O. Baker, vice president of the Bell Telephone Laboratories, told the FCC in 1966, AT&T is preparing for "the transmission of new magnitudes of communications, including intermixed batches of data, words and graphics beyond anything conceived hitherto. These forthcoming requirements will result from a growth in the accumulation and utilization of catalogued information, an increasingly important development in our society."

Such is the stuff of which the big communications profits of the future are to be made. And such is the area in which Bell hopes to beat down potential competitors, the independent communications companies which are attempting to market their own data transmission devices. So preoccupied is Bell with this conquest of new markets that it gives less and less attention to its humdrum (and captive) home and business customers. During 1968, by way of illustration, the Western Electric plants at Indianapolis and Shreveport, La., together produced 8.1 million telephone sets. Only 2.5 million of them were "general purpose dial phones." The remainder were what Western calls "specialty instruments or new models introduced in the past decade."

Which brings up a second reason for the phone collapse. Vital to Bell's data transmission market is the system-wide installation of something called "electronic switching systems," or ESS, described as the greatest thing to happen to the industry since Alexander Graham Bell. ESS is swift: when mated with Touch-Tone phones, it handles calls some five times faster than existing rotary systems. ESS has a memory: eventually, Bell tells us, it will enable a subscriber to have calls transferred from his base number to wherever he may be—at the ball park, in his car, at a restaurant.

Bell began deploying ESS in 1965, beginning in smaller exchanges on the Eastern seaboard. The apparent (but unadmitted) company policy is to make as few expansions of non-ESS exchanges as possible, pending availability of the more modern equipment. If customers suffer in the interim, that's regrettable, but Bell definitely does not intend to install older type equipment only to junk it within a decade. Here the company follows a hallowed, if hollow, Bell tradition. The one-piece handset which houses both receiver and transmitter was standard equipment in Europe by 1885; AT&T continued with the two-piece set —the mouthpiece in a permanent wall mount or on a desk stand, the earpiece separate and attached by a cord —until 1934. The reason: giving subscribers better equipment would have meant junking existing apparatus. So Bell permitted the two-piece sets to continue in service until they literally fell apart. If it undertook a crash program to install standard electro-mechanical switching systems, Bell could relieve much of the present crush.

And here arises another problem. Manufacture of ESS is complicated, and the FCC's common carrier bureau, which began an investigation of service snafus in late August, discovered that Western Electric was "persistently" late on deliveries of ESS and other switching gear. Civil servants in the bureau are now asking (and attempting to interest the commission in) the question of whether delays would have been tolerated had AT&T been dealing with an outside contractor, rather than its wholly owned manufacturing and supply subsidiary.

Sassy and stupid operators, while less complicated technologically, are of more personal concern to the phone customer than ESS and other unseen apparatus. Here Bell's excuse is "turnover"—that operators and other personnel zip in and out of the system so fast that they are ineffective. According to AT&T figures, the turnover of women operators was 31 per cent in 1967; 35 per cent in 1968 and even higher in the first four months of 1969. In Manhattan, the figure was 41 per cent in 1968, up from 34 per cent in 1967.

AT&T operators are at a tactical disadvantage in dealing with the public. A citizen who waits ten minutes in a sweaty booth for a long distance operator to pick up his call thinks not of AT&T board chairman Romnes nor AT&T director C. Douglas Dillon, the former Cabinet member, nor AT&T director Monroe J. Rathbone, former board chairman of Jersey Standard. To him the operator is Ma Bell incarnate, and it is this hapless creature who endures the public's raw animal hatred for the Bell System and its wretched service.

She is absolutely defenseless. She is programmed to be impersonal, even when the customer is in a happy mood and willing to josh a bit as he places his call. Says an officer of the Communications Workers of America, the chief Bell union: "Whoever the hell does time studies for AT&T figured out that an operator who smiles or jokes with a customer is wasting a second or two, and that won't do. So she has her little pat phrases she is required to chant at him, mechanically, even when human nature demands that she act human. So the caller thinks, 'My God, what a cold fish this woman is.' . . . When he calls the operator again he is brusque, even rude. The girls listen to this all day, and what happens? They, too, become brusque and rude, it's a self-perpetuating process."

Company rules consistently flout common sense—and it's the operator who takes the blame. A Philadelphia drama critic recently moved into a new home and requested an unlisted number for his phone, which was connected in his absence. He called the Pennsylvania Bell business office to ask what his number was to be. "I'm sorry, we can't give you the number of your unlisted phone over the telephone; you must come to the office," the girl told him. "But it's my own phone," the critic protested. "I'm talking from it right now; call me back and tell me the number." She replied: "I'm sorry, that's against company rules."

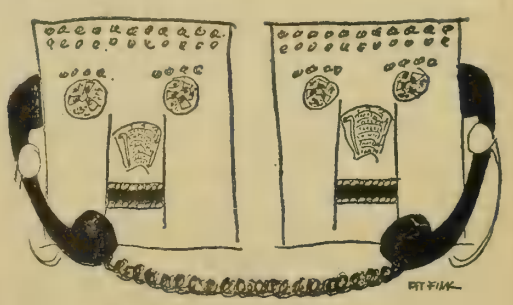
According to the management textbooks, efficiency in a large organization depends upon standardization—of machines and of humans. For a Bell operator, however, "standardization" makes life a daily hell. "The pressures are many, varied, subtle and extreme," says Lee White, CWA's national public relations director. "We are finding an unusual number of cases of—well, I guess you would call them cases of nervous troubles—developing in traffic departments.

"The girls are required to sit on a stool of a certain height, always keeping a prescribed distance from the switchboard, looking neither to left nor right, not talking to the girls beside them." According to White, it isn't uncommon for a supervisor to come up quietly behind an operator and hold a pencil alongside her head. "If the girl turns her head far enough to see the pencil, that means she's looking around too much, and she can be reprimanded. . . . Think of that—to sit at a board all day long, and endure something like that. . . . And to know that a supervisor is sitting in the back at a console, monitoring every call you handle, making sure you repeat the standard phrases exactly as written in the book, and that you answer all your calls within two seconds."

The Bell System maintains elaborate indexes of "performance norms" for its employees—how many calls operators handle per hour; how many repairs a serviceman makes during a day; how many new phones an installer handles. Fulfilling (or surpassing) these norms determines how fast AT&T managers are promoted through the system, for they are constantly being compared with men doing the same job elsewhere. To AT&T workers, these norms constitute an ever faster treadmill which has led, in the words of a resolution passed at CWA's 1967 convention, "to nervous sickness or nervous breakdown, widespread use of tranquilizers, and a large turnover in the traffic force." CWA decries constant prodding of workers "to meet . . . computerized indexes which will only be raised once you meet the objective."



A special CWA committee which surveyed 12,500 union officers and members reported findings last June that put a statistical foundation beneath such sweeping charges, to wit:

> An alarming four-fifths of the local presidents felt that unfair competition was promoted by the existing index system, and an overwhelming majority felt that the results of such a system were reported inaccurately to top management. . . . One out of every four females was disciplined last year . . . from the index system.
>
> [Job observation and monitoring have] caused gross irritation among our members. Three out of every five females surveyed responded that such job observation creates an uncomfortable or harassing atmosphere. [Existing methods] are not only harassing in the extreme, but are degrading to the employee and must be changed if employee morale is to be improved from its present low state.
>
> The adequacy of company training programs was severely criticized by both the local presidents and the individual members. Over three-fourths of the locals gave poor ratings to such training programs. Also, more than a majority reported that management expects too much too soon from newly-trained employees.
>
> There is significant evidence that the number of employees is insufficient in most cases to provide adequate service to the customer. This naturally throws a greater work load on the employees and a heavier burden on first-line management.

On and on runs the CWA indictment, but the last count constitutes the most devastating bit of evidence on life within Ma Bell's family: "When asked how they would recommend a company job similar to theirs to a friend outside the company, two-thirds of the employees that responded failed to rate their job as a good one."

What then is the solution to the phone mess? First, AT&T should be made to realize that the bounds of its monopoly are not limitless. Phone service is a natural monopoly, and even the most vehement of Bell baiters do not desire that each town have two or more operating phone companies. But what right—natural, moral or legal—does AT&T have to the data transmission field? Why should the regulatory agencies permit Bell to slight its responsibilities to its captive consumers while devoting its energies and a good portion of its investment capital to the capture of nonphone markets? At a time when millions of Americans are grousing about their phone service, why does AT&T's manufacturing subsidiary, Western Electric, take upon itself the mammoth task of prime contractor for the anti-ballistic missile system, which is to be the biggest defense undertaking since the Manhattan Project? AT&T's basic business is telephones, and it should be forced to return to it, resisting the green appeal of the dollars it habitually sees on the other side of the fence.

William D. Hickman, who writes on communications matters from Washington for the McGraw-Hill publications, frequently argues the value of competition as a regulatory tool. The revocation of a Bell franchise in one of the states now suffering abysmal phone service would put AT&T on notice that its monopoly, while long established, is no longer to be taken for granted. Does any state regulatory agency have the fortitude to take such a drastic step to bring the telephone monopoly into line? I doubt it—and so does Ma Bell; otherwise, she wouldn't be behaving so irresponsibly.

BOOKS & THE ARTS

Making the World Safe for America

THE POLITICS OF WAR: The World and United States Foreign Policy, 1943-1945. By Gabriel Kolko. Random House. 685 pp. $12.95.

THE ROOTS OF AMERICAN FOREIGN POLICY: An Analysis of Power and Purpose. By Gabriel Kolko. Beacon Press. 166 pp. $5.95.

RONALD RADOSH

Mr. Radosh is the author of a forthcoming book, The American Labor Movement and United States Foreign Policy (Random House). He teaches history at Queensborough Community College, City University of New York.

Gabriel Kolko is the latest historian to develop a study of World War II from a revisionist standpoint. It is somewhat irritating to find that he fails to acknowledge any debt to other revisionists, particularly to William Appleman Williams whose Tragedy of American Diplomacy (1959), a sophisticated and compelling critique of the cold war, provided the theoretical framework from which Kolko's study seems to have been developed. Nevertheless, The Politics of War, Kolko's account of two crucial years, 1943-45, is undoubtedly the most searching, thorough and detailed study yet to appear of what has led to our present impasse. Basing his conclusions upon memoirs, hearings and more than fifteen manuscript collections of the key policy makers, Kolko reveals that U.S. policy during World War II was not the result of drift, or a desire to score a military victory against the Axis powers. Political issues were inseparable from military problems, and the war itself was an extension of an older political-economic struggle.

American policy, Kolko argues, can be understood as an attempt to create a postwar world structure that would maintain United States hegemony throughout the world, on the basis of an informal empire of free trade imperialism. U.S. authorities sought to use the occupation forces to contain revolutionary change, and worked to revive conservative groups in order to prevent any collapse of the old order that might open the door to either social revolution or Soviet predominance in Europe. The United States did not, therefore, favor a stern peace for Germany or Japan, but desired their reintegration into a new liberal world capitalism to balance any Soviet gains from the war. The United States fought not to destroy the Axis but to advance "American global interests." World War II was actually a tragic error "to the American government in that . . . it understood that perhaps a less imperialist Germany and Japan would be preferable to the U.S.S.R. as allies in the future."

Holding a Wilsonian goal of building an integrated order of world-wide liberal capitalism, U.S. leaders viewed all areas of the world they did not control as danger spots. Perhaps Kolko's major contribution is the way in which he reveals the related nature of the broad economic objectives of American capitalism and the political policy pursued by the corporate policy makers. In a fundamental sense, U.S. leaders did not separate economics and politics; the two were different sides of the same coin.

U.S. policy toward Eastern Europe reflects the interaction between economics and politics. The United States did not object to Sovietization on moral and political grounds: a lack of "democracy" or a refusal to hold "free elections." Citing the positions of Cordell Hull and later Edward Stettinius, Kolko shows that U.S. policy was based on the assumption that "Americans could make future investments only within the context of a capitalist economy at least some of which the Eastern European nations might not wish to continue," and on "tangible demands for an open door to the Eastern European economies."

Hence U.S. policy at Yalta was "primarily economic in content," and called for multilateral trade patterns, equality of opportunity and freedom to invest for U.S. corporations. While the State Department gave lip service to acceptance of Russian security needs, it was defined "in such a manner as not to alter economic opportunities or involve a radical change in prewar internal or external economic relations." The United States came to depend on those very prewar political parties that were morally bankrupt, as it "ignored the structural facts" and opted for a conservative restoration of the prewar status quo. Rejecting either a move toward the left or neutrality, the United States worked with the Right since its economic objectives dovetailed with those of U.S. corporations. American leaders objected to any changes that would "have impinged on American freedom to invest and trade along traditional lines."

The United States desired restoration of the old trade patterns, so that Eastern Europe would maintain its old semicolonial status as breadbasket to the industrial West. American political goals were vague in nature, stressing containment of the Left and of Russian influence. But its economic goals were precise. The United States wished to prevent dismantling of property in reparations, keep oil from U.S.-owned wells from being shipped to Russia, and end all restrictions on the active return of U.S. business to Eastern Europe. First priority was opposition to nationalization. Tapping of Eastern European oil was considered crucial if economic life in Western Europe was to be restored. Victory for the Left or the Soviet Union "threatened this reintegration [of Eastern Europe] in the most fundamental manner." Thus the State Department worked for incorporation of the Danube River states into a European-wide inland waterway system under U.S. control. Fearing a Russian monopoly in the former Axis satellites, the United States worked to preserve Eastern Europe as an area that would sell its raw materials primarily to Germany. Soviet security needs could not be permitted to result in "interference with American property or trade."

The Soviets tried to create arrangements acceptable to the United States. In Western Europe they proved to be the most faithful allies of the State Department. Kolko perceptively uncovers the eminent conservatism of Soviet policy. Stalin based his actions on gaining security for the Soviet state, even if it meant opposing both nationalist and revolutionary Communist movements throughout the world. The Western Communist Parties proved faithful to Soviet needs, and became the old order's best allies. In Greece the EAM possessed most of the country, but they surrendered their arms and depended on British promises that never would be kept. In Italy the Communist Party stressed unity, even with Fascist collaborators. It became "the party of transcendent nationalism . . . that submerged class goals and vetoed the triumph of the Left in a period of considerable . . . revolutionary possibilities." In France the Communists actually played the "critical role in disciplining the working class and ultimately making it possible for capitalism as an institution to survive and profit."

The Americans never grasped the basic social democratic nature of Communist policy. Instead, they feared the potential implications of a popular Left victory. Yet the Communists worked steadily for stability, emphasizing productivity, speed-up, and an end to strikes. Capitalism survived only where both Communists and Social Democrats worked to reform it. The Left thus ironically "became the savior of Western European capitalism." Kolko, unlike orthodox Trotskyists, perceives the ineffectuality of Left action in the streets when the Nazis were still in power and the masses weak; and the further ineffectuality of Left action at the war's end when the Anglo-American troops made their presence felt. He finds that the Communists made a virtue out of necessity by, early in the game, declaring against revolutionary action. They served the Russian need for a breathing spell, and helped create a sound conservative order in Western Europe.

Soviet policy fit in neatly with the overall U.S. war aims, "to save capitalism at home and abroad." This goal could only be met in a rationally ordered world economy, in which a new Germany would be integrated into a liberal world capitalist structure. U.S. policy was a continuation of the old open-door imperialism, brought up to date by Cordell Hull. What the United States wanted was "ample and profitable outlets in the postwar period for its exports and investments, and in principle wished to see the markets and resources of the world available to all on equal terms, but most assuredly to the United States." With Britain and Germany as junior partners, reconstruction and relief would be solved as a "by-product of the creation of a rational world economy" through the open door. German power was to be retained but redefined according to U.S. needs, and a new Germany would be the bulwark of liberal capitalism in Europe.

Throughout Europe, American economic policy was used as a political weapon, and any postwar economic collaboration was delayed until political favors could be assured. Kolko clears up a long-standing issue taken up by the revisionists: the response to Stalin's request for a $6-billion loan from the United States.

Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr., has often asserted that this request was "lost." Kolko provides a much more credible account. Averell Harriman and key policy makers did not want a strong Russia to emerge from the war. And since Stalin planned to triple Russia's prewar steel output with these borrowed funds, Harriman opposed the loan and argued that the United States should increase trade elsewhere. The cutoff of Lend-Lease aid and denial of the loan was clearly an implication of "economic tools for political ends"—political ends which were of course economically derived. Kolko firmly lays to rest any further dispute over the meaning of economic policy toward Russia. Aid to the USSR was simply "incompatible with the now basic goal of strengthening world capitalism and the American position." No one, Kolko writes, had any "illusions about this objective," save, one might add, the liberal apologists like Schlesinger.

One cannot put too much stress on the immense achievement of Kolko. The present crisis is viewed as a result of the inability to carry out a policy of international counterrevolution. That an American historian can produce such a book in a conservative era, critical of both U.S. and Soviet measures, is evidence of the intellectual maturity achieved by some elements of the American Left. In his monograph, The Roots of American Foreign Policy, Kolko spells out the premises behind his approach. The United States is treated as a corporate capitalist state whose leaders fear for the "long-term future of American economic power as it overextends itself in the hopeless, open ended task of policing the world."

Kolko produces a needed corrective to the now popular Millsian view of military dominance, stressing that not the military-industrial complex but civilian goals are the source of U.S. foreign policy, that military power is only the instrument of a business-based ruling class that uses the military establishment for its own purposes. The policies of the cold war stem from a leadership emerging from "those with powerful class interests." American ideology is thus a synthesis "that embodies . . . economic and strategic objectives and priorities," demanding world economic stability and opposition to changes that "present a danger to United States hegemony." In a brilliant closing chapter, Kolko explores the roots of U.S. intervention in Vietnam. The war is the logical conclusion of a policy initiated by the Roosevelt administration, and is explained as "the inevitable cost of maintaining United States imperial power," not as an incorrect policy that might have been by-passed with wiser leadership. Kolko exposes the "specious liberalism which believes one simply replaces individuals in office with other men . . . rather than solving problems with an altogether new system based on a radically different distribution of power."

In some closing remarks, Kolko calls for a new "clarity" on the part of those who today reject the "leadership and goals of America's men of power." His own books produce such clarity. They are among the few truly essential works for those Americans who are seeking to lay the foundations for a humanist socialism in the United States.

Avant-Garde Forever?

SHAW: An Autobiography 1856-1898. Selected by Stanley Weintraub. Weybright & Talley. 336 pp. $10.

ALFRED TURCO

Mr. Turco teaches English at Wesleyan University and is at work on a book dealing with the organic coherence of Shaw's thought.

During his long life, George Bernard Shaw gave every sign of being a biographer's best friend. Not only did he supply several potential Boswells with reams of data: he sometimes wrote whole segments of their books himself. The appearance in 1956 of the "centennial" chronicles of Archibald Henderson and St. John Ervine seemed to exhaust the subject. Surely nothing new could be discovered after these massive tomes; perhaps too much had been written already about the author of Man and Superman, Major Barbara, St. Joan and other works that could be safely consigned to the realm of the passé. Shaw had advertised his modernity so long and ostentatiously that we forgot (as he never quite did himself) that nobody can remain avant-garde forever.

Nearly fifteen years later, the view is different. The publication of a number of serious critical works suggests that Shaw's reputation as an artist has begun to undergo favorable reassessment. While the "absurdist" contingent still finds it hard to forgive Shaw for believing that life has a purpose, many readers are more willing now than a few years ago to look beneath the level of surface shibboleth to find in his plays the exploration of a major theme—the possibility of synthesis between fact and ideal, flesh and spirit, wisdom and power—which is of permanent importance. In addition, a major biographical breakthrough occurred with the appearance in 1964 of Shaw of Dublin by B. C. Rosset. His on-the-scene sleuthing concerning Shaw's youthful period in Ireland convinced Rosset that G.B.S. had intentionally supplied misleading information about certain aspects of his life; that all the major biographers had uncritically cribbed material from one another's accounts; and that the destruction of original sources made a new beginning hazardous, if not impossible.

To be sure, Rosset's novel hypothesis —that Shaw wished to hide from the world a secret fear that he was the illegitimate son of a musician named Lee —was an overly flamboyant construction of the evidence. But the suggestion that Shaw's effusiveness was really designed to conceal a secretive nature fitted quite easily into the traditional view of a schizoid Shaw, divided neatly into a man and a mask. No attention was given to the possibility that Shaw may have adopted a public image (G.B.S.) not merely as a defensive tactic but because that persona actually expressed the part of his character with which he felt comfortable because he understood it fully. The man himself may not have known what lay beneath the mask.

In the wake of the wreckage left by Shaw of Dublin, it is no surprise that recent books of a quasi-biographical nature (such as R. J. Minney's Recollections of George Bernard Shaw) have been notable for their modest intentions. The most ingenious entry into the field, Stanley Weintraub's Shaw: An Autobiography 1856-1898, is not a "book of selections" in the usual sense. Mr. Weintraub's purpose has not been to collect a group of self-contained pieces but rather to sift an enormous amount of material (Shaw's prefaces, introductions to books about others, essays and reviews, speeches and unpublished typescripts) for segments which could then be spliced together in a manner suggesting the texture that a Shavian autobiography might actually have taken. The chapter on Shaw's youth, for instance, consists of more than thirty excerpts from more than a dozen sources written during the better part of a century—yet the effect aimed at is of one continuous essay. And despite the disadvantage of being limited to writings explicitly autobiographical in tone (passages of private confession are excluded), a reasonably full account emerges. Shaw's "shabby-genteel" origins; his humiliating apprenticeship as a clerk in Dublin and unpublished novelist in London; his adventures as Fabian Socialist and philandering virgin; his intellectual growth from rationalist to vitalist; his gradual success as music critic ("Corno di Bassetto"); his emergence as theatre critic and playwright in the 1890s (where the current account ends)—everything is here. If one cannot say that nothing is wanting, it is not because anything has been overlooked.

On Love

"My affections have two excellent qualities: extreme levity and extreme tenacity. I do not like the proverb 'Love me little: love me long'; but whoever invented it had a very narrow escape from finding its true form, which is, 'Love me lightly; love me long.' And that is how I loved, and still love, Annie Besant."

On Oscar Wilde

"Comedy: the criticism of morals and manners viva voce, was his real forte. When he settled down to that he was great. But . . . his initial mistake [i.e., as an apostle of Art] had produced that 'rather low opinion of Wilde's capacities,' that 'deep-rooted contempt for the showman in him,' which . . . will persist until the last man who remembers his aesthetic period has perished. The world has been in some ways so unjust to him that one must be careful not to be unjust to the world."

The idea of allowing a picture to emerge by letting Shaw speak for himself is in many ways appealing. There are, as we should expect, some hilarious moments—Shaw in Hyde Park, sheltered from the rain by an umbrella, giving an impassioned defense of socialism to an audience consisting entirely of six policemen who had been sent to keep an eye on him; or the account of one of his uncles, a religious fanatic, who attempted to expedite his arrival into heaven by strangling himself in a carpetbag. If there are predictable flashes of vanity, there is also self-criticism—readers feeling an antipathy to Shaw's bourgeois bias will discover that he was fully cognizant of his own middle-class prejudices. Vignettes of friends, among them Oscar Wilde and Theosophist Annie Besant, as well as a splendid tribute to artist-Socialist William Morris ("You can lose a man like that by your own death, but not by his") belie the contention that Shaw was incapable of sympathetic identification with other persons. And we catch a glimpse, too, of the mood of the late Victorian period—that remote time when vestryman G.B.S.'s advocacy of public lavatories for women greatly amused those who considered it ungentlemanly to suggest that a member of the fair sex might have occasion to use such a facility.

In spite of all these good features, Weintraub's method of compiling Shaw: An Autobiography involves a number of drawbacks, ranging from minor to serious. In the first group are the confusions of tone, transition and sequence, caused by the juxtaposition of passages written over long periods of time. The word "now" can refer to any time between the 1880s and 1940s; at one moment Shaw tells us he is in his "nineties" while material included nearby obviously dates from much earlier. Passages from speeches and reviews (e.g., his shock upon first seeing an uncorseted female or his obituary-diatribe against impresario Sir Augustus Harris) are misleading because the reader assumes that they are personal revelations when in fact they are segments of crusading argument cut adrift from the contexts that would make them fully intelligible. Bringing together several accounts of the same incident (for instance, Bradlaugh's famous challenge to the Almighty) results in a repetitiveness for which Shaw cannot be blamed. When at one point Shaw hails "Bassetto the Incorruptible," while a few pages later he laments that "poor old Bassetto" is no longer worth reading, or when he announces that Cashel Byron's Profession was not his first book after already having described in some detail the three that preceded it, the unfortunate effect in each case is not to be ascribed to senile garrulity but to a conflated text whose components were never meant to appear together.

Larger problems are presented by availability and arrangement of material. I do not think that Shaw would have written an autobiography of these years without mentioning his marriage, nor that he would have devoted twice as much space to his first play as to the next five put together (which included Mrs. Warren's Profession, Arms and the Man and Candida). And even where relevant material is plentiful and the flow of language is uninterrupted, the resulting tissue is not the equivalent of an extended piece of writing by Shaw. The Preface to his first novel, Immaturity, ranks with Milton's Areopagitica and Ruskin's Traffic as one of the summits of English prose; but when the essay is split into more than twenty fragments, and the magnificent peroration is placed at the beginning of a chapter consisting principally of segments more

On Religion

"Unfortunately this Christian Church, founded gaily with a pun . . . has become the Church where you must not laugh; and so it is giving away to the older and greater Church to which I belong: the Church where the oftener you laugh the better, because by laughter only can you destroy evil without malice, and affirm good fellowship without mawkishness."

subdued in tone, the rhythm goes limp. To be sure, none of the epigrammatic brilliance is lost; but Shaw's unit of expression is not the epigram, the sentence, or even the paragraph but a sense of mass which is precisely the quality which the editor has been forced to sacrifice. Did not Shaw warn that "all biographies must be artistic if they are to be readable"? Weintraub's aesthetic problem is that there is really no such thing as Shaw's autobiography—the bits and pieces are available, but there is no force to generate a form.

Finally, one must question the entire strategy of creating a portrait of Shaw by assembling, no matter how skillfully, statements he made about himself in the first person. Shaw on Shaw is occasionally fine, sometimes strident, and often a brash bore. While an unsympathetic reader may seize the occasion to observe that this book allows the man to stand condemned out of his own mouth, such a conclusion would be as misleading as a judgment of Wagner's abilities as an orchestrator based upon a study of only the horn parts in his operas.

On His Youth

"I had the intellectual habit; and my natural combination of critical faculty with literary resource needed only a clear comprehension of life in the light of an intelligible theory: in short, a religion, to set it in triumphant operation."

But the problem goes still deeper. Shaw once wrote of Wagner: "Seldom has there taken place in the soul of one and the same man as profound a division and estrangement between the intuitive and impulsive part of his nature and his consciously or reasonably formed ideas." Few have realized how true that statement is of the man who uttered it —even Shaw's detractors have tended to see him as a "rationalist" who at least knew what he wanted to say and said it brilliantly. While it would be rash to deny the brilliance, it does not follow that Shaw knew what he was saying. Indeed, I would even argue that he is never more brilliant than when he literally does not know what he is talking about. This is surely true of his art. It used to be considered quite a damaging criticism to point out that Shaw's plays do not mean what his prefaces said they meant; it is only recently that we have come to see the discrepancy between the two as a sign of the fecundity of an artistic imagination that ran away with its possessor's rationally formulated propositions.

As with the art, so with the man—Shaw's self is more interesting than his statements about himself would lead one to believe. Such assertions need to be placed in perspective, viewed in relation to one another, and finally integrated with our knowledge of the whole man. While one cannot criticize Weintraub's thoroughness and objectivity, one comes away from this book with the feeling that what is needed is not an "autobiography" at all, but the definitive interpretive biography which B. C. Rosset has shown we shall probably never have.

Creator of Surfaces

THE O'HARA GENERATION. By John O'Hara. Random House. 491 pp. $6.95.

JOHN DWYER

Mr. Dwyer is a former fiction editor of the Chicago Review.

Stanley Kauffmann, in comparing a late collection of John O'Hara's stories with his early fiction, said that the experience was like watching an old Jimmy Stewart film on The Late Show. "You realize that, essentially, nothing at all has changed. The years have done nothing but age him; what was good remains good, what was bad remains bad. There has not even been deterioration, let alone development." The comparison works in all but one particular: Stewart on film may appear older from year to year, but O'Hara in prose doesn't age at all from story to story, decade to decade.

At least that is an impression one gets from reading these twenty-two stories selected from O'Hara's work during the years 1935-66. "The Doctor's Son" (1935) and "Fatimas and Kisses" (1966), the stories which begin and end the volume, give every appearance of having been written within a few weeks of each other. Both are "Jimmy Malloy" stories (the only ones in the collection), the first presenting Jimmy as a teen-ager, the second showing him at various stages of adolescence and early manhood. Both have as their surface interest Jimmy's observation of the progress and violent termination of certain sexual intrigues in Gibbsville; both also involve the problem of Malloy establishing his own identity in relation to the formidable personality of his father.

In "Fatimas and Kisses," by helping to fix the grounds for a plea of insanity, Malloy as a newspaper reporter saves a murderer from the electric chair. The act mirrors his father's career as a physician; it is also performed in the older man's inconspicuous manner. The autobiographical element of both stories is thinly veiled: put side by side, the events, even the minor touches, occur at about the same place in both texts. Although Malloy appears at the end of "Fatimas and Kisses" to have achieved —what he failed at in the earlier story— a satisfactory relation to the memory of his dead father, one marvels, extraneously perhaps, at the degree to which this particular theme engages the author in stories written some thirty years apart. Both stories properly could be titled "The Doctor's Son."

O'Hara's prose in the most recent stories is the same instrument with which he began his career thirty-five years ago. It is the prose of a writer who sees himself exclusively as a teller of tales. His style is seldom interpretive (Malloy is never Marlow). He rarely uses language to provide a dimension beyond the narrated events themselves. O'Hara's narrative stance has always been, in his best work at least, reportorial. His business is with "facts," with appearances, with people's speech, with nuances in manners, with life-styles. O'Hara, more often than not, has succeeded in placing his characters in a sharply defined milieu precisely because he is an expert in the creation of surfaces.

Such expertise of course accounts for O'Hara's reputation as a master of "social verisimilitude." All the stories in this collection, especially the longer ones

TWO VARIATIONS ON A THEME

1.

What's his offense?

He's young and lies with women in his imagination.
The apprehension of death
grips him by the neck.
He'll go as close to an old man as to a blubber washed up on the beach.

2.

What's his offense?

He will not look.
The face is too old.
He will not look.

CARL RAKOSI

GOING ON THIRTY

They still let us in the swamped doors of the Fillmore
if we have our straight's five.
I'm hunched toward the stage, a strange tidal bending, and it is the blackest sea this side of the moon.
Red lights, buoys stranded,
burn across dead space.
Those are the eyes of undersea gear that hauls up sound naked off the ocean floor.

When the waves, blue to purple to good-blood red, have battered all our ears back into these sober undefended heads, the dark comes on again. The lonesome little eyes stare back. No recognition.
I stiffen for a hard shove, myself against myself.
Oh I pity me! me! and trust no one,
I who love the stage dead,
nothing begun,
and the dark stalled up there, empty-handed.

ROSELLEN BROWN

FAITH OF OUR FATHERS

Now it is time to see what's left:
not much.
Gulls above the scrub pine, the tufted dunes—though nothing visible emits that low, slurred moan—, the graves in rows like a tray full of type.
What we have lost
you may guess by what we have kept.
We rise to sing
like beach grass swaying in the wind.
O hymn of salt, the pages of the hymnal riffling, turning at last by themselves.

WILLIAM MATTHEWS

FOR A SHETLAND PONY BROOD MARE WHO DIED IN HER BARREN YEAR

After bringing forth eighteen foals in as many Mays
you might, old Trinket girl, have let yourself be lulled this spring into the green days of pasture and first curl of timothy. Instead, your milk bag swelled again,
an obstinate machine.
Your long pale tongue
waggled in every feed box.
You slicked your ears back to scatter other mares
from the salt lick.
You were full of winter burdocks and false pregnancy.

By midsummer all the foals had breached, except the ghost you carried. In the bog where you came down each noon to ease your deer-thin hoofs in mud, a jack-in-the-pulpit cocked his overhang like a question mark.
We saw some autumn soon
